Lovely Woman

by ANGELA MORGAN

[On seeing the bales and boxes piled on the sidewalk in a busy downtown district; the myriad shops; the endless procession of trucks and drays; the seething traffic.]

That you shall be dressed in a gossamer gown,
With pearls for your fingers and plumes for your head;
That you shall be jeweled and pampered and fed
A thunder of traffic is heard in the town.
Oh! millions must work in the cold and the heat,
And thousands must suffer and many must die,
That you shall be charming and sweet to the eye
With beads for your bodice and silk for your feet.

To bring you a delicate veil for your face
The peace of the morning is shattered with noise;
That you shall have beauty and culture and poise
The city is robbed of its beauty and grace.
Oh, Bedlam is loose in the heart of the town
When bale upon bale from the caravan comes;
'Tis fiercer than armies and louder than drums . . .
That you shall be dressed in a gossamer gown!

The sea is your servant, the forests obey
The wish of your heart or the wave of your hand;
The beasts of the jungle are yours to command,
The bird and the reptile forever your prey.
O mothers of men, who have suffered so much,
O women whose wrongs have been heavy and sore,
The whip of the centuries stings you no more,
The earth is your vassal and moves at your touch.

The earth is your vassal, to bring you renown,
And man is your slave, who shall do as you bid;
No longer your queenly inheritance hid,
You conquer the world in your gossamer gown!

GRANDMOTHER
Because She Never Had
By GEORGE ADE

NO ONE ever finds out that there is a more delectable climate somewhere until he gets an elevated view—from the top of a bank account.

Almost anyone can stand the northern winters until a rich relative passes beyond.

When grandmother hung up her gleaming festoons of sausage and set away her snowy crocks of lard and fixed the buckwheat batter and looked across the fields to where the trudging boys were hunting rabbits—a wisp of blue smoke arising beyond the hillside and a muffled rhythm of sleigh bells from the old pike—she never was despondent over the fact that she would find it impossible to visit Palm Beach and smoke cigarettes in Cocoanut Grove.

She was calmly thankful that the wood box was full and that the quilting party on the ensuing Wednesday P. M. promised to be a riotous success.

We never miss the intoxicating privileges which we have not tasted.

The Florida habit will never down you if you keep away from Florida. But if you ever wear summer clothes all through one winter—good by! After that you are an addict.

The only climate almost satisfactory to the people who use it is that of California. Even in California, if you could find someone who was not a member of the Boosters' Club, you might learn that there are off days.

Those who have babied themselves by running away from cold weather rave against our northern winters. They ask you to believe that the best earthly imitation of Paradise is a monster wooden hotel, with syncopated music coming out of every window and getting tangled up in the palms.

Well, there is no denying that a blue sky, a blue sea, a soft breeze, a dazzling sunshine and a specially engaged mocking bird, broadcasting from the guava tree overhead, have something in the aggregate, on slippery sidewalks and busted water pipes. But you may have observed that the birds who fly south just after the holidays fly homeward in the spring, and the early spring at that! They love their orange blossoms, bougainvilleas and poincianas, but you will always find them back, waiting around with the rest of us, to welcome the June roses.

The hymnist was away off when he described Heaven as a place where "never ending spring abides and never fading flowers." He was thinking of the other place. Take an apple-pie Yank and plant him in Manila and, after he has been there three years, he will burst into tears every time he thinks of frost on the windows and turkey on the table. He is fed up on never fading flowers. What he wants to see is a snow bank.

The best climate to settle down with is one which guarantees definite changes of season. It must be nerve-wearing to live in a perfumed bower which looks just the same on Christmas Day as on July Fourth.

Something like keeping house with a beautiful woman who wears the same gown 365 days in the year and never changes any of those trifling but intriguing ornaments which keep the party of the second part interested and expectant.

And where the weather is always the same, what do people find to talk about?

Nearly every Northerner you meet among the southern sunny seas, wearing a white suit, will give you free of charge a tall drink and his plans for getting back home.

The average ration of climate for 1923, in your neighborhood, is going to be pretty good.

There will be more bluebirds than blizzards.

For nine months the lonesome dwellers of the north woods will envy you. For a somewhat different total of nine months the residents of the sun-baked tropics will envy you. For a grand total of about four months you will envy either the people who live among the chilly pines or those who sit under awnings among the stifled islands of the south.

Cheer up! You have all the best of the bookkeeping. Stop denouncing your home climate.

It is really almost respectable.

WHIPPOORWILLVILLE is one of those places where the train stops twenty minutes for dinner and the passengers who take a chance have from ten to fifteen minutes to spare, depending on how game they are. This gives them a chance to see the business district. They can see it in five minutes, or four, if they hurry, which allows ample time for them to get back on board and start wondering what all the delay is about before the locomotive comes to and goes on about its business.

To give you a further idea: No set of souvenir postcards showing views in and around Whippoorwillville has yet been printed; and the popular excitement throughout the country caused by the Eskimo pie had practically abated nearly everywhere else in the South-Central states before it even reached here.

The town never had a boom. Its population increases very slowly and only because, as the vital statistics covering any healthful community will show, there are more births than there are deaths. Rarely does anything new go up, but occasionally something old falls down. In fact, Whippoorwillville is what you would call a finished town. Enlarging the fact, you might say it has been finished since the Civil War. The biggest thing that ever happened there was a clash between Union home guards and Confederate partisan rangers, raiding in for horses and recruits. This happened the fall after Fort Sumter was fired on, but the older citizens speak of it as though it had occurred within these past few months. But the biggest thing of recent years was when Letty Ember went to New York to prosecute her art studies in that great center of culture and artistic endeavor.

Letty Ember was Whippoorwillville's acknowledged child of genius. She was its only such, so naturally her going away made talk beforehand and left a void afterward. Herself, she could not remember when the urge of her gift first came to her. It was of record in the family that almost from her cradle days on she had been, as the word is, "different." While other little girls were playing lady-come-to-see and cutting out paper dolls she drew pictures of things and painted them with water colors.

A paint box containing an assortment of pale lozenge-looking slabs and some very limber camels' hair brushes with quills for handles and two little mixing dishes like large white china buttons with the thread holes left out of them, was at six her most treasured possession. At school on Friday afternoons she was the one who was sent to the blackboard to write out mottoes and surround them with scrolls in red and white chalks. In a somewhat later period she won first prize at the Denton County Fair "for the best strictly original work of art executed by a resident of the county." Her offering was a study in oils—she had progressed by now to the stronger and more enduring medium—a fruit piece showing apricots, pears, grapes and a slice of an exceedingly ripe watermelon grouped on a marble slab. She was sixteen then and her father was postmaster under the second Wilson administration and they lived in one of the largest houses in town; the one with the two wooden cupolas on it and a railing around the roof, it being the same house which an architect from Boston, passing through on his way to Kansas City and seeing it from the car window, had said must certainly be the real Crime of 'Seventy-three.

When this honor came to Letty Ember, bestirring her ambition for achievements yet higher, she absolutely was self-taught; had never had a lesson. Her father was forever saying that one of these days he was going to send Letty off somewhere to study under a regular professional painter. But he never got round to it. There were several things he never got quite round to—taking out more life insurance, for one thing, and cleaning the dead stock out of his drug store and putting in a soda fountain and paying off his notes in the Dentondale bank. Death caught up with him while he had all of these projects still vaguely in mind. Letty was just past twenty when diabetes overtook the loiterer.

Meanwhile, those four years between her sixteenth birthday and her twentieth had not been wasted. The walls of the Ember home attested her industry and her versatility. For the most part her canvases, enclosed in scrolled and shiny frames, were copies of what might be called standard subjects—Spearing Salmon on the Columbia River, the Monarch of the Glen, Our Darlings, the Grand Canal (Venice) at Sunset, Pompeiian Flower Girl, Kittens at Play, Pharoah's Chariot Horses.

She was that bad!

Block From Fifth Avenue

Eddie selfishly desired that Letty should bide where she was, but she told him her career must come first; to it she must sacrifice all else.

She was worse than that. She had no part of talent in her, but only a laborious knack for laborious imitation. Had there been in her a single smoldering little spark of the fire called inspiration she would somehow have guessed a way through her ignorance and the isolation, through her lack of craftsmanship even, to the rights of things. All about her were beauties that cried aloud in their loneliness for an artist to catch them and hold them in his webs of color—the neighborly foothills in wintertimes under snow; the jade-green river bottoms in the spring; the woods in the fall, with the hickories yellowing up and the ash purpling and the sour-gum dripping leaves like drops of blood where it had been bitten in Jack Frost's first attack; bits of dusty roadside of the summer, when the wilted mullein lolled out its furred tongues to show how poorly it stood the heat, and the "nigger-heads" brocaded the shoulders of the turnpike with golden epaulettes; darky types and town characters and awkwardly picturesque country folks; faces, shapes, figures; shadows and lights and moods—on every side, tendering themselves to her in a spendthrift prodigality. But she could not see them; the eyes of her soul were blinded to their wealth and their variety. Besides, there was nobody to tell her. So she went on desecrating ells of good cloth-weave with blobs of misused pigments. And Whippoorwillville's commonplace judgment held her as one favored beyond the ordinary daughters of ordinary men.

She went on so and thus until her father forevermore put aside all earthly consideration of those unstarted plans of his. Her mother already was dead. She was the mistress of her own acts thenceforward and the estate which had been left by the lately deceased was hers now to do with as she might devise. It was not much of an estate. When the funeral had been paid for and the just debts settled there was put into her hands a total amounting to slightly less than eleven hundred dollars. For the carrying out of her purpose she figured, though, it would be enough—if she stinted and stretched the pennies. To be sure, there was the heavy item of her consolidated entrance fees and her student dues for the first quarter; these would necessitate a seriously large outlay at the very beginning. But with her native abilities and her willingness to work hard she should go ahead fast and go ahead far. For any immediate privations she would be bountifully repaid in a few months, or in a year or two, at most, when there came to her recognition, honors, repute. You must excuse her for her vanity. For so far back as her memory ran she had been fed on the honest praise and honest loyalty of a community where local pride made up for many things lacking.

Naturally, Whippoorwillville, considered as a whole, approved of her decision. Eddie Sackett did not, it is true; but then, Eddie Sackett scarcely counted, he being as one against many. For his part, he selfishly desired that Letty should bide where she was and keep on being engaged to him. He wrote the Whippoorwillville Notes for the Dentondale Weekly Sun-Independent, which paid him six dollars a week, and he made fifteen dollars a week more as depot agent. He had prospects of a raise in salary; the railroad had shown signs of being not unmindful of faithful service and painstaking attention to details. On the enhanced income, he figured, two might live almost as cheaply as one. Married to him, Letty could go on with her painting; on his word of honor he pledged himself to it.

But she had read somewhere that domestic life was crippling, nearly always, to a successful artistic career, a clog on the winged foot of genius. She had visions of herself in a noble high studio fronting canvases of great price. With this vision were interwoven other delectable pictures in which she invariably was the main and central figure—the pet of the Four Hundred, accepting commissions from distinguished and worshipful patrons; taking medals at the Academy; cooking chafing dish suppers in a vastly becoming smock for guests recruited from the aristocracy of Bohemia; queening it at artists' revels. This conglomerate vision came swiftly between her and the present sight of Eddie's hurt, grieving face; his counter-arguments were lost in the rolling of great drums. She told him her chosen work must come first; to it she must sacrifice all else—or at least for the next few years she must. She owed it to herself; she owed it to her art.

For art's sake she already had decided to alter the spelling of her name. As Letitia she had been christened, Letty she had been called, but Leatrice she would hereafter be, both to her friends and to the general public. It was a name she had found in a moving picture magazine. Immediately she had been drawn to it; she felt that it fitted. And he, in his journalistic capacity, might, if agreeable to him, be the medium of advertising the change to the world at large. Leatrice—the very estate and sound of it seemed somehow to emphasize to him the depth and the width of the gulf opening between them. But he promised.

So Eddie, taking his bruised heart off his sleeve and putting it back in his breast to ache intolerably there, wrote for the top item of his weekly column one beginning: "All Whippoorwillville and vicinity are agog this week over the forthcoming departure of Miss Leatrice Ember, of here, rarely gifted daughter of the estimable late Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Ember, for the teeming metropolis of Greater New York City where she will——" and so forth and so on, twenty-odd lines of it, concluding with the ringing summary: "Our loss is Gotham's gain!"

He meant it, too, his valedictory flourish. You see, touching on Letty's future, Eddie had no doubts. Here at least he was in confident accord with his fellow Whippoorwillvillians. This was what made the parting all the harder for him—this sincere conviction that he was giving her up forever. You cannot hitch your depot agent to a star, and down in his soul Eddie knew it and by such knowledge was desolated utterly. Sense of an eternal loss drooped his shoulders as he walked across the echoing boards of the platform and into his little rabbit hutch of a station on a given date after Number Seven, east-bound, due in at six twenty-two, due out at six twenty-four, had pulled away, bull's-eyeing straight into the round red target of sun-up.

Number Seven was carrying her off to join an innumerable caravan which journeys to besiege a heaven-piercing city of admirable desires. It is a caravan that is formed of youth. Its baggage train is loaded with hopes. The quick march of optimism briskens its processional step. Blithe old General Ego rides on ahead, in full command. But ultimately—of course, there has to be an ultimately, else many folks would never wake up from their day-dreaming at all—the long casualty lists of disillusionment and despair will claim most of the names on this army's muster roll. Pardon me if I seem here to overstress the hyperbole; maybe I have been reading too many moving picture sub-titles lately.

Even so, facts are facts, no matter what fine feathers of language you dress them up in. And it is a fact that New York is a place of immortal rewards and terrific mortality averages. But quoting percentage sheets never yet turned back a stripling's pilgrimage. You might just as well hang a Keep off the Grass sign on an oasis and expect the famished travelers from across the burning sands to read it and heed it and head back for home.

Just then, floundering about for metaphor, I said Eddie Sackett's beloved went, that morning, to join a certain caravan. Rather, I should have called it a children's crusade, for that precisely is what it is—a children's crusade recruited from the deep ranks of inexperience. The girl who sang so much better than the rest of 'em in the village choir; the youngster who made a sweepstakes of it in the crossroads class of elocution; the born hewers of wood, the predestined drawers of water, who nevertheless yearn to hew the dumb marble into lines of sculptured life and draw deathless pictures for a reverent posterity; a whole generation of mute, inglorious Miltons, aspiring to be mute no longer nor yet inglorious; young hallucinationists who diagnose as the pang of thwarted creation what really is the growing pains of their own mediocrity; auto-intoxicated adolescents mistaking the illusions of self-deception for a hankering after self-expression—by the dozen and the gross and the great gross they move on the city. Their going thither stands for dollars saved through patient sacrifice, for mortgages put on homesteads by flattered parents, for slender patrimonies to be spent, more often than not, on a vain quest.

You merely would be wasting your breath, though, did you, being wiser, try to warn the majority of them that inevitably and lamentably it must prove to be, for them, the very vainest of all possible quests. They are armored against your warnings in confidence which, so many times, is only another name for conceit. Why should they listen to you? There, at her harbor's head, sits New York, the magic town. By virtue of a witchcraft resident in her New York is going to provide them with those precious elements which, until now, through no inherent fault of theirs, they have been denied. It is New York that will make noble swans out of all little awkward goslings, that will turn these drab sparrows of the hedgerow into birds of paradise, that is craving to graft the notes of the nightingale upon the feeble larynx of the sandpiper. New York with its opportunities, its advantages, its instinct for recognition; New York with its schools of applied design, its schools of interior decorating, its schools of the dramatic arts and the plastic and the graphic; its schools of expression, its schools of voice culture and of music, its schools of making finished moving picture actors right out of the raw material—New York will somehow turn the trick. Good old appreciative, generous, discerning, observing, discovering New York!

Technique was all Letty needed to land her at the very top of the profession. Professor Beckermann told her so himself.

So the stage-smitten amateurs who have neither grace nor personality but only a pale mimetic quality come hurrying to her embrace. And would-be writers of embroidered tales, who lack in imagination, in perception, in all sense for the right weight and the right color of words—they come along, too. And the boy whom a niggardly nature designed with intent that he should spend his maturer years making neat blue stripes on the red spokes of new farm wagons—he comes. The trouble with him is he thinks he has been called into this earth to paint rings around the Old Masters. And with him mayhap comes his sister. But her happy delusion is that, concealed somewhere about her trivial person, are the sweeping forces of a queen of tragedy.

They have gone as far as they could go in their restricted environment. Circumscribed and secluded as they have been, they nevertheless have felt the urge. They have triumphed above cramping circumstance; they have outgrown the small towns; behold, they have broken the bars. Surely, with the ambition that is in them and the feel of latent power that stirs them, they must go high and far there in New York where the horizons are so broad; where atmosphere and association make for development; where the producing manager stalks for hidden talent in the highway and fame is hiding around every corner eager to pounce forth and tag any unknown juvenile phenomenon.

But the truth is that New York is an Iron Maiden that takes them in her arms only to crack their young bones and press out their blood. The reputable schools, the honest teachers, weed them out, keeping those who give promise of making dependable craftsmen, banning the rest. Some, discouraged at the outset and homesick and daunted by the chill indifference of the town, return whence they came. They are, by odds, the luckier of those who are discarded. Others, as yet unhumbled and more persistent in their belief in themselves, fall into the maws of sharks who ply a shark's trade of imposture and fakery on the marshy verges of the arts; and it is the lot of these victims to be carried along by cajolery and deceit and false guidance until they have been stripped of their savings; then, eventually, to be cast adrift. Here and there is one who, by reason of having real merit, wins and wins magnificently. The name of such a one is advertised to all the land. But the losers are not advertised. And only God Almighty knows what an annual bumper crop there is of the losers—that same compassionate Almighty who hearkens to the heartbroken sobs of some poor child alone, except for Him, in a hall bedroom, three floors up and all the way back, with her head buried in the slimsy pillows to shut out the hateful face of failure. But if her Maker did not graciously deign to plant the seeds of genius in her when He put her forth into the world, how can even He now piece together the scraps of her paltry, shattered little dream? Sooner or later, every Whippoorwillville sends its Letty Ember to the City.

But our present concern is with our own particular Letty Ember from this particular Whippoorwillville. Promptly, to Eddie and to others as well, she wrote back letters that mainly were punctuated with exclamation points; about every fifth word was heavily underscored. New York was so wonderful—three black lines for emphasis under the so and a big "!" to finish with. Photographs and souvenir views and printed descriptions did not begin to do it justice—it must be seen to be appreciated! One felt that in New York one could breathe, could expand, could grow! Surely one would never have time to get blue or faint spirited here with so much to see and so much to do and such splendid goals to work toward!

True, there had been one small vexation at the outset. She had not been able to get into the Art Students' League, as she had counted on doing. It seemed the classes were all full at present; but to offset this she had had a perfectly glorious piece of luck. She had been so fortunate as to be brought into contact with a Professor Beckermann, a very distinguished foreign painter, who took for his pupils only such beginners as had recognizable talent. He had condescended to look at those typical examples of her work which she had brought along to show what she could do. And he had been so enthusiastic over them, so sure of her ultimate triumph! Indeed, he had consented to take her on for a series of private lessons. She was to call him "Master"; all his scholars called him "Master"! Under him she would have individual attention, while at the Art League she merely would have been one of a group. He had explained to her the eminent advantages of this over the class system. It was bound to be a tremendous help to her; she would go forward so much faster than otherwise she could hope to go. And Professor Beckermann was so picturesque, so unconventional in dress and manner, so charmingly Bohemian! With him, surroundings seemed to count for nothing; he lived solely for his art. And he had technique at his very finger tips! And technique was all that she needed to land her at the very top of the profession. He had told her so himself. Wasn't she the lucky girl?

It must be confessed that living was very dear in New York. Everything cost ever so much more than the same thing would cost back home. And, of course, it was not to be expected that anyone, let alone a little stranger from the country, should have the benefit of the Master's skill and knowledge without paying for it. But putting up with a few discomforts now only meant that supreme success would be coming all the sooner. Good by, and give her love to everybody. Already, Whippoorwillville seemed a million miles away. She was, in conclusion, Fondly, Leatrice.

Those first letters came in a white flock. It was as though she desired that at once and at first hand all her friends should know from her how promising the outlook was and how determined she was that they, who were so very proud of her, should never be disappointed in her. Later, there was a space—a very blank space for Eddie Sackett—when she did not write. To himself Eddie strove manfully to find excuses for her silence. She must be terribly busy; he could appreciate what heavy demands New York must be making upon her, socially and otherwise. Still, if only about once in so often—say, once every two weeks—she could steal the time to send him a line, that certainly would help him to bear the separation better. He kept on writing to her.

Finally a letter from her did come. It would appear that since he last heard from her there had been certain changes in her plans. For one thing, she had about decided, temporarily at least, to take up commercial designing—posters for advertisements and trade illustrations, etc., etc., etc.; she had been given to understand that these things paid very well. This, of course, did not mean that she had lost interest in her more serious work. That always would be her real forte. But she merely thought of adding on the other for the time being, as a sort of sideline. She did not mention Professor Beckermann in connection with this venture. In fact, she did not mention him at all this time; presumably he was to be taken for granted. Also she had another important piece of news: Eddie would be interested to hear that she no longer was staying in that stuffy, crowded old boarding house on west Fifty-seventh Street. She had rented "bachelor girl quarters" farther downtown, so that she might have her workshop right there in her own snug, quiet little housekeeping apartment. She was now—just think of it—in the very heart of the city, only one block from Fifth Avenue! And Eddie, of course, knew what Fifth Avenue was—the street of the most fashionable shops and the most exclusive clubs, with some of the largest hotels and lots of the leading theaters within easy walking distance. She thought it would be rather nice if Eddie would be so good as to write one of his pieces, mentioning this fact, for the Dentondale Sun-Independent. Everybody in Whippoorwillville and probably a lot of other people in Denton County would be thrilled to hear where she had moved to. That is to say, he need not give the exact address which she now sent him; it would be sufficient if he stated that her present location was just one block from Fifth Avenue, with all its life and gaiety. (Signed) Affectionately, Leatrice.

Eddie did as requested. He was proud to do it and Whippoorwillville was proud to read the tidings. He sent on the printed clipping of what he wrote in his next letter, which went forward three days later, immediately after the current week's issue of the paper came out. In the letter he rather betrayed his private feelings. He admitted to deep regret that she seemed to be forgetting those at home who cared for her; at least, she certainly was neglecting them so far as the United States mails were concerned. He appreciated the difference in their relative positions these days—he plodding along in a poky little backwoods hole, she going ahead so rapidly in the artistic circles of Greater New York City. But with all that, he still only could trust and pray that she would not entirely cease to remember those happy days gone by which they had spent together. Eddie could do some underscoring himself when the occasion called for it.

A month later he got a scrap of a letter from her—no more than a dozen lines on one side of a half-sheet of note paper. Reading it, he judged that some little thing must have upset her. It ran like this:

Eddie Dear—I have not forgotten you. I'm not going to forget you. Nearly all the time these days I think of you and of those who really cared for me formerly and believed in me. Oh, Eddie, I couldn't ever go back home if I failed, could I? Oh, Eddie, it's awful hard sometimes to keep on being brave when you're all by yourself nearly always. I don't suppose there's any place where a person can get to be as lonely as they are in a big city. Letty

Eddie decided she must have been very much upset indeed to forget that her name now was Leatrice. Well, the weather had been terribly hot all the week in Whippoorwillville. It must have been hot in New York, too. Maybe it was the weather that had got on her nerves.

He carried the letter about with him, reading it frequently and puzzling over it. It was the last letter he had from her. He was regularity itself, though—never let a week pass without writing.

One block from Fifth Avenue is Sixth. Now in New York, as has been stated by someone with almost an Old Testamental value of the strength of the repetitive, there are streets and streets. There are streets such as you may see in any one of half a dozen seaboard cities; and there are streets which in all main essentials might as well be the streets which parallel them. Parts of Eighteenth Street could be blended into Twenty-eighth or Thirty-eighth and nobody would mark the difference because there wouldn't be any difference to mark; the materials would match. Avenue A and Avenue B are twins. I know a stretch in Tenth Avenue which seems to have been copied, with a rare fidelity, from a stretch in Eleventh.

Then again there are streets such as you'll find nowhere else; streets which, having each one its own special individuality, are never by any chance to be confounded with any other streets there or elsewhere. They are the lines of character in the face of the city.

Take Wall Street; that's a deep wrinkle of avarice in Manhattan's lower jaw. Take Riverside Drive. On second thought, don't; it already has been taken by gas tanks, billboards, the New York Central tracks and miles of the homeliest apartment houses on this footstool—a natural glory spoiled by squatter sovereignty. Take Broadway, which in the nighttime is a broad yellow streak down the spine of the town but which by day is seen to be dying of the same disease that killed the Bowery—over-advertisement. Take the Bowery, smelling of stale memories, a stiff in a dirty winding sheet. Take Fifth Avenue if you can afford it. And take Sixth when you can afford nothing else. She's guaranteed not to be too rich for your blood.

Measured by feet, they lie within the span of a seventh of a mile, roughly. Yet by all other standards they are a thousand miles apart. Three minutes of brisk walking takes you from one to the other but takes you also into a distant world; there's a Great Divide between them. Fifth Avenue always is avowedly herself. With clumpings here and there of big shops and hotels, bits of Sixth Avenue achieve a localized imitation of the rich sister—Cinderella trying on the silver slipper. But, mainly, Sixth Avenue keeps her own personality, too, and frankly is what Fifth might have been if Fifth hadn't had nearly all the luck in the family. Fifth is the front show window; Sixth is the alley fence at the back. Even their currents flow contrariwise. Fifth runs uptown into billions; Sixth pours downtown into poverty. One lives on yellowbacks; the other thrives on the pennies. Fifth comes springing out of Washington Square to sweep irresistibly northward; Sixth goes sliding south from the haggard and consumptive trees of Central Park to lose itself finally in some most dismal labyrinths of the Lower West Side. A dollar doesn't get you anywhere at all on Fifth; on Sixth a thin dime gives you a fair run for your money. One is whipped cream; the other mostly is what was left over when they got through with the skimming. Dives rides through Fifth; Lazarus slouches along Sixth, panhandling as he goes. Multiply the similes for as long as pleases you; every time you'll get the same result.

A proper studio should have a north light. But the window in the room of this artist looked eastward. There was only the one window; the wall breadth could not have accommodated two and still leave a place for the head of (Continued on page 141)

The PARIS of My Dreams

Illustration by

THERE is a delightful comic opera clatter and bang to a Paris morning. It arises from sleep with song as naturally as the pine springs to the sun.

Down in the hallway the concierge is opening and slamming doors. His wife trills over the morning skillet. The butcher boy's dog yips a joyous greeting.

In the narrow back streets the huckster is tooting his raucous roundelay.

Around the corner a group of singing students are on their way to onion soup—the last lap of a night of revelry. A gendarme steps out from shelter, plucks his silken mustache, gives a hitch to his shoulder cape, shrugs and turns away.

Early workers are singing and whistling on their way. From the boulevards, a-crawl with kitten-power taxis, comes the incessant squeak of horns. Paris is awake.

Old men with their market baskets gesticulate wildly on the sidewalk. Parks ring with childish shouts. Tourists swarm about the boulevard tables. Little shops ripple with morning trade. A nightmare of materialism—radiant, effervescing. Paree! Paree!

Along the Boulevard des Capucines amid the delirium of the noontime rush, traffic clotted. A black hearse with an oval mirror halted at the curb.

Detaching herself from the crowd, a laughing midinette carrying her showy milliner's box moved up to the mirror, powdered her cheeks, brightened her lips and swept onward.

She is the spirit of Paris. Blithe, vain and smiling at the shadows.

Paris is hiding its scars. Torn, ravaged, it still laughs and loves with the lightness of its champagne foam.

It may be as fickle as the smiles of its courtesans, but I tell you it is the ideal spot to play, the hole in the garden wall where one may hide one's grief.

More than ever is it pitching its gaiety to the highest tempo, caring not for the day or hour but only for the moment.

Purple pasts fade spotlessly white in the eternal present. The ear is not attuned to gossip.

What matter if the lady in an international marriage was once "registered" at the Café de Paris?

That is a matter that Paris applauds.

The worldly adventuress runs her gamut of liaisons and settles down at a peaceful villa in wedded respectability. And not a tongue wags.

The rich dowager takes her foppish amant to tea at the Ritz, openly pays the check and at night sits with her husband at the opera in a halo of domestic bliss.

In a castle along the Bois lives the demimondaine. She has unlimited credit at the smartest shops and lolls in the perfumed languor of her especially built motor. Head waiters bestow their lowest bow.

And that is why Paris, despite its terraced loveliness, architectural grandeur, spacious parks and ribbon-smooth boulevards, smacks of a certain ugliness.

I talked to a Frenchman at a sidewalk table in front of the Café de la Paix—that historic corner restaurant where all the world drifts by. Sipping his chocolat, he was thrilling to the wonders of his city.

In the same breath that he described the beauty of the Arc de Triomphe he whispered the lure of the famous brothel, "The House of All Nations."

Contrast tumbles breathlessly upon contrast in this amazing Paris. It teems with lights and shadows.

In twenty minutes by motor one may be whisked from a den of throat-slitting Apaches to some tiny village, like a Callot engraving, with hens pecking and cocks crowing before the doors.

There are scarred inns with creaking signboards swinging in the wind and little farms with dovecotes, barns and sheepfold. And at the turn in the road frightful shell holes epitomizing the German fury.

One motors up to the breath-taking beauty of the palace gates at Versailles to learn that yesterday 10,000 curious stood all night in a drizzling rain to see a Bluebeard's head drop in a basket.

The Rue de la Paix, that short strip of fashion center, crackles with light and beauty. A few steps away one turns into the Rue de Rivoli to behold a frightful figure at a sidewalk table. He has long matted hair and beard and snips silhouettes with a deformed hand that has but two fingers. And his venerable body is swathed in crêpe.

In mid-afternoon, when the sun-dappled Champs Elysées is gayest with strollers, the chattering crowds sweep up to the arch, suddenly hush and tiptoe away. The specter is there—the freshly kept grave of the unknown soldier.

Even in that magic hour when the Champs is at its best with the parade of fashion, the blare of bands, the gaily caparisoned broughams flashing by, there is the feeling that it is only tinsel that hides a bleeding heart—a brooding tragedy wearing the mask of the mime.

I asked a Frenchman about this.

"What you sense, my friend," he said, "is that no matter how gay our people are, far off they hear the faint rattle of muskets."

Swinging from the shadows to the lights—from tragedy to jazz.

At four in the afternoon when sleepy eyed Montmartre awakens to slink to the cafés for bracers, the fun begins. Every café is featuring jazz. Art Hickman is cheered along the streets.

The darky who can syncopate is a figure. In his off moments he occupies choice tables in the best cafés. He promenades the boulevards with ravishingly beautiful Parisian belles.

France is quite fascinated by the American negro. His stock soared higher when a negroid featured Senegalese battered Gorgeous Georges almost beyond repair. The boulevards ring with "Vive le Siki!"

It is typical of the French to seize every opportunity to idolize. It helps them forget.

An American negro from Birmingham who sells newspapers in the Place de l'Opèra wears a silk hat, white spats and carries a cane.

"Hot diggedy dog!" he exclaimed. "This town is sho'ly the cat's vest. Colored folks is quality."

At the American bar, a New York singer, who sang in the back room of Kelly's on Houston Street, was a season sensation. His name went up in electric lights a few steps from the fashionable Rue de la Paix.

Paris elegantes flocked to hear a pale-faced youth with wistful voice sing of Kansas City Kitty and Montmartre Rose. A blond coon shouter reigns at the Acacia. So it goes.

The Montmartre café life is a cross-section lifted from old Broadway—the same faces, the same settings. Only at sunrise do the doors of night close.

I sing of Paris "wickedness" for sightseers. What a sham it is. In downtown streets the professional guides whisper to strangers of "The Mystery Dance" and "The Dawn Soirée."

Save that they are held in dank cellars on the left bank of the Seine, they are not different from the hoochie dancers that village constables drive from the circus lots.

Paris "wickedness" is staged like that of New York's Chinatown for the wide-eyed yapwagon riders.

The real vices of Paris are gilded and are not for the bourgeoisie.

No visitor can withstand the supreme beauty of a Paris night—the perfumed loveliness of the Tuileries, the etching of Eiffel Tower against the plush of night, the shadowy dignity of the Bois and that oddly mysterious hush that comes to the streets.

When the faint flush of morning is hung in Paris skies, there comes the rhythmic throb of hoofbeats like the rise and fall of a fountain.

Toward the market moves the age-old cavalcade of creaking carts, piled high with carrots, cabbages and cauliflower—the peasant drivers nodding on their perches.

From the Tuileries Gardens a plumed bird circles low and with a glad cry wings upward toward the dawn.

Again, the delightful clatter and bang.

Paris is awakened to another glorious day.

A Résumé of Parts One to Three:

CALLED El Hakim—the Desert Healer—by the Arabs, among whom he is a beloved figure, Sir Gervas Carew is a man of mystery to the European colony of Algiers. Years before the young wife he worshiped had run off with an Austrian count, leaving Carew's infant son dying; and the double tragedy had made of him a misogynist distrusting and despising all women. He had come to Algeria to blot out memory in ministering tirelessly to the medical needs of the desert Arabs, whose dress he wore and whose wild life he lived with his faithful attendant Hosein and his adopted protégé, the blind waif Saba. Because he was implicitly trusted by the Arabs, he was able incidentally to perform certain delicate diplomatic services for the French government, by whom he was held in high regard.

One night all the old wounds of remembrance he had thought healed are torn open when, riding alone toward his camp at Blidah, he is startled by a woman's screams for help. In a fierce combat he rescues her from an outcast Arab, Abdul el Dhib, who had abducted her; and because she is almost overcome by her experience, he is compelled to take her to his camp before he can escort her back to Algiers.

The girl is Marny Geradine, whose husband, Sir Clyde, is a notorious drunken reprobate. When she was scarcely more than a child he had practically bought her as the price of saving her dissolute brother from disgrace; and for five years she had lived with him a life of torment. To Marny, the contact with Carew's chivalry, stern and reticent though it be, and the free ride with him across the sands, are a Heaven-sent experience, the sweeter in memory by contrast with her husband's brutal embraces when he returns home from a hunting trip next day. Even though she thinks Carew an Arab because of his native garb, she realizes she is well-nigh in love with him.

Shortly afterwards, as Carew is returning from a visit to a sheik in Algiers, he again meets Marny, who had lost her way in the native quarter. This time he saves her from a gang of Arab gamins, from whose tormenting attentions she had tried to rescue a stray dog. Carew is now in European dress and she is startled to find him an Englishman. For his part he is more deeply and unwillingly stirred than ever by this second encounter; and he leaves her with a purposely brusque farewell. For days, indeed, he had been unable to thrust her from his thoughts, and from the Governor he had learned something of the character of her husband.

That night, at the opera with the Governor, Carew sees Geradine for the first time and the man at once arouses in him an instinctive and murderous hatred which he is at a loss to understand.

The Desert Healer

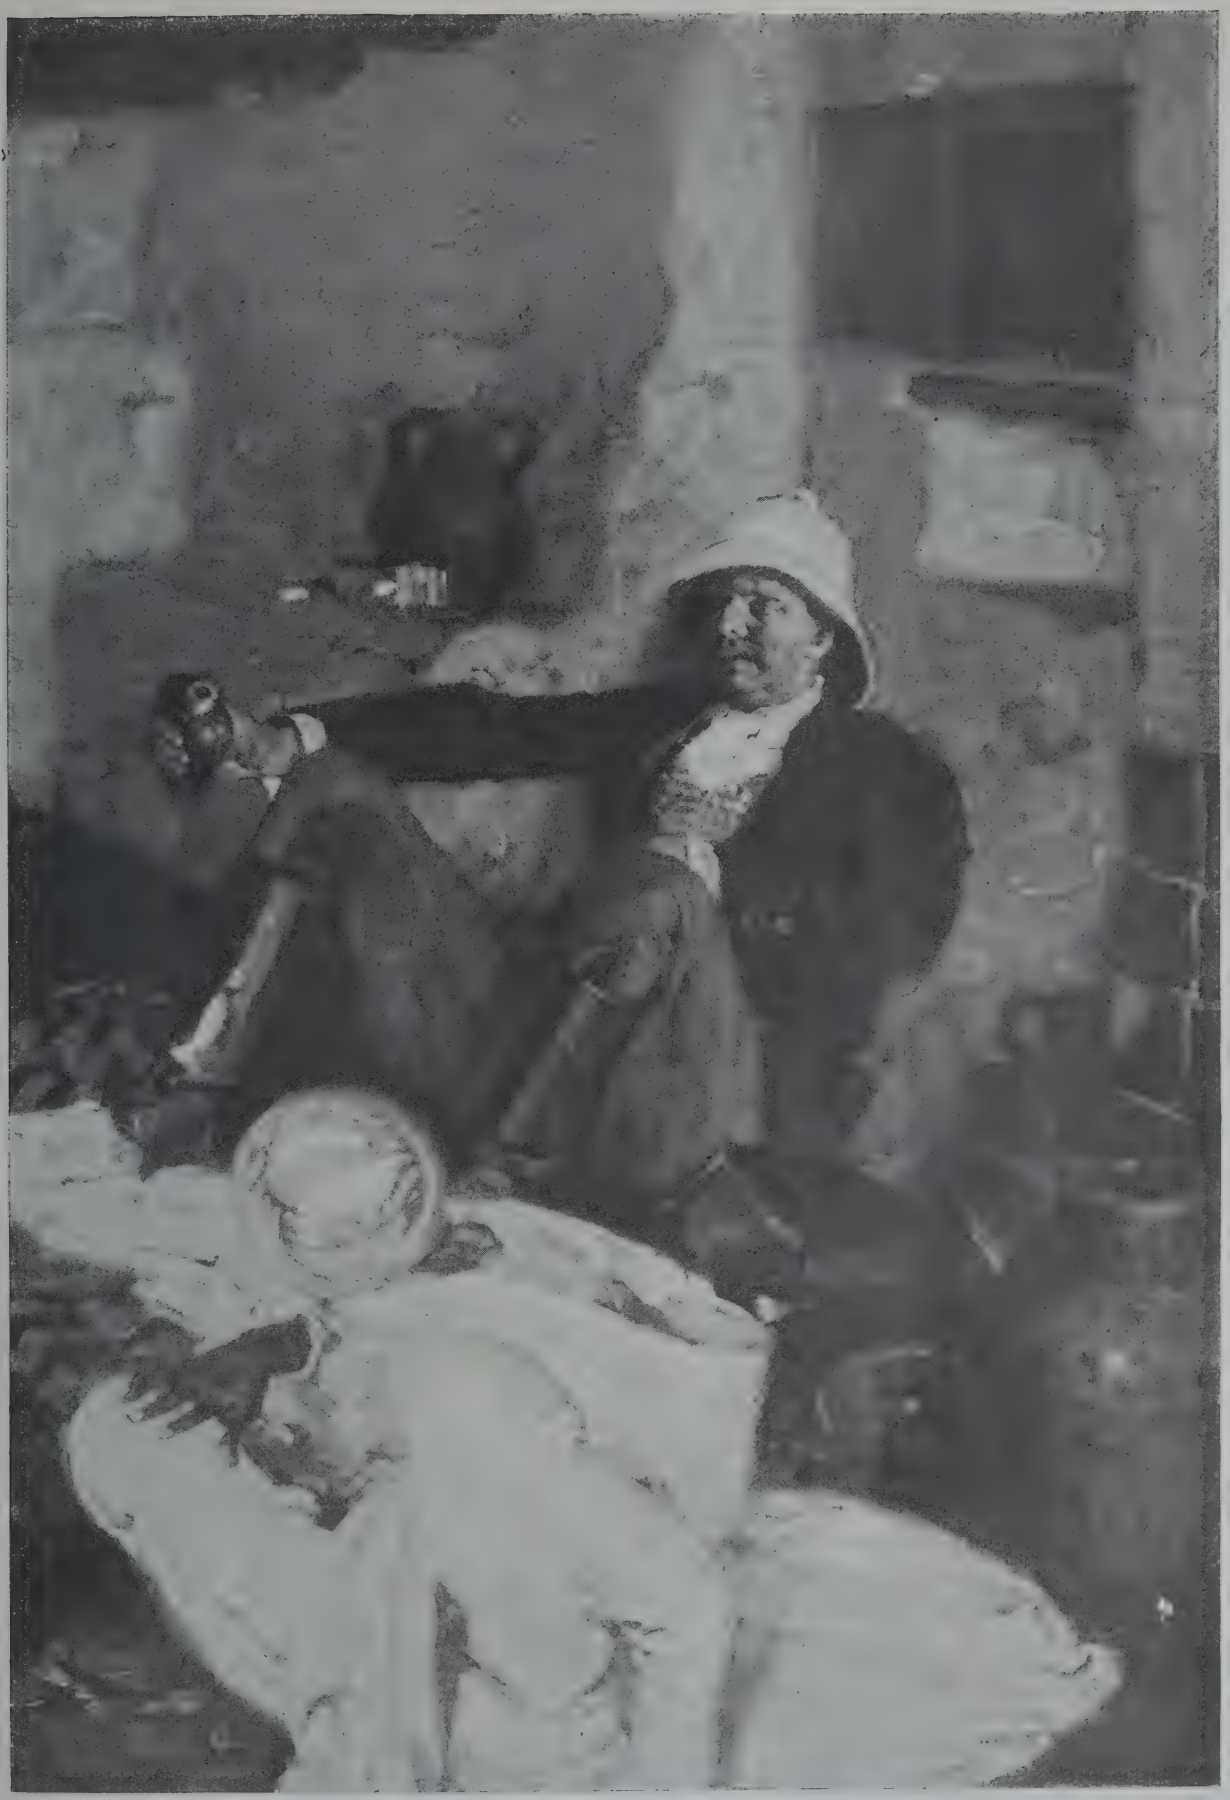
Carew's days are now an emotional turmoil, with the picture of Marny constantly before him. To forget, he contemplates an expedition to the mysterious and hostile City of Stones, but he is forced to postpone this because General Sanois, commander of the French Algerian forces, urgently requests that he undertake an expedition of another kind on behalf of the government. Impatiently awaiting the completion of arrangements, Carew goes to his Blidah camp. Returning from it one morning, he is mysteriously warned by an Arab café proprietor that his life is in danger. This supplements other warnings he had received, notably an instinctive dread for his life on the part of little Saba; and he has now no doubt that Abdul el Dhib is seeking vengeance.

That same morning, on the outskirts of Algiers, he again meets Marny, and yielding to her entreaty talks of his life in the desert. Marny listens spellbound, scarcely able to conceal the emotion that chokes her in the presence of the man she now knows she loves. Carew is startled by the approach of her groom, thinking it is Abdul. As he leaves he warns Marny never to travel away from Algiers unescorted.

Part Four: CHAPTER VI

IT WAS late in the afternoon when Carew rode into Algiers to keep the appointment made over the telephone that morning.

At the moment General Sanois was living in barracks and Carew found him in his private room sitting alone before a huge desk that was heaped with a mass of papers. At



With growing hatred and disgust Carew listened to the uninterrupted flow of evil language. Was his entrance the General rose and held out a welcoming hand.

"Well," he said eagerly, "you have decided?" and sank back into his chair with a little exclamation of satisfaction as Carew nodded affirmatively.

"You relieve me of a difficulty, mon cher," he went on, pushing papers and telephone on one side to make room for the map he spread out with almost affectionate care. "I was at my wits' end to find a substitute. My own men are no use; an officer would never get past the frontier. I think I shall not be wrong in saying that you will not fail," he added confidently.

Carew smiled faintly at the implied compliment, which he knew to be no idle one but a genuine expression of opinion.

"I'll do my best," he said briefly, with a slight shrug of embarrassment; "but I am not infallible," he added, "and if I fail?"

"You will at least have had a charming excursion," cut in Sanois laughingly.

Carew hitched the folds of his heavy burnous closer round him and drew his chair nearer to the table.

"I am ready to start almost at once. My own preparations can be concluded in a week. I am anxious to get out of Algiers, and if you keep me waiting indefinitely—well, then I can't promise that when you want me you will find me." He smiled at Sanois's whistle of dismay.

"A week?" he said rather doubtfully. "You don't give us much time, my friend. But I'll do what I can. And now to business."

When the details of the expedition had been discussed in every particular and Carew rose at last to go, night had fallen.

The air was strangely soft, heavy with the scent of flowers, and a brooding silence that was reminiscent of the solemn hush of the desert seemed to have closed down over all nature. Not a tree moved, not a dog barked, and Carew had the curious feeling that he was riding through a place of the dead. Amongst the Arabs it was an omen of death, a sure and certain sign that for some human soul the wings of Azrael were beating downward from the realms of the blessed. For his?. With a philosophical shrug he turned in the saddle to look back at the newly risen moon, a crescent slip of silver hanging low in the east, and then sent Suliman flying in the direction of his villa.

In the Moorish hall, brilliantly lighted by three large hanging lamps of beaten silver, Saba was waiting. And as his sensitive ears caught the almost imperceptible sound of soft leather against the marble pavement, he darted forward with a wild cry of joy and fell, laughing and sobbing together, into the arms stretched out to catch him. Tossing him up on his shoulder Carew carried him, chattering with excitement, through the jasmine-scented courtyard to the big bedroom at the back of the house, there to cope with a flow of endless questions. The boy continued to chatter throughout the length of the formal dinner served by Derar and Hosein.

Though preferring the simplicity of camp life, Carew in his town house followed early traditions and maintained a certain state and ceremony. But this evening he glanced about him once or twice during the protracted meal with a faintly puzzled look in his somber eyes. What made the room tonight appear so empty—so chill and lifeless? It was not the lack of guests that troubled him—he was used to being alone—but a strange yearning for something he was at a loss to define. Was it the preliminary warning of middle age that, urging a remembrance of his forty years, had induced the unaccustomed feeling of lassitude and melancholy that seemed to have taken hold of him? He almost laughed at the thought.

Calling to Saba, he went out on to the wide veranda that overlooked the garden.

For a while he smoked in a silence that was punctured at intervals by the blind boy's fitful remarks, to which he replied briefly with an inattention that was not lost upon his small companion, for gradually he too fell silent.

The night was very still. Directly before the veranda a broad streak of moonlight stretching like a path of silver to the distant boundary wall made blacker the darkness that enveloped the rest of the garden, where trees and flowering shrubs loomed large and fantastic in the murky gloom. The heavy scent of flowers was almost overpowering, languorous and sleep-inducing as the smell of incense. And the brooding hush that Carew had noticed earlier in the evening seemed now even more penetrating and intense. He was not given to imagination, but he could not rid himself of the impression of a coming calamity that momentarily made him more wide awake and alert. With the sense of waiting there came again the feeling of depression and melancholy he had experienced during dinner. How empty and lonely the house had seemed! He had never noticed it before. Why did he notice it now?

As he pondered it there seemed to rise before him the semblance of a figure standing in the brilliant strip of moonlight; a slender, graceful figure whose boyish riding dress no longer moved him to intolerant disgust. For an instant he stared almost with fear at the delicate oval face that appeared so strangely close to his, looking straight into the pain-filled, haunting eyes that seemed to be tearing the very heart out of him. Then an oath broke from his lips and in the revulsion of feeling that swept over him he wrenched his gaze away, cursing the day he had ever seen her.

A stifled whimper and a tiny hand slid tremblingly into his made him realize the passionate utterance that had been forced from him. He caught the boy in his arms and soothed him with remorseful tenderness. "Angry with thee—when am I ever angry with thee, thou little foolish one?" he murmured gently in response to the sobbing question that came muffled from the folds of his robes in which Saba's head was buried. Content with his answer, the child lay still. The clinging touch of his fingers, the soft warm weight of his slim little body brought a measure of consolation to the lonely man who held him.

Carew had been up since before daybreak, and lulled by the intense quiet and the heaviness of the night he began to be aware that drowsiness was stealing over him. He was almost asleep when the vague impression of a distant sound, a curious slithering sound that ended in a faint thud, penetrated to his only half conscious mind and roused him to sudden and complete wakefulness. The noise seemed to have come from the farther end of the garden. Who was abroad in the garden at this time of night?

As he stared keen-eyed into the darkness his brain was working rapidly. He had thought the child to be asleep but from a slight movement in his arms he knew that Saba too was awake and listening intently. To get the boy away before the happening he believed inevitable was his first care. Without altering his own position he slid him silently behind the chair with a low injunction to go. But with a passionate gesture of refusal Saba clung to him and Carew was obliged to use unwilling force to unclasp the slender fingers twined desperately in his thick burnous.

"Go!" he whispered again peremptorily. And as the boy crept slowly away he leaned forward in his chair once more, waiting with braced muscles and straining ears.

But the few moments' attention given to Saba had been moments used by another to advantage. The attack came with noiseless suddenness, from a quarter he least expected, and it was only his acute sense of smell that saved him. With the rank animal-like odor of the desert man reeking in his nostrils, he leaped to his feet, swerving as he turned. And his quick, instinctive movement saved his life, for the driving knife-thrust aimed at his heart failed in its objective and glanced off his arm, gashing it deeply. With a snarl of rage el Dhib thrust again. His right hand temporarily numbed and unable to draw the revolver at which his blood-drenched fingers fumbled nervelessly, Carew caught the swinging arm with his left hand and flung his whole weight forward against his opponent. They fell with a crash, the Arab undermost, and grappled in the darkness.

Crippled, Carew at first could do little more than retain his hold, but as the numbness passed from his wounded arm he managed with a desperate effort to jerk himself upward until his knees were pressing with crushing force on Abdul's chest and rigid forearm. Rolling sideways, he tore the knife from the fingers that clung to it tenaciously. But the maneuver cost him the advantage he had gained. With a lithe panther-like movement of his sinewy body, the Arab slipped uppermost, his hands at the other's throat.

Conscious that he was fighting for his life, Carew put forward his utmost power to meet the strength he knew to be equal to his own. Locked in a mortal embrace that seemed to admit of only one ending, they struggled with deadly purpose, writhing to and fro on the floor of the veranda until a sidelong jerk from one of them sent them over the edge and they rolled, still gripping fiercely, into the garden beneath.

The drop was a short one, but in falling Carew's head struck against the abutment of the marble stairway and for a moment he lay stunned. And Abdul, who had fallen on top of him, was not able to complete the work he had begun. Warned by the lights that flashed up in the villa, unable to recover the knife he had lost, with a parting curse he turned and ran for the shelter of the shadowy trees. Still dazed from the blow on his head, Carew staggered to his feet and stood staring stupidly after him. But as the flying figure almost reached the friendly darkness that would cover his flight the momentary cloud lifted from Carew's brain and he wrenched the revolver from his waistband. Yet with his finger pressing on the trigger he paused irresolute. Not at an unarmed man—not in the back! But the screaming whine of a bullet tearing past his head and a sharp crack behind him told him that Hosein was troubled by no such scruples. And with mingled feelings he watched Abdul el Dhib, caught at the moment he thought himself safe, plunge forward on his face and lie twisting in the agony of death.

When Carew reached him and, lifting him with practiced hands, supported him against his knee, the dying man's eyes rolled upward to the grave face bending over him and his contorted features relaxed in a grin of ghastly amusement.

"This was ordained, lord," he gasped painfully, a pinkish foam gathering on his lips. "Thou or I—and Allah has chosen. To Him the praise," he added mockingly, and choked his life away on the crimson tide that poured from his mouth.

CHAPTER VII

SILENCE had settled again over the little oasis which an hour before had been the scene of noisiest activity.

Scattered amongst the palms and thorn trees the débris of a camp evidenced the passing of a caravan, and three or four miles away the train of lurching camels with its escort of mounted Arabs was still visible moving steadily over the rolling waste, heading for the south. Seated cross-legged on the warm ground, idly dribbling sand through his long brown fingers, Carew watched it with a feeling of envy, longing for the time when he could once more lead his own caravan towards the heart of the great desert.

But for the promise made to General Sanois he would already have left Algiers. The small attraction the town had once had for him had vanished completely in the mental disturbance that had dominated him during the last few weeks. And Sanois's preparations dragged interminably. Daily Carew was tempted to put his half laughing threat into execution and abandon the whole enterprise. But he had given his word. There was nothing for it but to wait with what patience he could muster.

Out of tune with himself and his surroundings, he had gone for distraction to Biskra to attend the annual race meeting and for three crowded days he had been able partially to forget the strange unrest that beset him. But only partially. The little desert town, filled to overflowing for the great event of the year, was too small for chance meetings to be avoided and several times he had glimpsed Geradine, blustering and insufferable there as in Algiers. By keeping closely to his own circle of acquaintances Carew had escaped coming into contact with the man for whom he had conceived a hatred that was inexplicable. And in Biskra he had other interests besides the racing to engage his attention. Amongst the Arab chiefs who poured into the town from far and wide he had encountered many old friends.

It was in response to the earnest request of one of them that Carew had left Biskra early the previous day to ride with him the first couple of stages of a journey that would take the sheik weeks to accomplish.

Wrapped in his burnous, his face hidden in his arms, the sheik had slept throughout the hour of the siesta and not even the clamor and bustle of the departing caravan had roused him.

Now it was time, and past the time, that the chief should start to overtake the caravan that was no longer distinguishable, and time that Carew himself set out on the fifty mile ride back to Biskra. Traveling with no camping impedimenta to hinder him, he had reckoned on spending the night at a tiny village that was known to him and which made a convenient halting place. He would have to ride hard if the squalid little collection of mud huts was to be reached before the light gave out. There was, too, an odd feeling in the air that he had only just realized. Instinctively his eyes swept the horizon. Far off to the south-east, where sky and sand met, a faint dark line like an inky smudge caught his attention and sent him to his feet with a sharp exclamation.

"You were better with your people, Sheik."

At the sound of his voice the chief looked up with a start and sudden anxiety flashed into his eyes as they followed the direction of the other's pointing finger. Without moving he shouted to his men and almost before the words died on his lips his horse was beside him and he had swung into the saddle.

Bending down, he caught Carew's outstretched hand and was gone in a swirl of dust and sand.

For a minute or two Carew lingered looking after him, then turned to Hosein, who was bringing up the horses. The man jerked his head towards the east.

"My lord has seen?" he murmured.

Carew nodded. "It may pass," he said, running his fingers caressingly over Suliman's neck before gathering up the reins.

But Hosein shook his head. "It will come," he asserted positively. "They know," he added, pointing to the horses, whose nervous fidgeting and sweat-drenched coats evidenced uneasiness.

"Then let it come!" replied Carew with a short laugh. "Are we children to fear a sandstorm?" And Hosein's grim features relaxed in an answering grin as he held his master's stirrup for him to mount.

Riding, the air seemed less stagnant but the heat increased momentarily and the deep silence of the desert was more strangely silent than usual.

The horses were racing, urged by instinct, and splashes of white foam thrown back from Suliman's champing jaws powdered Carew's dark burnous like flakes of snow.

As he turned in the saddle a sudden gust of wind, scorching as the heat from an oven door, struck against his face and a heavy peal of thunder crashed through the intense stillness, reverberating sharply like the prolonged rattling of artillery. For an instant the horses faltered, quivering and snorting, then leaped forward, racing neck and neck, and together the two men looked behind them. The inky smudge on the skyline was blacker and more apparent than it had been, rolling swiftly up like a dense, impenetrable wall, and for the first time Carew realized the gloom that, preoccupied, he had not noticed before. There seemed no possibility now of escaping the storm that earlier he had thought would pass too far to the south to touch them, and the prospects for the night should they override the tiny village in the darkness were not cheering. But it was all in the day's work and he was accustomed to the vagaries of the desert. There was something in the thought of the approaching struggle with the elements that stirred his blood and made him almost welcome the physical discomfort that would inevitably ensue.

A vivid flash of lightning followed by another deafening roar of thunder concentrated all his attention on his nervous mount. Tightening his grip, Carew leaned forward, soothing the terrified animal with voice and hand. The gloom was increasing, the gusts of hot wind more frequent and of longer duration, bringing with them now the stinging whip of driving sand. There was a distant muttering like the far-off surge of waves beating against a rocky coast; suddenly the sun went out, hidden by the racing clouds that swept across the heavens; and with a tearing, whining scream the storm broke.

Reeling under the terrific impact of the wind that staggered even the galloping horses, blinded with the swirling sand, the two men crouched low in their saddles, wrestling with the flapping cloaks they strove to draw closer about them, struggling to keep near to each other, their voices lost in the roar of the tempest. The surrounding country was obliterated and a thick darkness enveloped them. Between his knees Carew could feel the great bay trembling and starting. It was pure chance now where they would find themselves when the storm abated, for the darkness and the whirling clouds of sand obscured every landmark.

The flying particles stung like showers of spraying glass and the reins were rough and gritty between his wet fingers. But he was happier than he had been for weeks. The fighting instinct in him leaped to meet the fury of the storm. There was no time to think. He lived for the moment, every nerve strained to the utmost, his somber eyes glowing with a curious look of pleasure, his knees thrust tight against his horse's ribs, his powerful limbs braced to resist the violent gusts that threatened to tear him from the saddle.

The storm had been raging for some time before the rain came, a heavy tropical downpour that, unexpected as it was short-lived, drenched the men's thick cloaks and caked the sand on the horses' bodies. It passed quickly and with its going the gloom lessened slightly and the wind abated somewhat in its violence. But Carew placed no faith in the temporary lull. It would blow again later, or he was very much mistaken, and probably harder than before. Meanwhile it was an opportunity to push on, to increase the pace of the horses, whose mad gallop had gradually slackened while the storm was at its height.

The village they were making for could be easily passed within a stone's throw and yet missed. And night was falling rapidly. There was nothing for it but to carry on and trust to luck.

Carew was succumbing to an intense and growing feeling of drowsiness. He had not slept during the hour of the siesta at the oasis and he had been up the greater part of the previous night. More than once he found his sand-rimmed eyes closing. It was Hosein who noticed the first indication that luck had favored them and that they were on the right track for the village they had scarcely thought to find—a clump of withered palms clustered beside a broken well that had been dry for years. And it was again Hosein who made the further discovery that drew from him an exclamation that effectually banished his master's drowsiness.

Almost hidden by the palm trees and the crumbling masonry of the well, two riderless horses stood with drooping heads, ridden to a standstill apparently, for even Suliman's angry squeal failed to attract their attention.

At sight of them Carew scowled in momentary indecision. He had no wish to be hampered with the care of two spent horses, but it was not a night to pass even an animal in distress. With a word to Hosein he swung Suliman towards the little dead oasis.

The weary beasts took no notice of their approach and did not move as Carew drew rein beside them. A quick glance about him and he slid suddenly out of the saddle. Near by lay an Arab face downwards on the ground, and a few steps away a powerfully built European sat with his back propped against the broken wall of the well nursing a heavy riding whip across his knees. His head was sunk between his shoulders, his face hidden by the wide brim of the helmet pulled low on his forehead. Rain-drenched and spattered with mud and sand that caked his once immaculate boots and clung closely to the rough surface of his tweed coat, he presented a sorry spectacle, but his plight had evidently not impaired his power of speech, for there came from his lips a steady flow of uninterrupted blasphemy that sounded oddly in such a place and at such a time.

Carew was no purist himself, but the unnecessary foulness of the words that assailed his ears roused in him a feeling of disgust, and he turned abruptly to the prostrate Arab who seemed in more immediate need of attention. But as he touched him the man rolled from under his hands and stumbling to his feet shrank away with upraised arm as though to ward off a blow. His eyes were dazed but mingling with the pain in them there was a look of deep hatred, and his bruised and bleeding mouth told their own tale. The individual by the well was evidently a hard hitter as well as a hard swearer. To Carew, the sullen, twitching features were vaguely familiar and it was obvious, when after a few moments the Arab collected himself sufficiently to speak, that he himself was recognized. But he could not place the man and the name that was reluctantly vouchsafed conveyed nothing—he knew dozens of Arabs with the same designation. More he could not ask. Whatever were his feelings on the subject, he could not interfere between master and servant. But his expression was not pleasant and he was conscious of a rising anger as he swung on his heel to go back to the well.

He did not reach it. With slowly clenching hands he stood where he had turned, staring at the man who was leisurely coming towards him—the man he had been trying to avoid since the night, weeks ago, of the opera. The sodden helmet was pushed back revealing clearly, even in the dim light, the blotched, dissipated looking face that had stirred him to so strange and deadly a hatred. And now, in their close proximity that strange hatred seemed to increase a thousandfold and it was all Carew could do to preserve an outward semblance of passivity and conceal the boiling rage that filled him. It was like nothing he had ever experienced in his life before. He could not explain it. He could not conquer it. He could only hope to retain the self-command that seemed perilously near the breaking point, for again the same appalling desire to kill was pouring over him.

Aghast at the horrible impulse, he thrust his hands behind him to keep them from the weapon that lay hidden in the folds of his waist cloth. And completely oblivious of the storm of passion his presence had evoked, Geradine strode up to him with the swaggering gait and overbearing demeanor that characterized him always but which was especially noticeable in his dealings with any native, irrespective of rank. A native to him was a native, an inferior creature little better than the beasts of the field, to be dominated by fear and kept in his place. He stood now, his legs planted widely apart, slapping his boot with his riding whip, surveying Carew through insolent half closed eyes.

"Look here," he began, his tone a mixture of truculence and arrogant condescension. "I'm in the devil of a mess. Came out from Biskra for a day or two's camping—missed my people in this infernal sandstorm—all the fault of that fool there. What'll you take to get me out of this bally graveyard? My beasts are knocked up—yours look pretty fresh. Name your price, and for heaven's sake get a move on. I—oh, damn!" he broke off with a petulant shrug of annoyance as Carew continued to stare at him with a purposely blank face that was neither helpful nor encouraging.

For a few moments, imagining himself not to be understood, he glared wrathfully at the supposed Arab, favoring him with a string of personal epithets that were neither complimentary nor parliamentary. And with contemptuous indifference Carew let him curse. If Geradine had accepted him as an Arab, an Arab he would remain—but not an Arab to be either browbeaten or bribed. He was not in a mood to make things easier for the blustering bully who was working himself up into a state of childish rage. He could alter his tone if he wanted assistance. Nor at the moment was Carew very certain that his assistance would be forthcoming. Why should he go out of his way to help a man be hated? To be left in the predicament in which he was would be a salutary experience that might have a chastening effect. And if he died in the desert, which was not in the least likely, his death would probably be a source of relief rather than grief to his friends and relations.

Quite suddenly Carew thought of the wife of the man who was facing him. She certainly, if all reports were true, would have no cause to lament a husband she evidently went in dread of. But what was that to him. A surge of anger went through him as his lowered eyes swept upward to meet the insolent stare fixed on him. The foul-mouthed brute! Almost unconsciously he moved a step forward, and there was something menacing in his expression that checked Geradine's flow of language. With a shade more civility in his tone he began to repeat his demands in halting French that was scarcely comprehensible. And with typical Arab aloofness Carew waited for him to come to the end of his stumbling explanations. But it was not on Geradine's account that he listened. It was the need of the wretched servant and the two exhausted horses that swayed him and moved him finally to a reluctant decision.

With a cold word of assent and a curt gesture that sent the quick blood rushing to the other's face, he turned haughtily as though from an inferior and walked back to the horses, leaving Geradine to stare after him spluttering with rage, twisting and bending the pliable whip between his coarse hands, in two minds whether to follow him or not. He was hanged if he would stick impudence from any Arab. The blighter could go to blazes, and his horses too for that matter. But a freshening gust of wind that, sand-laden, whipped against his cheek with unpleasant suggestiveness cut short his muttered imprecations, and quashed his half formed intention of revoking his demand for assistance and relying on himself to get out of an uncomfortable situation he was convinced was due entirely to the muddle-headedness of his servant.

With a snarl that boded little good for the unfortunate valet, Geradine went with no show of haste to join the group of men and horses by the well head. Carew was already mounted, wrestling with Suliman, who was backing and rearing impatiently. He swung the horse round as the viscount approached.

"You can ride my servant's horse," he said in French. "Yours can hardly carry themselves. The men will have to walk."

With a grunt which was certainly not an expression of courtesy, Geradine took the bridle Hosein offered him and climbed stiffly into the saddle. His drenched condition and his resentment at the authoritative tone addressed to him did not tend to improve either his manners or his temper, and with characteristic pettiness he vented his ill humor on the object nearest at hand. The horse that had been lent to him was plunging in furious protest at the raking spurs that were being used with unnecessary violence and, losing command of himself, he slashed savagely at the little shapely head with his whip. Twice the heavy thong rose and fell; then a hand like steel closed on his wrist and it was wrenched from him.

Turning with an oath, he found himself confronted by a pair of blazing eyes in which he read not only rage but a totally unexpected hatred that sent an odd sensation of cold rippling down his spine. He flinched involuntarily, dragging his horse aside, conscious for the first time in his life of a feeling of fear. But the strange look that had startled him was gone in a flash and Carew's face was impassive as he reined his own horse back.

"Your pardon, monsieur, he is unused to a whip," he said icily, and sent the offending weapon spinning into the mouth of the empty well, where it fell beyond recovery.

Speechless with fury Geradine glared at him and then, his French too limited adequately to express his feelings, let out a string of curses in his own language which would have given him more pleasure had he known them to be understood. But his hands were fully occupied with his enraged mount and Carew had already ridden on. It was blowing again steadily. Carew, sure now of his bearings, was heading more to the east and the swirling sand was driving straight at them. Muffled in his burnous, his face shielded somewhat by the close drawn haick, he felt it less than Geradine did. But he had no sympathy to waste on the huddled figure beside him. He reserved that for the two men plodding behind them with the exhausted horses. For them he was glad that the village lay only a bare three miles away. Progress was necessarily slow and more than once Geradine, impatient of the snail's pace at which they were proceeding, let out his fretting horse and dashed on ahead. But ignorant of the way and not relishing the prospect of losing sight of his companions in the growing darkness, he was forced each time to curb his impetuosity and wait for the others to come up with him.

For a time Geradine kept silence, but at last his annoyance found utterance.

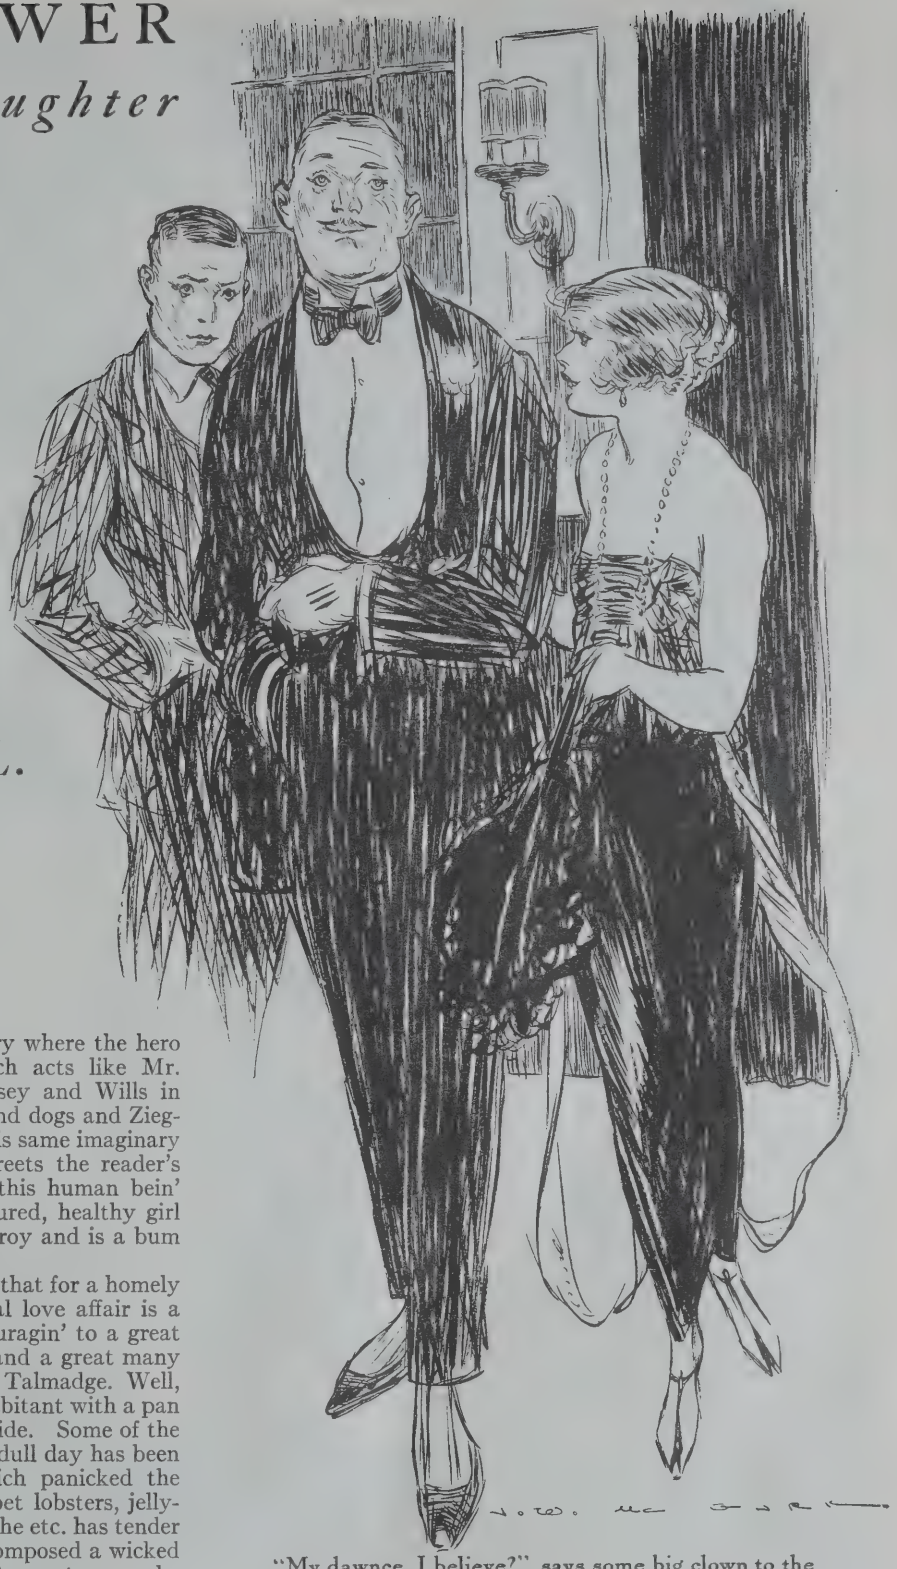
"See here," he exploded angrily, as Carew for the fifth time ranged alongside without seeming to notice the temporary separation, "this isn't a bally funeral! For heaven's sake push on a bit." And as Carew turned to him with an indifferent "Plaît-il?" he lost his temper completely. "Plus vite you silly ass!" he bellowed. "Pas un cortège, n'est-ce-pas—confound you!"

For a moment Carew hesitated, his own temper rising dangerously. Then he shrugged and raising his hand pointed behind him. "The men are walking," he said shortly, and wondered how long it would be before he was goaded into retaliation. To profess ignorance of his mother tongue was easy; to sit quietly under a storm of abuse and personal epithets was rather more difficult. But he had voluntarily decided on a certain line of action and he would have to go on with it, if only for the sake of the wretched Arab. Left in the lurch, Geradine would undoubtedly wreak his wrath on the servant who had been already sufficiently manhandled.

Again Carew racked his brains to recollect where he had seen the man before. It flashed across him at length. De Granier's man—taken on with the villa probably, poor devil. A fairly recent addition to the Frenchman's household, Malec had made no very definite impression on the guest he had served but once. But having identified him, Carew, casting back in his mind, remembered that de Granier had spoken of him as a curious character, responding to kindness but sullen when corrected and quick to take offense.

The change from the easy going Frenchman to service with a brute like Geradine must have been great, and Carew wondered suddenly what induced him to remain with a master he obviously hated. High wages—or a more sinister purpose? He checked himself abruptly. He would be doing murder by proxy, and rather enjoying it, if he let his thoughts race in this fashion. His own incomprehensible hatred was deep enough without allowing himself to dwell on another's grievances. And for him there was not even the excuse of a grievance. For no reason or cause whatsoever he had hated Geradine at sight.

Complete darkness had fallen before they stumbled upon the squalid little collection of mud huts that formed the village. Tenantless it seemed at first, for no lights shone from the tiny barred windows that were blocked with rags to keep out the drifting sand. But Hosein, dispatched in quest of the headman, returned shortly with an elderly Arab who, shrouded in a multitude of filthy coverings, salaamed obsequiously in answer to Carew's shouted inquiry and led them to a hut a little distance away.



Only a hovel it was, but sheltering an amazingly large family—vague shadowy figures, sexless in their close drawn draperies, who slipped away as the headman routed them out unceremoniously to give place to the unexpected visitors. One room, the farther portion screened for the use of the women of the family, and indescribably dirty and comfortless. (Continued on page 120)

"My dawnce, I believe?" says some big clown to the boss, and the next time I see her it's past midnight.

SOMETIME I would like to read a story where the hero ain't no up-to-date Greek God which acts like Mr. Gentleman himself, could lick Dempsey and Wills in the same ring, and can't stop babies and dogs and Ziegfeld's Follies from goin' wild over him. In this same imaginary volume where the above darin' departure greets the reader's dumbfounded eye, I'd call things perfect if this human bein' would stumble in love with a nice, good natured, healthy girl which is by no means a ringer for Helen of Troy and is a bum dancer to boot.

But from the average novel you get the idea that for a homely man and woman to stage a wildly romantical love affair is a impossible feat. This must be no little discouragin' to a great many boys which don't resemble a collar ad and a great many girls which will never be mistaken for Norma Talmadge. Well, they ain't a good reason in the world for a inhabitant with a pan which is no treat to the tired eye to take cyanide. Some of the tastiest affairs de heart which ever broke up a dull day has been between ladies and gents with features which panicked the neighbor's children. As far as that goes, I bet lobsters, jellyfish, hop toads, porcupines, chimpanzees and the etc. has tender romances, and a guy named Sheridan which composed a wicked play a couple of hundred years ago says, "An oyster may be crossed in love!"

Why shouldn't love mean as much to the homely as it does to the handsome? History shows that most of the men and women which smacked the world for a mock turtle while they was in it was terrible lookers, but if you think that stopped 'em from learnin' the mysteries of a kiss, why, read their lives and get a real thrill! So if you ain't exactly a eye tonic of either sex, cheer up and remember, "Be it ever so homely, there's no face like your own!" as Shakespeare said, or else he didn't. And if you still got the idea that only the beautiful is addicted to love, let me give you the case of Nero Whiffletree, the Barber of Seville, Illinois, and learn about romance from him.

About a year ago I get wind of a jazzbo out in this slab which accordin' to the Chicago papers will be unable to stop himself from becomin' champion middleweight of at least the world. He bounds around rejoicin' in the name of Nitroglycerin Pico and the list of the boys he's knocked for a triple looks like a page from the city directory. In fact I understand that he's got documentary proof that he's the original cat's meow and all others is rank imitations. Well, as pilot of the current middleweight champ I am no little interested in these bananas which crops up from time to time with designs on our title, so I decide to take a voyage to Seville, Ill., and see for myself is Nitroglycerin Pico somethin' to think about or just one more preliminary bout chump. I took a tough boy along with me to give this Pico a private workout. The name of the kid I carried with me was Rough House Riley and he was as good as any boy in his division. He was champion middleweight of the world.

When we get to Seville I park Riley at the hotel after findin' out that Monsieur Nitroglycerin Pico is a gendarme when not engaged in fisticuffs and will most doubtless be found in court. It seems only the day before he had raided the combination barber shop, pool room and near-beer saloon operated by this Nero Whiffletree, which was afterwards to be the life of our party. I get into the court room just as Nitroglycerin Pico is tellin' the judge what it's all about. Nitro is one vicious lookin' baby if they ever was one! He's got a pair of shoulders on him like a gorilla, a battle scarred pan and hands like a couple of hams. In fact, he's a little too burly to rush my gently reared champion up against without plenty of due consideration. You can see by the way the natives present regard him and whisper amongst themselves that Nitro's got quite a followin' in dear old Seville. No matter what the world may say, they think he's good!

Nitro gets through doin' his stuff and the judge calls on Nero Whiffletree, the captive. Nero is no invalid himself when it comes to build, but his face is his principal point of interest. I have saw some homely males in my time, but this tomato packs a set of features which belonged in the comic section of the Sunday papers and nowheres else.

"You are charged with sellin' bootleg," growls the judge, squintin' at Nero over his cheaters. "How d'ye plead?"

"Judge," says Nero, wettin' his lips with his tongue, "they ain't been a drop of hootch in my place since Prohibition. This here's nothin' but a put up job!"

"Guilty, eh?" barks the judge, payin' no attention to Nero's indignant stare. "Where's the evidence?"

Nitroglycerin Pico puts a interestin' bottle on the judge's desk and his worship takes a good long drink.

"Whoosh!" he chokes, makin' a terrible face and gulpin' down about half the water in a pitcher in front of him. Then he bangs on the desk with his gavel and Nero trembles. "You infernal scoundrel!" bawls his honor, red in the face and makin' a game battle for his breath. "What d'ye mean by sellin' sich stuff as this—d'ye want to poison me? I fine ye——"

Nero's so scared at the way the judge is gulpin' and gaspin' that he must of forgot where he's at. He reaches in his rear pocket and pulls out a flask.

"This here's the real McCoy, judge!" he says eagerly. "I——"

"Ha!" snorts the judge, grabbin' the flask. "More evidence, hey?" He sniffs the bottle, grins, takes a long swallow and smacks his lips. "Aaaah!" he says, clearin' his throat and lookin' around the court room. His wanderin' eye falls on the anxious Nero and he shoves one hand in his pants pocket. "Eh—what do I owe you?" he says, kind of dreamy.

Nero gives a start and the entire attendance falls a victim to the hystericals, which brings the judge back to himself. If his face was red before, you should of saw it now!

"Order in the court!" bawls this master mind, bangin' with his gavel. "What d'ye think this is—a theayter? One more cackle out of you idjiits and I'll jail the lot of ye for contempt! Nero Whiffletree, I fine ye fifty dollars and don't tell this court ye ain't got the money, because that's dern good likker and ye must be gettin' fancy prices for it—if ye ain't, yer a dern fule!"

Nero pays up.

I got half a mind to make the judge a proposition to take his act into New York where he's a cinch for at least thirty weeks on the Big Time, but first I want to interview Nitroglycerin Pico, the fightin' constabule, which is the baby I come out to this trap to see. However, a little coincident which immediately comes to pass right outside this temple of justice drives both Nitro and the judge out of my mind.

Nero Whiffletree comes out of court mutterin' and mumblin' to himself with a four alarm fire in each eye. He's so steamed up over that fifty-buck fine he's fit to be tied. Nitroglycerin Pico, the pride of Seville and heir apparent to the middleweight throne, follows him, strollin' along at a easy gait while the admirin' populace makes way for him.

"Here comes the greatest fighter the world has ever saw!" says a awe-stricken native admirin'ly. "He'll be the next champion as sure as the Lord made little apples!"

"Don't make me laugh!" snarls Nero Whiffletree, elbowin' his way through the crowd. "I only wisht that dizzy clown was champeen now, because I'm goin' to knock him dead!"

Before anybody can stop this daredevil he has turned back and stepped in front of Nitro, which looks down on him with a sneer.

"You big sapolio!" howls Nero with a whinney of rage. "Since you turned prizefighter and pushed over a couple of cripples you're all swelled up like a human yeast cake, ain't you? Think you're the duck's quack, hey? Well, no dumbbell like you is goin' to give me a pushin' around and get away with it!"

Sock!

With great presence of mind, Nero Whiffletree leaps off mother earth a baker's dozen inches and plants a murderous right swing on the invitin' jaw of his charmin' tête-à-tête, changin' him like magic from Nitroglycerin Pico to a dull, sickenin' thud. This Pico hit the wooden plankin' outside the court so hard he must of been pickin' splinters out of his pan for weeks afterwards and if they hadn't of swept him up he'd of been layin' there yet.

While the dumbfounded yokels is standin' around thunderstruck gazin' at their exceedin'ly fallen idol, I grabbed Nero by the arm and hustled him through the mob to cover. Seemin'ly in a trance as the result of his sensational bid for fame, Nero acts like a man which has sneezed in the Grand Canyon and immediately saw a landslide fill it up with dirt. He's miles beyond speech and that's all they is to it.

"Well, Nero," I says, slappin' him on the back, "you certainly ruined this Nitroglycerin Pico with that sock on the button, you did for a fact! He'll prob'ly have to leave town now, hey?"

Nero Whiffletree shudders.

"You mean I'll prob'ly have to leave town!" he says. "When that bozo comes back to life he'll give me a smackin' I'll remember to my dyin' day and then he'll drag me to the hoosegow again for assaultin' and batteryin' a officer of the law. I must of been crazy to of cuffed him!"

"Apple sauce!" I snorts. "That punch will make your name known from here to sunny Italy before I get through with you. Have you ever did any scrappin'?"

"Well, I didn't put Pico on the floor with a nasty look, did I?" says this egg.

"A bright answer," I says. "D'ye know who I am?"

"Sure!" says Nero, with a sarcastical grin on his homely pan. "You're Hawkshaw, the detective!" And he starts to move on.

"Listen!" I says, blockin' his way, "don't get too bright. When it comes to usin' my hands I'm nobody's fool either. You're in a jam, my good man, and I'm here to show you a perfect out and a chance to make your fortune to boot!"

Nero looks me over.

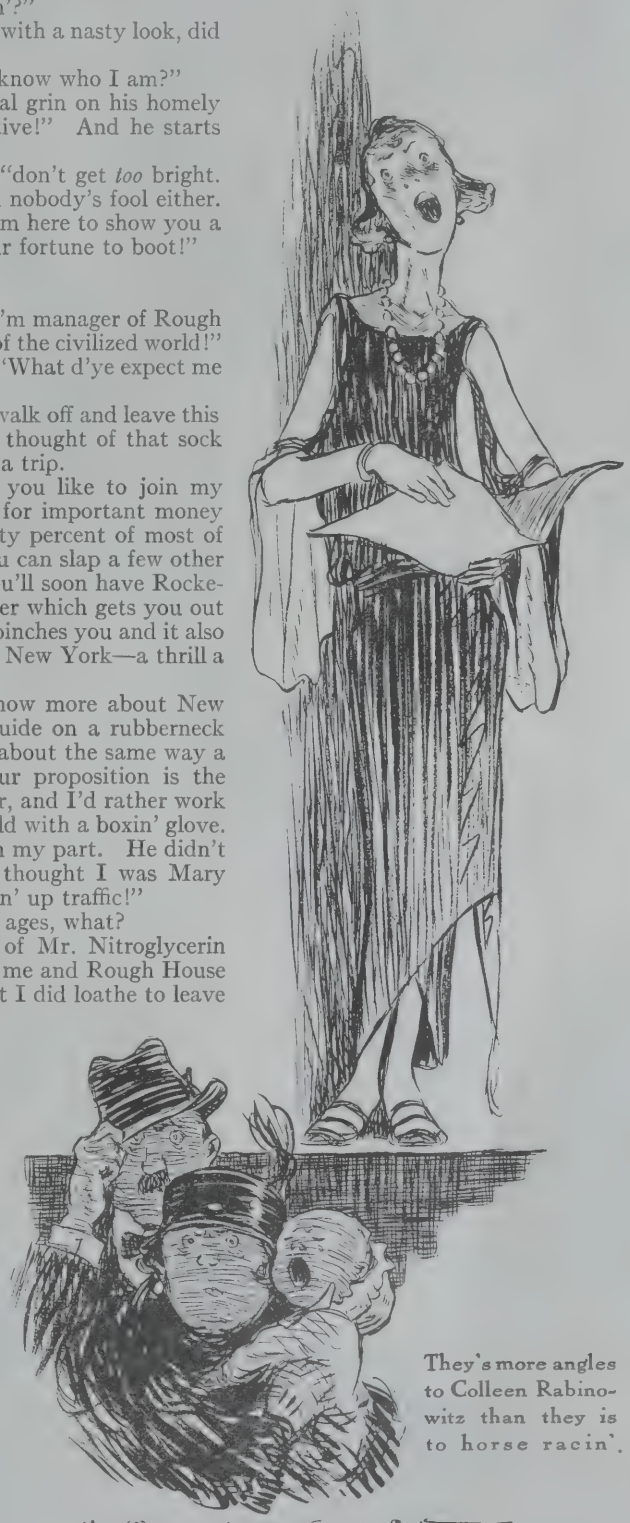
"Do your stuff!" he says.

"Well, to begin with," I tell him, "I'm manager of Rough House Riley, middleweight champion of the civilized world!"

"That ain't my fault," says Nero. "What d'ye expect me to do—fall down here in a fit?"

This burns me up and I'm about to walk off and leave this small town comic to his fate, when I thought of that sock which knocked Nitroglycerin Pico for a trip.

"Look here," I says, "how would you like to join my stable, come East with me and fight for important money around New York? I'll give you forty percent of most of your purses, rate you along, and if you can slap a few other parsnips like you slapped Mr. Pico you'll soon have Rockefeller gnashin' his teeth. That's a offer which gets you out of here before this Pico wakes up and pinches you and it also gives you a chance to see the sights of New York—a thrill a hick like you will never forget!"



"Be yourself!" sneers Nero. "I know more about New York than you do—I used to be a guide on a rubberneck wagon there and that burg thrills me about the same way a short skirt would thrill Adam! Your proposition is the bunk. I ain't no fighter, I'm a barber, and I'd rather work on their chins with a razor than I would with a boxin' glove. Knockin' Pico dead was dumb luck on my part. He didn't think I'd hit him no more than he thought I was Mary Pickford. On your way, you're holdin' up traffic!"

With that he blows. A sap for the ages, what?

Well, this mug's one punch kayo of Mr. Nitroglycerin Pico murders my interest in Nitro, so me and Rough House Riley checks out of Seville, Ill. What I did loathe to leave behind, though, was Nero Whiffletree. I simply couldn't get out of my mind that clout he hit the fightin' cop and that's all they was to it. A baby which could hit like that had a perfect right to be part of my income. He don't have to be no boxer. Dynamite can't box either!

Upon returnin' to the noted seaport and rapidly growin' hamlet of New York, I turned Rough House Riley out to pasture while I scurry up to a relative of mine by marriage, to wit, my wife. Although we been wed ten years we're still good friends. But our secrets of how to be happy though married will never reach the world, because we once started to write a book on it and we had such a fearful battle over what should go in this volume that the great American novel went by the board. However, my helpmeet is a breath-taker which would distract attention from Niagara Falls and I would dive into said falls with a anvil in each hand should she ever cancel me. Her trick is bein' beautiful and mine is makin' jack. We're both experts at our respective callin's and maybe that's the reason we seldom punish the neighbors with heated dialogue.

Anyways, when I reach Mortgage Gardens-on-the-Hudson, where we have just bought a new bower, this second Cleopatra greets me in a gown which would of made the first Cleopatra goal a dozen Mark Antonys. We exchange kisses till you couldn't make nobody believe we was married at all, while from below decks comes sounds of revelry by night. I peep over the stairway and downstairs it looks like New Year's Eve durin' the times when we were all sayin' "They can't put prohibition over in New York!" The boys and girls is struttin' their stuff to the tune of a record made by Mr. Jazz himself and fun is conspicuous by its presence. I am about to inquire what it's all about when my bride remarks that by a odd coincidence we have got to spend the night at a hotel.

They's more angles to Colleen Rabinowitz than they is to horse racin'.

"How come?" I says, with great surprise and no little astonishment.

"Well," says my spouse, "you know how we've been inviting different friends of ours from time to time to spend a week-end in our new home. It seems they can't take a joke and tonight they've all come up together. When I get through parking our guests here for the night there will be no room for us."

"Can't I double up with the boys and you double up with the girls?" I says.

"We don't know them well enough for that," says the wife. "Did you bring me anything from Madrid?"

"Seville, not Madrid," I says. "I was in Illinois, not Russia." I reach in my inside pocket and pull out a wrist watch which I bought in Chicago for her with great presence of mind and a hundred and sixty-eight bucks. It was the duke's cuticle, no foolin', and it went for a four bagger.

"What have you got for your great big handsome husband?" I says, when the applause for the arm clock has died down.

"This—sweetie!" she says and hands me a bill for a Simple Six sedan, $7,500, not countin' the horn. "Now that we're living out here in exclusive Mortgage Gardens with all the millionaire Wall Street bond messengers," she goes on, "we simply have to have a big car. Come out in the garage and I'll show you my—our—beautiful Simple Six. I turned in our Rolls-Rough to the company and they allowed me almost twenty-five dollars on it. Wasn't that wonderful of them?"

"It sure was noble!" I says. "Tomorrow I'll take the house over and maybe they'll allow me a runnin' start or somethin' on it. We need a seventy-five hundred buck car the same way we each need another neck! Where in the name of Detroit am I goin' to snare any seventy-five hundred smackers?"

"That, sweetheart, is something for you to think about," she smiles sweetly, throwin' open the door of a garage I would of once been glad to call my residence. "There's everything on it from motorcycle cop bafflers to nonskid time payments. We don't have to pay the whole seventy-five hundred down, you know."

"You have just mentioned the best thing about the car," I says. "What do we have to pay down?"

"Only seventy-four hundred and fifty dollars!" she tells me.

On the ways back to the house my wife says she forgot to tell me they was a special delivery letter just came for me. I reared on my hind legs and moaned because she didn't give me the letter the minute I stuck my comely nose in the door and she merely says if I get that excited over a letter she'd hate to be around when I got a telegram. Anyways, she adds, the missive is prob'ly only from one of my nasty old prizefighters.

"My prizefighters may be nasty," I says, "but I won't stand for them bein' called old. Besides, old or nasty, they're keepin' us alive—laugh that off!"

"Well, don't let any of our guests know that you're a manager of prizefighters, or I'll die of shame!" she says. "I told them you were a business man."

"Aha!" I says. "I thought you didn't believe in lyin'!"

"I don't," she comes back. "And I didn't lie. I said you were in the glove business and you are, aren't you?"

Ain't she cute?

Well, when we get back to the house some big clown in a dress suit comes along and says, "My dawnce, I believe?" to the boss and the next time I see her it's past midnight, because I couldn't dance if they was a guy shootin' at my feet. However, I have sneaked upstairs and got pillows and trimmin's in season and fixed up a bed in the $7,500 Simple Six sedan so's me and my wife don't have to go to no hotel while the guests makes merry in our home. Meanwhile I have read the special delivery letter and here it is:

> When you was in Seville you made the crack that if ever I ever come to New Yawk to look you up. Remember me? I am the guy which made Sweet Spirits of Niter out of Nitroglycerin Pico, the big false alarm. Well, my brother is running my joint in Seville and I have got his old job in the Hotel Escope Barber Shop. The big stiffs don't allow no tips, but I am getting past O. K. Come in and see me and I'll give you a trimming (on your hair) ha, ha.

> Yours truly,
> Nero Whiffletree,
> The Barber of Seville, Ill.

I decide to visit Nero the next mornin', as his charmin' letter has revived my hopes of addin' him to my stable of boss leather pushers. I have no trouble at all rememberin' that sock which flattened Nitroglycerin Pico, which, I notice by the papers, is still knockin' 'em over around Chicago. In fact, accordin' to a paper I got in my hand, Nitro has stopped Avalanche Higgins in two rounds the night before. This Higgins is tougher than a life sentence and he has went ten boisterous rounds to a draw with Rough House Riley, my champ. On the ways up to the Hotel Escope, where Nero is now doin' his stuff, I pick up Rough House Riley and bring him along. Nero is standin' behind the last chair and he greets me like I'm his father and he was a fellow which is fond of his parents. I guess the poor dumbbell was so glad to see anybody he knew in the big city where he's all alone that he could of cried. A joyful smile flits across his homely pan as we shook hands.

"Your friend certainly ain't very good lookin', is he?" says Rough House, grinnin' openly at Nero's comic supplement profile.

"Maybe he ain't tryin'," I says, hopin' to avoid bloodshed and violence.

"I ain't good lookin', hey?" growls Nero, gazin' at Rough House Riley's battle-scarred features. "Well, people which lives in celluloid houses shouldn't throw matches!"

"Shut up, clown!" grunts Riley, easin' into the chair. "Gimme a shave. I don't want nothin' else, see? I don't want no massage, hair cut, tonic, hot towels, manicure, shoe shine, singe, shampoo, olive oil rub or conversation! Just a shave, and no questions asked, get me?"

"Absolutely!" says Nero, tuckin' a towel under Riley's lantern chin. "Eh—would you like some lather?"

Rough House groans.

"Pick up the marbles, you win!" he says, and sinks back in the chair.

A few days later the thought strikes me that if I can sell Nero the idea of comin' up to Eddie McWagon's gym and seein' Rough House Riley and some other boys trainin', he may get hypnotized by the atmosphere and change his mind with the regards to a career in the ring. So I kept makin' a hangout of the Hotel Escope barber shop and finally one afternoon he happens to be off duty and he comes up to the gym with me. I led the open mouthed Nero across to where my five star special, Rough House Riley, is convincin' a sparrin' partner that the sparrin' partner should of took up steam fittin' and left boxin' for guys which bleeds less easy.

"There you see the world's middleweight champ in action, Nero," I says. "He clicks off from twenty to fifty thousand a fight. How d'ye like him?"

"Not so good!" says Nero scornfully. "He don't look to me like he could hit the ground with his hat. If he ever fights Nitroglycerin Pico they'll be a new champion, unless they let this jazzbo of yours go in with a hatchet in his glove."

Rough House Riley's face gets redder than the reddest thing you ever seen. He busts away from his grinnin' sparrin' partner and takes a punch at Nero, which, should it of landed, would of knocked the critical barber past the city line. Nero does a standin' broad jump backwards, hittin' a punchin' bag with his head. The bag returns the compliment and with a wild oath Nero takes a free swing at it. He misses from here to Peoria and wound up the number sittin' on the floor kind of dazed. The handlers crowds around and applauds, while the angry glare leaves Rough House Riley's face.

"It's bad luck to hit a cripple or a idiot," he grins at Nero. "So I'll leave you alone."

Nero scrambles to his feet and glares around in a rage.

"I ain't good looking, hey?" growls Nero. "Well, people which lives in celluloid houses shouldn't throw matches!"

Nero Whiffletree and Colleen Rabinowitz would of made Romeo and Juliet look like landlord and tenant!

"I didn't come here to be made a fool of!" he howls.

"Why should you," says Riley, "when you already had that part of it done years ago?"

"Get gay with me," hollers Nero, "and I'll smack you down, champeen or no champeen!"

"I think I'll just break your nose for you!" coldly remarks Riley, steppin' closer and settin' for a straight left.

But then I stepped in between the gladiators. Fun's fun, but I don't want either of my merry men to get shopworn right then and there. So I manage to smooth matters over.

Then I get to work on Nero on the subject of boxin', makin' him a offer which none but a half-wit would turn down. But no can do! Boxin' don't disturb Nero and that's all they is to it. Even a dumbbell can be a boxer, explains Nero, and cites the indignant Riley for a example, but bein' a barber is a art. Likewise, he says, he's no ordinary hair mower, but a big time boss tonsorial master which clamps down a mean hot towel and scrapes a nasty chin.

"It's no use," says Nero finally. "My girl would never stand for me bein' a pug."

"Why don't you stop clownin'?" sneers Riley. "Where would a guy with a face like yours get a girl?"

"Looks don't mean nothin' where women is concerned if a guy plays his cards right," says Nero. "Solomon was no Valentino, yet a thousand women thought he was the eagle's vest."

"I came here —to be near you," John stammered.

The Eagle's Feather

JOHN TRENT came into the presence of Delila Jameison and, with a quiver of his nerves like the quiver of a horse's skin at the light touch of a spur, instantly abandoned his incredulity. It was not, he had told himself, smiling up his sleeve at the hushed voices of valley report, that she was a big frog in a little pool; it was that she would have been a big frog in any pool. She was, he admitted as her eyes flickered across him, one of those rare women who are the natural rulers and scorners of men.

She sat at one end of her long log-built bare living room, her back against the wall, one hand resting on the littered pine board table before her, and looked casually from his lanky escort to him. He had been introduced briefly by this escort as a "hobo just in from outside lookin' for a ranch job." Delila Jameison acknowledged this introduction by a nod. Her beaked brown face, pouncing eyes and long, ironical, unfeminine mouth betrayed a terrible accuracy in comment. John felt that she knew his type, discerned the fundamental purposelessness of his past existence, the gradual withdrawals of unused opportunities, the penalties of occasional recklessness. Whatever his guarded face could yield of information, whatever deductions could be drawn from his ragged and dusty leanness of person and his cleanness of well shaven jaw, had been instantly yielded and deduced.

She pulled "the makings" from her shirt pocket—it was a man's blue chambray shirt open at the collar—rolled and lighted her cigarette with a merciless sort of leisureliness.

"You can't work at Circle R," said Delila eventually. "You're too easy to look at. I don't employ your sort—makes my girls trashy and my men sore." Her voice was not unpleasantly like the sound of a saw singing through soft wood. It confirmed that little contracting comment of his nerves.

The smile with which, ages of experience ago, John Trent had disarmed the angers of his English nurse, crept now into his bland English eyes. He twinkled sweetly down upon the woman and said nothing. He was enormously afraid that he had failed, that he would really not be allowed to work for her, but this fear he managed to conceal behind his smile; even more carefully he hid a masculine resentment. So she expected to bully him, did she?—this leathery-faced woman, gray in her hair, wrinkles about her eyelids, with her cigarette stained fingers, her shoulders tilted against a log wall—an uncouth, rugged and unlovely tyrant who owned more than a woman's share of acreage and cattle.

"Anyone tell you I needed a man?" she asked after she had observed his unrevealing smile.

"No one. I wanted to work—for you."

She lifted a pair of beautiful dark crescent eyebrows. "For the land's sake—why?"

"I like to work for the biggest man in any country I happen into and you're the biggest—man in Bear Valley. That's why."

He couldn't be sure that a faint stain painted her weather-beaten cheeks. Certainly her eyes betrayed no softness of flattered vanity. But he had a sensation of successful diplomacy. Just before the desperately calculated speech he had

"I vill teach you nod to say—no. You now goin' to learn how to say yes—to one big strong man," thundered glanced at the big grizzled fellow who had led him up from the bunk house to the main cabin. From such men as these, quick deduction told him, she had not received any very deft sycophancy; homage at best had been expressed in action, in surly obedience or in slick subservience. There had been no man of them worthy of the superb quality which made her, shut in here by ignorance and mountains and narrow opportunity, a sister of Great Catherine and Great Elizabeth.

Half guessing the faint tingle his compliment had brought her, he felt a sudden warmth of sympathy, of understanding. As he stood there, his hand resting on her pine board council table, looking down at her from his slim height, he recognized that she was, for all the hawk glitter of her eyes and the grim sardonic twist of her lips, a caged creature. No, not hawk. Eagle! Those sun-gazing yellow eyes had their own haughty and mute wistfulness.

"What'll you do if I don't take you on?"

"Go on out of here."

"How about Van Breuwen? He'll give you a job, likely. It's branding time."

Trent's face forgot itself and set. "I won't work for that damned Dutchman."

Her brows lifted again. It was her one charming and feminine gesture.

Trent went on slowly. "I fell in—and out—with him on my way up the country. He's a mean man to work for and an ugly customer to work against. If I stop in Bear Valley, I'll work against him."

He got this out with sharpness and she seemed to bite at his words with a zest of attention. There went between them a current of electric comprehension, interrupted by the appearance of someone to speak to "the boss." She waved Trent to one side, where he stood against the uncurtained window and watched her at her dealings. His blood warmed to a vision of unique, exciting opportunity. Prime minister—well, foreman of Circle R . . .

To Delila, a fair, smooth, crafty looking fellow with ice-blue eyes was suggesting that she had made a blunder, which concerned "breeding through that stallion of Martin's." His suggestion was patiently listened to and demolished with a slow conclusive sarcasm. As the defeated critic turned to go, she drew her lash across his humiliation. "Carry it under your hat, Jeff Carey, that you're not my foreman—yet." His face above his jaunty blue silk scarf flamed to the Indian paintbrush dark red. He just caught, out of the corner of one troubled eye, Trent's involuntary little grin. There was, it appeared, an immediate resolution taken by Jeff Carey to pass over humiliation to the smiler of such untimely smiles. As for Trent, he wanted to apologize and felt the depression of a newly acquired enmity. He had had so many enemies—curse that rash expressiveness of feature!

Van Breuwen. Martha was as fierce as a cornered wildcat but wasting not a breath in spoken defiance or outcry.

Delila beckoned to him and he moved forward rather hopelessly. She was already figuring and did not look up. She spoke with her cigarette in the corner of her lips.

"Lost my roustabout yesterday," she said. "Pigs haven't been fed today. Johnnie, take this young gentleman down and give him Piggy's overalls and show him the trail to the garbage. After that, the wood pile. Nights, young fellow, you can fetch hot water to the bunk house for Dandy's tub—that's Carey, the man who just went out—and mornings, at five o'clock, set a bucket at my door and give me a call. Pay you forty dollars a month."

Trent bowed, looked her in the eyes and walked off behind the grinning ranch hand, perfectly conscious that his flush matched Jeff Carey's and that he would have liked to kick his escort to a pulp. But, below the little prickings of humiliation and resentment, he felt that he had made his goal and his heart sang. The girl—the girl—the girl . . .

Down in the bunk house he donned Piggy's overalls under the laughing comment of men whose day's work was over and who were not loath to torment a newcomer of crispish speech and pronounced physical good looks. Their eyes, appraising him, were vain, sensitive and clear, the eyes of individualistic frontiersmen, lonely, introspective, more like the eyes of women. They mocked as skilfully as girls. But Trent, with an English public school training in his past, with more than a dozen years of drifting hardship, soldiering and job hunting since, was ready enough with good-humored retort and hardy willingness to see the joke. He departed, grinning, with his wheelbarrow to the regions back of the ranch house where the neglected garbage awaited his attention. He found the big unsavory zinc can and, using the lean muscles of arm and back, he rolled it gingerly upon his tilted barrow. Then he straightened, turned, and in the open kitchen doorway saw the girl.

Instantly he was aware of the beauty of the hour. He saw that dusk was blue, that above her there the mountains drifted up like dreams. He smelled the spice of sage, heard the voice of the river and a chord struck in the throat of a drowsy thrush. He knew that the lighted window square was a warm golden human light in contrast to the unearthly azures of the evening. She stood in her gingham dress and dried her hands on her skirt and smiled. Her face was rose all across its brow and widish cheek bones, down the clear chin and long brown throat.

Trent cut the truth out of Dandy with his own whip and made him eat his lies.

"I didn't know you just at first. I was kind of—surprised," she said.

He came to the step below her door. He had been skeptical of such transfigurations as this one that had caught him up to a breathless sudden height. Now he was shy, speech left him, his tongue was heavy and his heart large. It seemed to be learning how to beat.

"What's your name?" he asked.

She laughed shyly. "Martha."

"I came here—to be near you."

Again she laughed, opening and closing her dark and rather timid eyes, and shaking her head vigorously. She was too shy to protest in speech. He watched the flush fade so that the little boyish freckles stood out again across her nose and cheeks. Her mouth was beauty, to be sculptured, painted, dreamed of, and, O Lord of Lovers!—to be kissed.

"You weren't angry with me, then—on the stage?" he stammered. "That big man, Van Breuwen, didn't make you think I was a boor, staring at you out of insolence? I begged your pardon—but I need not have done so—I ought to've thrashed the ugly brute." He sighed. "I'm too slow, sometimes, with my fists."

"I don't pay heed to Van Breuwen—anything he says." She began picking at the bark alongside the door, looking down, her eyelashes moving as though she were angry and embarrassed. "If I did I'd run as far from him as the hills would let me. I've been scared of him ever since I came here. They say I'm foolish—that he'd be a great match for me. He would be—wouldn't he?—with that big ranch and all his cattle."

"A match?" Trent repeated uncertainly, his heart shrinking.

"He wants me—twice now he's asked. Let's not talk about him." She let him see then the troubled uncertainty of her eyes, which held something that cried for help. They laughed suddenly. "You may not be quick with your fists," she said, "but you can look fierce!"

"You were singing in the wagon," said John. "When Van Breuwen frightened you about my staring, you stopped. The tune's been bothering me ever since. Won't you finish the song for me now?" He whistled a few doubtful notes.

She looked at him with too ready an obedience—life had made her docile—and sang, her eyes filled with an anxious sort of pleasure, moving her head a little to mark the irregular rhythms.

Whippoorwill, I hear you calling me——

A voice inside the kitchen clamored like an iron bell. "O Martha! Say, Martha!"

She turned instantly; her eyes grew great with laughter. She went in tilting back her head, singing to show him the ludicrous appositeness of the summons—

I hear you calling me—Whippoorwill!

John walked six blind steps from the empty door and leaned against a fence which seemed to grow out of the ground to stop him. She was the very body of all the homeless longings of his brain. Why? Why? In God's name—why? After a world's experience, dingy and divine—this ranch child, sent down on the mail stage to town to do feminine errands for Circle R, perched like a gay little bird beside him all one day long, jolting across miles of sage, shy, never speaking, and singing under her breath until she became too self-conscious when Van Breuwen boarded the wagon, looked frightened at the sudden quarrel between him and Trent, and went dumb. Only one day, and that four days ago, but now she was his for always—she must be for always, his.

A faint stench of the pig sty drifted across the sage, and with it a realization, hideous and overwhelming, of his utter hungry poverty, his failures, his homelessness. John Trent, thirty years old, gentleman and vagrant, could not ask even this little ranch girl to be his wife.

He looked up at the groping mountains, dark to his vision, and he had a sense of confinement, at first alarming, then subtly reassuring. He had been set down at last in a narrow place. The ambition which had flashed up in him when he stood before Delila Jameison's council table revived. Here was a kingdom as large as one of those medieval states where soldiers of fortune had won power in the service of such women. If, adroit, intelligent, ruthless, he became her prime minister, her necessity—— Queer how the mountains shut you in—and out—and wrote forgetfulness like a spell across the sky . . . He straightened, walked back to the barrow and, lifting its weight vigorously, moved with long steps across the rough ground in the direction of the sty. His eyes held the splendor of an evening star, suddenly discovered by that seeking mountain head.

The months that followed ran with all the energy of a driven machine. Love, hatred, ambition throbbed with concentrated force. Against his rival in diplomacy, Jeff Carey, and against his rival in love, Pier Van Breuwen, Trent delved, doubled, writhed and struck, wrestler and pugilist by turns. Closer and closer his determined loyalty drew him to the eagle woman.

In modern frontier states as in medieval principalities, opportunity for promotion, recognition of special gifts, comes swift and soon. Circle R was not slow to discover the quality of its new roustabout. Trent kept himself in his employer's eye by clever contrivances, by a bettering of the pigs' environment, by the invention of a tin-lined tank superimposed upon an iron stove which gave the ranch a perpetual supply of hot water. Shaving became the fashion and the dishwasher smiled. Presently came haying season and all hands were called out to service in the fields. More important even than stock in this mountain valley was the winter fodder. The prosperity of Circle R rested on the produce of Delila's broad bright acres of hay and grain. She was field marshal herself, now running a tractor, now driving a team, now stirring sluggards with a biting comment, now humorously sympathetic with the spitting ruminative prophecies of some old hand. She summoned Trent with an alarming bugle call of his first name, "You, John!" from his handling of a pitchfork and, while he awaited a summary dismissal or a sharp reprimand, she called another blue-clad figure down from the seat of a mowing machine..

"You climb up there, Trent, and let this boob mishandle your pitchfork. What he don't know about machinery would fill a mail order catalogue from cover to order blanks."

Trent, flushed, climbed up—and spurned the first step of his ambition's ladder. Dandy's observant sneers only sharpened his appreciation; and, servitor of love as the sunburnt soldierly vagabond had become, he had a vision of reward that stood up as beautiful in the golden harvest fields as Ruth.

It was curious how he and Martha guarded their secret. She was a silent, supple-minded girl, soul and body made on the same pattern. Her intelligence, lambent beneath the shyness of her eyes and speech, seemed to follow the turnings of his unspoken thoughts and glow upon them. He had learned in queer, breathless, half secret interviews, her history. She had been left a little penniless seven year old outcast in Chicago by the death of an unmarried mother. She had spent her childhood in foundling home and orphanage. At fourteen she had rebelled against a matron and, remembering the aunt whose name her mother had whispered to her so fearfully that it had left a scar of unspoken dread of this Delila Jameison, she had lifted courage in both hands and had run away over half a continent to Circle R.

Recalling his own sensations when he first stood before Delila, John Trent exclaimed: "You must have wished yourself back in the orphanage when you saw your aunt!"

Martha tilted up to him the honest amazement of her eyes. "Why, no. I was scared until I saw her. And then I couldn't understand why mother hadn't sent me to her straight. Aunt Lila might have been ashamed of me. But she just gave me one look-over and said: 'You've the Jameison chin and yellow eyes. Go wash up my dishes, Marty!' "

The eyes of the eagle? Oh no! thought Trent—dark, soft and tender eyes, golden only when the sun crept into their secrecy. There was nothing of the eagle about his girl. She might suggest a feather from the great swooping wing; a light, clean, drifting feather—no more of the eagle nature than that. Even her quick intelligence had none of Delila's pouncing, preying swiftness. It followed stronger flights with pretty sweeps and turnings like a swallow's after dusk. The two women occupied his whole imagination in the intense, narrow but wonderfully complete absorption of his life. The mountain range had chopped his existence in two.

That autumn chance gave his fortunes an upward jolt. During the summer he had had occasional experience with cattle on the range; he had proved himself a horseman and betrayed a natural eye for stock; so, when an epidemic of "flu" struck the valley and Delila's cleverest man, Carey, as well as her trustiest, Mac Campbell, were laid on their backs, she blindfolded caution, yielded to intuition as even an eagle woman will, and sent Trent out over the hill in charge of the October drive. He took out his steers in the face of a driving wind, met a blizzard in the canyon and, in spite of the unwilling obedience of his lieutenants, minded to show this upstart where self-confidence falls over on its nose—he came back to Circle R with the record of a good sale and not a steer lost. He came back, besides, with a frost-bitten cheek, a gaunt body and a new permanent line between his eyebrows.

"No more horses for you, John Trent," said Delila. "You follow your girl on foot."

He sat with Delila that night before her stove in consultation. He had, on his journey, fallen in and out again with Van Breuwen; also, he had a suggestion to make concerning that property, so close to hers, so valuable, so mismanaged by the heavy witted Dutchman.

And late, very late, creaking home over the dry snow to the bunk house, where Dandy ruled and made his refuge thorny, he whistled softly under Martha's window, and in the frosty stillness governed by the icy mountain peaks, their breath mounting in silver feathers, the stars clamorous with leaping light, he knew the exquisite warm reality of her kiss. He wanted to speak to her then, but she put her cheek across his mouth, whispering "Hush! Hush!" as if words would hurt her quivering silence like the crudity of blows.

In winter, when Martha, obedient to Delila, pulled herself out of her lover's life and went down the valley for schooling, Trent's blood mounted from his hollow heart to his wits and, with Delila's confidence, he schemed. The bank, it appeared, had refused Van Breuwen a loan. A dry summer, followed by a long feeding season, left many ranchmen in the valley ruined that spring and Van Breuwen must have "gone under" if the bank, after a secret consultation with Trent as Circle R's representative, had not placed a short and heavy mortgage on his land. There followed another bad summer; the price of steers crashed. In November, her cattle driven out and sold, her grain and hay safely in her barns and stacks, Delila made a feast to the countryside. Van Breuwen was not invited. Circle R was celebrating the acquisition of his ranch. The mortgage had been foreclosed and it came then to light that Circle R was back of the loan and now stretched itself for another two thousand acres. The valley shrunk about it to a fringe.

Perhaps Van Breuwen, that November day, prowling about his ranch house, traced down the persecution to its source and remembered with some ruefulness his insult to a dark-eyed girl. At her last and most resolute refusal of his hand he had said: "You've lost your chance to be respectable—I'll make you what your mother was——" He had left her trembling, so white that her little freckles stood out black against the fine skin, tears burning across her cheeks, her fists clenched. The next time he had seen Trent the young man's face had been like marble. And Trent was Circle R's representative all over the valley—curse him! Why wouldn't the coward fight like a man with his fists instead of stealing a fellow's land—and girl—from him? So Van Breuwen, alone, lumbered to and fro like a wounded bear, his blue eyes bloodshot and his face reddened with drink.

For Delila Jameison the acquisition of his ranch was a royal dream of diplomacy fulfilled.

Having helped in kitchen and living room since the crack of day—a bleak and shallow crack between stone-colored clouds and snow-streaked mountains—the head of Circle R withdrew to dress herself in all that was most magnificent. Satisfied presently with her appearance, she went to sit in the small counting house, to which her pine board table had been removed to make room for the festival. She folded her hands together and silently exulted. She wore a purple silk dress, cut to a V, and changing where it rustled into gold. Her gray-streaked heavy hair was dressed high on her head, her throat was banded with twinkling jet. Flushed, with brilliant yellow eyes, she had a regal presence. Jeff Carey, knocking too softly, stepped in and moistened his lips once before he pushed to the door behind him.

Jeff's own magnificence of crimson scarf, silk shirt, studded belt, new overalls and beaded boots accentuated his snaky slenderness and the narrow pallor of his face and eyes. He came nervously across the floor and stood beside her, bending down a little, speaking in the voice of conspiracy, sugar-sweet but vibrantly suggestive of alarm.

"I'd like a word with you, ma'am, before"—he jerked his head towards the adjoining room—"the show begins."

She smiled and bowed her head.

Jeff cleared his throat and a slow flush mounted against his will across his face.

"Does anyone but you, ma'am, know the combination of that safe?"

They both glanced across the room to the clumsy old-fashioned receptacle of what wealth Delila kept in the ranch house. Her face had changed and her eyes were very shrewd.

"John Trent—yes."

"Well, ma'am—I've been suspecting that fellow. I haven't said nothing to you because you seemed so sot on him. He's a good looker—likely any woman would——" He hastened, stumbling before the queer expression which had come about her lips: "But I've been watching him—the boys hev watched him some, too. They're good boys and every last man of them's my friend. You can ask the bunk house what it thinks of Trent—and me. Well, ma'am—I've got my evidence. In the box under his bed Trent's hidden a wad of cash—the boys' pay. Find out for yourself if he ain't plannin' to make his getaway tonight."

Delila rose, strode with steps too long for the cut of her scant, ankle length skirt and too heavy for the build of her high heeled slippers, to the safe, where she twirled the knob, swung back the door and made a brief inspection. She shut the safe with a sharp click.

"He's taken the money, sure enough, Jeff," she said, smiling thinly. "He knows the combination, but—he left the safe open for ten minutes yesterday when I called him out to see Martin. That was right careless of him. I told him so. He said there wasn't anyone about and he ran back and shut it quickly. I heard the bang. He didn't stop to look inside before he shut the safe. Well, sir"—here she began to drawl terribly—"I guess he took the cash all right unless during those ten minutes some other candidate for foreman's been smart enough to take it out and load him up with it."

Silence occupied the room like a full-bodied visitor. They could hear the slow cold wind singing about the cabin corners.

"After dinner's over, when some of our guests have gone, you can come in here and face me—and Trent—with that story, Jeff. Until then—use your tongue for eating, and don't go back to the bunk house. You're pretty enough now for any party—pretty enough to fool any woman under fifty."

She appraised the smoothly departing figure. "Trent weighs about thirty pound heavier than you and he's studied fightin'. I can tell by his eyes and the way he moves his hands when he's angry. I'm always scared of a man that isn't very ready with his fists. Eat a good dinner, Jeff—and try the punch. It tastes fine."

She laughed, the rarest of her articulations, smote the council table with her hand and, biting at her lip, followed Carey into the long room where her guests were gathering to Trent's welcome before a big and blazing hearth.

Martha, in blue crêpe, arms bare to the elbow, ankles and feet trim in white cotton stockings and black cross-strapped slippers, drifted about the table with dazed bright eyes, her cheeks as warm as June. Not once had Trent looked at her. Their long secret, as skilfully conducted as a court intrigue, lay like a nest under branches in their united consciousness. But Trent's face, above his sober flannel collar, gleamed.

The afternoon now was about three hours old; neighboring ranchmen and their wives, boys of Circle R with girls, boys and girls, of other brands, faces brown and rough, wind-burnt eyes, marshaled themselves about the board which stretched the full length of the long warm room. Firelight danced forgetful of the cruelly singing wind and the dark sky. Delila sat at one end of the table and Trent was bidden with her familiar bugle note of command to put himself at the other. He looked a little startled. There were dark faces as well as bright ones turned to watch him take that place. Much eating followed, and little talk. When Circle R feasts, the food's the thing. Martha and her companions grew rosier with swift, untiring service. Delila ate royally but drank little. There was punch of considerable potency.

After two hours of steady plying of her guests with food, the hostess stood up there against her logs. They all looked to her and their eyes recognized, perhaps, some of the woman's trammeled greatness. She made her announcements, smiling along the table, showing her splendid teeth.

"Circle R has spread its wings, folks, to cover the neighboring homestead. The Lazy O brand has joined the Circle R. Van Breuwen's sold out."

Van Breuwen's unpopularity fanned up a loud applause.

"I have also to announce," went on Delila, "the appointment of a foreman to my joint property. I want to name the man who has done more for my interests and my ambitions during the past eighteen months than any boy that ever drew my pay . . . John Trent."

Punch, holiday feeling, the comfort of satisfied digestion, as well as admiration, male and female, for the suddenly pale young prime minister, helped to swell throats and drown the silences of envy.

Trent rose and briefly, almost shyly, spoke. He praised his eagle mistress. He told them it was "a good outfit to work for," that such a leader as Miss Jameison made work—he faltered and used a phrase that startled his hearers—"a sharp delight." The eagle eyes understood. He read their wistfulness.

But down in his silent heart, forgetful (Continued on page 145)

The Old Boy

THE old man was beginning to complain. He said that he was beginning to feel old. He said that he didn't believe he could get around a golf course in less than a hundred strokes. He said that it hurt his eyes to read the newspapers, and he guessed he'd better see an oculist. And he really did seem below par. He didn't seem to enjoy making money any more. He didn't even seem to enjoy spending it.

But as usual he went to Bar Harbor for the second two weeks in August and took half a dozen people with him. I got in on the party because Smash, the first secretary, was sick, and before we came back Smash married, and after that the old man always took me around with him.

The weather was fine down East, nights not too cold and no fog, and the old man did a lot of entertaining. He didn't want to, he said, he was getting too old, but then he always had and people expected it of him. There doesn't seem to be anything that people like better than to be entertained on a fine yacht. And of course the Buccaneer isn't just a fine yacht. She's the fine yacht. There isn't another in the world so big and black and ocean-going, and graceful and fast and shiny.

And as for entertainment—well, you could play roulette or poker without any limit, or you could smoke Cuban cigars as big as baseball bats, and I might as well confess that in spite of Prohibition, if there was any particular kind of forbidden thing that you wanted to drink all you had to do was ask for it. But if all you wanted was a cup of tea, why even that would be brewed from leaves which the late Empress of China had given to the late Tsar of Russia, and which the late Tsar of Russia had passed on to the old man.

The old man gave his parties and saw that everybody had a good time; but he wasn't very gay himself. He did lots of polite listening and very little talking. He kept himself in the background, and right in the midst of things he'd slip off quietly and go to bed.

The old man looked at Miss Pembroke as so much beauty, so much youth, so much fascination.

I heard people saying that he'd changed terribly. He'd gotten so quiet. He'd lost his big hearty laugh. "When he thinks nobody's looking at him," one woman said, "he kind of sinks into himself and looks wistful." And I heard one man say: "It's natural enough. The old man is a whole lot older than any of you think he is, and he's beginning to wake up to the fact that he's just about all through."

That made me smile; because I happened to know just exactly how old the old man really was. My first job with him was to help catalogue the library and I ran across the family Bible. It had the date of his birth in it, and the name of the little New England town where he was born. That summer at Bar Harbor he passed his fifty-third birthday.

He'd invited some people out to dinner one night, and afterward they and the yacht guests were to go ashore to a fancy ball and leave the old man all alone. Of course he could have gone to the ball too, but he didn't want to. Said he didn't think he'd ever met the people who were giving it, and that if he had met them he kind of remembered that he hadn't liked them. And anyway he was too old to dress himself all up like something that he wasn't and look ridiculous.

Well, one of the women who came out to dinner was a stranger to the old man. She was a Miss Pembroke. He gave one look at her and then he sent for me and told me quietly to have the place cards changed. "Put Miss Pembroke on my right," he said.

She was the first woman he'd taken any interest in for a long time. She wasn't more than twenty years old. She had a rich, joyous voice, and so much youth and sparkle and beauty that she made the other women look like ghosts. And that's saying a good deal, because with the exception of one ancient maiden lady, who had a tongue dipped in pure wit, the old man wouldn't allow an old woman or an ugly woman anywhere near him.

He loved beauty, and more than beauty he loved youth. Miss Pembroke was both.

Before dinner was half over she had the old man's famous laugh ringing out as if nothing had ever gone wrong with it. Before dinner was all over she took exception to the fact that he wasn't going to the ball, and she gave him one look and said, "Of course you are going."

He smiled and looked surprised and then he said, "Am I? Really?"

And she said, "You are."

That settled it. He went.

II

WHEN the old man was feeling right and any kind of proposition came before him for judgment, he'd take in all the facts the way a dry sponge takes in water, and right on top of that he'd make his decision one way or the other. Sometimes he thought things out wrong, I guess, but always he thought them out quickly.

In the matter of Miss Pembroke he pulled himself together and gave a flash of his old methods. He looked at her probably as a kind of proposition: so much beauty, so much youth, so much fascination, so much good breeding, etc., etc., and on the other side he probably figured that for a man of his age she was too young and too good looking and much too attractive to other men who weren't half his age. Considering all the advantages and considering all the risks, was the proposition one that he wanted to fool with or wasn't it?

Well, of course I've no way of proving it, but I'm sure enough that within twenty-four hours of meeting Miss Pembroke for the first time, the old man had made up his mind to marry her.

Miss Pembroke looked as if she was made of hothouse peaches and Devonshire cream. As a matter of fact she was made of whipcord and leather. She didn't like to sit in big chairs out of the sun and be made love to. She liked to play tennis in the morning, swim afterward, dance at the Casino for twenty minutes before luncheon, golf in the afternoon, climb mountains on Sundays and dance again all night.

Now no man old or young can sit by and watch his darling go through her paces. The old man had been a fine athlete in his day, and he'd kept going until the war broke out. The war upset him so that he didn't think it was decent to play games, and when the war was over, if it is over, he felt shy about starting in again and doing badly the things that he'd always done well. So he'd been out of golf and tennis and swimming for eight years, and it was mighty tough work for him to get back into them. He'd settled and softened in those eight years.

Two days after he met Miss Pembroke he was so stiff that he could hardly get out of bed in the morning, and he had blisters on both hands and both feet and a peeling nose. But he'd hung on to some of his old skill and knowledge, and at that he hadn't made a holy show of himself. He'd be a dead man when he went to bed at night, and he'd be half dead when he got up in the morning; but he'd pull himself together and doll himself up and step out on to the first tee of the Kebo Valley Club with quick, alert steps and a smiling face.

People said he was wonderful; that he had the endurance and elasticity of a boy. But he hadn't really. All that he had was an infatuation for a very beautiful and athletic girl, and courage.

But he drew the line at mountain climbing. She wanted him to climb Newport with her on the ocean side. But he wouldn't. And he gave his reasons frankly and simply:

"I'm one of the living proofs," he said, "that Byron is right and that man isn't descended from a monkey. Even when I was a little boy I couldn't climb a cherry tree. I have heightophobia. I can look at the ground from a first story window but I can't look at it from a second story window. I don't even like to think of looking at the ground from a second story window. I can't tell you just what it does to me; but it's very horrid."

So they walked up Duck Brook instead. And I think they got engaged on that walk; because that night the old man seemed to forget how tired he was, and carried on all the evening like a two year old.

III

He wrote to her every day and she wrote to him; but they did not see each other again until the autumn. She came then to be with friends at Piping Rock and of course the old man could be with her every day.

But in the meanwhile he'd kept up the games that she'd started him on and had hired an ex-prize fighter to stick around and train him. And he did manage to get into wonderful condition for a man of his age. But age is age for all that, and it takes more than scientific exercising and deep breathing and massage and cold showers to set the clock back.

I wouldn't want to criticise the old man; he was always white to me. But from the time he got discontented with his age and began trying to make himself young, he lost some quality that I'd always liked and admired. There'd been a wonderful, philosophical, restful dignity about him, and that was all gone now. So was his repose. He'd acquired an abrupt, jerky manner, and the kind of clothes that go with it. His man told me in confidence that the old man had taken to sleeping in a chamois mask lined with cold cream.

Somehow you can't help admiring a woman who puts up a good fight to keep herself young. But it's different with a man. The fact that he should actually resent growing old kind of knocks the manliness out of him. A man is supposed to take what's coming to him, as, and when, it comes. At least that's the way I feel. But then I'm young. Maybe I'd feel different if I loved somebody the way the old man loved Miss Pembroke, and wanted her to have everything that a beautiful young girl ought to have—including a young husband.

Winter came and Miss Pembroke followed the golf and tennis as far south as Aiken. But the old man was obliged to stick around New York. The market was active and he couldn't get away. But he made all his plans to hit Palm Beach just about the time she did.

She'd no sooner gone south than he came down with a hard cold, and he had to call on all his renewed youth to shake it. And it left him pale and pulled down and worried.

The doctor came every day to blow the old man's nose out with salt and water, to spray his throat and run a vibrator up and down his spine. Sometimes the doctor stayed to dinner, and they'd have long talks in the library afterwards.

One night the doctor brought some other doctor and they were shut up with the old man for a long time.

He didn't go downtown the next day. He just sat around and walked around and was very quiet and absent-minded. The second day he sent for his lawyers and I was called in to witness his signature on a document. I suppose it was a will. But they didn't tell me.

Then for two days running the old man went downtown. The day after that he sent for me and told me that he was going to the hospital—the doctor's private hospital. He said it was nothing serious, that he would be laid up only a week and that he expected to be greatly benefited. He told me not to tell anyone where he'd gone. If it leaked out that he was sick the sickness would be exaggerated and there might be bad times on Wall Street. I was to come to the hospital every morning for orders, or between times if anything really important turned up.

That hospital was in a funny part of town, for a hospital, way over near the East River. You could have got to it by boat if you'd wanted to. It was in a house that had been a fine Colonial mansion in its day, but all done over now in white tiles and white enamel. It wasn't easy to get in. There was a negro who'd look out at you through a little wicket in the front door, and ask your business, and shut the wicket, and go away, and come back, and pull a lot of bolts and let down chains and let you in.

I saw the old man the morning after he'd gone to the hospital. And he was a sick looking man. He looked as gray and as fragile as cigar ashes. He didn't say but a few words.

I'd brought a letter that had come from Miss Pembroke, and he told me to lay it on the medicine stand; said he'd read it later. And then he forced a smile and nodded for me to go away and not bother him.

The next morning he looked even worse. And he was having an attack of hiccoughs, due to sheer weakness. But he was more talkative. He said he was going to be all right. "They used a local anæsthetic," he explained, "so I had no real shock; but I could hear them cutting and it made me nervous."

Then he lifted a weak hand, and pointing toward the room at his right, he said:

"How's Smith?"

And the doctor answered, offhand and very quickly:

"Don't worry about Smith. He's all right."

I'd said good by to him and stepped out into the hall with the doctor, when the negro came running up the stairs in his soft rubber-soled shoes and pulled the doctor aside and whispered to him. The doctor gave him some instructions and he turned and went back down the stairs. Then the doctor said to me: "Would you mind stepping into this room for a moment?"—here he turned the handle of a door. It was the door of the room toward which the old man had pointed when he asked about "Smith."

"There's a new patient arrived," the doctor explained. "You undoubtedly would know him by sight, and—well, he doesn't want to be seen. He doesn't want anyone to know where he is—not even so discreet a young man as yourself. Do you mind?"

I said, "No, of course I didn't," and went into the room and heard the door close behind me.

It was just such a room as the old man had, but the shades were pulled and at first I didn't notice that there was something lying on the bed with a sheet over it. "Smith," I thought. Well, Smith instead of being all right had died and they'd put me in the room with him.

But it was natural enough for the doctor to have told the old man that Smith was all right. You don't tell one very sick man that his neighbor has died. It's too discouraging.

I'd never been alone with a corpse before and it made me feel embarrassed and uncomfortable. But in a few moments I got used to it and didn't mind.

Then, for it was quite a time before the doctor came and said that it was all right for me to come out, I began to get curious—curious to see what Smith looked like. And I couldn't see what harm there'd be in taking a look, and so after a little hesitation I walked close to the bed and took hold of the sheet and lifted the head end of it and looked underneath.

I don't know much about such things or which is which; but the thing under the sheet—the thing they had called Smith—wasn't a man. It was some kind of a big ape.

I let the sheet drop and tip-toed to the door, as close to the door as I could get, and waited for the doctor to come and let me out.

IV

Next morning the old man was better. Wonderfully better. He'd lived through a horrible day of hiccoughing, and about midnight his nerves had suddenly stopped dancing and he'd slipped off into a deep, quiet sleep. He'd had eggs and coffee for breakfast. His eye was bright and clear. He said that he felt like a new man.

It was a beautiful sunny morning, and he asked me to push the window up all the way. And I stood for a moment looking out over the river.

The old man's room was in the second story of the house, but the house stood on what had been the original bank of the river, and this had been shorn clear and faced with granite masonry so that the window was really a long way from the ground. Two days later I had occasion to remember this; for when I came into the room the old man, in his dressing wrapper, was standing where I had stood at the open window, and leaning out and looking down.

He whipped around when he heard me come in, with the expression of a little boy who's been caught in a mischief, and then he laughed.

"Something's happened to my eyes," he said. "I don't seem to mind heights any more."

He was tickled to death, like a child with a new toy. And he was just going to show me how far out he could lean without being bothered when the doctor came in.

The doctor was very cheerful, and rubbing his hands together, and altogether happy and voluble. But the way he addressed the old man gave me an awful shock. It seemed to me so disrespectful and familiar.

"Well," he said, "how's the boy?"

But the old man didn't seem to mind. He laughed and said:

"The boy is fine and dandy, thank you! But by the way"—here he jerked his thumb over his shoulder as if indicating the next room—"how is Smith?"

Then he giggled as if he and the doctor had some amusing secret together. But although the doctor pretended to be amused I could see that he wasn't, not altogether.

"Oh," he said, "Smith's all right! Smith's got nothing to worry him."

This seemed to strike the old man as a wonderful joke. He put back his head and roared. Then he said:

"I guess that's right. He's got nothing to worry him except money."

It was all over my head and beyond my understanding.

Then the old man stopped laughing and said:

"We ought not to laugh. Smith's going to find out that money isn't everything—poor fellow."

Curious, I lifted the head end of the sheet and saw the thing they called Smith.

The next day the old man left the hospital. I called for him in a closed car and drove him home. He was in high spirits.

"Surgeons are wonderful," he said, "but I do hate a hospital—when you're feeling pretty low yourself and have to listen to the noises of those who feel worse." He filled his lungs full of air and smiled in a gay way.

"I don't even feel weak. I don't feel as if I'd ever be tired again—— By Gawd, there's a pretty pair of ankles——"

I'd never before seen him so interested in the streets and in the crowds. Usually when he drove about town he never looked to the right or left. But now his eyes were all over looking at everything. And he wasn't a bit like himself.

"I never noticed how many pretty women there are in New York," he said. "Look at that girl (Continued on page 119)

THIS WAY UP

Young Richard Kinsella was highly ambitious,
He wanted to be a success,
And, knowing that fortune was often capricious
With moods that aren't easy to guess,
He read all the books and the magazines too
That tell a young fellow what course to pursue.
"Work hard," was the counsel he read, "work and save,
Be modest and thrifty and always behave
With such circumspection as never to shock
The most puritanic and—don't watch the clock!
Be up every morning at six, as a rule,
Don't waste precious evenings at poker or pool,
But spend the time fitting Yourself for your job
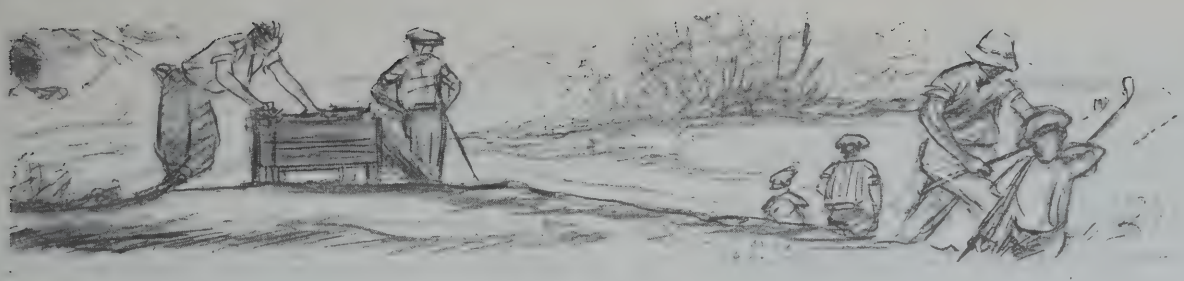
And do not be flitting
Around with the mob
Who dance and who frivol like gay butterflies
—But be like the bee if you're hoping to rise."



Equipped with such copybook maxims as these
Our hero came into Manhattan one day
Prepared at the earliest moment to seize
The first opportunity coming his way.
Next day at five-thirty he rose to partake
Of coffee and oatmeal and rolls;
The city, he noticed, was not yet awake
Except for some nondescript souls
Who stood on the corner, awaiting a car;
They certainly were not Successes, by far.
Dick boarded the subway and traveled downtown
To seek for a firm of whose world-wide renown
He'd frequently heard, and with worthy ambition
He hoped he might find there a humble position.

The people he rode with looked more or less seedy,
They mostly were workmen and such,
Together with other folks threadbare and needy
Who'd never amounted to much,
And Richard Kinsella remarked to himself,
"Say, where are the people with power and pelf?"
I used "pelf" to rhyme, but Dick's actual crack
Was "Where are the guys who are making the jack?"

The office he sought for was closed, and a sign
Announced that it opened at quarter to nine,
But Dick thought "I'll wait;
For I'm willing to state
That the early bird's here—it's the worm who is late."
At last the place opened and Richard went in.
The office boys gave him an impudent grin,
But after some moments a pretty girl came
Who asked him his business, along with his name.
And Dick came across
Then asked "Where's the boss?
I've waited around since some time before seven!"
"The boss," smiled the girl, "seldom comes till eleven."
"I'll wait," announced Richard, and picked out a chair.

For two hours or thereabouts, Richard was there,
While clerks and stenographers came in and out.
Our hero, however, kept looking about
Observing that all of the women and men
Who seemed to be "somebodies" blew in at ten Or later, perhaps;
"They've surely got snaps,"
He said to the girl at the desk. "Well, you see They've also got pretty good brains!" answered she.
Eleven o'clock—and the boss sauntered in,

He looked like an athlete with sun-tempered skin.
He glanced at our hero and strolled on inside,
"That's him," said the girl in a tone of some pride.

"I'll see if he'll see you."
She shortly returned.
"I'm afraid he can't see you," was all that Dick learned,
"He's busy this morning, and this afternoon,
He's dated for golf, so if you'd just as soon
Perhaps you will try
Some day by and by——"
"I'll come in tomorrow," our hero remarked,
And rose from the chair where so long he had parked.
"All right," said the girl, but she didn't tell Dick
That the boss had said, "I haven't time for that hick!"

Young Richard Kinsella kept up his attack,
And day after day he came back and came back
But all his persistency netted a loss,
He couldn't succeed in approaching the boss.
However, the girl, on his plight taking pity,
And knowing Kinsella was new to the city,
Was cordially nice to him;
So in good time
She gave her advice to him,
Telling him, "I'm
Your friend, Dick Kinsella, so listen, old bean,
Those clothes that you're sporting aren't fit to be seen,
Forget all those copybooks,
Silly old sloppy books—
Take it from me in these few simple words,
A bunch of fine feathers don't injure fine birds!
You go out tomorrow,
And beg, steal or borrow
Enough of the rhino to buy you some duds—
Something with style and with verve and with pep—

Then, when you look like the best of young bloods,
Come back to Mabel and I'll put you hep,
Hep to the game and the way it is played
Here in these centers of business and trade!"

Out of the hoard
Which he had saved for his bed and his board
(Bed at the "Y" and his meals at a beanery)
Richard, with Mabel's aid, purchased new scenery.
Thus equipped, young Mr. Richard Kinsella
Certainly looked like a "regular fella."
"Now," observed Mabel, "I'll show you a few things, We'll go and mix with the people who do things."
She took him to ball games, she took him to shows
She took him to smart cabarets,
She showed him the country clubs, which, heaven knows,
Are costly in various ways;
On Saturdays, Sundays,
(The popular fun-days)
She took him to beaches
Where smart people swim,
And he viewed the peaches
Gay, graceful and slim,
And husky young tritons, and dowagers stout,
Whose high powered autos were parked all about.
Young Richard looked over these seekers of pleasure
And said, "These are millionaires, people of leisure, Folks who've inherited
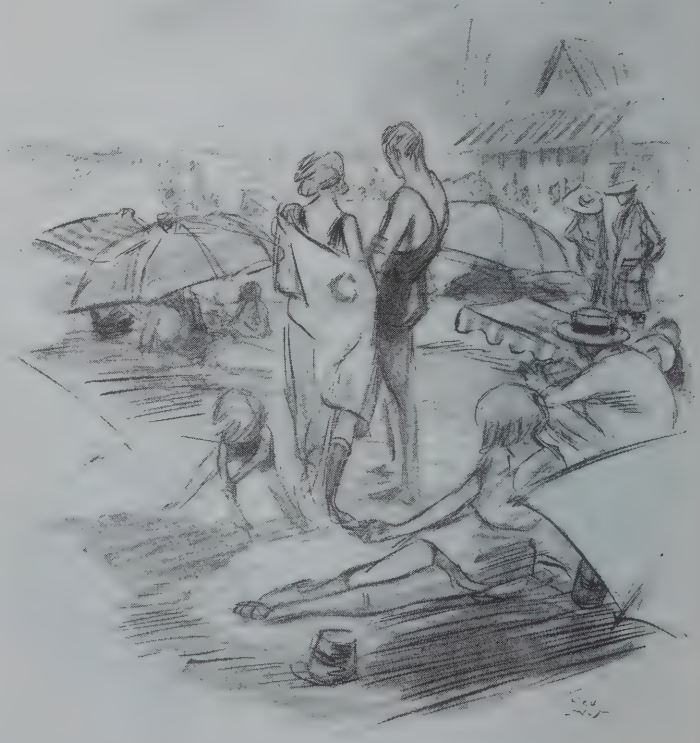
Fortunes unmerited;
Why don't you show me the kind who are stressful
Builders and makers of business successful?



Men who toil busily,
Twelve hours a day
Not these who dizzily
Frolic and play.
Nix on these gay
Loafers and shirkers
Take 'em away,
Show me the workers!
Show me the planners of big vital schemes,
Men in whom worthy accomplishment gleams!"
Thereupon Mabel gave Richard a jar,
"Look all about you," she laughed, "here they are!

"These are the people
Who raise the skyscrapers,
Build the church steeple
And edit the papers;
Don't you be fooled by the magazine junk—
Books on success and that species of bunk;
Brains and ideas are really what count,
These folks have got 'em—in any amount!
That's why they've money to spend in their play;
They make it—thinking for four hours a day.
Never you mind what their canny biographers
Write for the sake of ambitious stenographers,
Clerks and young people who long for success—
Stuff about twelve hours a day, more or less,
Dope that says plodding's the way to advance:
—These are the gamblers who took a long chance,
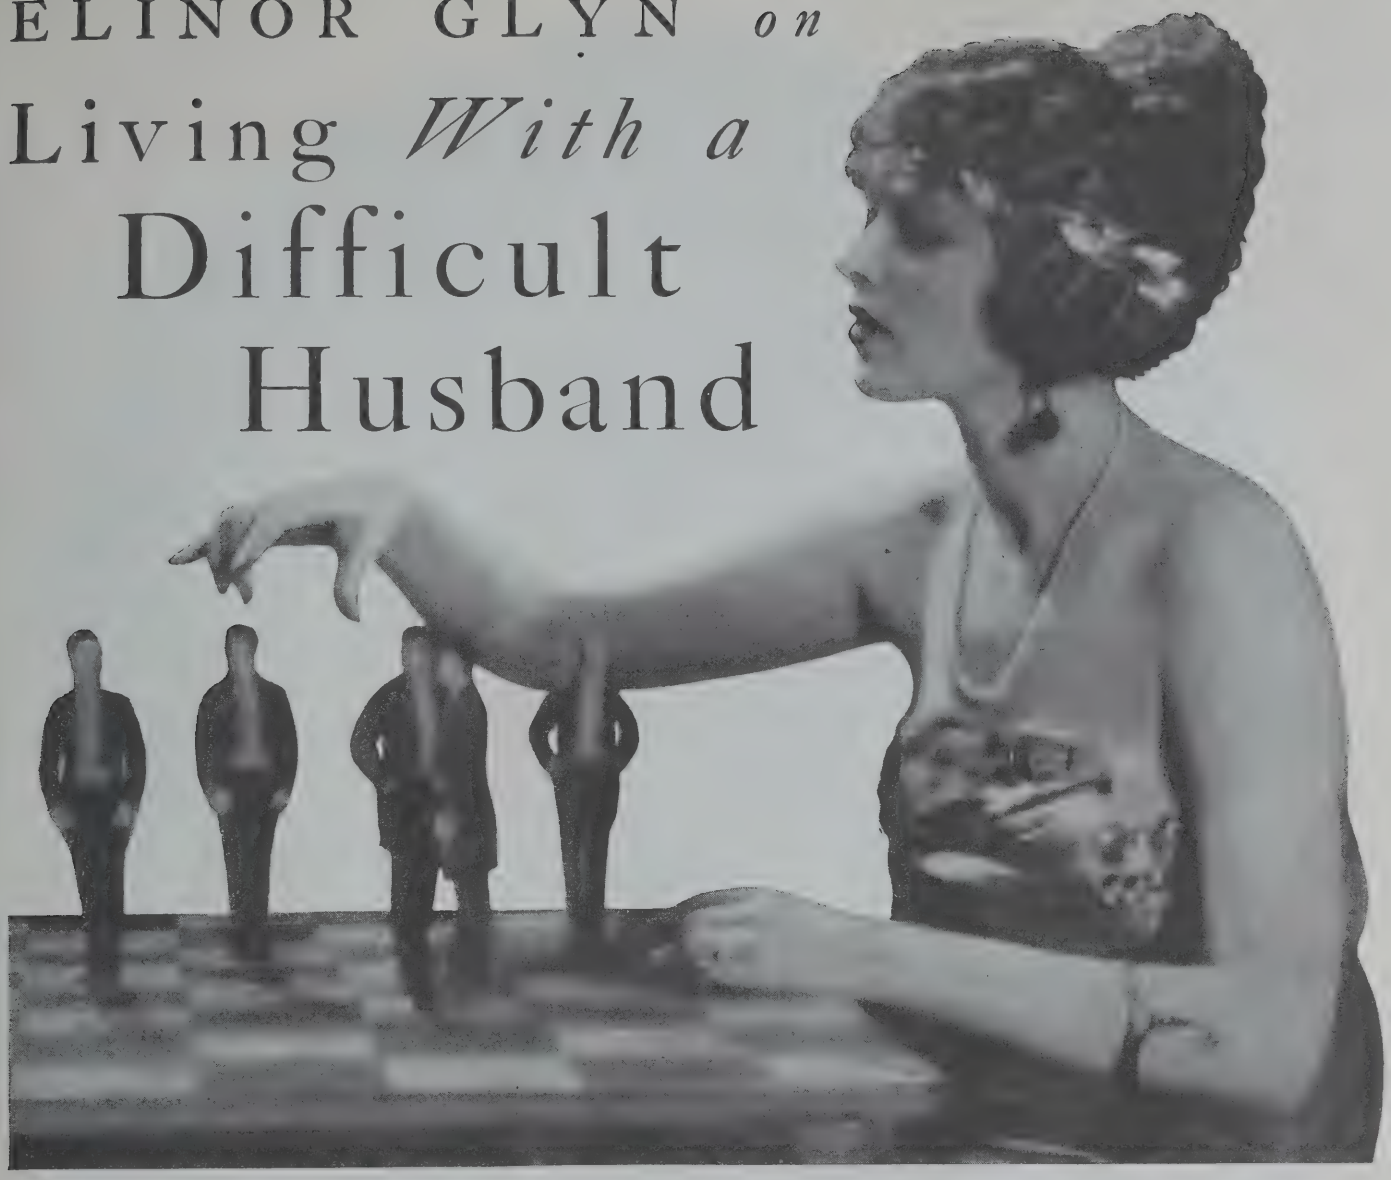
Backed up their hunch
With nerve and with grit
Used all their punch
And vigor and wit,
Played the game bravely for all they were worth
And now they are running this part of the earth!

"I also might add,
Young Richard, me lad,
That many a deal that makes millions," quoth Mabel,
"Is made on the golf course, or over a table;
For Business is Business—but this, too, is so:
Folks like to do business with people they know,
And playing with people—it can't be denied—
Will help you a lot when you come to decide
Just what sort of character they may possess!"
"I get you," said Richard, "although I confess
It comes as a bit of a shock after all
The stuff about 'reaching success' I recall.
But somehow I rather believe you are right,
I've got a new slant, and I've seen a great light,
I'll risk all my wad—though it isn't so much—
On getting in touch
With people who count in this Manhattan game,
And see if that method is all that you claim."



Though fresh from the farm
Young Richard had charm
And something that made people like him at once;
—I haven't the space to relate all the stunts
By which he got in with
A smart social set Almost to begin with;
And presently met
The man whom in vain he'd attempted to see —In brief, Mabel's boss. It was luck, you'll agree,
And yet—maybe luck isn't quite the right term,
For Dick was the early bird seeking the worm;
And, failing to catch him the regular way,
Had captured him, unaware, during his play.
The boss took to Dick
(Whom he'd called "a hick")
And when next our hero was destined to cross
That office he'd parked in—he came with the Boss!

But little remains
That needs to be told,
Kinsella had brains
And his hunches were bold.
The boss liked his daring (because it made money)
And Richard's career is exceedingly sunny;
For four hours a day in his office you'll find him
And there about business he capably thinks,
And then, with his strenuous labors behind him,
He goes to the tennis courts or to the links,
Where frequently, after a number of sets,
Or after a "round" he successfully gets
Quite chummy with men who, he knows, are an aid
To building up business and giving him trade.
His wife—yes, it's Mabel—is helping him write
His autobiography, which, so I hear
Advises young people to work day and night
To save and be thrifty—for Richard, I fear,
Now he has risen to moderate fame,
Isn't giving away any tricks of the game!

Living With a Difficult Husband

WHOEVER has a "difficult" husband has to humor him. The tragedy which very few men realize is that the moment a woman has to humor a man she unconsciously loses respect for him, even if she goes on loving him in a protective sort of way; because the possibility of his answering to humoring implies either vanity or weakness, and however tolerant of his faults the conscious mind may be, the subconscious mind recognizes the truth and feels contempt. A man might very well ask himself, therefore, whether he wants his wife to despise him before he permits himself to become "difficult."

When a woman marries a man, even after the shortest acquaintance, she must have some idea of what his character is. It seems to me that it can be only in books, where situations are created to meet the exigencies of the story, that total changes in men occur after marriage, and that simple lambs turn into Bluebeards and delightful companions become morose tyrants.

In real life surely any observant person could get the general "hang"—so to speak—of the character of an ordinary man; and as we are considering the question broadly, it is of the ordinary man we must judge.

I do not mean that the troubles of matrimony or the waning of love do not alter people, because of course they do. What I mean is that there are certain fundamental qualities which remain, and these, except in the cases of deliberate arch deceivers, must have been evident in the beginning; such qualities as generosity, jealousy, arrogance, egotism, vanity, pettiness. About truth or honor a woman could hardly be certain because both these qualities are looked at by the male mind from a different standpoint when dealing with women to what they are in the abstract, or when dealing with men.

But to discuss that interesting point would be a long story.

Therefore we must start this discussion by supposing that Margaret has a general idea of George—greatly exaggerated as to the good side if she is in love—when she marries him. But although she may have remarked that he is mean over little things, or selfish to others even though he may be a slave to herself, or easily flattered, or avaricious, or weak of will—still, she has glossed over all his faults and so has not faced the idea that he is going to turn into a "difficult" husband. She marries him; and afterwards he becomes this tiresome bore, making the days uncomfortable and filling the atmosphere with discontent.

Now what is she to do about it?

Every woman has some grain of tact because it goes back to the self-preservation instinct, which through the ages has instilled cunning into woman to oppose the brute force she had to fight.

Therefore that sixth sense, that intuition, is in every female in some degree, and she can never be so completely impervious to things, people or events as man can.

But the subconscious and basic motive of all human actions is to follow nature's laws; in the case of woman, this means to secure a mate and to reproduce. Civilization is responsible for countless diversifications and perversions, and for atrophying or exaggerating these instincts, but they can always be found if the probe goes deep enough.

So that once the woman has fulfilled the first of them—that is, secured the mate—her sixth sense in regard to him automatically loses its alertness, and indeed is often allowed to sleep.

Thus a girl seemingly tactful during the engagement can become an apparently tactless woman so far as her husband is concerned. All this quite unconsciously; but that in itself may cause some of his "difficulties."

The case with man is different, because nature is continually prompting him to be unfaithful, and it is only the effects of civilization and custom upon the subconscious mind for generations that enable him to remain constant at all. So unless he is deeply in love and the woman is not too ardent, so that his desire to keep her instinctively suggests cunning to him, he is at no pains to use tact in his relation to his wife; and in nine cases out of ten if he is that kind of man he just indulges his "difficultness" without trying to alter himself.

Now to get to the practical question of living with a "difficult" husband:

Margaret must first decide clearly what her aim in the affair is.

It is very seldom that women, or indeed any human beings—I say human beings, not just "men," because we have agreed in a former article that there is a third sex of neuters evolving—will face what actually is their aim, and what is the motive principle for their actions. They throw dust in their own eyes all the time, and either never analyze at all or call their motive what they would like it to be rather than what it truly is.

So that Margaret, who we will suppose has an almost impossible husband to live with, would have to ask herself these questions fearlessly:

1. Does she want to break away and get rid of him?
2. Does she want to make things smooth and live with him in peace?
3. Or does she so desire to express her own personality that so long as she can do that, quarrels or peace are really secondary considerations?

Most probably she will hate doing this self-analysis, but it will be the only way to get anywhere near deciding the question.

Now let us begin with number one, which we will suppose she has discovered to be her real desire after facing things.

She has found George to be impossible. She has grown so to despise his unreasonableness or his irritating idiosyncracies that she would rather chuck the whole thing and be off. She had better put it before him, and if he will not or seemingly cannot change, then she had better apply for a separation.

But perhaps there are children, so that although Margaret's real desire is to leave him, her interest in the children makes her waive it. Then she should use the whole of her woman's natural instinct and her acquired reason in her endeavor to discover just what so irritates her in George, and what are the probable causes of his behaving in certain ways.

We will suppose that she then discovers some of the trouble is due to the wounding of her own vanity and not to intentional meanness on his part; that some is really due to contemptible faults in his character; and that some is due to the fact that she herself often "riles" him. Whatever the cause may be, she must seek to eradicate it. If he has faults and habits which cause her to despise him, then her task is easier, because she has only to reason with herself and tell herself that the opinion or actions of one she despises cannot possibly matter to her. They are beneath her notice, just as a tiresome child's actions are beneath one's notice. In that case she can humor him as she would an invalid or a lunatic. She will be keeping her real aim in view, that is, to live with him in peace, because her desire for the welfare of the children is stronger than her desire to get rid of him.

She will have to use her wits all the time and never let herself indulge in wounded vanity or express her individuality in the way she has discovered brings forward one of his "difficult" moods.

(The incredible bores men can be in their homes when they are "difficult" many thousands of poor women know.)

Of course having to be always watchful is very trying. If it should be not the children but worldly position, or ambition, or money, or any other reason whatsoever which she finds stronger than her personal distaste for the "difficult" man, she will have to act in the same way, and use her wits to make it possible to live with him. For it is perfectly idiotic to stay on with him grumbling or acting in such a way as will shatter the nervous force of herself, and probably make the man more tiresome. That sort of thing is the old story of knocking one's head against a stone wall instead of quietly going through a gate.

Now for number two: Suppose Margaret wants to make things smooth and live with George in peace.

Well, more than ever must she study his character and notice the small things about it as carefully as the big.

If a skilled mechanic had a difficult bit of machinery to deal with, and his whole welfare depended upon his power to work it smoothly, what would he do if he saw that it was becoming uneven and cranky? He would examine its every part and discover what was the cause. He would not stop until he absolutely knew the cause of its annoying action.

If he discovered that it was because his own hand was shaky, he would try to steady his hand. If he found that there was apparently no present cause for the machine's getting out of order, he would then know that there was some fault in the construction which he was powerless to alter and that he must ignore it and for the time turn out second-class work or wait until it went right again. But he would never be so stupid as to grind on in temper because he felt that machines had no right to get out of order and ought to work as he wished them to, regardless of the fact that this particular machine had idiosyncracies. He would know that if he did that he would just smash the thing up, and that some parts might then fly out and hit himself.

Margaret should use exactly the same method with George.

Her difficulty would be to own to herself that anything in the uncomfortable situation could be her own fault.

If, however, she finds on examination that it is really not her fault, and that the "difficult" moments come, so to speak, like a bolt from the blue, then she must just soothe or remain silent; unless the man is of a reasonable nature, when she can explain to him how these ways of his pain her, and how, when he is unreasonable and "difficult" over so many trifles—be they jealousy or economy or any other thing—he is just causing her to lose respect for him and will eventually wear out her love. Then if the man has any decent qualities in him, he himself will try to change.

But sometimes a man is "difficult" because he is working terribly hard and his nerves are on edge. Then it is that a woman should show tact and tenderness as she would to a child.

And now we get to question three.

And we find that Margaret admits that just to please herself each day and express her feelings and desires is her real aim.

Then the only thing to be done with a "difficult" husband is to fight it out and see whose will is the stronger.

Some natures enjoy fighting, and if Margaret wins she may have peace at last in her home. But if George gets the best of it, then she has to begin all over again and may in the end come to think that there is something quite sensible in that old verse about the "dinner of herbs where love is" being better than the "stalled ox and hatred therewith."

Part Seven:

CHAPTER XXVI

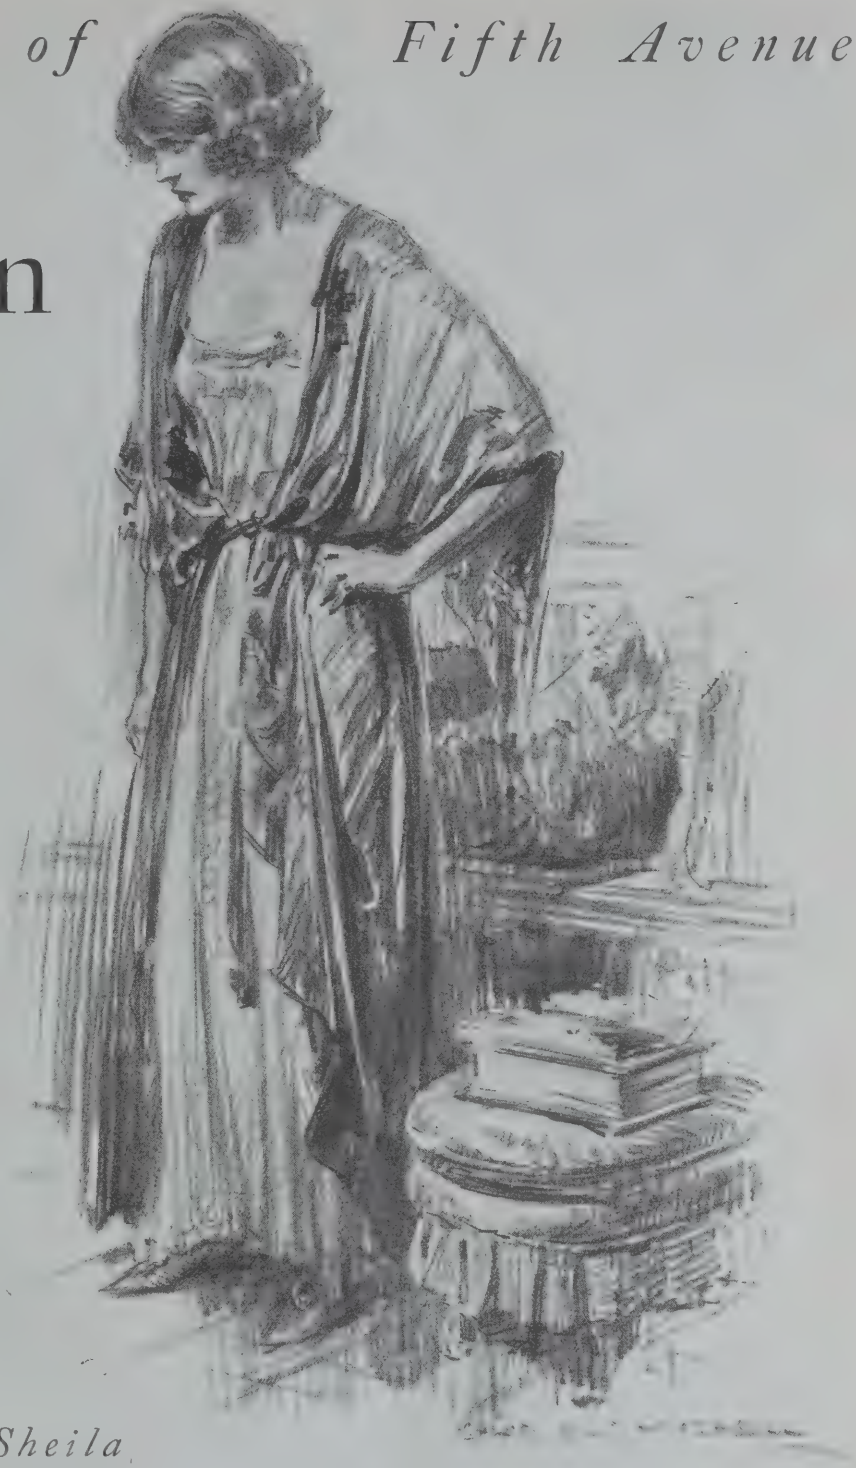
IT WAS five o'clock and all the children had gone home. The ground was strewn with pasteboard boxes, torn newspapers, crushed cups, wrappings of every sort—the débris of the party. Where the air had been alive with the tumult of voices, the wheezing of the accordion, the whine of the bagpipes and the raucous cries of Mr. Punch now brooded a startling silence. Yet something of that intense, vibrant life seemed yet to hover there, charging the air with unseen pulsations.

The Pirate, sitting alone on a green bench, could still feel in his ears the vibrations, hear the pounding of hundreds of little feet. He had been glad to sit down at last, although he did not feel exactly tired. Rather he did not seem to have much feeling at all. Uncle Billy, mousing with his pipe around the remains of the marionette theater, thought the old man had gone to sleep—but Uncle Billy was mistaken. Old Peter was not asleep, although he was dreaming.

He sat erect and high—the Kaynes were all long barreled—his thin old legs crossed, his lean brown hands with their blue-black veins laid one athwart the other upon his knee.

Old Peter was just a shade bewildered. There had been so many children. So many! And they had darted about so quickly! They had tired his eyes. But not him—only his eyes. He half closed them. The air was sweet, surprisingly so, and the fragrance that stole along the grass was redolent of blossoms. He took several long breaths, in spite of a slight tightness in his chest. Oh, it was good! Good!

His eyelids sank lower. He wondered he did not feel more exhausted after such a long day. But it had been worth it. Yes, life was sweet at any age. It might be different if you were left alone, but he had so much. So much to enjoy! So much to be proud of! There never had been a better son, a finer man than Rufus. His boy. He had known the boy would make good, and he had.



He would never have built the house if he had not known that Rufus would make good. The house! He remembered his first talk with Howlett about it. He had never really liked Howlett. He was too autocratic, too much of a swelled head, stuck on himself. "I want you to build me the best house you know how—latest type—solid—best material—something to last!" he had told the architect. Well, he had got it. There was nothing finer in New York—and it would last, too! Long, long after he was gone—it would still be there. No one could want anything better. His house! His family!

He closed his eyes for a moment the better to savor it all. The shadows from the Mall crept closer and closer—drawing a coverlet of partial obscurity over the refuse of the picnic. The children seemed to have come back. He could hear them babbling all about him—babbling, babbling. He opened his eyes a little wider. The evening breeze stirred the papers on the grass and sent them flying. Yes, there the children were—everywhere, all in white—all over the grass. He was glad they had come back. He had been lonely without them. Their voices were getting louder all the time—rising higher and higher, drowning out everything like the roar of waves. Throughout it all he seemed to hear the skirl of bagpipes—above his head somewhere. The wind swayed his whiskers gently. His eyes closed.

It was distinctly cooler. He could no longer hear the voices of the children and he perceived to his surprise that they had gone away again. Those white things were only pieces of paper! But there was no doubt that they had been there a moment ago. He had seen them distinctly. Children were all like that—here one second and gone the next. Sheila was just like that. His little Sheila—his "fairy moonbeam." What a shame she could not have been there to see the children! Where was she? Where had she gone? Why had she not told him that she expected to be away? It was not like her. She was always so thoughtful—so sweet.

He began to worry. Suddenly he became convinced that she was in danger. The children had come back again and the sound of their voices was like the shouting of the sea. They were pushing close about him, stretching out their hands, fear on their faces; and they were all in danger, terrible danger; and as he stared at them he saw that each one was Sheila—a thousand Sheilas—and each one dearer to him than anything else on earth. The roar of the sea poured all about him. Then the sun set—suddenly—and darkness.

"Gently! Hold him like that!" he heard someone saying, and he opened one eye. It was still bright daylight. The sun had come back. There was a group of people about him and he recognized Rufus and Uncle Billy. What were they worrying about? He tried to smile but he could not move his face. It seemed stiff—cramped. He tried to get up but his left arm and leg refused to budge. There was something the matter with his tongue. It made him angry.

He wanted to tell them about Sheila. What were they waiting for? Why were all those motors stopping just there, with their staring occupants? From the distant avenue came a faint clanging which grew louder and then louder. Then someone hit the gong a vicious penultimate stroke right beside him. He was furious at his own futility. And then—crowning insult!—he felt the bench with himself upon it being lifted in air and carried towards the motors.

He remembered little of his trip home, or of how he got up the front steps of the house and into his bed. But his sense of relief at being once more surrounded by his own personal effects was great. It was such a comfort to feel that he was back home—in his own house—with his family. Everybody was there: Rufus, Elizabeth, Billy, Diana, Claudia, even that fool James; everybody except Sheila. He endeavored to communicate to them the important fact that she was in danger, but his mouth gave forth only a succession of meaningless sounds. Disgusted, he gave up trying. Then a long time passed during which—so far as he was aware—nothing happened at all.

CHAPTER XXVII

IT IS probable that both Elizabeth and Diana would have been more dismayed by Rufus's disclosure of his misfortune had their minds not been distracted by Sheila's mysterious departure, of which they had first learned when Diana, returning home the previous afternoon, had found a penciled note in her sister's handwriting saying that she was going down to spend a few days at Doctor Dhal's Butterfly Club.

This discovery, coming so shortly after Diana's talk with Sheila and the latter's expressed willingness to abandon Dhal and all his works, was to that extent the more appalling. That, as Sheila had said in her note, Lulie Wingate, Rita Ricardo, Oscar Florian and others equally conspicuous were also down there did not assuage Diana's anxiety. Florian and his associates were almost as antipathetic to her as Dhal himself. Rita Ricardo kept snakes, and indeed there was to Diana something reptilian about all of them. This made her the more ready to believe all the implications in what Maitland had repeated to her about Dhal.

She had communicated his information at once to Sheila, who had at first ridiculed it. The child had never, she assured Diana, felt half so well as since she had been taking the exercises at the sanitarium. They were perfectly simple—deep breathing, fresh air, a mild diet. Doctor Dhal himself was never there and the instruction was given entirely by young women. If it benefited her, what difference did it make whether it was called "yoga" or anything else?

When Diana endeavored to explain, Sheila became indignant. She did not know what Diana was talking about. What she said was all nonsense! Why didn't she go around there and find out for herself instead of listening to a lot of silly gossip which was utterly false? Diana could not understand the intense feeling of resentment which she seemed to have aroused in Sheila. Finally the girl promised to give it all up.

That had been six weeks before, and Diana had been lulled into a specious sense of security by Sheila's apparent willingness to yield to her sister's wishes. And all the time Sheila had been getting into it deeper and deeper. That Diana did not know what "it" was made her fear the greater. There was something ominous in the fact that Sheila had lied—must deliberately have broken her promise and had intended to do so all along. Some subtle influence must have undermined the girl's normal standards of conduct.

At least Sheila had had the decency to let them know where she was. Could the child have gone back to drugs again? But a search of Sheila's bureau and medicine closet revealed nothing to suggest a resumption of the habit, if it could be called such. And her appearance for the last three months belied any such suggestion. Lying in a corner, where evidently Sheila had dropped and overlooked it, Diana found a curious cone-shaped object. It was round at the base and about five inches in diameter, made of brass wire twisted into a spiral and terminating in a crudely fashioned serpent's head. She recalled with a shudder having seen a similar object worn by a dancing girl. Something far more dangerous and terrible than drugs was hanging over Sheila, gradually overpowering her senses—physical and moral—as with an insidious, poisonous perfume.

Diana had telephoned Lloyd at once, but had found him neither at his office nor his rooms. He had been, in fact, even then on his way to the Kayne house with Rufus's will, which he was eventually to take away with him undelivered after seeing the tableau of Devereaux and Diana in the window. That telltale silhouette, following on the very heels of his talk with Rufus that afternoon, had confirmed his worst suspicions. There was no mistaking the abandon with which Diana had thrown herself into her lover's arms—no longer room for doubt that he was her lover.

And yet for some perverse reason Lloyd knew that he loved her none the less himself—loved and hated her at the same time—refusing to face that which his reason told him must be the truth. Was instinct, the deeper spiritual knowledge of his subconscious self, teaching him to question reason? Or was the great wave of his passion lifting him off his feet and carrying him bodily towards the rocks? A change had come over him. So far as this woman was concerned he would now have thrown conscience to the winds—while surrendering no other jot of his integrity. This emotion that now possessed him, this lust of Satan or thirst of the soul, whichever it may have been, had overcome his conscious will, and yet his surrender to it had bred a certain ruthlessness towards its object. He would bide his time. Perhaps she would tire of Devereaux. Then ——

But he was in no conciliatory mood when next morning Diana called him on the telephone, told him the news regarding Sheila and asked for his advice. What did she take him for, he asked himself? Did she imagine that she could deceive him about her relations with Devereaux and, while keeping him in suspense, use him to the limit? Rather gruffly he told her that she had better go to Jamaica near which the Butterfly Club was situated and see if she couldn't persuade the child to go home with her. If she was unsuccessful he'd see what could be done next.

Why, he demanded peremptorily, hadn't she kept track of what Sheila was doing? At least enough to know whether or not she had been faithful to her promise? Diana could make no defense. There was none to make. She had learned only a part of the lesson of responsibility. Having once rescued Sheila she had left her to her own devices—with this result.

"Don't be cross with me!" Diana had begged.

"Why not?" he had answered brusquely. "I've a right to be! I'm furious with you!"

Yet it had been with a deep sense of comfort that she had heard his voice through the telephone.

It was too late to do anything that evening and it was accordingly not until the next morning—the morning of May Day—that Diana, shortly before Rufus had left the house for the purpose of finding his father in Central Park, had started for Long Island. She drove herself, taking no chauffeur, and the exhilaration induced by the glory of the spring and her swift flight through the soft green countryside gradually allayed her fears. No wonder Sheila had wished to be in the country at such a moment.

Diana had looked up her route in the road book before starting and, at a wooded corner by a duck pond, left the turnpike for a sandy road leading towards the Sound. For a mile or so she drove past open fields and at length came unexpectedly upon a high brick wall surmounted by iron palings. Midway was a heavy door painted green with a small barred opening or peephole closed from within by a slide. On one side was an ordinary push button marked "ring." There was no name or mark on the door save a swastika on the lintel above. This was enough of a cue and Diana, having parked her car on the other side of the road, pressed the bell, which after some delay was answered by a negro servant.

Through the door Diana could see an extensive lawn where a number of persons were playing tennis, basketball, battledore and shuttlecock, ring toss and throwing a medicine ball. The negro on learning her errand conducted her up the path towards a large yellow house with several additions and many windows. In a grove of trees farther up the hill behind the house were a number of bright colored bungalows. Several females were walking about the piazzas in pink, blue and purple kimonos. From inside came the insistent whine of a phonograph. Diana now observed that the athletes all had on tights over which they threw the wrappers when they were done playing. A pleasant faced young woman dressed in a sort of bathing suit de luxe came forward, shook hands with the visitor and led her into a small bare reception room.

"I will try to find Miss Kayne for you," she said civilly. "She may be at one of the lectures. If not, she may have gone out walking."

A few moments later Sheila herself came in dressed in the street costume which she had worn when she had left home.

"What have you followed me down here for?" she asked, coldly suffering Diana's kiss.

"To take you home."

"I'm not going home!" Sheila answered, moving a step towards the door by which she had entered.

Diana became angry.

"You promised to give up all this," she protested sharply.

Sheila's face remained expressionless. She did not reply.

"Mother is frightfully upset about your going away without saying anything to her. It was very inconsiderate of you—heartless, in fact. Please get your things and come at once. I have the motor outside."

Sheila shook her head. There was a look in her eyes that frightened Diana.

"I insist!"

Sheila tittered. The sound was harsh, uncanny. It drove everything from Diana's mind that she had purposed using as an argument with her sister.

"You've lied to me!" she cried furiously. "What has come over you? Have you gone back to taking drugs?"

Sheila's face, hitherto merely scornful and antagonistic, hardened. Turning her back upon her sister, she walked haughtily through the doorway.

"Sheila!" cried Diana, hurrying after her. "Sheila—dear! Oh, Sheila! Please come back!" But the child had vanished.

Diana, turning into the adjacent corridor, came face to face with Oscar Florian, arrayed in white trousers and sleeveless purple jersey. He exhaled an odor of quelques fleurs. There was something about the chubbiness of his chin with its little pointed beard and the whiteness of his arms that seemed positively indecent.

"Ah!" he cried gaily, holding out a soft white hand with shiny nails. "Excuse my dishabille! Are we to have the pleasure of welcoming you to our circle? I understand your sister is here."

"How do you do," said Diana rigidly. "Can you tell me if Doctor Dhal is in? I am anxious to see him."

The young woman beamed on Diana: "Doctor Dhal wishes me to say your sister is unwilling to return."

Florian smiled as if something amused him and withdrew his hand.

"I will see," he answered with his old insolence.

Diana returned to the waiting room and stood looking out of the window. What was behind all this? A terrible dread lest Sheila should be already lost possessed her. Her tension increased as the minutes passed. Unexpectedly a thick, oily voice close behind her said:

"Dear lady, what can I do for you?"

She had heard no one enter and she shrank back; then, overcoming her sensation of horror and disgust, faced about. Doctor Dhal was standing there in a gown of blue crash, a red sash about his waist, a bland smile upon his pasty face.

"Please tell my sister to come home with me!" she besought him.

"Does she not desire to remain?" he asked in apparent surprise.

"Her father and mother don't want her to stay. They did not know that she was coming. They wish her to return at once."

Dhal bowed. "Dear lady, I will speak to her. She will, of course, go if she wishes. No one ever stays here unwillingly. All are free as the air."

He spoke with such sincerity that Diana's feeling of repugnance was somewhat weakened. Superficially at least the man was a gentleman.

"Will you sit down?" he asked. He placed a chair for her and she sank into it. Coincidentally Doctor Dhal slid into another. He was looking deep into her eyes now—his glance never leaving them for an instant. She had been foolish to be afraid of this man!

"Are you sure your father and mother are correctly informed about what we teach here?" he asked in a kindly tone. "We are seeking only perfect health—'mens sana in corpore sano'—self-realization, perfect and harmonious development of body, mind and soul. Our doctrines take a very firm hold upon those who study them. Much harm can be done by interruption. Sheila——"

The familiar use of her sister's Christian name by the stranger released Diana's will from any momentary ascendancy which his personality might have achieved over it. To hear those mucilaginous lips uttering the word "Sheila" revived all her original loathing.

"I wish to take my sister away with me—now!" she answered definitely.

The sweetness of Doctor Dhal's smile faded but his urbanity did not.

"Very well!" he answered. "Doubtless you have sufficient reasons. But it is a pity not to let her stay. She is very ductile. She is making great progress—and it is possible that she may not wish to go."

Doctor Dhal appeared to dissolve in a bluish mist and to be sucked through the doorway as by a draft. Diana felt, after her two interviews, nervous, verging on tears. The Swami did not come back, but at the end of a quarter of an hour the young lady in the bathing suit beamed in once more.

"Doctor Dhal wishes me to tell you that he has spoken to your sister and that she is unwilling to return to the city. Of course he has no way to make her do so."

Millions of motes floating in the sunlight seemed to obscure Diana's vision. She rose, feeling faint. From the other side of the corridor came the rasping of somebody's famous ragtime orchestra accompanying a hoarse vibrant voice upon the phonograph—"All I want is a little bit of love! A little bit of love from you!"

Maitland, having waited vainly at the trust company until eleven o'clock for Rufus to appear, called up the district attorney, with whom as a junior partner in Crutchfield and Pepperill's he had no difficulty in securing an immediate appointment, and took the subway to the Criminal Court building.

"I want to find out two things," said he succinctly as they settled down to business. "First, what you really know about a man who calls himself Doctor Dhal; second, how, if at all, one can force him to surrender a young girl if she falls under his influence and voluntarily goes to one of the various places he runs and refuses to leave it."

The district attorney—Morgan, also a young man—looked significantly at Maitland over his horn-rimmed spectacles.

"Get out of the way!" ordered Maitland sharply. "Sheila! Little one!" purred the Yogi, looking into her eyes.

"So you're on Dhal's trail?"

"I'm afraid so—yes."

The official shook his head ruefully.

"Then you've struck one of the most amazing phenomena in this city. I don't know of anything else like it anywhere. The man's got a kind of lingo—a patter—that enables him to pass for a 'Swami.' He's no more a Swami than you are. Knows some of their tricks though, but he only uses 'em to create an impression when necessary. Of course his athletic stuff is O. K. and that is how he hooks the rich women who are his real game.

"Dhal has sense enough to keep out of the way during the preliminary stages. Everything is antiseptic and hygienic and all to the good and they all go crazy over it. His employees keep up an air of mystery about the 'Omnipotent,' and drop hints of his wonderful occult powers, and by the time an old girl has finished the course and can touch her toes with her finger tips without squatting she's generally feeling so full of beans that she wants to go on and become a regular member.

"You see how it works? They'd forgotten all about how it felt to take a good chestful of ozone, or have a beefsteak appetite, or want to do any of the things they used to—and suddenly the mysterious Doctor Dhal makes them young again, with all of youth's desires and impulses. That's at the bottom of it."

Morgan pressed a button and an officer entered.

"Tell Grady to give you those old indictments we found against Dhal."

He turned to Maitland again.

"And there's where the harm begins. They're told that no matter how fine they feel they will go on feeling better and better if they can only persuade Doctor Dhal to receive them as his 'chelas.' Accordingly they make application, he looks them over carefully, selects the likeliest to play into his hands, and makes them go through what he calls a 'period of purification.' They are then permitted to join his club and after they have been thoroughly tested out by Dhal himself, the ones he wants are gradually initiated into the esoteric rites and mysteries of what he says is a recognized religion.

"Once they reach that stage it's generally all over. They regard Dhal as a perfect being who can do no wrong. He teaches them that there is no such thing as morals or law. That the highest religion is the religion of 'self-expression.' The secret of it is, of course, that he gives them an excuse for doing what they want to do. Clever, rather! When you come right down to brass tacks his religion, as he calls it, is simply any sort of license, camouflaged under a mass of undigested references to supposed doctrines of Hindoo philosophy which I'm told are absolutely meaningless. It's the greatest con game ever pulled off. The man really is an artist. If I should tell you the women that he's had down there, and who still swear by him and put up for him when he gets into trouble—for he occasionally does get into trouble—you'd think I was stringing you!

"Look here," he ejaculated as the officer returned with a bundle of papers. "This is the kind of stuff he gives them to read and study!" and he handed Maitland a paper bound book ostensibly containing the "theory and practice" of Doctor Dhal's religion, but which on its face was nothing more than a hodge-podge of pornographic matter, with illustrations so crude as to be ridiculous. "And yet they fall for it!

"I'd like to send the bird up! But it's practically no use trying. He's so foul that nobody can get near him without being so contaminated, or at least open to the suspicion of being so contaminated, that his victims are afraid to appear against him.

There is no doubt but that one way or another he has wrecked the lives of a large number of women. At the present moment there are no less than five complaints in this office and that of the district attorney of Suffolk County against him—but nobody is willing to testify. Now that you've heard the story, what can I do for you?"

Maitland rubbed his chin meditatively.

"Suppose a girl of nineteen goes down to his place, is there any way of forcing him to surrender her?"

"You're a lawyer, Colonel Maitland," returned the other. "You know as well as I do that in default of showing duress there is practically nothing that a parent can do to control a child of that age. He or she is a free agent. If, however, there is any evidence of crime, wrongdoing, or a conspiracy to impair morals or, as I said, duress—that's a different matter. I could issue my search warrant here and Jones could give you one in Long Island City. But what would happen? You'd not find a particle of evidence of any sort and not a single one of Dhal's patients would open their mouths."

"Well, what is a father to do?" asked Maitland.

"I don't know," answered Morgan. "But I'll tell you what is likely to happen any fine day. Some father or brother or sweetheart is going to put a bullet through Doctor Dhal's satin waistcoat, and then we'll have another Thaw trial!"

CHAPTER XXVIII

ON THE elaborate dais of an ornate court room, five middle-aged gentlemen in black bombazine gowns sprawled in postures indicating respectively indifference, irritation, resentment, scorn and coma. The one who would later write their joint opinion was listening; one—the last—was sleeping; one was wondering where he could find an apartment for his mother who insisted on moving to New York; and two were dreaming of the Garden City golf course.

Maitland had been sitting in that luxurious legal conservatory since one o'clock waiting for his case to be reached, for it had been too late to secure an adjournment from the opposing counsel when Diana had telephoned. Through the drone of the arguments he had heard only her voice as it had come over the wire. "I need you! I need you!" She was waiting for him now in one of the rear rows of spectators, her car outside. There had been only a moment's opportunity to shake hands and assure her that at the earliest possible instant he would be with her.

"Crutchfield and Pepperill?—Mr. Maitland?"

He heard the name and mechanically arose and made his way forward. As if his astral body were concealed somewhere behind a cornice he could see himself bowing and hear his voice in the monotonous, slightly bored tone that it was the fashion to affect.

At the end of his declamation five swivel chairs squeaked in a common relief, a distinguished looking man, much more like a judge than any of the others, but who was only a clerk, arose and murmured: "Hear ye! Hear ye! This court stands adjourned until tomorrow at one o'clock!" The assembled lawyers got up with an assumption of leisure and drifted slowly out conversing in low tones.

Another moment and Diana and Lloyd were in the car, entangled in the traffic of Fourth Avenue. The face of the girl beside him was set, her eyes tortured; but she nevertheless drove with control.

The great arms of the Queensboro Bridge spanned the twisting, uncoiling river with festoons of palely glowing lights. Ahead over the smoke of Long Island a snow-capped Oberland reared itself rose-pink in the afterglow. It faded to mauve, to gray, then disappeared. An interminable procession of red lights fled before them.

Neither spoke. She was longing to pour out her heart to him, to abase herself to him, to paint her dread of the invisible menace that threatened her sister.

He was suspicious, antagonistic, resentful. He would serve her—yes. That was his job. But let there be no more acting. Let them look into each other's eyes and acknowledge the truth.

Once over the bridge she began to talk in detached jerky sentences. Crouched at the wheel, her eyes fixed on the road, she recounted her experiences of the morning, sparing herself with regard to neither her neglect of Sheila in the past nor the stupidity of her last approach. Her unrestrained self-recrimination had almost the savor of a confession. All her confidence had fallen from her. He had never seen her like that. It was clear that she wanted him to know her exactly as she was. She had turned instinctively to him, her attitude saying unmistakably, "I don't know what I should do without you!"

Her helplessness, her dependence upon himself and the fact that she had appealed so confidently to him could not but touch Lloyd. That she had called upon him in this way instead of upon Devereaux puzzled yet gratified him. He ceased to resent being made use of. Instead, he found himself oblivious of the purpose of their errand or the danger hanging over Sheila, of everything save that he was by her side. He exulted in the consciousness of her reliance upon him. Up to this time she had always seemed to him to be stronger than himself. It was an exquisite delight to feel that she needed him—no one else, only him!

Holding his hat rim with one hand, his upturned collar clutched in the other, he watched her driving into the night—a Walküre, a witch on her broomstick. Now and again his arm would touch hers and once he was thrown sharply against her and felt the warmth of her body. A strange, wild irresponsibility—utterly foreign to the calm, cool Maitland—took possession of him. She was his! What did it matter what she was or had been or had done if he loved her? What did anything matter if she could be made to love him?

They swung off the main road and shortly came upon the brick wall.

"Here we are," she said abruptly. "It's up to you from now on!"

"Then let's turn the motor," he answered, coming back to earth again. "We may want to leave in a hurry."

She ran the car a few yards beyond the end of the wall, backed it and left it headed in the direction whence they had come.

"What are you going to do?" she asked as if, whatever his reply might be, she would be entirely satisfied.

"I don't know," he confessed. "But I'm going to do something!"

The negro eyed them suspiciously through the wicket before opening the door but admitted them and left them in the reception room, explaining that everybody was at dinner.

They were kept waiting what seemed an interminable time. Maitland became first impatient, then irritated. He looked for a bell, but there was none. At length from a distance came the sound of chairs being moved; then of many footsteps. Dinner evidently was over. At the end of the corridor an irregular procession of figures began to pass. Maitland, who had no plan of campaign, found himself at a loss. Suppose they were simply left kicking their heels just where they were all the evening?

He walked part way down the corridor to see what was going on. A large hall hung with brilliantly colored stuffs opened to the right. At one end was a platform faced by rows of chairs. Twenty or thirty people were already occupying them. Clearly some sort of evening entertainment was towards. The incongruity of his presence—like that of a gentleman burglar—slightly amused him. Florian, in a scarlet dinner jacket—obviously an effort at self-expression—passed along talking to a young girl. It was Sheila! Then Maitland became conscious of reality. The sight of the pursy artist with his chubby chin and little pointed beard infuriated him. He saw Florian lay his hand upon Sheila's shoulder and could see her as if by instinct draw away from him.

Maitland stepped boldly into the room.

"Miss Kayne!" he called.

Engrossed in what Florian was saying, she did not at first hear him. But he was conscious that others in the room were gazing at him with surprise.

"Miss Kayne!" he repeated, approaching her.

Sheila turned, and every vestige of color left her face.

"I have come to take you home," he said simply, without noticing Florian.

Sheila put her hand to her breast.

"Who—sent—you?" she asked.

"Nobody—I came," he replied. "I want you to come with me."

Florian had not moved from where he had been standing. Sheila looked first at him, then at Maitland.

"I can't, Mr. Maitland!" she said. "Really, I can't!"

"Why of course you can!" he insisted. "Do you mean you are afraid to leave?"

A troubled look crossed her face, into which the color was now slowly returning.

"Perhaps Miss Kayne means that it would not be courteous to Doctor Dhal to go away as you suggest," said Florian, looking at her fixedly.

"Miss Kayne will speak for herself!" retorted Maitland. He appealed to her once more. "May I have a few words with you alone—Sheila?"

A Love Story as Tonic as a Sea Breeze

Beach Roses

Illustrations by Grant T. Reynard

NOW according to the proverb, everything has an end, and a cake has two—and so has the beach at Seaward, where the difference of a mile is the difference between the Seaward Inn at twenty-four dollars a day, and one of several boarding houses at seventeen dollars a week. The sea and the sky, however, haven't yet become exclusive, so that at both extremities of the beach romance comes in each June as naturally as driftwood—and much of it floats lightly out again each following September. But this was June, and the young man who was sitting in front of Herzfeld's Chowder Pavilion, at the seventeen dollar end, wasn't thinking of the calendar.

He was tall and spare and loose muscled; black-haired, black-eyed and sunburned; but for all the depth of his eyes and the squareness of his chin, there was something essentially boyish about him, some hint that his imagination still had plenty of elbow room. At a glance it was evident to many women that he was of the stuff of cavaliers; and in the past half-hour many women had glanced at him admiringly; but he had saved his attention for those few who paused at the little flower stand directly opposite and presently moved on again, without purchasing.

And now at length he got to his feet and walked over to the stand and gravely surveyed the proprietor, who was an old woman with ocean-blue eyes and a thousand wrinkles in every smile.

"I want to play a sort of a joke," said the young man, in a voice which was unexpectedly soft and caressing. "I want to play a sort of a joke, and you're going to be in on it. If it's like I size it up, a lot of these girls that go by here want some of your flowers and can't afford to pay for 'em. Am I right?"

She inspected him with a lessening smile and growing suspicion. "Well, what of it?"

The young man had produced a bill book. "What are your roses?"

"Two-fifty a dozen."

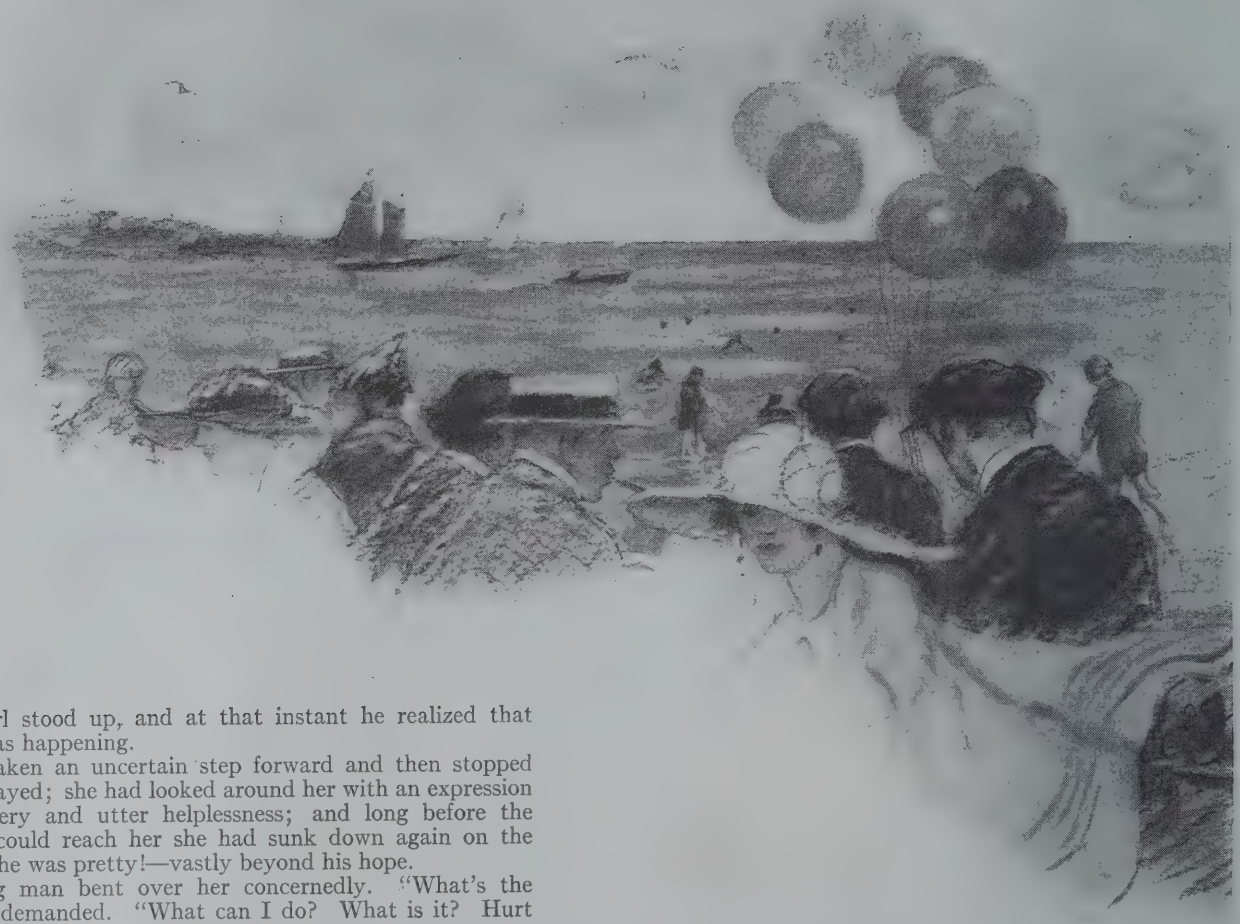
"You take two dozen of 'em," he ordered, "and wrap some of that red ribbon around the stems, and the next time a girl—only, mind you, she's got to look mighty poor and she's got to look mighty nice; you know what I mean—asks you what roses cost and then starts to walk off, you call her back and say a man you never saw before paid for 'em and left 'em here for whoever wanted 'em and went away. They're hers. Don't even tell her what I look like. Understand the idea?"

The old woman bobbed her head, and as she reached for the ribbon her eyes began to twinkle. "Sure," she said. "Leave it to me. It's a grand joke. One of them girls that's saved up all winter to come down here two weeks. It'll make her believe in fairies all over again. I thought first you was a masher."

The young man laughed. "How do you know I'm not?"

"Because if you was," she said cannily, "you'd have stuck around till after."

He laughed again; watched her set aside the fragrant armful, with its broad sash of red; nodded, and sauntered north. Two minutes later he had forgotten all about it.



It was still mid-morning and the tide was out; consequently Seaward was promenading. In another ten minutes he had met the head of the slow moving stream which had its source at the Inn—men who apparently had just stepped, spotless, from the tailor's; women with exquisite summer frocks and dainty parasols; women so perfect and so poised that he could hardly fancy them to be real; girls who were bewilderingly sweet in delicate colors, and yet, to this young man's notion, equally unreal and unsubstantial. His eyes, as he beheld them, were as wide as a child's; and yet his heart gave no responsive flutter.

"It sure is an entertainin' parade," he said to himself, half grudgingly, "but it's sort of more human down at the other end." And presently, with no definite purpose, he turned back and sauntered south towards the boarding houses.

When he had gone perhaps a quarter of a mile he suddenly perceived, below him on the beach, a girl who was sitting quite alone looking out to the sea; and in her lap there was a sheaf of gorgeous red roses tied with a broad red ribbon.

His little whimsical act had gone out of his mind almost as soon as he had made the bargain; but now he halted and smiled reminiscently. The whole point had been to give a thrill of pleasure to someone he would never meet, and for himself to remain in the background, unknown; but now that he actually saw the beneficiary, he was normally curious to know what manner of girl this was who had received his flowers—and what she had thought. She was to have been poor, but he wondered if she were also pretty—not that it mattered, but still, he couldn't help wondering. And had she been overwhelmed or dubious or disturbed—or only amused—and grateful?

His curiosity pushed him towards her simply for the satisfaction of a closer view, but he had hardly left the boardwalk when the girl stood up, and at that instant he realized that something was happening.

She had taken an uncertain step forward and then stopped short and swayed; she had looked around her with an expression of utter misery and utter helplessness; and long before the young man could reach her she had sunk down again on the sand. And she was pretty!—vastly beyond his hope.

The young man bent over her concernedly. "What's the matter?" he demanded. "What can I do? What is it? Hurt your foot?"

She shook her head, and he thought that she was crying; but a moment later she lifted her eyes and he saw that she was convulsed. "No!" she gasped. "Asleep! Only I didn't know it—and I—just couldn't stand up!"

The young man straightened in relief and began to grin. "That's different. I reckon we won't send for the ambulance, then. Can I help you up?"

She was slightly flushed but he liked her better because she wasn't too self-conscious. "Would you mind?"

"Oh, I guess I can live through it!" he said cheerfully, and gave her his hand; and when she was beside him he added, with tact which wasn't wholly lost on her: "Curious how that thing can put you right out of business, though. Sometimes it's funny and other times it isn't. I remember once in Mexico a flock of greasers jumped us one night and I grabbed my gun and started to get up—and my foot was asleep . . . Hold on while I pick up your flowers."

"Thank you ever so much . . . And then?"

"Oh, well!" he said. "There weren't only five of the greasers, and I had two boys from West Texas with me, so it worked out all right. But I might just as well have had a broken leg . . . Feel like tryin' to walk? That'll fix you up."

For a few slow paces she held gingerly to his arm. He was appraising her minutely, and approving of her; the old woman with the wrinkled smile had used most excellent judgment.

"Mighty nice roses you've got there," he said casually.

Her reply was slightly delayed. "Aren't they wonderful? I love them more than any I ever had."

"So? How's that?"

She hesitated and finally said: "Perhaps because they came as such a surprise . . . But you said something about Mexico. Have you been there much?"

"Off and on—yes. Why?"

"I was just wondering if you'd ever met Dan Carroll down there."

The young man laughed. "Lucky Dan? Why—I reckon I know him about as well as most anybody does. You must have been readin' a newspaper."

"Well, how much of it is really true?"

The young man was quizzical. "Why, that kind of depends on how much you've read—don't it?"

Here she released him and stood by herself. "But there's been so much in the papers—pages and pages and pages—about what a picturesque man he was, and how he trailed Villa into the hills and led oil rushes and had knife fights and all that, and then made millions and millions of dollars overnight in Oklahoma, and turned into a philanthropist and adopted orphans and did all sorts of lovely quixotic things—and it just doesn't seem to hang together, somehow. I mean, if it's true he'd be the most wonderful man I ever heard of. The kind of man—well, like the Prince of Wales—the kind of man *every*body could love without ever having seen him. Is he like that?"

"I am afraid," said the young man, "you flatter him. And I ought to know because, you see—my name's Carroll."

There was a brief silence, during which she gazed at him steadily. Then her lips parted. "You shouldn't startle me like that. And I happen to know that Dan Carroll is in Chicago. The papers said so. And besides——"

The young man chuckled. "And besides, I don't look picturesque enough? I'm sorry, but I left my gun home and I don't ever wear spurs with a straw hat. No, my name's Carroll, all right, but it's Percy D . . . I don't look it, do I? . . . Thanks . . . And yours?"

She regarded him keenly. "Did you ever hear of the Hudsons, in New York?"

"Who hasn't? I guess they own everything but the river, don't they?"

"Well, my name's—Hudson."

It was the young man's turn to regard her closely, and he did it. "You win, sister. You got me roped and tied . . . But about Dan, he's just human. That's all; he's just human. Just as human as me and you. That junk in the papers—oh, he did it all right, but it wasn't for anything but to please himself! I know because I know Dan."

"But it's true, then, is it?"

"Why—sure. Everything you said, anyway. It's sure as shootin'."

She drew a long breath. "Then I'd give everything in the world to meet him," she said. "Because he's the last romantic figure since Buffalo Bill. And—I'm glad to have met you—and thank you."

"Wait a second. What is that—my cue to go somewhere else? Or are you goin' to be nice and let me talk to you?"

"Let you talk to me!"

"Talk and listen," said the young man. "You see, I got a tongue and an ear that's a good deal like a saddle pony. They got to have exercise."

She had known long since that he was ingenuous, but it was all she could do to control her voice. "Th-thank you for the compliment!"

The young man put his hand on her arm. "Hold on, there! Don't get so excited! I picked you out on purpose."

"It's a grand joke," said the old woman. "It'll make some girl believe in fairies all over again."

"Oh—you did!" Her tone was elusive. "That's something new."

"Well, sir," said the young man, "I'll tell you a fact. I been here two days now, and I listened in to quite a few conversations up there by the Seaward Inn, and I got some queer ideas. Nobody ever said a man was a man—they said he belonged to some particular club or other, or else he was the son of this or that fellow or was a relative of somebody else—and that was his brand. Nobody ever said a woman was a nice woman—they said she lived on such and such a street, or her dad was in a certain firm, and that was her brand. Well, sir, I'm fed up on it, so when I saw you sittin' down here it struck me that a girl that would go off by herself to look at the scenery and smell roses instead of wearin' a rut in the boardwalk and talkin' about the old man's money, was worth investigation . . . so I did. It's your deal."

She had taken the roses from him and now she buried her face in them. "What would you expect me to talk about?"

"Well," said the young man meditatively, "we got three subjects already. Flowers and Dan Carroll and you." He squinted up at the sun. "Gettin' along towards noon, too. Want to do me a favor? Save my life. The last time I was so lonesome was when my horse went lame in the Bad Lands. Come have a snack with me—the Inn, or anywheres else you like. Will you? I mean it."

He was a man, but he was also a boy and very much on the surface, so that she deliberated. "I don't know why I should——"

"You got to go further. Do you know why you shouldn't?"

Eventually, because she too was young and imaginative, and because he was himself and it was June, she shook her head. "No, I don't. Only—anywhere but the Inn."

His face fell. "But I thought you'd like that best! Have you ever been there?"

"Yes, a long time ago. But—they're not my kind. And it isn't any fun unless you really—belong."

"Well, there's something in that, too. All right. We'll go over to the Strand . . . Can I carry your flowers?"

A moment later, when she spoke to him, he didn't answer; and when she looked to find the reason his face was granite. Mechanically, almost involuntarily, he had counted the roses. There were only twenty, and he had paid for twenty-four. And he wasn't a man who, even while he was playing Santa Claus, could be defrauded of eighty cents without an explanation.

As she sat across from him at table, his admiration was so frank and so ingenuous that she couldn't even be embarrassed. She was dressed with extreme simplicity and without so much as a necklace of imitation pearls for ornament; but he liked her far better than if she had worn an imported frock and genuine orientals. He liked her high white forehead, on which a loop of brown hair was forever trespassing; he liked her eyes, which were clear and direct; he liked her strong, sensitive mouth and her chin, which told of native character and determination. And because he liked her so much he was proportionately sorry for her; and proportionately resolved to see that this day would last in her memory.

"What do you do?" he asked abruptly.

She started. "Why—I'm assistant secretary of a girls' club in New York—working girls, you know."

"Oh. Stenographer?"

"No—records and files."

"You ought to be doin' something better than that," he said reproachfully. "You've got more intelligence than that."

Her lips curved. "What would you suggest, for example?"

"Well, suppose you begin by tellin' me all about this club."

"Why, it's for working girls, just as I said—and we've got a branch at Seaward. We've got a big house in the south end, and the girls can come down for Sundays and their vacations. That's why I'm here now."

"For the whole summer?"

"Why, probably . . . But I won't lunch at the Strand very often—nor buy roses for myself." She reached out to touch one of them; they were now in an ornate cut glass vase on the table. It pained him to think that his careless charity could have meant so much to her.

"How do you stand the city, though? How does anybody stand it?"

"Why, I don't know what other people do, but I stand it because of Seaward."

"Seaward!"

"Don't you think it's beautiful here?"

His smile was pitying. "Beautiful? Sister, did you ever see an Arizona sunset over the Buttes? Did you ever see a sunrise in the Black Hills? Did you ever ride the Texas ranges? Why, you don't know what that word means!"

"After luncheon," she said, nettled, "I'll show you the most heavenly spot you ever saw—and it isn't a mile from here."

"I'll take a don't," said the young man warmly. "Places like that don't grow within two thousand miles of here—you poor kid."

She gave him a quick glance from under her lashes. "Why should you say that?"

His voice dropped to an undertone. "Because I mean it. Lord! All you people livin' like flies in big cities—workin' in a boiler factory like New York—when there's places like I know—and callin' Seaward beautiful!"

She looked up at him but her eyes were veiled. "If I told you how I loathe New York you wouldn't believe me. But I still think Seaward is beautiful."

He sat so long peering at vacancy that she had to laugh at him to bring him back. "Not so very polite, was it?" he said. "But I was thinkin'."

"What were you thinking about?"

"Why—you had used another word—'romantic'—about Dan Carroll. I was wonderin' if the same man would have seemed so romantic to you in these ice cream pants and a blue coat on the boardwalk."

"But a man like that would be the same anywhere! Just as you would be the same anywhere!"

"If you hate New York so much, why don't you get out of it?"

"What would I do?"

And they fell to arguing; and by argument they became so much at ease with each other that in an hour or two the young man had forgotten to be sorry and the girl had forgotten to be recessive. More than that, they had stopped looking at each other directly; for each of them was aware that danger lurked in the other's eyes. For she was pretty and he was fascinating, and their thoughts were striking sparks together—and it was June.

It was half-past three when the young man broke off in the middle of a sentence and altered his tone.

"You mustn't mind me, sister," he said apologetically. "I'm a kind of a crank anyhow, I reckon. I want everybody else to have the same run of luck I do . . . Show me this place you like so much."

It was a cliff which overhung the bathing beach; a cliff with myriads of pine and fir trees, through which the sunshine came sifting in golden flecks down to the deep green moss; and out beyond was the sea, blue as a bluebird's wing, stretching into infinity. The tide was in, and fashionable Seaward was bathing; the two had the cliff entirely to themselves; and for a minute they stood together and watched the horizon.

"It is what I would call—pretty," said the young man at length. "As pretty as the girls I saw this morning. Pretty, but —not much else. I think I would find it more attractive in a storm."

She turned on him. "There's always one thing you can do about it, you know!"

"I intend to. I intend to go back West. Very soon. And I'm sorry I am no good at bluffin'. Maybe you would have liked it better if I had thrown a fit about it. But I can say one thing, anyhow—to a New Yorker it would be beautiful."

She sat down on a convenient log and smiled vaguely. "You're frightfully hard to please. Some of the greatest artists in America come here every summer."

"But don't forget," he said, "the reason they don't come out to the Grand Canyon is, they would waste their time—because no man yet has been able to put it on canvas. What I could show you—if you came out to my country!"

"Well, what could you show me?"

He didn't reply at once. "A New Yorker might not like it," he said, "but I could show you peace. I could show you color that would make you wonder if you were dreaming. I could show you the raw material that dreams are made out of—out of solitude and space and sunsets. It would do you good to come out and see what we are like . . . Is there any chance of it?"

"There's nothing I'd like better."

"Well—why not?"

When she looked up he was standing before her with a white smile on his lips and illimitable depths in his eyes. At the moment he might have been eighteen, and incredibly mature; or forty-five, and incredibly young.

"Exactly—what do you mean—by that?"

"The devil of it is," he said tardily, "that the English language is so poor . . . I know as well as you do that all men say the same thing, whether they only talk with their mouths or not. And I know that to most people the idea of fallin' in love in a hurry is a big joke. It's funny. But if you would care to see my country, I would be glad to take you there."

"You honestly think that——"

He raised his hand. "My dear, I would not fool you, now, for anything in this world. I learned the value of laws by livin' in Mexico—where there aren't any. I learned the value of money by bein' broke for most of my life. I learned about women by never meetin' any like you. And I can size up a horse or a woman in two minutes. You got to, out where I live—and you can't afford to make any mistakes, so you just naturally don't . . . The work I'm doing out there is a kind that would please you, and you could do it with me and help me and be happy. I know that because—even if you have not said so—I know you hate big cities, like I do . . . Will you come back with me?"

Her eyes were on the moss at her feet. "How can you ask a thing like that? What do you know about me?"

"Only what you have told me—and what you have shown me. But that's plenty enough."

"In—a few hours?"

"I am always ready to gamble on my judgment."

"Oh—you admit it's a gamble, then?"

"Like everything else. Like life. A man who won't admit it is a fool. Only this is everything—to—me."

"What makes you think so?"

"Your face."

She put both hands over her burning cheeks. "And until four hours ago—you never saw me!"

"That isn't the point. It's twenty-nine years I didn't see you—and I've been waitin'."

"And you expect me—to answer you—the way you want me to?"

"I never expect anythin' but the worst. That's why I'm never disappointed. I always get more than I expect—or deserve. When those greasers jumped us, like I told you, I expected to get shot—but I didn't get in front of the fire just the same, did I?"

"You're the only man I ever knew who——"

"Don't say that! All men have the same line of talk. It's all there is to say. You've got to tell the difference between gold and iron pyrites yourself. You're the assayer. I'm only the specimen."

"But why do you think you—want me?"

"If any man could answer that question to any woman—he ought to be elected President. How can I tell you? Tell me why a magnet is a magnet—and then I'll answer you." He came a step nearer. "Have I gone too far? Are you too Eastern to stand for my talk?"

She shook her head. "I respect any emotion—if it's sincere."

"Have I made any headway? Have I made it clear to you

"I learned about women," the man told the girl with the roses, "by never meetin' any like you."

that I want not only your companionship but also your help?"

She said nothing.

After a moment the young man dropped down beside her.

"It is a funny condition to be in, this life," he said thickly. "Mighty few people look it in the face. They laugh when somebody falls in love at first sight. Hell! Everybody falls in love at first sight—only most people are so scared or so cagey or so one thing or another they don't wake up to it right away like I did. I don't give a hang whether it's five hours or five minutes—I know I love you. Could I say any more than that if it was five years?"

Her hand moved towards him. "You've—you don't even know—what my ideals are—what my ambitions are——"

"They're the same as mine," he said. "Because I'd make 'em so—if they aren't already. And I can give you everything you've never had and always wanted." (Continued on page 140)

A Romance of the African Veldt

"You made a broken down, hopeless wreck of Lundi Druro." Desmond had not meant to say it, but the truth had come flaring out.

A Résumé of Parts One to Five:

LADY FLAVIA DESMOND had been adored by society for her youth, beauty and fascination. On the morning she married, her husband was shot dead in her presence by a friend, who forthwith killed himself. Refusing to disclose the reason for the double tragedy, she stubbornly fought for and obtained the right to her husband's fortune—and was straightway cut dead by her former friends.

She was about to commit suicide in Paris when a chance meeting with a stranger, Lundi Druro, South African miner, gave her a new grip on life.

Thereafter Flavia Desmond disguised herself as a man—young Desmond, artist and writer—and sought to lose her sorrow in wandering. Her objective was South Africa, to witness the happiness of Druro even though she could not share it.

She came to Wankelo, Rhodesia. But she was shocked at what she discovered. Druro, the buoyant, the debonair, had returned home to find the girl he loved married offhand to another man, and his gold mine worthless. The blow made him a self-contemptuous drunkard with misery lurking in his eyes.

To be near him, Desmond, secure in her cunning disguise, which not even Druro suspected, took work in a mine owned by Constant Lypiatt, the man Druro's fiancée, Gaynor, had married; and she lived the rough veldt life in all ways as a man. The fineness hid by Druro's drunken exterior she came to know well; also the treachery and craftiness beneath Lypiatt's suave manners. One plot of Lypiatt's to complete the ruin of Druro by compromising him with the rather "vampish" Loochia Luff, she neatly foiled. Meanwhile her own love for Druro deepened.

Arrived a day when Desmond came down with fever. Unconscious, she was carried to Mrs. Hope's hospital by Lypiatt; and of course Mrs. Hope at once discovered her secret. But when she recovered, despite the nurse's pleading, Desmond again donned a man's clothes.

She found now that Druro, in utter despair over the apparent complete failure of his own life, was about to end it all. To save him, Desmond as a last resort induced his old love, Gaynor Lypiatt, to come to his hut at night and plead with him. But Gaynor's courage failed on hearing Druro's drunken ravings, and Desmond herself entered the hut.

There, in the darkness, pretending to be Gaynor, she took Druro in her arms, comforted him, vowed eternal love and secured his promise to lead a new life. And Druro, thinking his old sweetheart had come back, was lifted to heaven.

Followed a long fight against the devils of drink, or ponjola, with Desmond always at his elbow to aid. At last, recovered, his ruined farm once more on its feet, Druro set out to find gold again so that he could claim Gaynor and take her away.

He found gold and sent by messenger for Desmond. The latter stayed at the mine while Druro, himself now ill with fever, went to town for supplies. But Druro's letter had been intercepted and read first by Lypiatt; and in the former's absence Lypiatt showed up, evidently to stake a claim on Druro's property. Desmond laughed at him because she had just staked the plot.

When she entered her hut after dark, Lypiatt awaited her. At once he made her aware that he knew both her sex and her name; and he threatened exposure unless she would destroy Druro's discovery notices, giving him the right to the mine. Goaded to the breaking point, Desmond taunted him with the fact that his wife loved Druro; whereupon Lypiatt sprang at her throat.

Desmond thought her last moment had come, when Druro suddenly entered. The two men grappled. The candle went over. In the darkness there was a terrific struggle ended by a heavy fall, and silence. When Desmond could make a light again, Lypiatt lay dead, Druro unconscious.

Eventually she got Druro to his hut, delirious, and in panic concealed Lypiatt's body in her own hut. But next day she was arrested for murder. She told the magistrate she was a woman.

"But who are you?" he asked, astonished. "I don't think that matters," she said bitterly.

Part Six: CHAPTER XVI

IN THAT, however, she was mistaken. The one question that rang up and down Rhodesia for the next few weeks was: Who is Desmond? Who was the woman who had gulled them all so cleverly into accepting without question that she was a man amongst men?—and a bright and hardy specimen at that! Rather too good looking, perhaps, some of them had thought at first, but had forgiven it when they found he didn't exploit the advantage by running after women and tangling up other men's love affairs. Men remembered that now. Other things men remembered too, and spoke of, were his pluck, his skill at riding, shooting and fishing—anything that was doing in the sports line. He had not shirked his share of hard knocks in work or play.

These were good memories. Men felt that at least this mysterious woman had not made fools of them—pulled their legs, as the saying is, for the sake of laughing up her sleeve. There were other favorable things too. She never joined in drunken revels, but it was on record that she had more than once picked up a drunken reveler in the street and got him home. When they remembered how strong and active she was in this way it was impossible for them to say they didn't think she could have polished off Lypiatt; but they were prepared to swear that whatever had happened, it was a square deal and no foul play on her side at least. That was something in the way of a testimonial that not every man in the country could have called forth! And with it came offers of help and bail, not only from friends but from rough men of all classes.

But though deeply touched, Desmond continued to cling to the privacy of the jailer's house while waiting for trial. No one had insisted upon her dropping her male garments, for she had no others and was too big and tall for borrowed ones. She was thankful for that, fearing that once she returned to women's clothes the hardihood she had assumed so successfully would desert her. Now that her secret was known she thought with horror of the day when she must face the world.

It had been bad enough at the inquest. Everyone who could had crowded into the little Selukine police court full of amazement and curiosity. The proceedings had been very brief, but they gave her plenty of food for meditation now when she sat in her narrow whitewashed room remembering all that had passed. First Doctor Ryan described the fracture of Lypiatt's skull and gave his opinion that it was caused by a blow or a heavy fall on a hard substance such as the granolithic floor of the hut. Incidentally he remarked that Lypiatt had one of the thinnest skulls he had ever seen in the course of his experience. He also described marks on the dead man's face—a long scratch down the cheek that might have been inflicted in a struggle. A sensation arose when he added he had been obliged to treat the accused, who in his opinion had very narrowly escaped death herself, from injuries to her throat.

After the doctor, Lypiatt's manager officially identified the body—it was mentioned that the widow was too ill from shock to attend the proceedings.

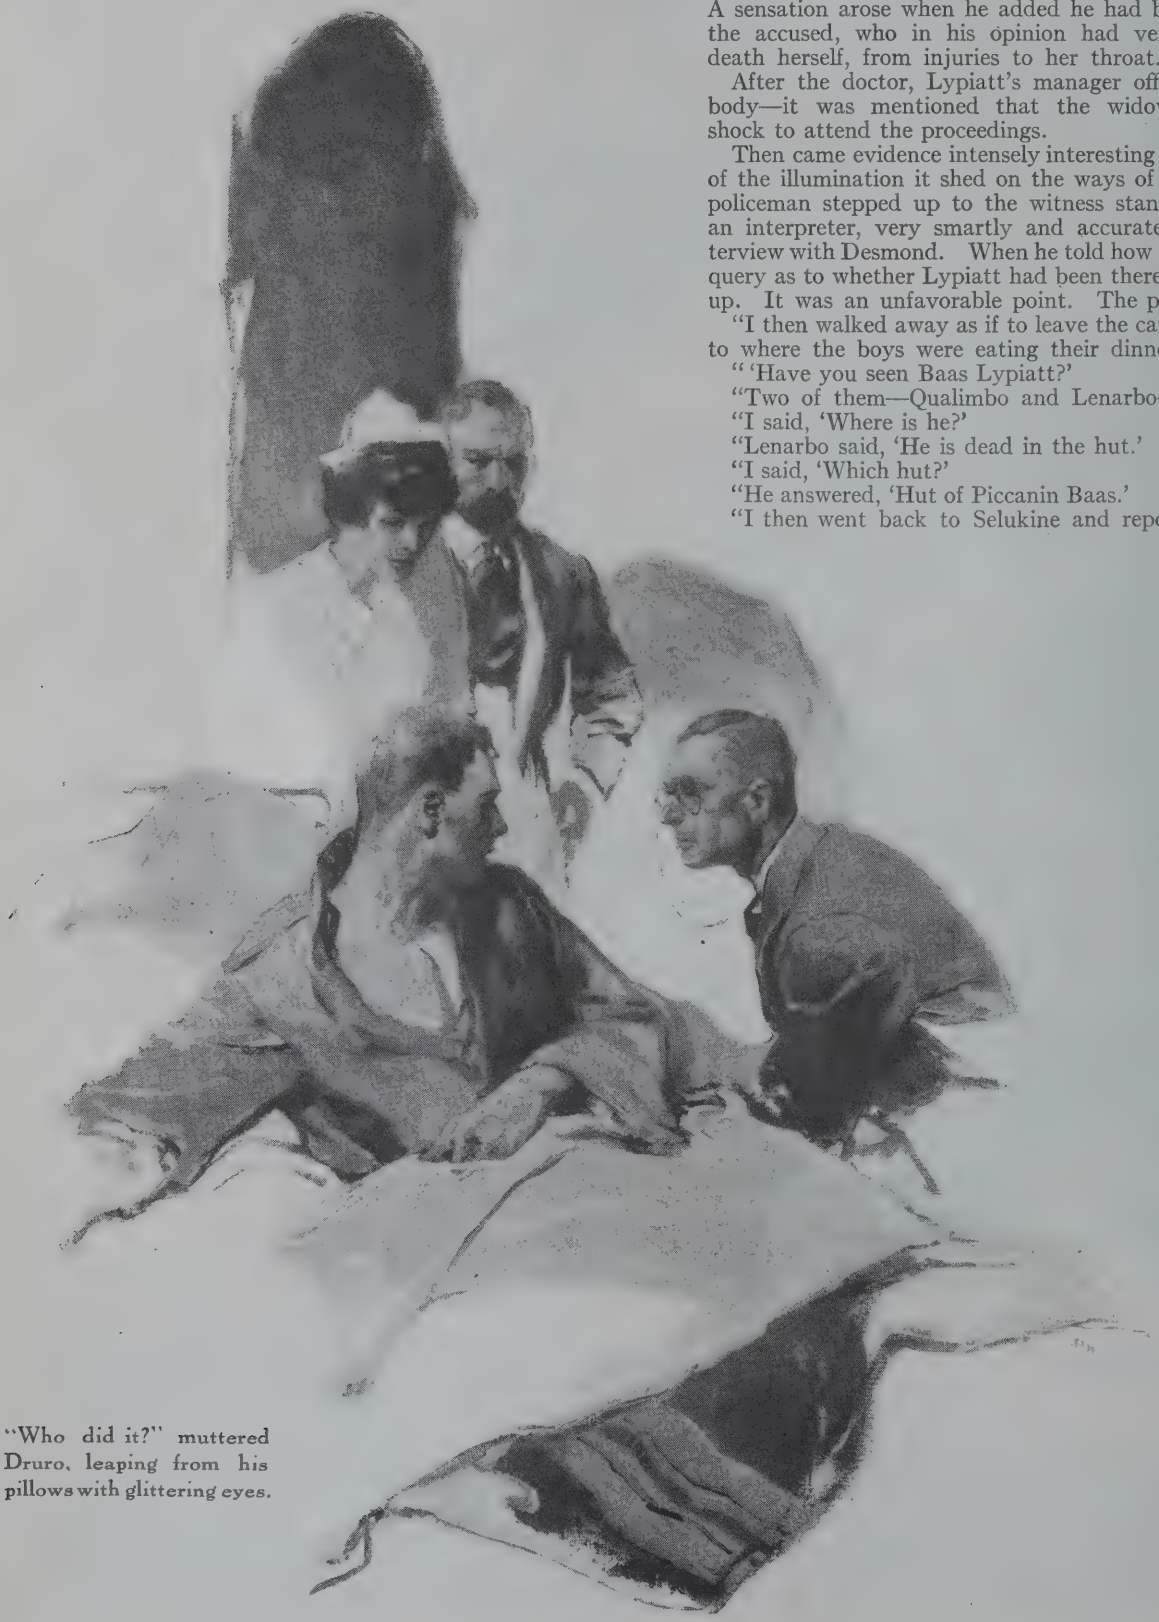
Then came evidence intensely interesting to Desmond because of the illumination it shed on the ways of natives. The black policeman stepped up to the witness stand and, by means of an interpreter, very smartly and accurately described his interview with Desmond. When he told how she had said no to his query as to whether Lypiatt had been there, a general sigh went up. It was an unfavorable point. The police boy continued:

"I then walked away as if to leave the camp, but turned aside to where the boys were eating their dinner. I said to them:

"'Have you seen Baas Lypiatt?'

"Two of them—Qualimbo and Lenarbo—answered yes.

"I said, 'Where is he?'



"Lenarbo said, 'He is dead in the hut.'

"I said, 'Which hut?'

"He answered, 'Hut of Piccanin Baas.'

"I then went back to Selukine and reported to my Inkos."

Desmond, listening, had marveled. The scene he described was indelibly engraved upon her memory—the group of natives squatting on their haunches, the big uniformed Matabele standing by carelessly twirling his kerries and apparently commenting on the weather, the indifferent answers she could neither hear nor understand. Not one of them had even given a glance in the direction of the mess, yet they must have guessed she was watching even as they had known all the time that Lypiatt lay dead! Sitting there flicking their wooden spoons back and forth into the pot and stuffing mealie-meal into their mouths they were supplying in two potent phrases all the information the policeman required! While she was sighing with relief they were giving her away! Impossible to probe their mysterious yet primitive minds to find out if this was sheer callousness, but one thing was clear—no sense of loyalty to her had troubled them. Probably Druro would not have been so lightly betrayed. But the Piccanin Baas was less than nothing to them.

When Qualimbo was examined another enlightening detail transpired. Since the fearsome Baas Lypiatt was dead and Baas Druro by all accounts likely to be in the same case shortly, he had no hesitation in recounting his visit to the Agate to see his Brudda and how Lypiatt had taken and read Druro's note.

(This meant little to the prosecution beyond a proof of Lypiatt's general unscrupulousness, but to Desmond it explained much.)

He further described what had taken place on the morning of the fifteenth while Druro was away fetching Desmond. The boys, taking advantage of their master's absence, were "sleeping" in the bush, but not so soundly as to miss the sight of Lypiatt walking over the camp and taking complete observations. Qualimbo, with a couple of gestures, inimitably conjured up a picture of the white man squinting along a level and measuring with his feet. No one had reported the incident to Druro, he said, because it was not safe to mix yourself up with the business of white men—especially Baas Lypiatt!

That represented the opinion of both Qualimbo and Pofaan on witnessing the further movements of Lypiatt on the afternoon of the same day. They had gone to bed, they stated, at the usual time, and had heard, they said, no sound of quarrel or fight. Even the return of Druro was unknown to them, they swore. It was a surprise to find him in his hut in the morning but not to see him raving out of his mind, for they had known for several days that he was sick.

Asked why they thought the body was in Desmond's hut, Pofaan replied simply:

"The Piccanin Baas's throat was very sore."

It might supposedly have been unnecessary for them to get actual sight of what lay in the hut but that would not have been the native way, and Lenarbo had accomplished this during Desmond's short sleep of exhaustion whilst watching Druro. Time enough for a subtle signal, a streak across camp from shaft to hut and the tipping up of a canvas window. One glance within sufficed. Lenarbo had been a warrior and knew how dead men lay.

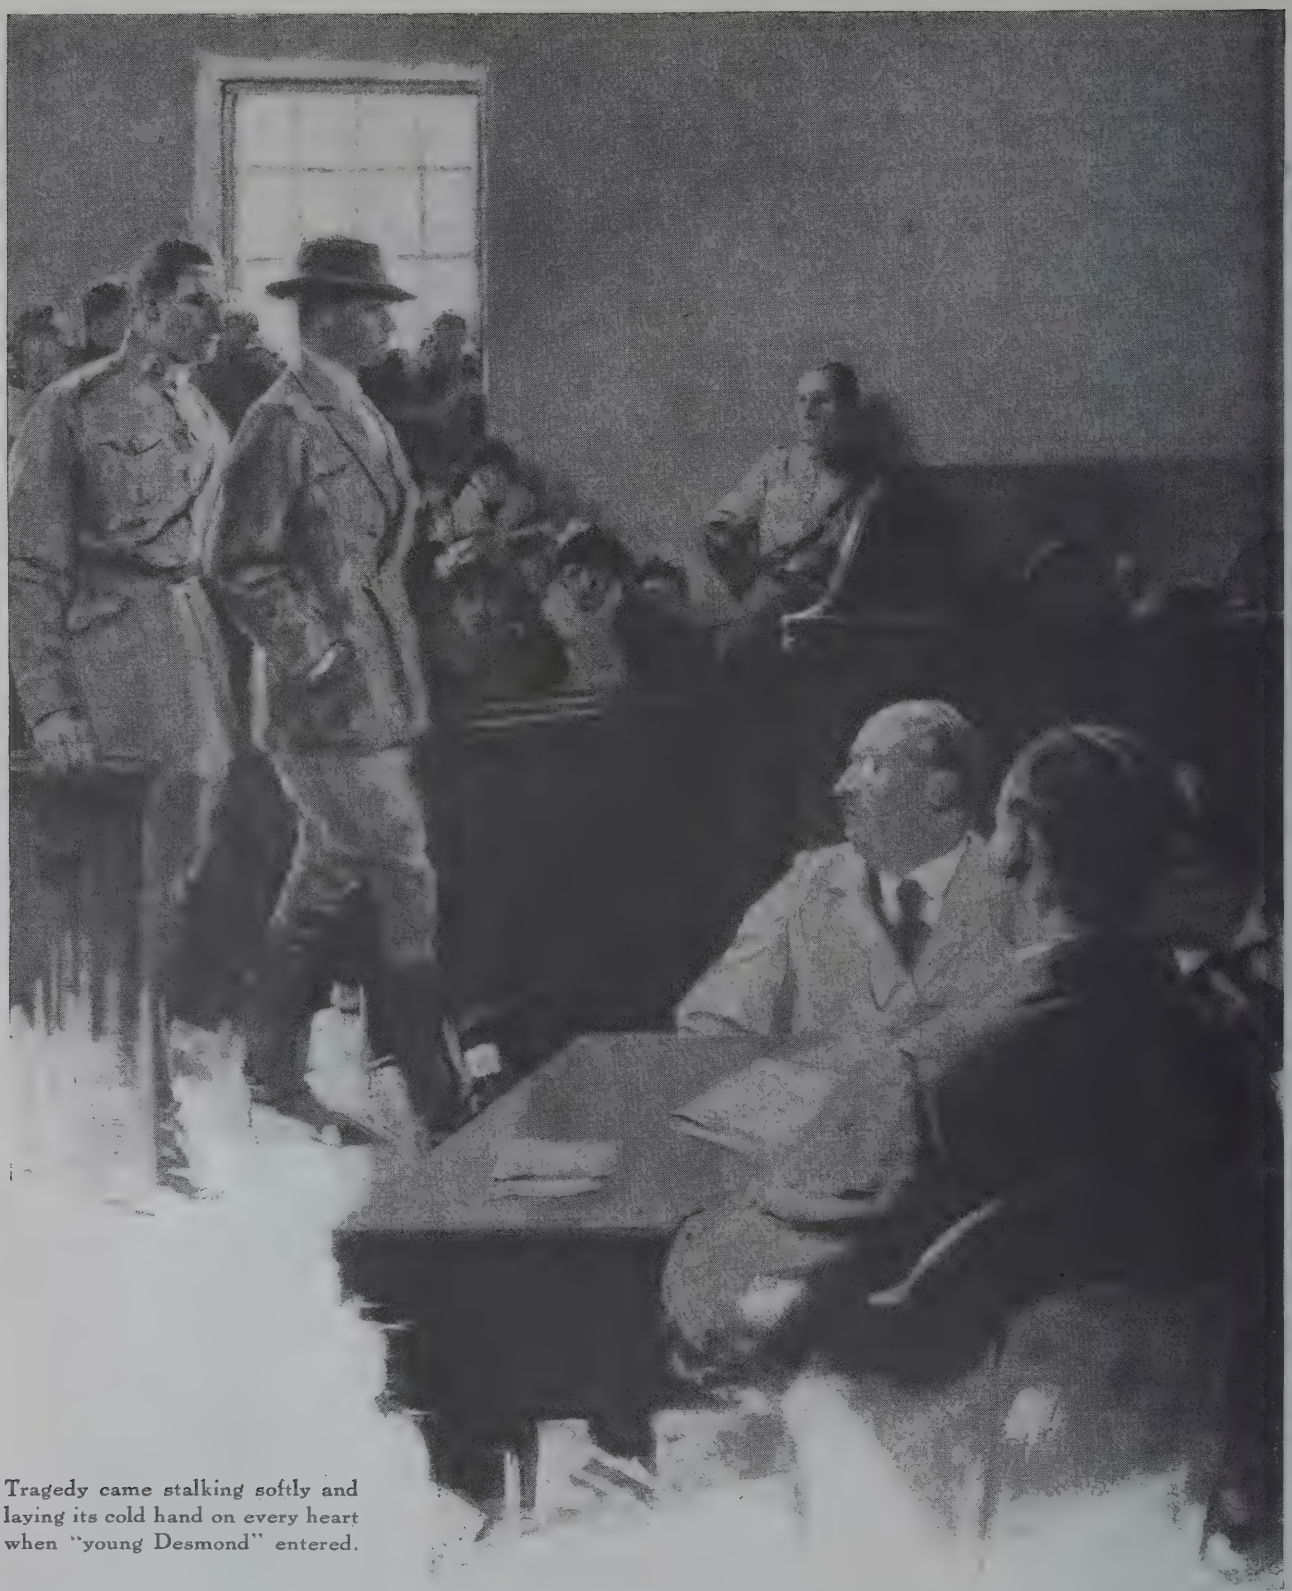
Curtis, the prospector, then gave evidence of fetching away fever stricken Druro and dumping him in Mrs. Hope's care. It looked strange that Desmond had said nothing to him of the tragedy. If it had been an accident or the outcome of a quarrel, what more natural than to have told Curtis and got his help to bring in the body? The prosecution made this further ugly point without unduly emphasizing it. Another doctor—Ryan was away at the time—gave evidence of receiving Druro at the hospital, unconscious and precariously ill of "black water." He added carelessly that he did not suppose Druro would recover, and no one noticed Desmond blench, for she was so pale already that it could not be observed.

Druro had not left Selukine until late. His horse was tired out and the night pitch dark, but he had insisted on going. It was natural for everyone to suppose that on arrival at camp he had, being a sick man, gone straight to his hut where he was found the next day.

Thus, without effort from anyone and no more than a little economy of frankness on Desmond's part, Druro had been entirely eliminated as a factor in the tragedy. As a result the prisoner was committed for trial on a charge of manslaughter and removed to Wankelo where the high court was due to sit shortly.

Into her narrative of Desmond's life Loochia put all the malice of a petty nature.

CHAPTER XVII



THE only visitors she saw were her lawyer and Emma Guthrie, now established at the Jubilate Deo and making things hum. The mine was brilliantly fulfilling Druro's anticipations.

"Roughly speaking there is about forty thousand pounds' worth within sight in the next few months," the little man told Desmond with the gleam of gold in his eye. "And more to come, or I'm a tinker. The only worry now is to get Lundi out of hospital and you out of jail."

The report on Druro was not good. He hung literally between life and death and had never spoken a connected word since entering hospital.

Guthrie did not go into the matter of Desmond's guilt or innocence, nor the reasons for her disguise. She was Druro's friend, and on the strength of that and the forty thousand he got the best lawyer in the country to defend her.

O'Byrne, K. C., was a brilliant and ambitious Irishman, bursting with eloquence and chivalrous ardor to right the wrongs of pretty women, and he did not need pressing. Besides, who would hesitate to step into the forefront of such a cause célèbre as the "Jubilate mystery" promised to become?

Tragedy came stalking softly and laying its cold hand on every heart when "young Desmond" entered.

But he soon found that the greatest obstacle to the éclat he promised himself in getting her off was his client herself.

Counsel had to protest at last in exasperation that she seemed to want to be convicted. She looked startled and became less taciturn, for that was not the impression she desired to give.

"It's no use going into details," she said. "You've heard the police court evidence. When the native constable asked me if I had seen Lypiatt I said no, and when the sergeant told me he had found Lypiatt dead in my hut I said yes, quite right."

"But that's not enough for me. I must have some sort of story of how the thing occurred and why Lypiatt should want to attack you."

On that she gave him a very wary account of Lypiatt's discovery of Druro's rich strike and decision to steal it, being careful to assign his action entirely to greed for gold and eliminating all reference to the enmity existing between the two men. (She only prayed that no one else would drag that into the case!) Her story fined down in fact to a personal quarrel between Lypiatt and herself about the discovery notices.

"He wanted me to change them and of course I wouldn't and called him a blackguard. One word led to another. I said something particularly galling, I suppose, and he jumped up and took me by the throat. I haven't any idea whether he meant to kill me or merely shake the life out of me, but there was a scuffle, the table overturned, the light went out, the floor was covered with water and I suppose he slipped. I heard him fall with a crack like a coconut hitting a stone, and when I recovered enough to light up he was lying unconscious. I tried to get him round but after a time, realizing that it was no good, I pulled him over to the wall and covered him up. I was rather dazed and I don't quite know what I intended to do eventually—hide the body, I think. But the police came before I could do anything."

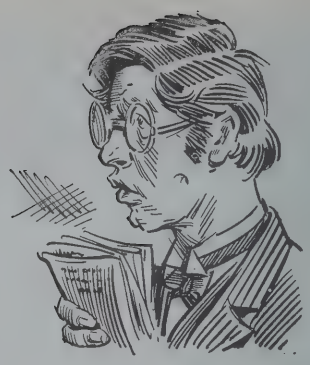
It was a clever story, and true every word of it—but with all the essential facts left out. O'Byrne could not pick a hole in it though instinct told him there was something missing. However, it is a criminal lawyer's business to make bricks from the straws offered by his client.

Lypiatt's family was sending a K. C. from the Cape to assist the prosecution—a Hollander married to Lypiatt's only sister. O'Byrne knew him for a smart, malicious devil who would stick at nothing to enhance his reputation, and if there was something the accused was keeping back he would surely drag it forth; so O'Byrne decided not to put her in the witness box.



Told of this decision Desmond answered smilingly that it was a good thing as wild horses would never have dragged her there. It was only with great difficulty, and after assuring her the plea did not in the least contradict the evidence, that he could persuade her to plead not guilty. (Continued on page 106)

SCENE—A criminal court room in Upper Hellangone.
At rise of curtain, everybody is on the stage, standing up. They soon get tired and sit down.

CLERK: Hear youse! Hear youse! Hear youse! This court is now in session!

JUDGE: I must warn you that this court room will be cleared if there is any munching on gumdrops. Counsel will proceed.

FITCH (rising): Your Honor, we will prove that this defendant, Mrs. Snow, was caught red-handed in the murder of her husband. There is no controverting the evidence in this case. It was cold-blooded, premeditated murder.

JUDGE: Counsel will confine himself to one syllable words.

FITCH: Our first witness is C. M. Prettyman.

CLERK (calling): C. M. Prettyman! (Prettyman takes the stand and Clerk administers the oath.)

FITCH: Mr. Prettyman, do you know this defendant, Mrs. Snow?

PRETTYMAN: Yes, sir. I live in the same building, right across the hall.

FITCH: Please state what happened on the night of May twenty-eighth.

PRETTYMAN: Well, I got drunk and came home and set around awhile and then I went over to the Snows' apartment.

FITCH: Why?

PRETTYMAN: I thought Mr. Snow was out.

FITCH: But he was not out?

PRETTYMAN: Oh, yes, he was! He was down and out. He was dead.

JUDGE (slapping bench): Good!

PRETTYMAN: And Mrs. Snow stood over him revolver in hand, still smoking.

FITCH: Who?

PRETTYMAN: Both of them.

FITCH: Then what happened?

PRETTYMAN: Mrs. Snow asked me to go and call the janitor. She was expecting company and wanted the room straightened up.

FITCH: And did you call the janitor?

PRETTYMAN: I did call the janitor.

FITCH (to Williams): You may take the witness. (He sits down.)

WILLIAMS (rising): Mr. Prettyman, are you married?

PRETTYMAN: No, sir. I'm a widow.

WILLIAMS: What did your wife die of?

PRETTYMAN: She got her throat caught between my fingers.

JUDGE: Good!

WILLIAMS (to Prettyman): That will do. (Prettyman leaves the stand and Williams sits down.)

FITCH (rising): I will call Lars Anderson.

CLERK: Lars Anderson! (Anderson takes the witness stand and Clerk administers the oath.)

FITCH: What is your name?

ANDERSON: Lars Anderson.

FITCH: I thought so. (Catcalls.) What is your occupation?

ANDERSON (assuming a Swedish dialect): I ban janitor up to the Clifton Apartments.

FITCH: Do you know the defendant?

ANDERSON (looking at Mrs. Snow): Sure, that's the murderer.

WILLIAMS (springing up): We object to that, Your Honor!

JUDGE: Objection sustained. (To Anderson) When it's a lady you must call her a murderess. And if she's a Swiss lady, you can call her a Swissess.

FITCH: Now, Mr. Anderson, tell us what happened the night of May twenty-eighth.

ANDERSON: Well, my woman and me, we ban went to a picture show. We seen Ben Turpin. He's cross-eyed. When we got home, we ban had a fight. She wanted I should take a bath and I said no. So just then this Prettyman come to the door and says I should go up to Mrs. Snow's apartment. That's the murderess.

JUDGE: Good!

ANDERSON: So I ban went up to Mrs. Snow's apartment and found Mr. Snow laying on the floor. So I got the vacuum cleaner and swept him up.

FITCH: What makes you think he was murdered.

ANDERSON: That's what Mrs. Snow said. But she ban all the time joking.

FITCH: The State rests. (He sits down and Anderson leaves the witness stand.)

WILLIAMS (rising): Your Honor, we have only one witness, the murderess herself, who will take the stand in her own defense. (Mrs. Snow goes to the witness stand and Clerk administers the oath.) Now, Your Honor, it seems to me that we might save this little lady a great deal of embarrassment if you would scrunch this indictment. Things have came to a pretty pass when a beautiful woman has to throw away a day in court every time her husband happens to get murdered.

MRS. SNOW: Don't mind me, Judge. I'm enjoying every minute of it.

JUDGE: Counsel will proceed.

WILLIAMS (to Mrs. Snow): State your name.

MRS. SNOW: Cordelia Snow. Cordelia means warm-hearted.

JUDGE: But Snow is cold.

WILLIAMS: Now, Mrs. Snow, why did you shoot your husband?

MRS. SNOW: Oh, I don't know—poisons is so uncertain in this climate!

WILLIAMS: But what was the occasion of your killing him?

MRS. SNOW: No special occasion—just Saturday night.

WILLIAMS: Did you and your husband quarrel very often?

MRS. SNOW: Only when we were together.

WILLIAMS: What did you quarrel about?

MRS. SNOW: Oh, anything! We were both broad-minded.

WILLIAMS: Had you quarreled with him the night of the tragedy?

MRS. SNOW: Tragedy?

WILLIAMS: The night he died.

MRS. SNOW: Oh, that! Why yes, I suppose we quarreled.

WILLIAMS: What makes you suppose you quarreled?

MRS. SNOW: Well, he was home.

WILLIAMS: And did you always quarrel when he was home?

MRS. SNOW: Oh, no! Sometimes he was home and I was out.

WILLIAMS: Did that happen very often?

MRS. SNOW: Only when I could arrange it.

WILLIAMS (to Fitch): You may take the the witness. (He sits down and Fitch rises.)

FITCH: Now, Mrs. Snow, how long were you married to Snow?

MRS. SNOW: Right up to the time he died.

FITCH: I am through with the witness.

MRS. SNOW: And it's mutual, believe me!

WILLIAMS (rising): We rest, Your Honor. (Mrs. Snow leaves the witness stand.)

JUDGE: Counsel may have one minute apiece for summing up.

WILLIAMS (rising): Your Honor and queer looking people of the jury: This case reminds me of the woman who went to the photograph gallery and asked the photographer if he took pictures of children. Stop me if you've heard it. Well, this woman went into a photograph gallery and asked the proprietor, Mike, if he took pictures of children. "Yes, ma'am, we do," replied Mike. Stop me if you've heard this one. "Well," said the woman, "and how much are they?" She was referring to the price of photographs of children. "Three dollars a dozen," replied Mike, the proprietor of the photograph gallery. "Well," said the woman smilingly, "I guess I will have to come back later. I've only got eleven." Now, Your Honor and ladies and gentlemen of the jury, this case is an exact parallel of the story I have just told. This defendant, Cordelia Snow, would never have killed Snow had it not been for the fact that she still lacked a dozen husbands.

(He sits down in practically complete silence.)

JUDGE: I will now call on the district attorney, Mr. Fitch, a man who won his spurs in a Swiss livery stable and a prominent Rotarian in Fitchburg, Mass.

FITCH (rising): Your Honor and jury: This case reminds me of an even older story than that which my distinguished colleague tried so hard and failed to tell. It seems that two gentlemen, Pat and Mike, were traveling through the hill country of Kentucky. It was very still. At length they came in sight of a cabin in the clearing. The only sign of habitation was the remnants of a mule and the tall figure of a man who leaned against a tree, spearing hazel nuts. "Wonder if he can talk," said Pat to Mike. "Try him," said Mike to Pat. "Well, stranger," said Pat, "this is a great country." "I like it," replied the Kentuckian. "Have you lived here all your life?" asked Pat. "Not yet," replied the Kentuckian. Now, Your Honor and friends, we demand that this defendant, Cordelia Snow, be found guilty and fined no less than five dollars and costs. (He sits down in a hubbub of quiet.)

JUDGE: Would the jury like to ask any questions?

FOREMAN: Your Honor, was the deceased the defendant's legal husband?

JUDGE (to Fitch and Williams): How about it, boys?

FITCH AND WILLIAMS: No question about that.

FOREMAN: Well, then, who had a better right to shoot him!

JUDGE: Gentlemen, this case is out, like a Yankee pinch hitter.

A Story of a Town where Everything, including Ghosts, Must be Up-to-Date

THREE characteristics of the human countenance Joe Thomas abhorred—curly hair, a Grecian profile and romantic eyes. Physical perfection is all right in a museum; in the home it is loathsome. If Adonis had a room mate—or better, a barber—it is safe to say the latter yearned to cut his throat, for who could repeatedly shave a cheek, a chin, as smooth and as flawless as flesh can be; who could daily vaseline a head of wavy midnight hair with just the right curl to tempt unruly feminine fingers without praying for pimples and dandruff?

Nevertheless, that is precisely what Joe Thomas was called upon to do, for the cheeks, the chin, the throat, the hair were his. Out from his mirror gazed a pair of haunting, languorous eyes fringed like the gentian. He had tried cutting off the lashes, but they came in longer and thicker than ever, and they curled. His was the fatal curse of beauty

Joe had been marked by this hideous peculiarity as a child; in fact, he and Myrtle Sawyer had been the prettiest children in town and they had won prizes at baby shows. Myrtle, as she grew older, lived down her past, but with Joe the disgrace lingered. Even after his voice changed and the pink down of adolescence appeared upon his lip, people continued to refer to him as "that perfect boy," and some of the women spoke of the dimples in his back. Joe's face was that of a sixteen year old cherub and his lips were like rosebuds, but at references such as these there issued from him language—well, language that went with a full and unkempt beard. When he grew old enough to envy the ugliness of other boys and to realize that he could neither freckle nor grow warts, no matter how he tried, a burning resentment took charge of him and he fought with his playmates. Frequently he was licked by these homely boys, but in spite of his desperate disregard of consequences his perfect features possessed the resiliency of rubber and malignant nature healed the marks of battle. Nothing he could do resulted in permanent disfigurement. As age laid muscle upon his frame, he more often came home a winner and by the time he had graduated from "Tech" as an electrical engineer, his reputation as a willing and able rough-and-tumbler had become such that only comparative strangers complimented him upon his looks.

He was beginning to hope that he had finally laid his ghost when one day Sol Ginsberg, a friend of public school days, wrote him from Hollywood urging him to come West and go into "pictures." Ginsberg had gone to California as an assistant camera man and through the display of talents entirely unsuspected by his schoolmates he had risen, meteor-like, to the dignity of producer.

"I can make of you a big hit," the enthusiastic Ginsberg wrote, "if only you screen as good as you look, and I bet you would. We can easy change your name to something classy, like Pedro de Ventura, now that these Wop leading men have got the women boiling. All I expect is I should get a nice long term contract in case I put you over. It beats the wireless business, Joe, which ain't got anything solid behind it."

"You thnake in the grath! Wait!" lisped Miss Donaldson, withering Hyman with a glare of hatred.

Talking Vase

Joe started to answer the letter but thought better of it, for the postal regulations governing what may be transmitted through the mails are rigid. Instead, he swallowed the temptation and went on with his radio experiments. But thereafter he detested motion pictures. That detestation ripened into a positive hatred when Myrtle Sawyer won a beauty contest which carried with it a trip to the Coast and a rôle in "Passion's Pawn," a crashing super-special in preparation by the Hyman Film Productions.

Sick with apprehension, cold with dread, Joe called upon Myrtle the evening the announcement appeared in the local paper.

"You don't intend to accept this crazy offer, do you?" he inquired.

"Why, of course I do!" Myrtle's blue eyes were starry with excitement. "I'm as thrilled as a bunny, Joe."

"What the devil is your family thinking of?" he growled.

"Why, Joe! It's the chance of a lifetime."

"Sure! Chance to be mauled around by some plumber in a sport shirt; chance to be thrown over a cliff into the arms of Handsome Harold, the perfect male thirty-eight. If I ever see you kissing one of those 'nature's noblemen' with a divided chin and moveable eyebrows—I—— That's all the movies are—kissing games!"

Miss Sawyer flushed. "You always hated kissing games, didn't you?"

"Of course. Mother's friends licked my face shiny until my beard got rough. They kissed me until I smelled sour. If you'll cut out this nonsense——"

"It isn't nonsense," Myrtle declared earnestly. "I'm going to make my fortune."

"You don't need a fortune. I'll——"

"It's my chance for a career. Motion pictures is the fourth largest business in America, Joe. I must think of my future."

"There's a big future in electrical supplies and radio equipment, too. I'm working out a new telephone—'The Phone Beautiful,' I call it. Why talk into an ugly iron thing instead of into a vase or an ornamental——"

"You're so practical, so—matter of fact! So is everybody." Myrtle sighed. "Girls want romance, adventure. Of course I may not screen well——"

"No danger of that." Joe frowned darkly. "If you tackle this, I'm going to start right in burning down moving picture theaters."

Myrtle, of course, was flattered by Joe's jealousy, but it was more flattering by far to be selected as the most beautiful of ten thousand beautiful girls, and before her the gates of the world had opened. Through them she glimpsed an enchanting realm of glittering possibilities. Fame beckoned her and Fortune smiled. What girl could hesitate? Long and earnestly Joe argued but in time Myrtle went West.

Several months later, Joe was surprised to receive a call from Sol Ginsberg, President of Gins-Art Productions, Incorporated. Mr. Ginsberg had a single track mind and he had come for an answer to his letter.

"You got a picture face, Joe, if ever I saw one and I've seen a million. Maybe if you'd show me you can act a little I'd put you right in my next serial."

"I'll show you exactly how I can act," Joe began venomously; then his brow cleared and he laughed outright. "Did you come all the way from the Coast to offer me a job?"

"N-no. I had other business. You ain't got to act much, Joe. Leave it to the director. Got any stills?"

"I'm an electrician, not a bootlegger."

"Still pictures, photographs. It's types we——"

"I hate everything about moving pictures, and I loathe moving picture actors."

"All the same, it pays better than stringin' wires." Ginsberg cast a disdainful eye over Joe's place of business.

Joe opened his mouth to explain that he was an engineer, an inventor, but he doubted if Sol would understand the difference so he said: "Come in here. I want to talk to you." He led the caller into his office and seated him. Then, "Tell me, how are you getting along?"

Ginsberg shrugged. "Oh, we all got our troubles, I s'pose! Pictures ain't so good lately. Competition, you know. Two fellers I'd like to kill, Joe; the guys that invented competition and overhead. Compared with them robbers, Frank and Jesse James was a couple of nice boys. No sooner I spend a fortune making a star than along comes Ad Hyman or the Notable or some other bird of prayer and hires her away. Only one artist on the lot you can absolutely depend to work every day and that's the famous Hebrew heavy, Mr. Morris W. Overhead."

"What sort of a fellow is Hyman?" Joe inquired curiously.

"Don't ask me! I wouldn't talk about him. He's a wulture, Joe. It ain't enough I should lose to him Miriam Donaldson and Bush Thorndyke, the two best money getters in the business; he takes with 'em my best continuity writer by offering him screen credit. On top of that somebody at the home office hears the great Anna Turin sing 'Tosca' and right away signs her up to make five Gins-Art features, with a private car both ways from New York. Anna Turin!" Ginsberg moaned like an autumn breeze.

"I supposed Turin was a great find."

"Ain't I telling you? They couldn't of found another like her if they looked a year. Her first picture cost us a hundred and eighty thousand dollars, two script writers and the best director on the lot. Poor Jimmy Lord! I just left him in West Baden. Nervous indigestion and shellshock. He cries steady and can't eat only bran muffins. Battle Creek is the place for him, but he couldn't stand the name."

"What is the picture like?"

Ginsberg stared at the speaker with the eye of a hunted deer. "One reel of titles and action and six reels of close-ups of the star. Sure! Pictures is a great business. Another hit by Turin and Gins-Art goes under the hammer. Already her spirit control has advised her to hire a lawyer for fear we break the contract."

"Spirit control?"

"Sure. Since this feller Doyle got his name in the papers, Hollywood does nothing but tip tables and hold slate writings. The bootleggers have turned mediums—more money in it and they don't have to split with the police. It's so you can't sign up even a character woman without she should first consult the unseen world, and then you don't know if you got a good signature to the contract or the monnicker of some dear departed that wouldn't hold in court. It looks like Ad Hyman has got a drag in the spirit world, because all the good actors that quit Gins-Art right away sign with him. Crooked business men I can get along with, Joe, when they're alive, but how you going to compete with a lot of slick ghosts? I ask you."

Here was something that interested Joe Thomas and for some time he questioned the producer. Friendship, perhaps it was, that induced the latter to lay bare his hidden worries. Truly, those worries were by no means trivial, for Turin was a terrible quince and her contract alone, if carried out, was enough to wreck a stronger organization than Gins-Art. Moreover, it did indeed look as if Sol's company was on the spirit blacklist, for what few capable people it still retained were threatening to desert and go to his rival.

"But there, I been crying about my troubles and you probably got plenty of your own," the picture man sighed. "Business good?"

"Fine! I've perfected a new idea in telephones—'The Phone Beautiful'—and it's bound to go over. Why not make the telephone a thing of artistic beauty?"

"Why not?" Ginsberg nodded vacantly. Then: "How about three hundred a week, Joe? And if I put you across——"

Mr. Thomas exploded. "Not for three thousand. I tell you I'm poisoned on pictures."

"Then why you been taking all this time——"

"Because——" The speaker flushed. "It's on account of Myrtle. She won that beauty contest of the Hyman Film Company."

"I know." Ginsberg smiled wanly. "It's the only piece of luck I had that he got her instead of Gins-Art."

"Why? Isn't she any good?" Joe inquired hopefully.

"She's a lemon! Mind you now, Myrtle I like. Ain't I known her all my life? But for an actress—I'd sooner have a trained seal. This here 'Passion's Pawn' is a complete flop."

"Then I'm afraid"—Joe rose and took a nervous turn about the room—"there's something in what I've heard."

"What you heard?"

"That Hyman is interested in her; wants to marry her. She was engaged to me when she left here."

"So? That's tough. But Joe, a lotta girls have thought Hyman wanted to marry 'em and he didn't. That's how he works."

"I've been waiting for her to get sick of the game and come home, but he has signed her up for a year."

"He should worry if she can't act, with the company paying her salary. Of course she don't know she's rotten. None of 'em do. I s'pose her spirit control——"

"Has she fallen for that stuff?"

"I don't know. Most of 'em have. Lord, Joe, if you was a good medium instead of a bum electrician, we'd—clean up."

After a moment Joe Thomas astonished his caller by quietly declaring:

"I am."

"Am what?"

"A—medium."

"Hush!"

"I'm psychic, in a way. Anyhow, I can talk with the dead, if that would do us any good."

Sol Ginsberg breathed heavily; then after a searching stare he reached for his hat and rose, saying, "Well, Joe, I gotta be getting along."

But the other laid a detaining hand upon his arm. "Wait. You've been complaining about malicious spirits ruining your business. Suppose I could put you in touch with some friendly spooks that would boost you and knock Hyman."

"Are you kidding? Of course there ain't any such thing as spirits. All the same I'd be willing to sign up one that I could count on and let him name his own salary."

"If I could convert you I'd have no trouble convincing those people in Los Angeles, would I?"

"Convince 'em of what? Already they believe anything they're told. It's me you got to convince."

"Very well. Suppose you heard a spirit voice? Suppose it answered questions, foretold the future, withstood every test?"

"Honest, Joe, to try such foolishness on me is wasting time. It can't be done."

"Wait and see. You'll have to admit there are forces in nature vastly powerful, although unseen; dynamic possibilities we know almost nothing about. Well, I've discovered a method of communicating with the dead that none of your mediums know anything about. Billy Sunday never snatched a brand from the burning as quickly as I propose to yank you out of your disbelief. Sol, before you leave this room you are going to talk with your ancestors."

"Ha, Yiddish ghosts! All right, I'll fall for anything once. Commence!"

It was nearly three hours later when Ginsberg left Joe Thomas's place of business. He wrung the engineer's hands and laughed excitedly. "Say, all the luck in the world ain't bad, after all. I'm a fifty minute egg and when you get me going you've done something. Most of it I don't understand yet. I've been selling some of my Gins-Art stock on the quiet, but if your ghosts will talk in California like they do here——"

"They'll talk much better."

"Then I'm going to buy it in again. Wire me when you're ready to come and I'll have my pressman plant a story in every Los Angeles paper. Jimmy Lord will be back by that time. He's been to some of them séances with Turin, and he's a bear on make-up. Take a tip, Joe, and grab a few shares of Gins-Art for yourself. These old-home spirits of ours will send 'em to par."

Again came the eerie whispering from the shadow world. "I am waiting!" declared Madame Turin.

The more intellectual members of the Hollywood moving picture colony were interested one morning to read that Professor Tremblay, the eminent scientist, had arrived on his way to the Orient in furtherance of his experiments in psychomancy, a particular phase of psychic research upon which he was the leading authority. The professor was en route to the interior of India where he had previously spent several years studying spirit phenomena, and while he was reticent about the evidence already gathered, nevertheless he intimated that his forthcoming book would create a sensation.

Several people, Madame Turin among others, telephoned the investigator at his hotel but succeeded only in speaking with his secretary, who informed them that Professor Tremblay was distressed at the amount of publicity he had received and positively would not consider anything in the way of a public appearance or a lecture. He was engrossed for the present in a series of exhaustive experiments with the famous Talking Vase of which no doubt they had heard.

What was the Talking Vase? The secretary was amazed that the phenomenon was unknown to his hearers, inasmuch as the journal of the International Society had lately been full of it. It was a curious relic the professor had stumbled upon and psychic circles were in an uproar over it. Rightly, too, since it had rendered former methods of spirit communication antiquated.

News of this sort naturally created a buzz among Madame

"Sol," said Joe, "before you leave this room you are going to talk with your ancestors."

Turin's psychically inclined friends; that buzz became a murmur when the scientist visited the Gins-Art lot.

Pressed for an explanation, Tremblay confided that Conan Doyle's experiments with spirit photography had induced him to take to India with him an expert camera man; hence his visit to the moving picture capital.

Doctor Tremblay was a handsome, swarthy, impressive man. He wore a magnificent, glossy black beard parted in the middle after the oriental fashion. Ginsberg, Jimmy Lord and Moe Apple, the Gins-Art head electrician, spent the better part of the day with him.

Myrtle Sawyer was genuinely surprised when Joe Thomas phoned her that evening explaining that he had come clear to the Coast just to see her, and she welcomed him when he called a half hour later. Myrtle's gladness at sight of him was unaffected, but Joe soon discovered that a change had come over her; she was no longer the girl he had known. Camera-blight had stricken her. Myrtle had been a modest creature, a trifle shy in fact, and she had never displayed the faintest sign of conceit over her abundant good looks. But the movies had changed all that. Her personal appearance concerned her deeply now; it absorbed her; she referred to it frequently and showed Joe a bewildering collection of stills, the while she talked about camera angles and back lighting and soft focuses. After they had sufficiently admired her photographs, she read him some thrilling press notices of "Passion's Pawn" and her work as the captive slave. At least they thrilled her. Next she showed Joe a fan magazine in which was an illustrated interview headed, "Fragrant Myrtle Sawyer, the Wonder Girl."

Joe read the story with some surprise, for Myrtle, it seemed, had in the course of a few months developed into an all-around athlete. There was a half-tone of her in riding breeches and polo belt kissing the nostril of a livery horse; another of her in golf clothes removing a divot by means of a left-handed grip on a right-handed mashie; and a third view of the Wonder Girl smashing at a tennis ball that Tilden could not have reached from the end of a springboard. Nor was that the half of it. "Fragrant Myrtle" was a skilful and an adventurous fisherwoman, also a crack shot—she had the clothes to show it. Joe feared to turn the page lest he should discover that she was also a high diver and dressed that part. Her passionate fondness for the out-of-doors, he read, arose only from her intense vitality and perfect health, but there was another, a softer, a more womanly side to her character—she was a fancy cook and adored bungalow aprons. She loved her parents and all dumb animals. Myrtle Sawyer was a girl "you'd like to take home and introduce to your mother." Joe was glad there was one statement in the ghastly parody to which he could subscribe—he'd like to take her home and introduce her to his mother, all right—with instructions to give her a good spanking.

"It is all a part of Mr. Hyman's publicity campaign," Myrtle explained. "He's a wonderful man."

"Um-m! When do you start work on the next picture?"

"I don't know. We haven't found a script yet. He insists on a proper vehicle; so many stars have been killed by bad stories. I'm not really a star, of course, but he says——"

"Honestly, Myrtle, do you like this sort of thing?" Joe indicated the "Fragrant Myrtle" interview.

The girl flushed. "Certainly not. I hate it, just as I hate horses and guns and cooking. But I never earned a dollar in my life and it's such fun to buy things with your own money. It's all like a dream. There are so few things a girl can do, Joe. When she's lucky enough to have a career offered her, why—she owes it to herself and to her family to make the most of her opportunity."

"It's a pretty good career to marry and live happily ever after. That's what all your photoplays are written about."

Myrtle nodded. A yearning light crept into her eyes; upon her face there came an expression the camera had never caught; and Joe Thomas realized that at heart she was still the Myrtle he knew and adored. He understood her, too. Poor, foolish, dazzled little kid! She was indeed walking in a dream. Her faith, her yearning, her determination to become rich and great were very natural, very girlish. He loved her the more tenderly for them.

Later, when he told her good night, he took her in his arms and kissed her. She struggled faintly, she protested in a shaky voice, but there were tears in her eyes and the hands that held him off really clung to him. He was too wise, however, to take advantage of her momentary mood.

It was due to Madame Turin's persistence that Professor Tremblay finally consented to appear informally before her and her friends and demonstrate his mastery of psychic forces. As a return for the many courtesies of Sol Ginsberg, he suggested that his experiments be conducted in the latter's home.

On the appointed evening, the president of Gins-Art entertained a dozen or more guests at dinner, among whom were Miriam Donaldson and Bush Thorndyke, his former stars, and also Ad Hyman, their present employer. In spite of their poisonous rivalry, the two producers maintained an outward show of friendship. Tonight Hyman was more than skeptica of the forthcoming demonstration; he twitted Sol upon his conversion to spiritualism and his remarks were edged with ill concealed malice.

"Because Madame Turin gets me to stage a ghost dance in my house, is it a sign I believe in such things?" the host protested. "Anyhow it's a free show and you got a good dinner thrown in, so what you kicking about? For all I know this Tremblay is a faker. There's fakers even in the fillum business. And for a while they get away with it." Ginsberg spoke with a smile, but he narrowed his eyes at Hyman.

Madame Turin resented the mental attitude of both men and said so. "The idea of criticising a man of his eminence! Of course, I'm only a child in my understanding of the subject; nevertheless I could tell you of things I've seen, demonstrations that would surprise you. Whether or not you believe in a higher plane of existence, you will admit that we poor humans are drawn in opposite directions by conflicting forces, some beneficent, others malignant; forces of good and evil. If, through spiritual understanding, we attune ourselves to those beneficent powers they will inevitably sweep us onward to success. That, at least, is my theory."

"Maybe you're right," Hyman told her. "Anyhow, it's like that in the picture business; some of us succeed in everything we touch. Why? Because we have the power to do big things. Others fail." Ginsberg felt something coming and essayed an interruption but the speaker went on: "When actors ask me for advice, I tell them to get aboard a going concern, and line up with the successful, growing firms that can do the most for them. If your cart is hitched to a sick horse, cut the traces. Don't rats leave a sinking ship?"

Hyman addressed this question directly to Stella Green, last of the Gins-Art stars. Miss Green was known to screen lovers as "California's Passion Flower, the Girl with the Million Dollar Back," and Ginsberg considered her the best vamp in the business. He read the double meaning in Hyman's words and a cold sweat broke out upon him. If the Passion Flower jumped, he was ruined.

"You said something, Ad," he declared. "It's only rats do like that."

Miss Donaldson spoke up in her lisping, childish voice. "Buth had a demonthrathion. Didn't you, Buth?"

Bush Thorndyke, pressed for details, confessed: "It happened while Miriam and I were making 'The Bride of Hate.' You remember the scene where the castle burns and I swing myself across the moat on the telephone wire?"

"Where he ethcapeth from the Cage of Death and thaveth me from Duke Borith."

Ginsberg nodded vigorously. "I should forget it in a hurry, when the set cost thirty thousand dollars."

"Well, I had a slate-writing and it warned me to beware of fire and water," said Thorndyke, "so I pretended to have a sprained wrist and they doubled me. The wire broke and that double went to the hospital for six weeks."

"I remember that, too," Ginsberg asserted. "Like it was yesterday. He had a day and night nurse."

Hyman beamed. "On our lot, we have never hurt a principal. We're careful of our artists. Anyhow, those cheap stunt pictures are cold."

During and after dinner more guests arrived and by nine o'clock, the hour set for Tremblay's appearance, the party included a good many of the local film notables.

The professor was late, but when he came he carried with him a large case which he carefully laid upon the hall table. Alone with Ginsberg in the latter's bedroom, he inquired, "Is Lord here?"

"Sure. Him and Moe had their dinner in the basement and everything is set. But the nerve of some people! Ad Hyman is after the 'Passion Flower.' In my own house! And it wouldn't surprise me if already she's jumped! He offers her seventeen-fifty a week and guarantees court costs if I sue. The wiper!" The producer mopped his moist brow. "Such a night! And on top of a wire from New York to hold up Turin's salary check till they can cover it! Just as well I should ask her to hold her breath that long."

"Ladies and gentlemen," Professor Tremblay addressed the assembled guests after his introduction, "I am not here in the guise of a necromancer, but as a cold, scientific investigator of spirit phenomena. The theory that intelligence is everlasting, that mind travels beyond the grave, that life continues after death is neither new nor original. It is one of man's oldest beliefs, and to this investigation I ask that you bring neither a blind, unreasoning acquiescence nor a stubborn disbelief. Let me urge you to maintain open minds. That is the only true scientific attitude.

"It has been my practice to appear only before academic audiences; therefore I declined Mr. Ginsberg's first invitation to come here. But upon second thought I realized the dignity and importance of your profession. I realized that here I should meet only the keenest minds; people with level heads and brilliant intuition. So it occurred to me that among you there might be an intellect capable of solving the occult mystery that has baffled the most learned of our purely scientific investigators."

There was heartfelt applause at this tribute to the higher intelligence of screen celebrities.

Madame Turin murmured audibly: "He's wonderful. And so young!"

Through his fine black beard the professor's teeth gleamed pleasantly. "Now for a brief history of the unique relic I have brought with me. Several years ago I was engaged in important research work which took me to the Province of Poopar, four hundred and eighty miles northwest of Calcutta. There I was the guest of the Rajah, a very old man at the time. Of course I had heard of the famous Talking Vase of Poopar—who has not? But I put it down as a native superstition, a myth. Imagine my surprise, therefore, when my host assured me that it did indeed exist, although none but the eyes of Yogis and priests had ever beheld it, none but holy men had held converse with it. It is perhaps a tribute to my standing in the world of occultism that I was finally permitted to see the vase, the most remarkable phenomenon the Orient has yet produced, and to test its powers. My report to the International Society created a sensation. I was regarded as a madman, for I reported that it actually spoke. The Rajah's family is one of the oldest in the East. This urn from time immemorial had contained the sacred ashes of his forebears and he declared that the voice was that of his ancestors!"

There was a stir and a rustle from the audience. Miriam Donaldson's hand sought that of her manly co-star, Bush Thorndyke, and she chattered:

"It giveth me the creepth! I'm all over gooth fleth."

Ad Hyman leaned forward to whisper: "It's the bunk. But I've got to hand it to him. He's great."

Tremblay continued: "Inasmuch as my knowledge of the Indian language was incomplete and the Rajah had to interpret for me, naturally the demonstration was not entirely satisfactory. Nevertheless I proved beyond question that there was no trick, no fake about the voice, and I offered the Rajah any sum for the relic. He refused to consider it.

"One day while tiger hunting I saved the life of his son, and later when the Rajah died I induced the young man to surrender the vase into my keeping with the understanding that I never leave it out of my possession and that I return it to the temple at Poopar in two years. He also exacted the strict proviso that I use it only for scientific demonstrations before serious minded people, explaining how easy it would be for an unscrupulous person to enrich himself by consulting it on business affairs. You see the voice is truly the voice of an oracle; it forecasts the future as unerringly as it reveals the past. That promise, ladies and gentlemen, I have scrupulously adhered to."

Madame Turin wished to know if the voice spoke only its native tongue.

"Ah! Now comes one of the strangest features of this bewildering business; one that has baffled the keenest minds of Europe and America. Shortly after the vase came into my possession, I noticed that it occasionally spoke an English word. Gradually it came to speak English entirely, although with an accent not unlike that of my old friend, the Rajah. Within the last six months every trace of accent has disappeared.

"I will bore you no further with explanations. The vase is here and you are free to test its powers."

With these words the professor opened the case he had brought with him, exposing to view an antique urn or pitcher with a slender, graceful neck and a long, curving, covered spout not unlike that of a watering pot. The vessel appeared to be made of some composition lighter than clay; its body was covered with crude figures in bas-relief. The audience pressed close and examined it inside and out.

"For our purpose we shall need a smaller room, one capable of accommodating perhaps a dozen chairs," the professor announced.

"Use the library," Ginsberg offered, and thither Tremblay bore his precious burden.

"Excellent," he said upon his return. "Now then, I assume that most of you are convinced that there is such a thing as mind reading—thought transference—so I will not——"

"Wait a minute," Hyman broke in. "Nobody ever read my mind, and I don't believe it can be done, on the level."

Ginsberg laughed loudly at this. "First you got to have a mind, Ad, before anybody can read it. You don't ask the professor should accomplish the impossible, I hope?"

"So?" Hyman wheeled swiftly upon the speaker. "Maybe he can tell what I'm thinking right now. The ladies can leave the room for a minute, so he can speak it right out loud. And if you go with them it won't hurt anybody's feelings. I'm from Missouri. If I'm going to join the order give me all the works. What do you mean, 'thought transference'?"

Madame Turin was distressed at this interruption. "There is always a disturbing element at every séance," she complained. "Skeptics and mental defectives should stay at home."

"Pardon! This is in no sense a séance." Tremblay raised his hands in good natured protest. "I flatter myself that I have progressed far beyond that stage. Mr. Hyman is right. It was my mistake in assuming that you had gone further in your studies. However, I think I can readily prove to him that—well, that thoughts are things. Thought transference is one of our first steps. Mr. Hyman, will you oblige me by speaking a number? Any number of two figures."

"I've got you. Twenty-three."

"Twenty-three." The professor nodded and stroked his forked beard. "Yonder is a telephone. Please call the Hotel Ambassador and ask for my secretary, Mr. Henry Graves."

Hyman did as directed. There was a brief delay, then: "Hello! Professor Tremblay's room, please . . . Mr. Henry Graves?" Hyman covered the receiver with his palm and announced, "He's on the wire."

"Tell him, please, that I am thinking of a number and ask him what it is."

Several people crowded close to Hyman while he repeated the message, holding the instrument away from his ear so that they, too, could hear the secretary's answer. There was a moment's delay, then the bystanders gasped. Hyman hung up and turned with a foolish grin. "You win. He called the turn."

Sol Ginsberg spoke above the chorus of exclamations, saying: "Of course, Ad, if it had been only you thinking of that number instead of all of us, it would of fell off the wire. It takes a mental athalete to shoot a message that far."

Tremblay now had the respectful attention of even the most incredulous. Over his evening clothes he slipped an elaborate oriental robe, upon his head he placed a large turban which came well down over his ears; then he called for envelopes and paper.

"Please write your questions, sign and seal them in the envelopes. Be careful that nobody sees what you write. I assume that all of you have lost dear ones—that you wish to learn whether they fare well or ill and whether life after death indeed exists. That is the most vital problem that vexes the human mind and I urge you to avail yourselves in all seriousness of this opportunity which may never be repeated. A supreme wisdom is at your call. Make the most of it."

Amid a great chewing of pencils and a heavy furrowing of brows these instructions were followed. Meanwhile the professor called for an assistant and for some receptacle in which to collect the sealed questions. Ginsberg hustled out of the room and shouted loudly for Moe Apple.

Apple appeared with a black cloth bag and when the last query had been signed and sealed he passed through the audience and each guest with his own hands dropped his envelope into the bag. Tremblay next requested Apple to upset the bag and dump its contents upon a large brass tray which he had placed upon a table. This done, he waved the electrician out of the room, struck a match and ignited the pile. As it blazed up, he murmured something about "consuming fires," "purifying flames"; and while he droned his incantation he stirred the blazing papers with a metal wand until the last one had been consumed, until the last charred and blackened remnant had been resolved to ashes. His voice became louder, more resonant as he announced:

"My friends, your hopes, your fears have passed on. Your words have been transmuted into a form visible to him who speaks through the Rajah's vase. May his counsel aid and cheer you in your quest for the ultimate truth. Not all of you will hear the Voice; fortunate will be those to whom it gives a message. Now, as many of you as can find seats please follow me into the Presence."

A Short Story of a Man Who Hated Women

The Bear Trap

Illustrations by Percy Cowen

She was the first white woman who had ever climbed Holgar's path.

HOLGAR watched the woman as she drove the bow of her canoe up on the pebbly bank. He watched her as she stepped ashore and stood studying the wreath of smoke that went up from his cabin chimney between the sheltering pines. He watched with a quickening pulse as she lifted a short barreled rifle from the canoe bottom and stood erect again, with the weapon in the crook of her arm. She seemed to be studying still again the smoke wreath that drifted up between the pine tops.

Holgar's heart sank as he saw her slowly advance up the narrow trail that led from the river bank to his cabin door. He was vaguely afraid of women, just as he vaguely hated them.

A small panic took possession of him as he stared out at her through the square window sash set in the neatly dovetailed log ends. He noticed, with the appraising quick eye of the woodsman, that she was dressed in a hunting coat of leather lined with lamb's wool, laced leather leggings and khaki knickerbockers fitting close at the knee, like riding breeches. She was a young woman, and she was slender, and she carried her head high. There was still a questioning look on her face as she advanced towards the shack. Holgar was too upset to nurse any definite impression as to the beauty of that face. But there was courage in her poise, courage tempered with caution, and the repeated impression of youthfulness which came from her as she stopped in his clean swept dooryard did not add to his happiness.

"Hallo-o-o-o!" she called out, with a cool note of challenge which the woodsman resented. This was the first white woman, he remembered, who had ever climbed that path of his.

"Hallo-o-o-o!" she challenged again. There was a trace of impatience in her call this time. But Holgar did not open his door until she had called for the third time.

She did not speak at first. There was, however, a small frown on her face as she studied him.

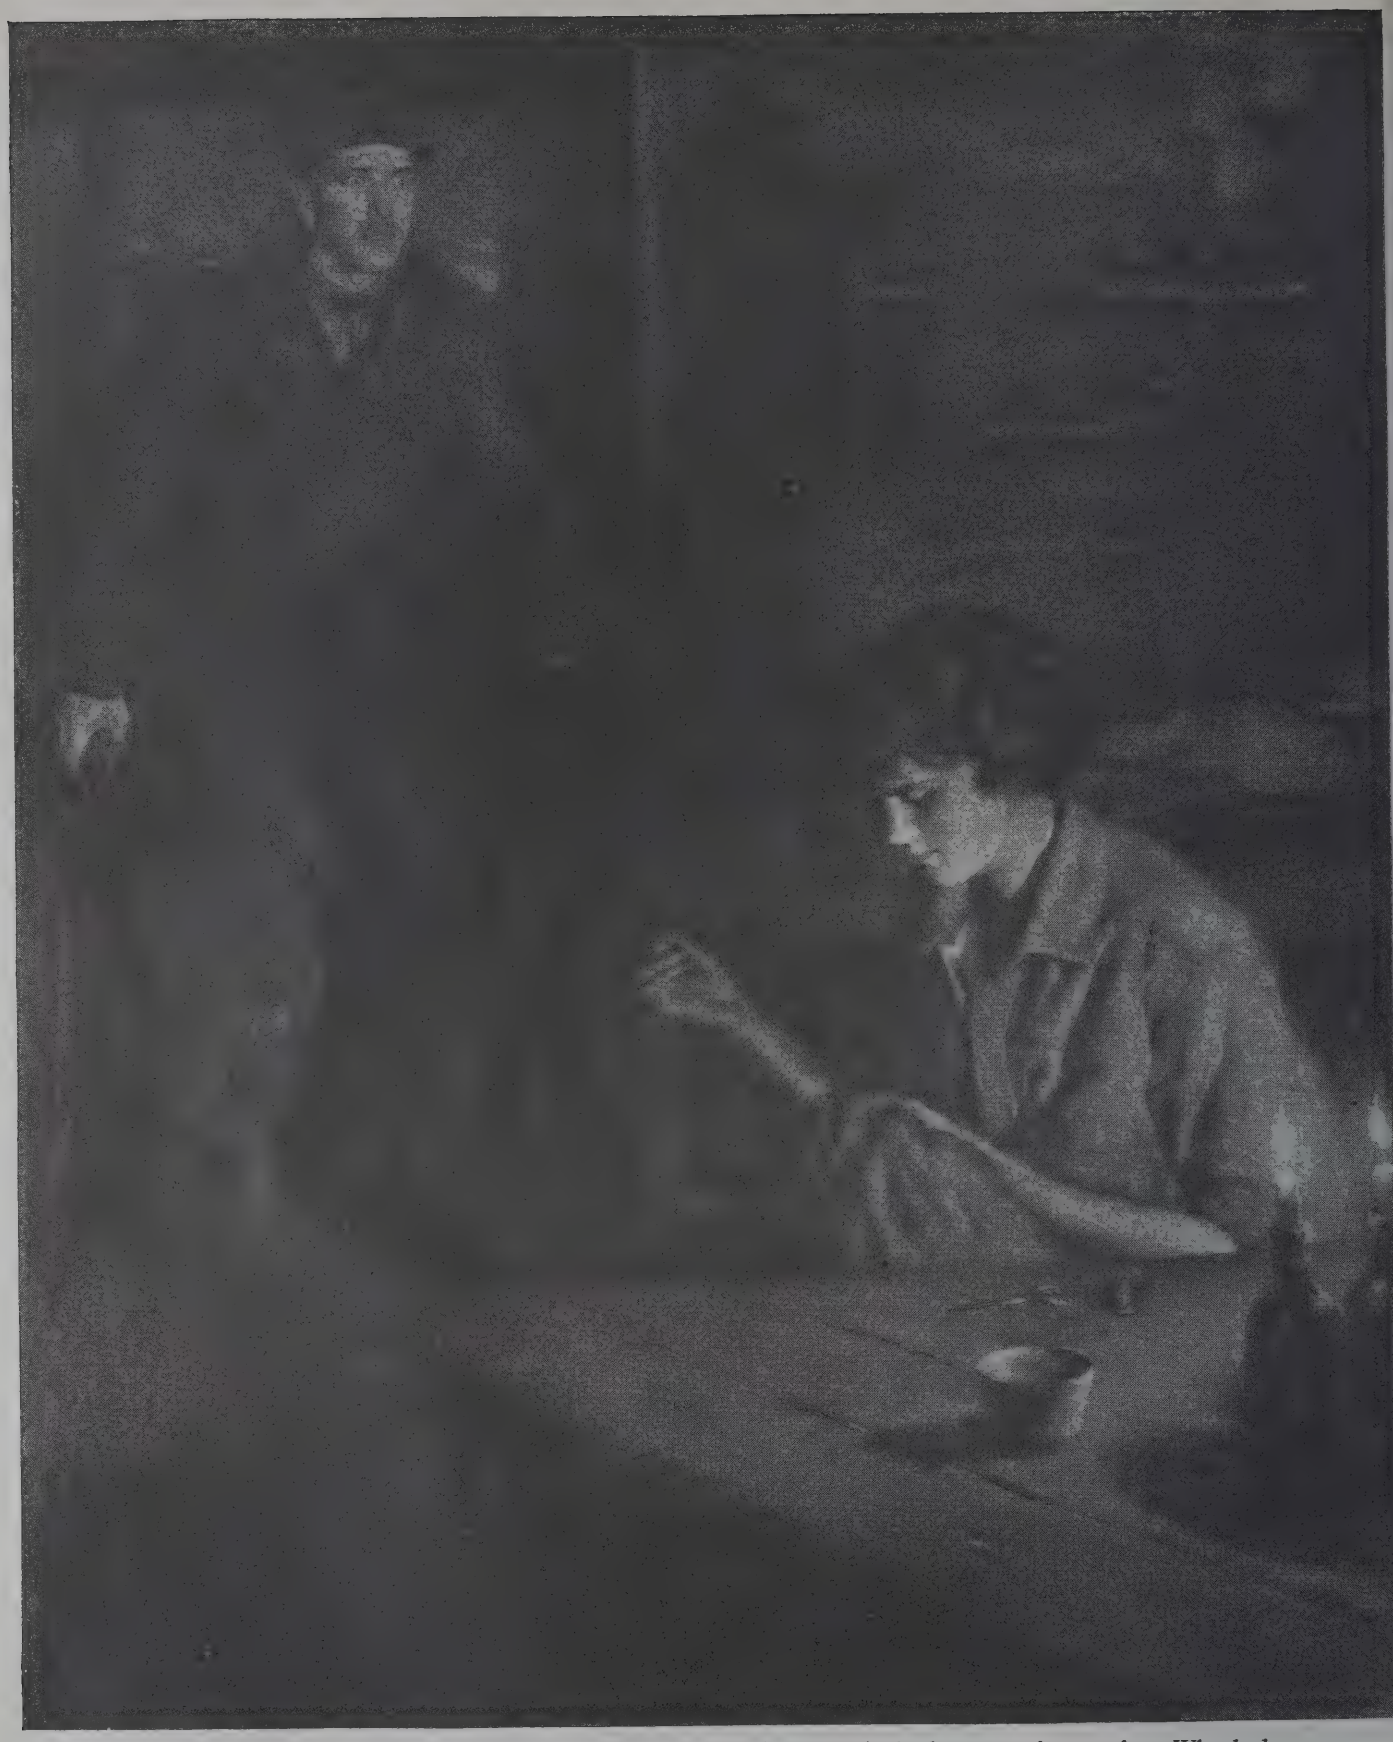
"You're a white man, aren't you?" she demanded, almost sharply, bewildered by the stolidity of his prolonged stare.

He ignored both her question and the ironic barb in it. "How'd you get here?" he asked. His voice was heavy, and a faint dewing of embarrassment moistened his weathered forehead.

The woman, taking her own turn at ignoring questions, scrutinized him with her level hazel eyes. She found it hard, apparently, to reconcile a clean shaven face with a manner so uncouth.

"I'm glad you're a white man," she finally acknowledged, with a sigh that was obviously forced. "I thought at first I was stumbling on an Indian or a mere breed."

Holgar nettled through the full length of his sinewy body. "I'm a white man," he none too graciously admitted.



"Then you can help me," she proclaimed. "For I rather fancy I'm lost."

"Where'd you come from?" he asked, inadequately, resenting her smile as she leaned with a show of patience on her rifle.

"From Coppermine Camp on Barren Creek. A black bear raided our grub shack and I wanted to shoot him. I got lost following his trail."

"You were foolish to try to," was his curt comment.

"I realized that," she continued in an achieved quietness of tone. "I realized that when I came out on what must have been another stream. I kept along that until I found a canoe and a cache of food up on a stage above high water. So I took it. I thought I was still on Barren Creek and that it would take me to Moose Crossing. But instead it took me into this river of yours and down some really awful rapids. And your chimney smoke was the first sign of life I've seen since yesterday morning."

Her smile as she stood watching him in the ensuing silence was both patient and cogitative. She endured his pointed inspection without flinching, apparently waiting for her appeal of body and face to produce some accustomed result. She was obviously not unused to the homage of men. But she could see no unbending on the part of the hostile big figure in the doorway.

"Barren Creek's one hundred and thirty miles from here as the crow flies," said Holgar, with no loss of his earlier gruffness.

"I had a seven mile current to help me along," she said with a short laugh.

"And you'll have it against you going back," he announced, "if you go by Wapiti River."

Her face sobered. "Will you take me back?"

Her question had the crispness of an ultimatum. And Holgar's answer was correspondingly crisp.

"No!" he told her.

"Why not?" she demanded, after a moment in which to digest her shock.

The question seemed to go unheard. "Are you a married woman?" he suddenly asked her.

"Yes," she said, coloring under his continued stare.

"Where's your husband?"

Adrienne Wheelock laughed. It was not a mirthful laugh. But it seemed to keep Reason on her throne.

"At the present moment, I rather fancy he's in a very comfortable office on the fourteenth floor of the Husonia Building on lower Broadway. That, I might further explain, is in a city known as New York."

Holgar's face remained impassive. "You're a long way off from him," he finally remarked.

"Much to my regret," added the woman, with the color now gone from her face.

"And I take it you're a camper?" he continued, with his eyes on the river below him.

"You can call me that if you wish," she retorted. "But just at present I'm a white woman lost in the open. And seeing you were a white man, I naturally looked to you for help."

His smoldering eye swung back to her. "It's not that I don't want to help you," he said with an odd gesture of helplessness, "but I can't."

"Why not?" she demanded, noticing that the color had again deepened on his heavy face.

"I—I don't think I could make you understand," he said, shifting uneasily in the narrow doorway.

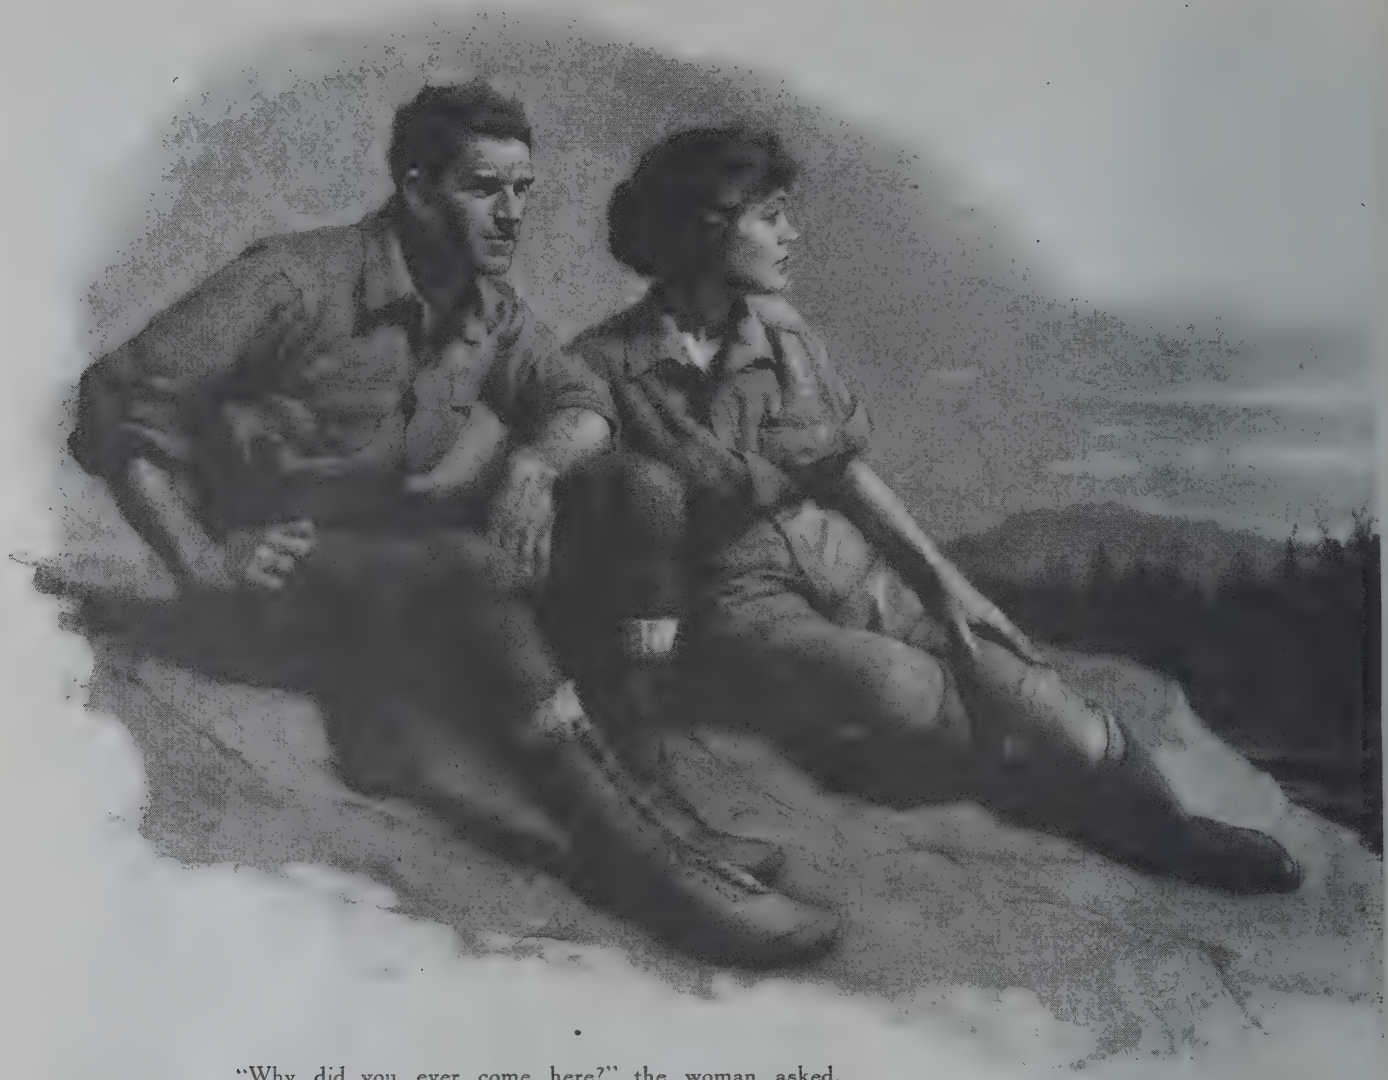
She turned away and stared at the intermittent silver of the winding and snake-like river. It was several moments before she was completely mistress of herself. She preferred that no betrayal of fear should escape her. When she spoke, accordingly, she did so in as matter-of-fact a tone as she could command.

"If I kept on down Wapiti River, where would it take me to?"

"Into three or four hundred miles of wilderness."

She turned at that speech, and once more stared into his unparticipating eyes. He was not unaware of the tragic intentness of that stare, nor was he oblivious of the contempt touched with hostility in which she was bathing him. He merely wiped his brow helplessly and waited for her to speak again.

But the woman did not speak again. Her face puckered oddly, not unlike a hurt child's, as her eyes rested on his motionless figure. Then she turned quickly away. She did so to hide from him a sudden and humiliating gush of tears, tears of exasperation and defeat shot through with hate. And she knew there was no use turning back.



Holgar watched her as she walked away. He stared after her, outwardly impassive but inwardly depressed, conscious for the first time of the isolation of the brown-clad figure in the hard northern light. He noticed that instead of taking the path to the river she was stumbling half blindly along the narrow trail that led into the filtered green shadows of the pine woods. He was vaguely worried by her foolishness, for no woman, he knew, could travel overland through such a country. She'd find that out soon enough, after her first muskeg or two, and circle back to her canoe and the proper avenue for traffic in those unmapped northern forests. She carried a gun and there was game enough to keep even a greenhorn going. When the high water went down a little there'd be a Chippewan or two coming out with their furs. Or perhaps old Pecotte, the metis from Little Bear Creek, would happen along and pick her up.

Then Holgar looked after the vanishing woman with a still deeper frown on his heavy face. He had suddenly remembered about his bear trap. That trap was set near the lip of the first muskeg over the wooded hill to the northeast. And the woman had taken the trail leading toward that trap. He had placed it carefully nearly a week before. There was not one chance in ten that a woman could pass over that innocent looking trail without springing the trap. And once those heavy steel jaws had snapped shut on a woman's leg——

Holgar swallowed hard. He made a small animal-like sound of anxiety as he lunged out of the door. But he no longer hesitated. He ran after the woman, winding down the uneven trail with singularly light movements of the moccasined feet, calling out to her, now and then, as he ran. But she neither looked back nor answered him. He shouted louder, more Holgar carried her easily, but of the two his face was the more distorted.

"Why did you ever come here?" the woman asked.
"That's something I've never talked about," replied Holgar.

frenziedly, as she drew nearer the muskeg fringe. She must have heard him. But she ignored his calls.

He threw up his hands in an uncouth gesture of desperation as she strode forward into the dissembling narrow trail where the syrup was smeared on the saplings. His work had been well done—had been too well done. There was nothing to betray to the casual eye what lay immediately before her. He hoped forlornly that she might yet step aside into safety. But she surrendered to the deliberated deceit of the gradually narrowing brush channel he had made. Her abstracted eye sought out the line of least resistance. She went stubbornly forward, went forward into the small tideway where disaster lay crouched like a cougar to spring up at her.

Holgar knew he was too late. He shouted, without knowing he was shouting, at the sudden arrest of all movement in that slender body. At the same moment that he saw the small eruption of dust and leaves at her feet he noticed the odd backward movement of her torso, like that of a walker on ice seeking to recover a lost balance. He saw the rifle fall to the ground as she swayed there, with her arms grotesquely upflung. She did not scream out as he had expected. But after one more violent twist she fell forward on her face, where she floundered, floundered horribly, for a moment or two.

She lay quite still as he ran to her side, and he thought at first that she had fainted. But as he knelt, panting, and tugged at the iron jaws that bit into the leathered leg just below the knee, she opened her eyes and looked up at him. He noticed perplexity in them, and mute protest against pain which could not be accounted for. He kept saying "Oh, my God, my God!" over and over again, foolishly, as he strained and fought with the trap jaws.

"What is it?" he heard her ask weakly as he leaned back to regain his breath.

"It's a bear trap," he gasped, wincing as he gaped down at the toothed steel that still bit into the flattened oval of the leather covered leg. "You stepped into a set bear trap. It's got you here by the knee."

"Can't you take it away?" she implored thinly as she lay clasping and unclasping her fingers.

"Yes, I'll get it," he said with a shake of his head. If he had a heavy enough pole, he knew, he could insert it in the trap and pry back the spring. But there was no pole at hand, and he had no ax. He stopped short as he saw her rifle.

"I'll get you out," he proclaimed. She moaned as he moved her body a little so that he could set the base of the trap against the clog pole. Then he took her rifle and held the barrel end within a foot of the tempered steel spring.

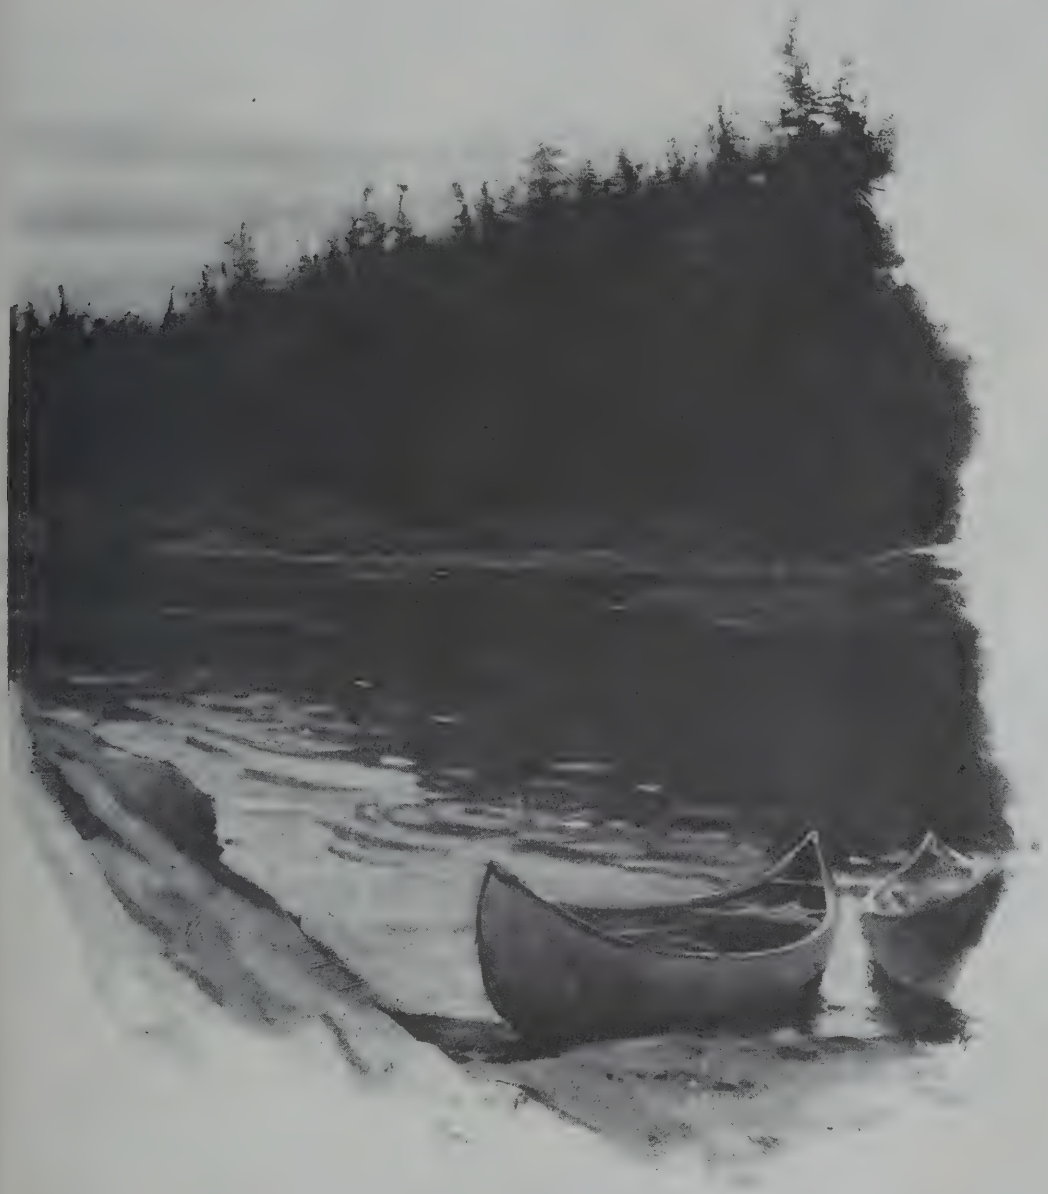
"What are you doing?" she called out in a voice flat with terror as her opening eyes saw him crouched close beside her with the balanced firearm.

"I'm going to break that spring with a bullet," he told her as he quickly studied his aim so that no ricochet of the ball might imperil her. "It'll hurt a little, the shock. But it'll get the trap loose."

He fired the next moment, and her sharp cry seemed an echo of the sound. The spring broke, as he expected, and he carefully lifted the relaxed iron jaws away. She moaned again as he turned her over on her back. The grayness of her face rather frightened him.

"Does your leg hurt?" he asked as he stood staring helplessly down at her.

"It's when you move me," she complained with her eyes closed.



He didn't altogether like the look of that leg. And he dreaded the thought of having to unlace the leather legging, of having to inspect bare flesh bruised and lacerated by one of his own traps.

"I guess I'll have to get you up to the house," he said after a full minute of silent self-conflict. She made no reply to that, so he circled about until he found a bit of hollow tree bole, which he split by striking against a pine trunk. Then he gathered moss and took the laces from his moccasins. With the moss he carefully padded the two curved bits of timber and tied them splint-wise along the helpless limb. She opened her eyes and met his gaze as he stooped over her, tying the last knot.

"I'll have to carry you," he said in a strained voice.

She said "All right," very feebly, and closed her eyes again.

He wiped his wet face with the sleeve of his flannel shirt. Then he took a deep breath and gathered her up in his arms.

He could carry her with no great effort, but of the two his face was the more distorted as he made his way up the narrow trail. A harried look came into his eyes as he edged in through the equally narrow cabin door with his burden. As he put her down on the bunk with the carefully spread gray blankets his face muscles were twitching spasmodically and a flat pallor had imposed itself upon the customary tan of his cheek.

He backed away from the bunk and slipped out through the open door, where he stood breathing in deep lungfuls of air, like a man taxed beyond his strength. He looked back at the shadowy cabin almost timorously as he heard the faint call of her voice. Then he drew himself together and stepped in through the door. The thing had to be faced, he knew, and it might as well be faced at once.

He crossed to the bunk, where the woman lay exactly as he had placed her.

"Could I have water?" she said quietly. "A drink of water?"

He brought her the water in his worn and battered tin dipper. But before she could drink he had to slip a hand under her body and lift her head and shoulders up from the bunk pillow. She groaned as she sank back on the pillow. And Holgar's trouble returned to him.

"I'm afraid we'll have to look at that leg," he said with a resolute setting of the jaw. But again he had to wipe his forehead as he spoke.

"It won't do any good," she said with weak listlessness.

"But it's hurting you, isn't it?" he compelled himself to ask.

She was silent for a moment and then she said "Yes," very quietly.

"You can't tell what's wrong under there," he ventured with a vague gesture toward the splint-covered knee.

She moved and gasped a little. "It—it seems to get worse," she admitted. He could see that she was biting her slightly indrawn under lip. To ease the tension that was leaving his face a trifle haggard he turned resolutely to making a fire and putting a kettle of water on the russet small range. Then he rolled up his sleeves and washed his hands. His jaw was set again as he took down his hunting knife and felt its edge. Then, breathing deep, he crossed over to the bunk.

"I'll have to cut some of this stuff away," he said as casually as he could. She did not speak, but he accepted her slightly perceptible hand movement as a sign of assent. So he untied the moccasin strings and removed the improvised splints. With his knife he cut the lace of the brown leather legging and carefully drew the latter away. He next took off the heavy tan walking shoe. Noticing her wince as he tried to unbutton the leg end of the knickerbockers, he took his knife and slit the khaki material up well past the knee. Then he carefully turned back the top of the ribbed woolen stocking, working it down inch by inch over the limp-hanging foot. She moaned once or twice, and he made his movements as slow and guarded as he could.

He was relieved, when the leg was bare, to find no blood there. He had stood foolishly in dread of blood. But he could see, a hand's breadth below the knee, where the flesh was dishearteningly swollen, discolored and darkened to almost a plum color in contrast to the whiteness of the skin below and above it.

He bent over it, breathing heavily as he explored the inflamed surface, explored it with cruelly inquisitive fingers until she once more cried out with the pain of it.

"This leg's broken," he said in a husky voice.

The only response from the woman was a repeated small movement of hopelessness. He continued to kneel there beside her for what seemed a very long time, with a look of hopelessness in his eyes. Then with a sound in his throat that was not definite speech he arose to his feet. He wrung out a towel made of hemmed bagging and placed it as a compress over the swollen flesh. Then with ax and knife he cut two splints of red cedar, shaping and hollowing out the soft wood until it conformed to the inert white limb which he could now study with less stricken eyes. For these splints he cut a lining of deerskin padded with an end torn from his Hudson Bay blanket. Then he filled his tin basin and lifted away the compress and gently bathed the helpless leg. It wasn't until she asked for water again that he spoke to her.

"This is going to hurt a little," he told her as he bent over.

"What are you doing to me?" she asked with her face to the wall.

"We've got to reduce that fracture," he explained.

"What's the use?" she half whispered, indifferently.

"It's got to be done," he told her, almost gruffly. And with that fortifying mood of gruffness still on him, he bent to the business at hand. He could see her fingers open and close and he could hear her vague sounds of distress. Then she screamed, sudden and shrill, as his thumbs closed on the swollen flesh and compelled the ragged bone ends into place. After that there was neither sound nor movement from her, and he concluded that she must have fainted.

But he kept grimly on at his task, padding the splints and adjusting them and lacing them firmly into place with long strips of buckskin. When he had finished, he took off her other legging and shoe and stocking. To get away the heavy leather coat, which gave him more difficulty, he finally had to rip open one shoulder seam from collar to sleeve, and then cut the stitching in the sleeve itself.

When he had decently covered her with one of his worn gray blankets, and mopped his own face dry, he got fresh water and sprinkled her forehead. She opened her eyes, studied him frowningly and then turned away her head. He concluded, after watching her for several minutes, that she had fallen asleep.

So he busied himself with the tasks still confronting him. He went for the broken bear trap and the rifle, standing the latter in the shack corner near the bunk head. He prepared a broth of doe meat and barley, in case his patient should want to eat later in the day. He washed and sun-dried two half-blankets and the least threadbare of his flannel shirts. Then he took his ax and cut timber for a shallow lean-to across his shack door. He roofed it with bark and fitted it with a movable couch of poplar poles mattressed with pine branches. This he intended for his sleeping quarters. For the woman, he knew, would be with him for many days . . .

When Holgar went to the bunk towards evening he found the woman awake but feverish. He offered her broth, which she refused. So he made her tea, the one panacea of the northern woodsman. She drank some of it, but her discomfort was more obvious than ever.

"Does your leg feel worse?" he asked, fighting against a vague spirit of helplessness which weighed him down.

"No," she said, with her face averted. "It's these clothes."

"I thought they'd be uncomfortable," he said in his expressionless flat voice. He went out, after a full minute of awkward silence, and brought back with him the fresh washed flannel shirt and blankets. He held them so that she could see them, but he did not speak. She studied them with opaque eyes, a line of pathos deepening about her lips, slightly puckered with pain and revolt. She studied them for several minutes. Then she slowly nodded her head.

He reached for the hunting knife. "I'm afraid I'll have to cut off most of those things," he said.

She closed her eyes as she said "All right," very feebly. So he knelt beside the bunk and began to cut away her clothing. He tried to do it carefully, but an indeterminate torpor of the brain seemed to leave him more thick fingered than he usually was.

When he had finished, he covered those different articles of apparel, still warm from the heat of her body, with a square of his precious bagging. He covered them and bundled them up and put them out of sight, as though they were something on which the eye ought not to rest. Then he went out in the open air and walked about with no sense of goal or direction, like a man confronted with problems that offered small promise of solution.

When he went back to the cabin, shadowed with the weariness of a fighter who had been through battle, he was only dully disturbed by her unexpected request that her rifle be placed in the bunk beside her. He did as she asked without speaking.

II

John Holgar, stretched out on his creaking pole bed placed guardingly across the cabin door, slept even less soundly that night than did the feverish woman on the bunk inside. Twice he muttered aloud out of his troubled dreams and once he found himself pacing, half asleep but sentinel-like, up and down the clearing in front of his cabin. Three times in all he got up and went to Adrienne Wheelock's side when she called to him. He was clumsy at helping her. But he stood thinly grateful for the semi-darkness that hung its relieving curtains about those ministrations, just as he found a shadow of solace in the depersonalizing veils of pain that still immersed, like a fog, the woman on the bunk.

For he was compelled to see, both that night and during the days that followed, the last wall of personal reservation laid low between them. That, he reminded himself, was something imposed upon them by destiny, was something they could not escape. The woman seemed the first to reach some final and forlorn citadel of composure, facing an unexpected situation as one faces unexpected surgery. She lapsed into a protective indifference.

When her fever abated and she could eat again she even emerged into a phantasmal sense of fortitude touched with superiority as she lay sleepily conscious of those solemn ministrations of his. She was much the more comfortable of the two. She watched him as he carried in stovewood from the neat pile along the cabin's side wall and brought fresh water from his upland spring. She watched him as he cooked and washed and swept the cabin with his broom of shaved hickory. There was even a momentary threat of laughter in her eyes when, on the first day that she could be propped up in her bunk, he carried over to her his ludicrous tin basin half filled with warm water, a small piece of hard soap, and a washcloth made from a sun-bleached square of burlap. She felt wordlessly grateful to him for his reticence as he took his ax from the corner and went off to the woods.

Adrienne Wheelock, in fact, was slowly compelled to revise her estimate of Holgar. She was amazed at his gentleness when he finally took off the splints to make sure that the bone had properly knitted, just as she lay perversely fortified by the showing of something almost akin to terror on his face as his unsteady fingers unlaced the straps of buckskin. But she was very grateful for his husky assurance that everything seemed to be going well and that her leg was as straight as a bow string. Neither of them quite knew, however, just how long splints should be kept over such a hurt. So rather than assume any risks he made a fresh and softer padding of rabbit skin and laced the grooved cedar slabs once more about her knee. She sighed with relief when she was able to lie down again. She was indeterminately sorry, as had happened more than once of late, when he took his trolling line and went off to the river.

When he came back two hours later she watched him with a less indolent eye. Life, with returning strength, was becoming to her less and less a thing of the casual moment. She let her gaze meet Holgar's as he bent over the bunk to see if she were awake or sleeping.

"How long do you suppose I'll have to be here?" she asked him, as casually as she could.

He pondered that question with a frown on his shy and solemn face. "That all depends on you," he finally asserted.

"I ought to be taken back," she ventured, conscious that life had once more become a thing of enormous complications. But she watched him covertly as she spoke.

He moved his head up and down, gloomily.

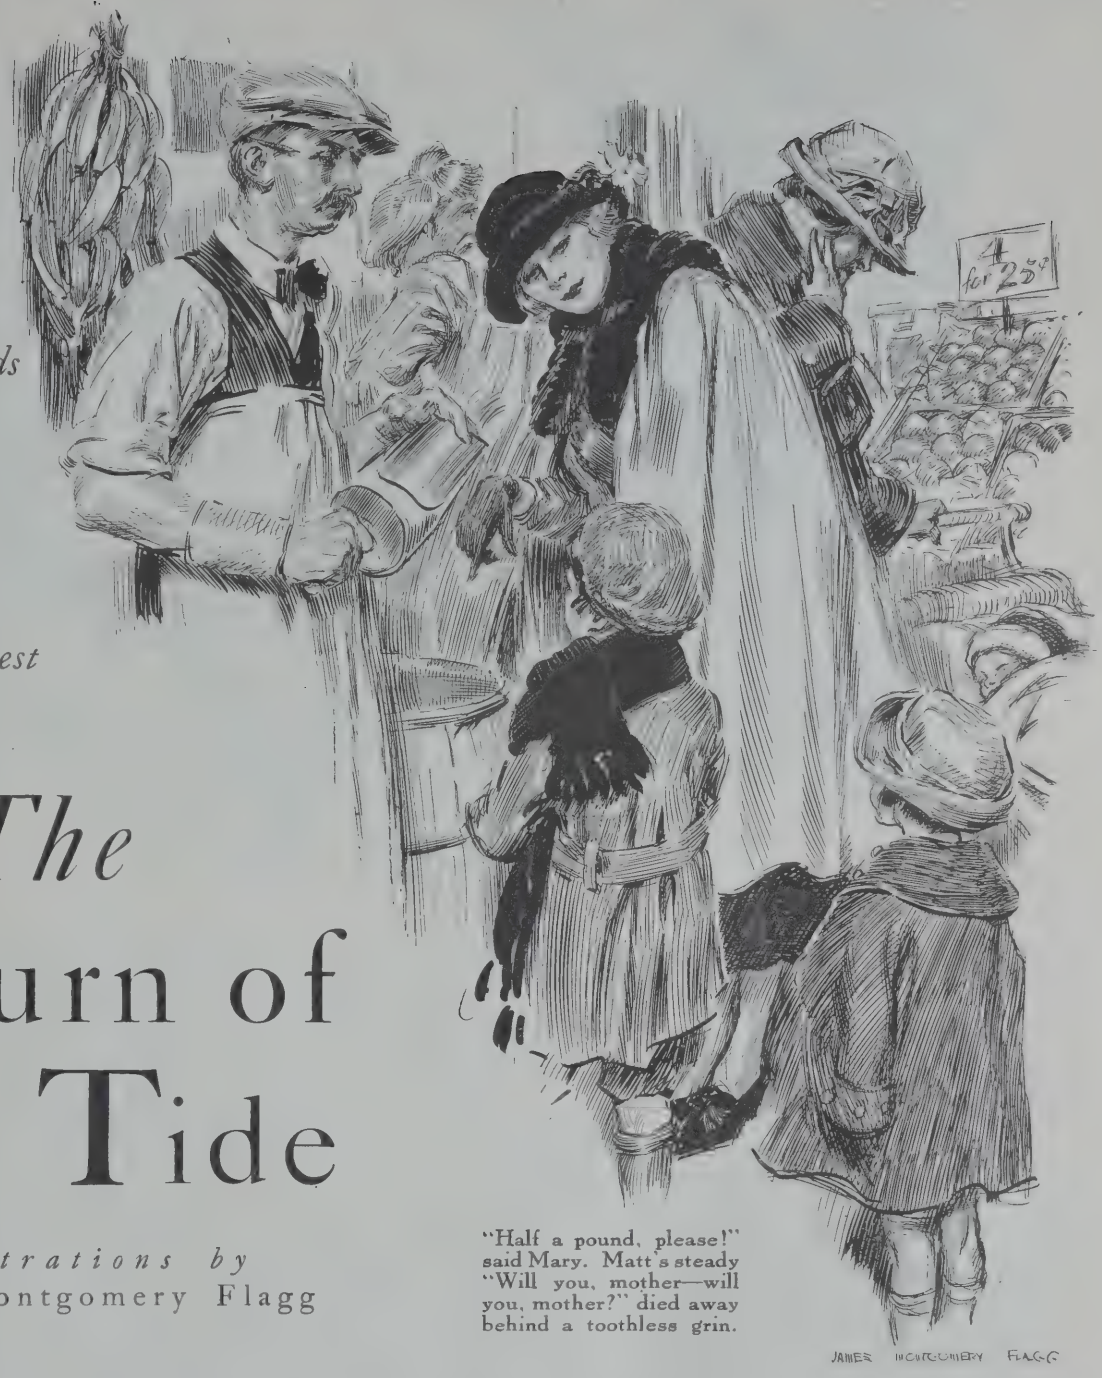
"I'd rather not take you back until you're able to walk," he told her. Then he added, apparently abashed by her intent stare: "It'll be pretty tough going."

She lay thinking this over. "When can I walk?" she asked out of the silence.

"That all depends on you," he repeated. "I don't think a thing like that ought to be hurried."

"I suppose they think I'm dead," she said as she stared up at the shack roof.

"There was no way of letting them know," he asserted. She wondered why his color deepened a trifle.



"I know," she quietly agreed. "But I hate to think of—of all the work and worry I've caused you."

"I'd certain things to pay up for," he said, almost roughly, as he busied himself at building a fire in the small russet stove.

She watched him as he brought in a pail of black bass. She saw him take one of the fish and with the end of his knife cut through the skin from the throat up to the shoulder, just behind the bony ridge that lies back of the gills. Then he ran his knife point along the top, on each side of the big back fin, from the neck to the tail. Then about two-thirds of the way down the fish's body he made two lateral cuts, (Continued on page 151)

ANNIE CALLAHAN CURLEY, bumping her young son Matt ahead of her with a guiding knee, clutching her four-year-old Helen firmly by a pulpy hand, pushing the perambulator that contained—along with the bread and the canned corn and the graham flour—the plump body of Frank Curley, seventeen months old, and managing, at one and the same time, to grip with firm, thin, worn fingers her flat pocketbook, encountered in Haley's Market none other than her sister, Mary Callahan Keane, a bride of four months.

It was a sweet, sharp, sunshiny morning in November; the little Curleys were well wrapped, and the tips of their microscopic noses were wet and red. Annie wore her thick old coat, and pretty, dainty Mary the smart homespun cape with the fur collar that had been a part of her trousseau. The market was full of glancing sunlight and clean color; the cash registers rang and clattered, and clerks dashed about busily.

Mary and Annie smiled in simple pleasure as they met. Mary's first little dainty housekeeping rooms were but three blocks from Annie's overrun little household, after all, and they saw each other almost daily. But it was pleasant to meet here, as Mary immediately said, grown-up, you know, and married, and buying things for their husbands to eat.

Mary plunged Helen unceremoniously into the foot of Baby Frank's coach with the freedom of familiar aunthood, and Helen squirmed herself somehow into comparative comfort upon the packages and cans.

"Hush up, Matt!" said Mary then, without heat, to the seven year old boy. "Here, what do you want, for the love of Pete!" she added to the child, as she opened her pretty, well filled purse. "Half a pound, please," she said imperiously to the salesman, indicating a great opened hogshead of mixed sweet crackers beside her.

Matt's steady "Will you, mother—will you, mother—will you, mother?" died away into silence behind a toothless grin as he began the attack with a pink-coated cocoanut confection, and Annie, after a perfunctory murmur of "What do you say, love?" settled herself happily, half supported against the counter, for a chat with Mary.

"Did you see ma today, Mary?" she began.

"I was just in there. She wanted me to send her some pork, for beans," Mary said, instantly portentous. "I think she looks terrible!" she added solemnly, blinking her suddenly misted eyes.

Annie's glance at once became grave, and she sighed.

"I think she looks terrible!" she said drearily. "Frank thinks she looks something terrible," she went on thoughtfully. "She's getting awful—old," she said, faintly stressing the last word to express something for which her vocabulary was inadequate.

"She's terribly lonely, maybe," Mary suggested, troubled and perplexed.

"Well, she has Marty," Annie answered in the same tone. "Don't give him the frosted ones," she added to Matt, wiping a pink smear from Frank's soft, shapeless mouth. "Give him that graham one. Take sister over there to those boxes, Matt, the way the baby won't see you eating them. I thought maybe I'd stop there—at ma's I mean—with the children, going home, and give them their lunch there," she finished mildly to Mary.

Now Mary, and her brother Jim's wife, Ida, in recent conference concerning ma's welfare, had decided that Annie was too easily inclined to walk in upon ma with her children and impose upon ma's hospitality for luncheon. It meant building a fire in the kitchen stove, and it meant an exhausting amount of cutting and buttering of bread and tying of bibs and wiping of little mouths. Of course ma adored it—there was that to be said for it; but ma was not so young as she once had been, and Ida and Mary, one a bride and the other the mother of but one small child, were apt to be a little hard in their judgment of Annie.

But Mary was haunted this morning by the thought of ma as she had just left her, moping solitary and quiet about the clean empty kitchen, and it occurred to her, brisk and radiant herself in bridal garments, and in the sweet winter sunshine, that Annie's tribe today might do actual good by lunching with "Gogga." Mary herself had her marketing to do, and then she and another young wife, a neighbor, were going into the big city to see a "fillum." The entertainment and shopping would consume four happy hours; the young women would wander giggling and with linked arms through the greatest shopping district of the whole world: up Sixth Avenue, across Thirty-fourth Street. They would debate at windows, follow passing costumes with critical eyes, discuss bobbed hair and the length of skirts. And they would reach home wearied and sated with the sheer joy and thrill of living, just in time to serve bridal dinners of chops, Saratoga potatoes and cream puffs from the bakery, to the enslaved Billy and Dan.

It was many years since Annie Curley had been free for any such idle, aimless enjoyment. And Mary, suddenly smitten by the thought, and of the chains that these three small, exacting children must be, and perhaps half consciously touched by the paleness and plainness of Annie's face, stamped already with the first shadow of a new responsibility, said affectionately:

"Do go in, Ann! Ma gets so lonely lately. I—I wish I could. But I sorta promised Loretta——"

"Oh, go on with Loretta while you can!" Annie said heartily, with a smile on her motherly face. "It won't be forever. How do you feel anyway, Mary?" she asked shrewdly.

Mary flushed and laughed, half resentful and half amused.

"Oh, for Heaven's sake, Annie! You and Ida are cautions. Every time you look at me you're sizing me up," she said impatiently. "This morning ma was having her coffee when I went in, and when I said I didn't want any—for I was just from my own breakfast—you'd die at the look she gave me. 'Does the smell of it make you sick, Mary?' she says. 'No, ma,' I says in a regular yell, 'I love it. The smell of coffee is a regular perfume to me. I'll tell you when there's any news,' I says, 'and until then I wish to goodness you and Annie would lay off me!' "

Annie laughed indulgently and deprecatingly as the trim and pretty Mary vigoro sly delivered her protest, with her pink cheeks growing pinker under her snug veil, and her square slim shoulders erect under the brown cape.

"I know," she said apologetically. "But there's no happiness like it, Mary," she reminded her sister as she settled Frank, made Helen comfortable and prepared to go upon her way.

"So I see," Mary said significantly and satirically. Annie only laughed again. She would not have given up one kiss on the damp back of young Frank's neck for all the shopping, for all the shows, in Christendom.

"But say, lissen, Annie," Mary said suddenly, just as they were about to part. This was the customary proceeding; they would now exchange, after their first farewells, the real news of the day, if news there were. "Lissen, Annie," said Mary. "Dan and I were talking about Christmas this morning. What are you and Frank planning to do?"

"I wish we could have you all, and Josie and John too," Annie said wistfully. "But I don't know how I could manage it——"

"You'd be crazy to try it!" Mary assured her heartily. "And I suppose poor Ida won't have a family dinner," she said thoughtfully. Ida, their brother's wife, had lost a little son not much more than a year ago, a tragedy that had plunged all the different branches of the family into bitter sorrow.

The Jim Callahans had Cecelia left, to be sure, and a lovely little girl she was. But for Jimmy, the adored one brother of the family, to lose his splendid little Francis—Francis, who was so precocious and so handsome and so generally adored—was a frightful blow to them all. Francis's mother had been rendered almost melancholy, and Ma Callahan had suddenly seemed to collapse into age and grief. For months the women of the family brooded upon all the horrors of the child's last hours, upon the funeral and the days preceding the funeral, when he lay so quiet and so beautiful in his white serge first Communion suit, looking, with his dropped long black lashes upon his rosy, handsome little face, like an angel already.

The months had brought some little comfort to Ida; she knew now that St. Valentine's Day would find another baby in her arms. She would go to Annie's cluttered, crowded flat and sit for hours with Annie's fat, healthy baby in her lap, and although down Ida's cheeks would pour the quiet tears that four year old Cecelia wiped away again and again, yet she grew quieter and the very weeping seemed to relieve her.

And then, in August, there was Mary's wedding, and all the excitement attendant upon the establishment of one more little home in the world, and Josie and John Concannon had come down from Albany, with their four year old Rose Agnes in her white coat with the beaver collar, and there had been much felicity and innocent mirth between them all.

But Jim Callahan never for an instant forgot his boy, and there was a certain new and weary droop to his big shoulders, and a pathetic, seeking look in his eyes in these days; and Ma Callahan grieved so for her grandson that her daughters sometimes told each other fearfully that "it'd be the death of her yet."

She liked best to sit in her kitchen, that clean and empty and quiet kitchen that had been the theater for so many young tragedies and comedies, so much eager young living, and talk of the past and especially of little Francis, with Annie or Kate Oliver or some other member of the family. If chance supplied a fresh listener, some quiet little neighborhood mother with awed eyes and with a baby tugging at her breast, then Mrs. Callahan would review the whole terrible thing from the beginning to end.

If only she had spoken to Ida when she did be noticing that little Frank looked as pale as a curd! she would lament. That was "the Tuesday," mind you, and they didn't have the doctor to him until "the Thursday" night. The hands on him was as cold as ice, but then he'd been out with all the Sodality boys, and sure she thought it was no more than that he was tired.

"Well, then, and on the Wednesday morning," the tale ran, "he stepped in on his way to school. And he had a great way with him, that he'd be getting out of you what he wanted, mind you, and him as grave as a bishop! 'Gogga,' he says, holding up the little bold face of him the way I could kiss him, and me hands in the dough——"

And Mrs. Callahan's tears would begin to fall fast, remembering the beaming little face that was so soon to vanish from among the other beloved faces. Annie and Mary came to dread those recitals.

Christmas had been terrible, and now there was another Christmas upon them, and it behooved Mary, the bride, and Ida, for the sake of her unborn child, and Annie, always a tower of strength and help, to make it as easy as possible, perhaps even happy, for ma and Jim. The Concannons might come down, and they would all be together; anyway, they must brace up, the sisters decided, and make the best of the situation.

"Ma's simply not fit to have all the excitement and fuss," Annie offered dubiously. "And Ida expecting, you couldn't ask it of her, it'd kill her!"

"No, but this is what I was thinking," Mary said. "Ida and Jim have got a spare room, and we have, too. Now if Josie and John came down to them, quietly, you know, and not exciting ma in the least, and then if I took Rose Agnes at our house—Dan'd love it, he's cracked about kids anyway—and then if we got a frozen pudding made at the Tea Shop—they're perfectly delicious——"

"Say, Mary, I think that would be wonderful!" Annie said radiantly. "I'll tell you what I can do. Frank's sure to win one of those twenty pound turkeys in the raffle at the club, he always does, and the Cottle works always give their married employees turkeys anyway, and I'll roast the two turkeys and bring them right over—Frank'll manage that! We won't say one word to ma——"

"Ida'll make the cram'bry," Mary added. "And vegetables are nothing—the canned ones are just as good if you leave them in a colander for two hours or more——"

"Well, hear the old housekeeper!" Annie laughed in fond pride. Mary flushed happily and consciously.

"Well, they are!" she said. "We could have a soup—the bean soup and the tomato mixed is simply grand. Loretta had it the other night—it was grand, really! And then the turkeys and fixings, and then dessert—that's oceans. I'll tell you what we'll do—we won't say one word to ma until Christmas Day itself; you ask her to your house and say it's going to be just your own family. And then, about eleven, we'll all walk in on her——"

"I'll give the children a late breakfast—or maybe Kate would keep them for me until about one," Annie interrupted enthusiastically. "Because we don't want any noise or racket. And then we'll clean them all up, and we'll all go, Ida and Cecelia and Jim, and John and Josie with Rose Agnes, and Frank and me with our three, and you and Dan. That'll be—that'll be twelve—thirteen, with ma. We can't sit down thirteen——"

She paused, and Mary frowned thoughtfully.

"Marty!" she remembered suddenly. The small derelict that Mrs. Callahan had adopted years before had been visiting Josie in Albany and had been delayed for weeks instead of the originally intended days, by measles. "He and Rose Agnes will be all over the measles by then," Mary announced in satisfaction, "and Josie will bring him down. Ma's always happier when she has Marty anyway. And she has lots of china, and scads of napkins—you and I'll just put her in a chair and keep everything serene, and Ida and Josie can heat things up, and then all the children will come in! And afterwards we'll just let her talk to Jim quietly, and we'll clean up every last spoon and send the children home and have a real good visit with her alone."

Annie was so excited and so pleased by this plan, and Mary so inspired to perfect it by fresh details, that but for the enraged impatience of young Matthew Curley to get home, and the sudden whimpering of little Frankie for his noontide baked potato and top milk, the sisters might easily have spent another hour or two hours in rapturous communion.

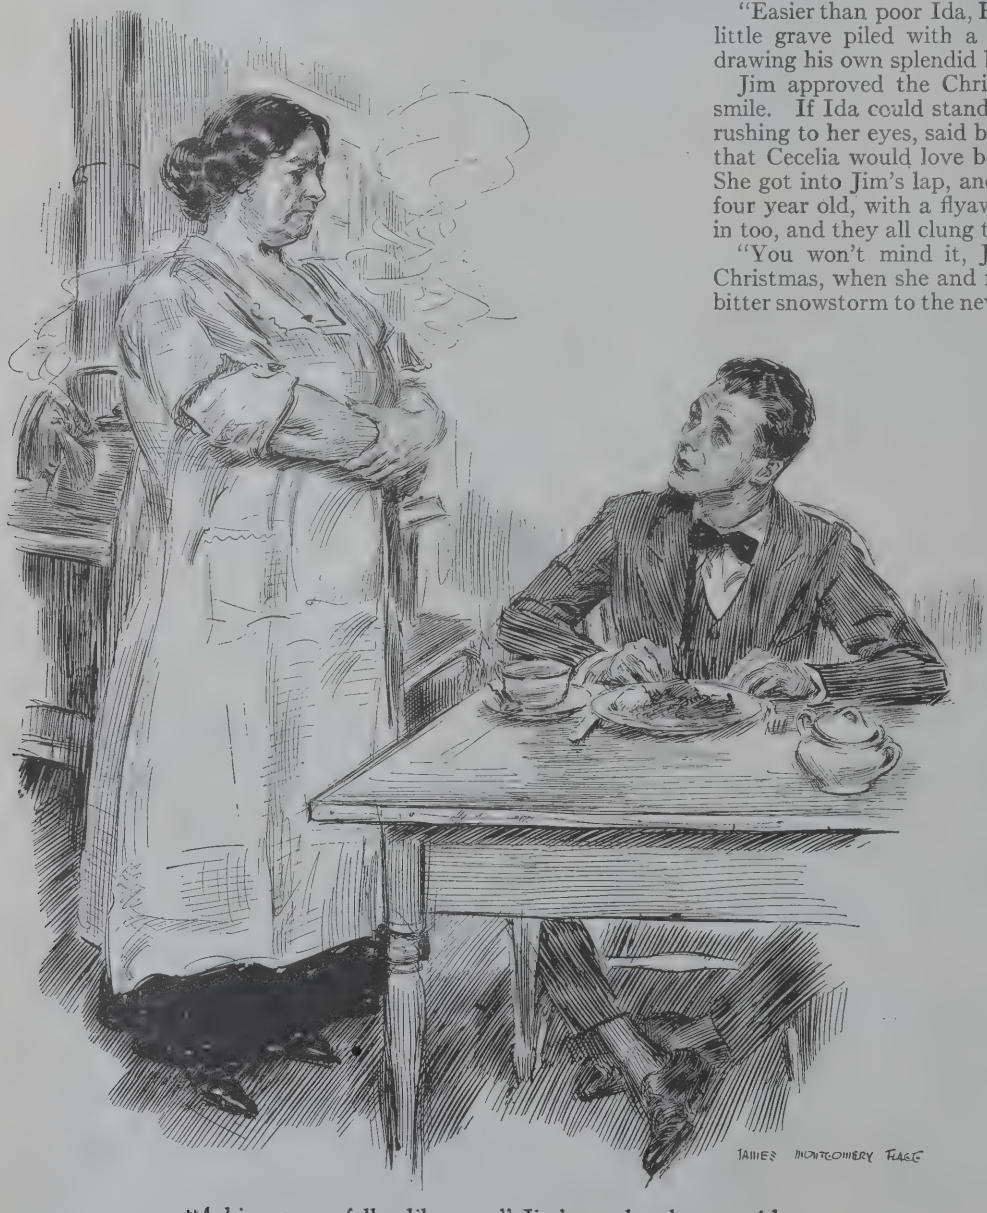
Of this loving little maneuver to give Ma Callahan all the joy of a Christmas reunion without the nervous anxiety and effort of arranging it, Frank, Dan and Jim approved, each in his separate individual way. Dan exultantly kissed his wife and said that he'd bet it was all her idea, and that she was a wonder.

Frank, with whom affairs at the Iron Works were not going well, and who was still worried about the bills from Annie's las illness, also kissed his wife, more soberly, and gave her the prou and tender smile she loved, and told her that nothing but bles ings could follow a daughter that was as good as she was. An mind you, if he didn't win a turkey this year—but all the fellow thought he had the luck of the Old Boy himself about it!—sh was to buy a big turkey and pay for it. The children were a well, God bless them, and the only thing now was that eighty two to Doc Webster, and they'd squeeze that out very eas without scrimping on the Christmas turkey, said Frank.

Annie's whole soul went out to him in a wave of love an gratitude. They had just been bringing themselves to face, i the last few days, the probability of the coming of a fifth chil Annie had lost one baby before birth, but there were three hungry dirty, wet, exacting, restless, wakeful little Curleys in the si room apartment now, and Frank had money worries, and the cos of everything necessary to safe and comfortable living was wha he called "crool." Only he and Annie knew what it all meant the utter madness of fatigue and worry and work, the mountai of tiny cares that crushed all the sweetness out of living for while. Sleepless nights, stumbling errands about the darkene rooms in the chill of midnight, sour bottles, washtubs piled hig with dirty, worn, buttonless little garments, and always th whining, crying, fretful little voices—Annie knew every deta of it. And yet she had said to Frank two or three nights ago "Let's let the first thing we say of him be 'God bless him!' Frank. And she kissed her husband now, when his patient goodnes could go on beyond her and the children and extend to ma, wit a rush of love and confidence that no hardship and struggle coul do anything but deepen.

"Easier than poor Ida, Frank!" she said, thinking of Francis' little grave piled with a second winter's snows. And Frank drawing his own splendid boy toward him, reverently nodded.

Jim approved the Christmas plan with his new, sad, quie smile. If Ida could stand it, he said questioningly. Ida, tear rushing to her eyes, said bravely yes, that she would like it, an that Cecelia would love being with Gogga and all the children She got into Jim's lap, and Cecelia, the exquisite and blue-eye four year old, with a flyaway mop of pure gold hair, clambere in too, and they all clung together.



"You won't mind it, Jim?" Ida pleaded, remembering las Christmas, when she and ma and Jim had all battled through bitter snowstorm to the new little grave in the Flushing cemetery and that ma had had a chill after i and that Annie and her young bab had come over to ma's, and ho they all had gotten to crying in th Christmas evening.

"No, my darling," he answere gravely, with a deep, patien sigh.

"It isn't like a regular famil Christmas," Ida said, "because w really have to think of your mothe Jim, and save her now. It's a going to be managed very quietly with no strain and no confusion and she'll not have any of th trouble or fuss at all. And nex Christmas, Jim dear," she went o timidly, "next Christmas will b happier, won't it, Jim? You wi feel happier, won't you, especiall if it's a little boy that God send us?"

"I think maybe another gi would be better—— I don't know it seems like a boy would put hi out of his place," Jim said, thickl but steadily. "I guess we'd lov the little feller—but he wouldn't b my Frank. Two years since w gave him his coaster——"

And he got up slowly, placin her and Cecelia gently in the cha he left, and went heavily into th kitchen, like an old man, and sh heard the outer door shut. Ida burying her wet face in Cecelia' mop, wept her heart out. If onl —if only—there didn't ever hav to be a Christmas again!

"A big, strong feller like you," Jim's mother began witheringly, "stravaging the streets on Christmas day, like a Turk."

Ida remembered last Christmas and the new little grave. If only there didn't ever have to be a Christmas again!

Launched in a whirl of enthusiasm, the conspiracy for ma's happiness was destined to encounter disheartening squalls. The chief of these was the attitude of ma herself to the once welcome holiday season. She appeared to be totally indifferent to all talk of Christmas trees, presents, family reunion. Discouraged but not daunted, Annie duly asked ma to have a quiet Christmas dinner with Frank and herself and the children. Ma accepted lifelessly; poor Ida and Jim would be going to the graveyard, she opined.

"Maybe Josie and John'll be down, and bring Marty home," Mary hinted one day, really alarmed at her mother's apathy. Marty, Mrs. Callahan's adopted child, was the very apple of her eye.

"I hope they won't, then," her mother answered despondently and firmly. "Why they'd bring the poor child down to a forlorn old woman like me when he's safe and happy with them, the dear knows! I'll come over and have a bite of dinner with Annie, but I hope the none of you'll go to any fuss with turkey and ice cream!"

"Ah, please do try to cheer up for Christmas, dear!" Mary pleaded.

"I don't know why I would," her mother faltered, with watering eyes. And she froze their hearts within them by adding, in an undertone: "Maybe I'm tired. Maybe it's that I'm getting to the end of me road!"

Josie raised other objections almost as depressing. Josie was the middle daughter, most prosperously married to a physician in Albany, and with a beautiful home and a motor car and a general promise of rising to social heights that would have paralyzed her own Irish grandfather with sheer terror.

She wrote that although she and John had not seen ma for six months, they were sure that the big family party at home would be too much for her. She was failing; there was no question about it. And that raft of children and all the chatter and excitement might kill her.

Now why wouldn't it be better to give the children a nice early supper, say at four o'clock on Christmas Day, and then all go into New York and have a fine restaurant dinner, with John and herself as hosts? John thought that would be the only sensible thing to do, and then he and she could take the ten o'clock train back to Albany, and the others go home when they pleased.

Mary, Ida and Annie raged when they had this letter. Josie had been suspected of a certain airy sense of superiority more than once; now they were sure that she was completely spoiled. Egged on by the others, Annie wrote her a firmly reproachful letter, assuring Ida and Mary that if Jo wanted to get her feelings hurt, why they simply would have to be hurt, that was all.

But Jo replied meekly and submissively, as it happened, and so re-established herself in their hearts. Her letter, three days before Christmas, brought comfort and courage to them all. She would come, of course, and bring Rose Agnes and Marty, and they'd all go in upon ma at noon on Christmas Day and help cook dinner and have a perfectly gorgeous time.

By this time a threatened change in the management of the Iron Works was, however, unduly worrying Frank Curley, and Annie was sure that her suspicions as to her own condition were justified, and Jim had pleaded off from attending the Christmas party; he'd be all right, he said, he'd just take a long walk. Ida, who knew where the long walk would lead him, cried herself asleep, on the eve of Christmas Eve, with disappointment, and Annie felt ready to die with utter discouragement and heartache.

But Christmas Eve came in with a whirling, glorious snowstorm, and in the cold, sunless morning Josie, looking stunning in her furs, and her big John and little dancing Marty and Rose Agnes all arrived, with a carload of packages and a thousand cold and laughing kisses. Annie's kitchen became a riot of voices and shouts; Ida and Cecelia came over, and after work that afternoon Jim stopped in and kissed his sister and talked to blue-eyed little Rose Agnes in his kind, sorrowful voice. And ma never dreamed—ma hadn't the slightest notion—ma was as innocent as an angel, they told each other exultingly, over and over.

"And she told me yesterday," Mary said, "that she thought she'd never let another Christmas go by again without making an effort. She said she wished she'd asked Jo to send Marty down. She said she didn't think she'd live to see another Christmas——"

Stories That Have Made Me LAUGH

SOME of the members of the Bohemian Club of San Francisco went on a hunting trip in the Oregon Mountains and carried no cook with the outfit. Every second day they played a round of poker hands face up, and the member of the party with the lowest hand was designated as cook for the next two days, with the proviso, however, that if any other member of the camp during that period complained about the cooking, the cook should be relieved of his job and the kicker made to perform it for him.

The first person to be stuck with the cooking was a prominent San Francisco attorney. He had never so much as boiled a potato before, and the meal which he turned out for his fellow campers on their first night in camp was so unutterably bad that hardly anybody could touch it.

"This is the damndest stuff I ever ate," one of the victims said in an absent moment. And then he remembered the penalty.

"But I like it," he added hastily and emphatically.

FROM where I am writing this, the Mexican town of Tia Juana is twelve miles by a good concrete road. There are no formalities at the border, and across it the Volstead Act loses its entire force and effect. Every evening there is a steady stream of automobiles from the City of San Diego, and once past the Mexican Custom House the thirsty tourist hastens to the nearest bar. They are all well stocked with the usual Scotch and rye, and while the bulk of the tourist trade is confined to these two staples, some of the more venturesome have recourse to an odd shaped bottle containing a colorless liquid. It is called Tequila and four glasses of it will induce all the symptoms of cerebrospinal meningitis complicated with leprosy.

A friend of mine took just one small pony of it the other day.

"How was it?" I asked.

"It was like a torchlight procession going down your throat," he replied, "broken up by the police with nightsticks."

YOU will remember that many years ago Weber and Fields defined an optimist as a doctor who cures the eyes and a pessimist as a doctor who cures the feet. Since then, there have been many concrete examples of the term pessimist.

"A pessimist," said Professor Brander Matthews, "is a person who of two evils chooses both."

General Joseph Pendleton of the U. S. Marines said the other evening that his idea of a pessimist was a man who wore suspenders with a belt. Mr. Charles Holzwasser, a San Diego dry goods merchant, was present and he remarked that out of his experience, the best definition of a pessimist was a man who had once done business with an optimist.

All this leads up to the Scot's story of the pessimistic Sunday school scholar who was plucked in his examinations for his first communion. The minister had asked him how many commandments there were and he had replied that there were perhaps a hundred. After he had left the room he was accosted by a fellow candidate.

"How did you make out?" he was asked.

"Lad," he replied, "ye'll never get through."

"Why not?" his friend asked.

"Well, for instance, if he asks ye how many commandments there are, what will ye say?" he inquired.

"Why, I'll say ten, of course," the friend replied.

"Ten!" he exclaimed. "Try him with ten, will ye? Why, I tried him with a hundred and he wasn't satisfied."

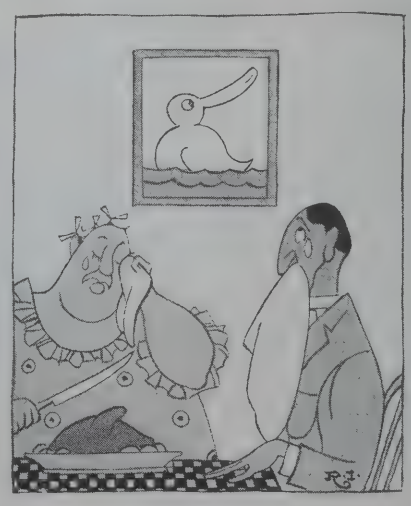
THE late John M. Scribner, a prominent member of the New York bar, was as bald as a bat and then some. He was speaking to Mr. Joseph H. Choate about the approaching marriage of one of the Vanderbilts to a foreign nobleman.

"It would be absurd to give a Vanderbilt a costly gift," he said. "I should like to find something not intrinsically valuable, but interesting because it is rare."



"Nothing easier, John," Mr. Choate said. "Just send her a lock of your hair."

DURING the Siege of Paris in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, food became so scarce that any creature which walked upon four feet was sooner or later made into a ragout. Most of us can remember the story about the concierge and his wife who being too poor to buy a slice of elephant or a sirloin steak of some passé Old Dobbin, were reduced to making a meal of Fido, their Pomeranian terrier. His grief-stricken mistress served him up with a sauce poivrade, and when at last she watered her empty plate with her tears, nothing remained of the faithful hound but his inarticulated skeleton.

"Poor Fido!" she sobbed. "How he would have enjoyed these bones."

And this brings us to the modern, up-to-date version of the same story. It was told me by Peewit, the celebrated French clown, who is now a neighbor of mine in California.

A vaudeville team had an act of trained ducks, with which they toured the vaudeville circuit for a number of years. Last season proved rather disastrous for them and they were laid off for several weeks. At length they received a telegram from a vaudeville agent in New York reading as follows:

SELVINIS TRAINED DUCKS ROCKVILLE CENTRE L I HAVE ENGAGEMENT TO OPEN NEW HAVEN NEXT WEEK

He received the following wire in reply:

IMPOSSIBLE TO ACCEPT HAVE EATEN THE ACT

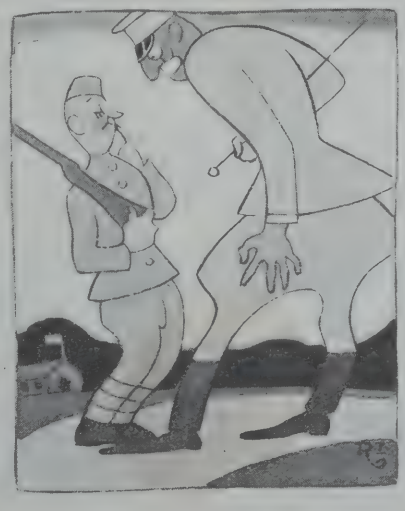
AN ITINERANT evangelist was making his way through the Cajon Pass in the days before Prohibition when he came to a settlement called Dos Robles. It consisted of a saloon and one adobe cabin, both belonging to a character known as Mojave Joe Green.

Mojave Joe was married to a Mexican woman and kept a few goats for what he was pleased to tell his patrons was his domestic supply of milk. None of it ever found its way, however, into coffee or tea. He used it with a little sugar, a little grated lemon peel and four fingers of Santa Cruz rum.

On the day when the evangelist passed that way, Joe had just mixed himself a large glass of his domestic supply and it reposed on the bar untasted as the evangelist entered.

"Friend," the evangelist said, "I'm on my way to San Bernardino. I'm tired and thirsty and I'll pay you a short bit for that there glass of milk yonder."

"Parson," Mojave Joe said, "any member of the Bible trade can't pay no short bit for a glass of milk in this shebeen. Drink it and welcome."



The evangelist thanked Joe and immediately drank the milk. He swallowed it slowly but continuously, and it was almost a minute before he banged the empty glass down on the bar. He wiped his mouth with the cuff of his dusty sleeve.

"Lord! What a cow!" he exclaimed fervently.

THE Calcutta manager of an American electrical supply company gave his Baboo cashier a raise in salary and the following day received from him a letter in which among other things the Baboo wrote:

> You have been a good samarian in presenting me the rise two rupees eight annas per week and for this kindness may Almighty God give you tit for tat.

MY FRIEND Peter B. Kyne has been, in addition to a talented author, a good soldier and served with distinction through two Filipino campaigns as well as the World War, in which he was a captain of field artillery. He says that when he was at Camp Kearney an old regular army captain discovered a newly drafted private in a pup tent wearing a pink silk bathrobe. The outraged officer immediately ordered the offending bathrobe to be destroyed and told its wearer just what he thought of him in language selected from a vocabulary which was particularly rich in terms appropriate to such an occasion—even for an old regular army captain's vocabulary.

The following day the old captain encountered the same private doing sentry duty and was further outraged by not receiving the customary salute.

"Hey, you blank, blank, blankety blank!" the captain roared. "What d'ye mean by not saluting your captain?"

The recruit smiled bashfully.

"Why, captain," he said, "I didn't salute you because I thought you were still mad at me."

DANIEL D. DOUGHERTY was the proprietor of a hardware store in a Middle Western town, and had worked up a good business in spite of the fact that he wasn't much of a hand with a pen.

Whenever he signed a check, he was obliged to take off his coat so as to give his arms scope for tackling the three flourishing capital D's.

Nevertheless, although he had the utmost difficulty not only in writing letters but in reading them himself after he had written them, he was quite sensitive about his lack of education. He believed that people professed out of sheer perversity not to be able to make out his written orders, and hence the following story about a salesman for a wholesale hardware house of which Mr. Dougherty was an old and valued customer.

The salesman had called around the first of the month as usual, prepared to book Mr. Dougherty's order, but Mr. Dougherty told him that because of a luncheon engagement he had written down the items of his order to save his own and the salesman's time, and handed the salesman a sheet of paper which contained hieroglyphics as cryptic as any on the Egyptian obelisk in Central Park.

The salesman thanked him profusely and went immediately to the hotel, where for the rest of the forenoon he tried in vain to decipher Mr. Dougherty's handwriting. At last he gave it up and went downstairs to the clerk.

"You hotel clerks have to read all kinds of writing," he said. "Be a good fellow and translate this for me." He handed the clerk the cryptic scrawl.

The clerk puzzled over it for more than half an hour and at last gave it up.

"You've got me," he confessed finally, "but there's one man in this town who can read anything that was ever written by anybody."

The salesman looked relieved.

"Who's that?" he asked.

"He's Jake Gessner, the prescription man at the Remington Drug Store," the clerk said. "Take it over to him and he'll fix you up."

A few minutes later the salesman entered the drug store and handed Mr. Dougherty's order for hardware to Jake the prescription clerk.

"Can you make this out?" he asked.

"Why sure I can," Jake announced. "Give me just five minutes, that's all."

"Go to it," the salesman said, and Jake disappeared behind the prescription counter.

Five minutes afterward, he returned with an eight-ounce bottle in his hand.

It was corked and labeled and contained a dark brown fluid. He handed it to the salesman.

"That'll be one seventy-five," Jake said.

The Barber of Seville, Ill.

"There's a proper dumbbell!" says Nero to me in disgust. "I bet this bird thinks New Jersey is a sweater!"

Once again I got to prevent violence and to change the subject I file a inquiry about Nero's girl.

"If you think the young woman would object to you bein' a honest, respectable prizefighter," I says, "what does she say about you bein' a barber?"

A broad grin spreads itself across Nero's weird face, and if he ain't somethin' to frighten the kiddies I built Uncle Tom's cabin!

"She don't know I'm a barber," he says. "I told her I was in the movies."

"With that pan?" howls Riley, pointin' to Nero's face.

"I didn't say I was a star," explains Nero. "I says I was what they call a double. A daredevil which takes the place of the stars when they is stunts to be done like jumpin' off bridges, layin' in front of trains, fallin' out of areyoplanes and that kind of stuff."

"D'ye mean to tell me that every time you and this Jane sees a movie where somebody does a thriller, you tell her it ain't the hero doin' it at all, it's you?" says Riley in amazement.

"Sure!" nods Nero. "She don't know the difference."

"Then if she don't know the difference, why don't you tell her you're President Harding and make her think you mean somethin'?" says Riley.

Nero walks out on us.

But once I set my mind on a thing I'm two bulldogs when it comes to lettin' go. I had set my mind on makin' Nero a payin' proposition as a box fighter and I wasn't goin' to give him up without a struggle. I figure my next imitation will be to bear down on him through his girl. If I can show her the doubloons and fame they'll be in it for him if he turns leather pusher, I feel sure she'll give him his orders.

So whenever I see Nero I keep questionin' him about his lady love. It ain't hard to get him to talk about her, but it's hard to get him to stop. Her name is Colleen Rabinowitz and accordin' to Nero she's a disturbance of the first water. As beautiful as a kindly act, as clever as a Irishman's alibi, with more personal magnetism than magnet itself and packin' a voice which would make these opera singers sound like hucksters. She sings in a movie theater, Nero tells me, but what he don't tell me is how in the name of Kansas City a knockout such as he describes Colleen Rabinowitz to be ever come to fall for a male with this baby-frightenin' face of his. Still, stranger things has happened, as the gamester in the sanitorium remarks while watchin' the little pink camels flyin' gaily around the room.

Anyhow, I frame up a little theater party with the idea of meetin' Nero's charmer and findin' out what she thinks of her homely boy friend settin' sail for a title. I declare my bewitchin' bride in on matters, because she seems to get a lot of laughs out of these cave men of mine and what I have told her about Nero has made her hungry for more. So I get tickets for one of the Broadway frolics and tell Nero to bring along his young lady. So's to have things smack of a all-star cast, I also invite Rough House Riley and his Platonic friend, Venus D. Milo, of the Winter Garden. There's a party of six which would get attention anywheres!

Well, although the world's champion middleweight, his widely known manager, two of the most beautiful girls which ever plucked a eyebrow, and the Barber of Seville is members of this junket, the interest is in a person which ain't even there when we assemble for the night's pleasure. That's Colleen Rabinowitz, Nero's ace in the hole. Her failure to punch the clock at the time agreed upon has the ladies of the party champin' on the bit. They've heard nothin' else from the lovelorn Nero but what a eye-soother his entry is and naturally they're as anxious to see her as Columbus was to see Sandy Hook. As for me and Rough House Riley, well, we're less than a foot from death by curiosity.

Nero's as cool as your ice box should be.

Nero's uncomely face shows he's findin' out what worry is as the minutes flit past and Colleen Rabinowitz don't. Finally, after he has stared his watch out of countenance, a thought fights its way to the top of his ivory bean. Callin' our attention to the fact that his sweetie sings in a picture theater, he claims she must of got so many encores on this particular night that she simply couldn't get away. He thinks we should all go to this trap where she does her stuff and wait for her. So that's what we do.

We get to this movie house too late for the first half of the feature picture, "Married in Fun." The only thing which could of been more disappointin' than missin' the first half of this film would of been not missin' it. It was fearful and no mistake! But finally it comes to a well merited end, the lights go up and on the screen flashes this message to one and all:

"You May Be the World to Your Mother,
But You're an Awful Bust to Me."
Sung by Colleen Rabinowitz

They is quite a stir in the theater and a general scramble for the exits, but Nero Whiffletree swells all up like a mump. He looks around at us as proud as a new cop. Both the girls sits up a little straighter. I admit to a mild thrill and even Rough House Riley straightens his tie and smooths back his hair. The evenin's piece of resistance is about to appear.

A little this and that from the organ, and out on the stage steps Colleen Rabinowitz and bursts into song.

Hot bouillon!

Like one man all of us but Nero lets forth a gasp and sinks back in our seats, slapped for a row of East Indian tomato cans! This Colleen Rabinowitz is a tall, thin, red-headed comic, with a face about as plain and unexcitin' as the directions for makin' tea. Never again will she gaze upon her fortieth birthday and they's more angles to her than they is to horse racin'. If she can sing, I can make a seaplane!

Venus D. Milo is gigglin' softly, my wife just sits there petrified and Rough House Riley is busy composin' appropriate remarks to make to Nero after Colleen has had mercy and quit singin'. But Nero Whiffletree is drinkin' in every line of his young woman's song like it was liquid gold. In the midst of a note which is so cruel and unusual it sent half the customers scurryin' out into the great outdoors, Nero turns to my wife and sighs:

"Ain't she wonderful, no foolin'?"

Before the boss can answer, Rough House Riley takes the rostrum.

"If you and that snapper ever visits the zoo," he says, lookin' from Nero to Colleen, "they'll look on you as the find of the century and they wouldn't let you get away if you cried your eyes out!"

The next second Riley's busy tryin' to find out who kicked him in the ankle with a pointed toe. It was me. Apparently Nero didn't even hear Riley's nasty dig about him and his cutey, because he says nothin' at all.

Well, Colleen quits singin' and we all go round to meet her at the stage entrance. After introductions has flew back and forth like butterflies and Colleen Rabinowitz has showed no signs of bein' overcome with the honor of meetin' any or all of us

LOOK FOR THE RED AND WHITE LABEL

Big Leaguers, I remind the gatherin' that I got six ducats for the theater and it's gettin' late. The minute Colleen hears the name of the drama I have picked out she says she's already saw it and besides she don't feel like goin' to a theater, she wants to go to a cabaret. All her remarks is addressed to Nero Whiffletree and although I am the jobbie which has blowed fifty bucks for theater tickets, I could of been in Betelgeuse for all the attention she give me.

Fed up with Nero and Colleen, Rough House Riley and his patootie is showin' unmistakably signs of restlessness, but me and my chatelaine is gourmands for punishment and we led the way to a cabaret without further ado. I used my influence—a twenty dollar bill—with the head waiter and we get parked at a ringside table where we can see the revue and the dancers and act as a given point for everything else of interest to pass. Food flowed like water and what we drank is nobody's business.

In the next two hours I made two hundred attempts to get Colleen Rabinowitz in conversation long enough to sell her the idea of Nero becomin' a box fighter and I failed just two hundred times. The world's undisputed champion wry-faced male and the holder of the same title in the female division had conversation for nobody but each other. Questions asked 'em brung a short nod in return, when they give us a tumble at all. Every now and then they got up and danced, leavin' us flat without as much as a facsimile of a apology. They act like not only are they alone at our table, but they're alone in the wide wide world. I have saw couples which was partial to each other, but Nero and Colleen would of made Romeo and Juliet look like landlord and tenant. You couldn't of got Colleen and Nero apart with a injunction! All they needed to make anywheres Heaven was each other!

Two hours of this licks Rough House Riley and his girl and they complain bitterly, so we took the air. I couldn't even get a word in edgewise to Nero and Company to apologize for leavin' 'em.

Once we get outside, Rough House Riley lets off steam.

"Both them two sapolios looks like they just stepped out of somebody's nightmare," he says, "yet each thinks the other is the lamb's chop! Ain't that a scream?"

"I think it's delightful," says my wife, givin' Rough House a reprovin' stare. "There's something pathetically fascinating in the fact that two people as remarkably unattractive as they are should fall so desperately in love with each other. One of us should go back and apologize for leaving them."

"I'll bet they don't know we left," I says.

"Humph!" snorts Rough House, callin' a taxi for him and his lady friend. "They don't even know we was there!"

But yes they did. Or at least Nero did. The next afternoon the Barber of Seville saunters into Eddie McWagon's gym where Rough House Riley is workin' out for his comin' battle with Montreal Eddie Biff. Without no preliminaries, Nero walks over to Rough House and slaps him on the gleamin' white shoulder blades.

"You big stew!" snarls Nero. "What d'ye mean by tryin' to make my girl last night?"

Rough House Riley stops sparrin' and looks at Nero kind of dazed.

"Me try to make that—that comic valentine!" he gasps. "Why, you poor ——"

"Don't lie to me, you double-crossin' false alarm!" howls Nero. "She told me all about it. How you was incessantly makin' eyes at her and steppin' on her little foot under the table and tryin' to get her phone number. Well, when I get through with you, you'll leave pretty girls alone hereafter!"

Then the fun began.

Nero Whiffletree suddenly swung a glancin' right at Rough House Riley and my champ sits down hard on the floor. Well, Riley has been down before—but he gets up! If I had my way, I'd say that when Riley got up Nero proceeded to smack him for a mock turtle, but I might as well tell the truth. Rough House Riley went around Nero Whiffletree like a cooper around a barrel and when he got tired of cuffin' him he knocked him as stiff as your collar with a left to the jaw. So that was all settled.

I don't see Nero for another week and when I do he's full of surprises. First he says Colleen Rabinowitz has promised to wed him as soon as he can show her fifty thousand pistoles in the bank. Can you feature that? If I was a girl and I looked like Colleen Rabinowitz and somebody asked me to marry 'em, the only conditions I would make is that the party be white. But the lovesick barber don't seem to think that the fifty thousand ransom is a bit unreasonable.

"I'm through barberin' for the time bein'," he says. "You once made me a proposition to turn scrapper. Well, I have talked matters over with Colleen and she's willin' to have me take it up. She thinks I'm in the movies, you know, and she's willin' to have me do anything which will get me out of that game!"

"Why?" I says.

"Well," says this human cartoon, smirkin' and brushin' back his wire hair, "she's afraid some of them bathin' beauties might fall for me."

Three months later, "One-Punch Nero," née Nero Whiffletree, is ready to make his first start in a prize ring. Five months later he's ready to make his last! In two months, Nero started five times and lost an even five fights. In four of his battles he's knocked kickin' and in the fifth he quit like a dog. The poisonous right with which he flattened the famous Nitroglycerin Pico that day out in dear old Seville seems to of lost its power as a sleepin' potion and as a boxer Nero was a good barber. I never seen nobody like him and that's a fact. In the gym he was as ferocious as a wounded grizzly, but once he got in the ring he wouldn't harm a flea. He made the worst boloneys in the business look like champions once they got boxin' with him. After Nero's first five starts I couldn't of got him in a fight club around New York with a ticket.

In the meantime Nitroglycerin Pico has been goin' through the middleweight division like Sherman went through Georgia. He just don't seem able to lose a fight no matter how he tries. The results is that the sport writers begins clamorin' for Rough House Riley to give Nitro a chance at his title and I can't agree fast enough. I figure that anybody which Nero can stop with a punch the way he stopped Nitro will be a cinch for Rough House, which in turn had no trouble puttin' Nero to sleep.

The Rough House Riley–Nitroglycerin Pico middleweight championship battle was a scuffle which will be remembered to their dyin' day by them which was lucky enough to see it. They was as much action in it as they was in the Battle of Manila Bay and it was a much better fight to look at. Both could hit and both could take it and that's what they done to the queen's taste! Each made a half-dozen trips to the canvas durin' the first thirteen frames and then in the fourteenth round Nitro caught Riley comin' in with a short right hook to the button. When Riley opened his eyes the club house was dark and he was ex-middleweight champion.

The next mornin' they is nothin' in the world lower than the way I feel. My visible means of support has been slapped from under his title and the chances is it will be a oversize year before Nitroglycerin Pico will give Rough House Riley a crack at his brand new crown. Well, it was while readin' the mornin' paper accounts of the massacre that I get the big idea. In one paper it says that Nitroglycerin Pico, the new champion, has never been knocked out in his life. Immediately a picture of our old friend Nero Whiffletree sockin' Nitro for a goal pops into my fevered mind. He done it once, maybe he can do it again!

They is nothin' more attractive to me than the impossible. I'd much rather cross the ocean on roller skates than on a boat. Since I was pet of the nursery, tryin' to unscrew the unscrutable has been my hobby. Another thing, nearly every champ in the prize ring has had a guy which was his jinx. A guy which no matter if four thousand other scrappers could knock him out has always had somethin' on the champ. I figured that in this case Nero Whiffletree was Nitroglycerin Pico's jinx and no matter how many tomatoes could put Nero away, he was the new champion's master through that one punch kayo he slipped over on him in Seville. Nero may not be no world's champion, but he's champion of Nitroglycerin Pico, is the way I size matters up. At any rate, it's worth a try. With that fifty thousand bucks to accumulate for Colleen Rabinowitz, Nero thinks so too.

Rough House Riley, convalescin' from his wounds, tells me I'm cuckoo when I ask his aid in readyin' Nero for a brush with Riley's conqueror. Riley says Nero couldn't beat Pico or Pico's grandfather if they let Nero come in with a machine gun. The sport writers and the wise crackers around Times Square claims if they had my nerve they'd open up a shipyard in the middle of the Gobi Desert, and a fight between Nero and Pico will kill boxin' wherever it's staged because Pico will reduce Nero to kindlin'. I simply go on takin' the short end of four to one that Nero knocks Pico for a rubbish container.

The first tip-off I get that my hunch is correct is when Nitroglycerin Pico absolutely declines the pleasures of meetin' Nero Whiffletree in a ring. His manager claims it's because the bout wouldn't draw flies on the account nobody's ever heard of Nero but me and his parents.

Here's a health-insurance policy for you

Real Naptha! You can tell by the smell

Thousands who board use Fels-Naptha in their rooms for washing out lingerie, silk stockings, handkerchiefs and other small articles. Where hot water is not convenient, Fels-Naptha makes clothes clean with cool water, just the same.

The original and genuine naptha soap, in the red-and-green wrapper. Buy it in the convenient, ten-bar carton.

Fels-Naptha is a wonderfully efficient laundry soap. It washes clothes so completely clean there isn't the slightest attraction left for germs. Not mere cleanliness, but Fels-Naptha Cleanliness!

Those little dirt-patches where germs feed and breed may be invisible to the naked eye, but the real naptha in Fels-Naptha finds and flushes them out. Its work done, the naptha vanishes, leaving the clothes clean, sweet and sanitary.

Use Fels-Naptha for your finery, as well as for the heavier, dirtier pieces. Remember, it "washes everything washable; cleans everything cleanable." And the results are agreeably surprising!

Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. That's tapioca puddin' to me. I know one guy which has heard of Nero and his name is Nitroglycerin Pico! I'm now positive that Pico's more than afraid to step into the ring with the only baby which has ever knocked him cold. Old Si Cology has marked Pico for his own.

On one pretext and then another Nitro stalls out of the match till the sport writers begins to kid him for bein' faint hearted. A few columns of this done the trick and Nitroglycerin Pico signs to fight Nero Whiffletree twenty rounds for the world's middleweight championship.

I couldn't dare let Nero fight anybody else before he sunk his teeth in Nitro because I'm afraid some tramp will smack him stiff and ruin the championship fight. So I kept him strictly under cover till the night of the big muss. Between the kiddin' and the what not, the fight had been pretty well smoked up and when Nero climbed through the ropes to make his bid for the world's middleweight championship the crowd would make you think they was nobody from this side in France with Pershing but his horse. Pico is a six to one ringside favorite and me and Nero has got every nickel we own in the world bet that we make a pass!

I never in my life seen nobody as confident as Nero Whiffletree is that night, the biggest evenin' of his life. Ordinarily he was as nervous and pale before the bell as a guy bein' hung for the first time, but tonight he's as cool as your ice box should be. He waves and grins to the boys around the ringside till the sport writers swears I got him doped.

"The only time I ever took a punch at this parsnip, I laid him like a carpet," he says to me while I'm tyin' on his gloves. "I'll do it again tonight as sure as I'll leave this ring with fifty thousand bucks and a first mortgage on Colleen Rabinowitz."

I go over to the other corner and find a pale and tremblin' champ, starin' gloomily across the ring at the smilin' Nero. This is the first time he's saw the barber since that fatal day in Seville and you can't tell me that Nitro ain't thinkin' heavy of what happened when Nero socked him then. When the men comes to the middle of the ring for the referee's instructions, Nero grins happily right into Pico's face and Pico shudders and stares at his shoes. They shake hands and the crowd settles back to watch Nitro give Nero a boxin' lesson and then knock him dead. I commence prayin' and—the bell rings.

Nero shot across the ring like a bullet keepin' a date to where Nitro stands seemin'ly dazed and with a sickly grin on his pan.

Sock!

The barber's well oiled right starts back of his ankle and comes to rest on Pico's chin. The back somersault Pico done would of win him fame in a circus. It lost him his title here, though, because when he hit the floor it was for a indefinite stay.

Back in the dressin' room I pay off Nero his share of the purse and bets—a mere fifty-six thousand iron men. Colleen Rabinowitz, standin' hard by, grins slightly, takes the money and gets straight faced again.

"In a couple of months we'll fight a set-up and get thirty thousand more for our end," I begins. "Now——"

"Where d'ye get that we stuff?" butts in Nero. "You fight the set-up, I'm through with the ring! The only guy I can lick in the wide, wide world is Nitroglycerin Pico and they'll laugh him out of the game after what I done to him tonight. Another thing, Colleen is afraid if I stay in the ring I'll get my face all cut up and she don't want my looks spoiled, money or no!"

She don't want his looks spoiled. Say—you couldn't of spoiled that guy's looks if you combed his face with a broken bottle!

"Will you give Rough House Riley a chance at your title?" I says. "I made you what you are today and in doin' it I lost my champ."

"That's tough," says Nero. "Close the door from the outside!"

And him and Colleen goes into a clinch.

But six months later he did give Riley a chance and Riley wins back his title in two rounds. Today, Nero Whiffletree's got one of the biggest barber shops on Broadway and right next door Colleen's runnin' a beauty shop.

Be good!

In February COSMOPOLITAN comes an H. C. Witwer story you will not dare read aloud, or you will spoil it by laughing. It's called "Julius Sees Her."

The night before the trial, meditating in her little room trying to collect all her forces to meet the coming ordeal, she was broken in upon by the jailer's wife—a dot of a woman with a whispering voice and a will of iron, who ruled the jail and everyone in it.

"A lady wants to see you," she murmured, looking at Desmond with the fond eyes characteristic of childless women when they find someone they can love.

"But Mrs. Brade, you know I can't—unless it's Mrs. Hope?"

"It's not. She won't give her name and she's all veiled up but I think I can guess who it is."

Desmond stared.

"She grew up among us," whispered Mrs. Brade. "One of Rhodesia's lovely children! If only she had married Lundi Druro!"

Lypiatt's wife! Desmond grew very pale.

"I can't——" she said hoarsely.

"I think you ought to," urged Mrs. Brade. "The poor thing!"

Desmond walked to the window and gazed out at a row of euphorbia trees growing in the courtyard, inked grotesquely against the last glow of the evening sky. It was not that she feared reproaches; instead she was in terror that Gay might probe out the truth. Only one thought suddenly calmed her. Even if she did probe it out she too loved Druro and would be ready to help save him.

"Let her come in, Mrs. Brade." Presently there was the rustle of a dress, and the sound of a door softly closed, and Desmond and Gay were alone in the falling dusk.

"It was kind of you to see me!"

"Won't you sit down?" Desmond remained standing, back to the window. She did not want her face read. But Gay pushed back her cloudy veils and in the somber cell she gleamed with an alluring pearly beauty. No wonder Druro had been unable to forget her, thought Desmond. There was a spirituality about her that was like a promise of eternity. If a man could not gain Heaven of himself, with such a woman loving him he must get in somehow, surely, redeemed by her love and shielded by her wing!

Yet she had failed Lundi Druro! Not once, but twice.

Never could Desmond forgive that, and the memory steeled her heart and voice now:

"I cannot imagine what you can derive from this visit, Mrs. Lypiatt!"

"I want to beg your mercy," was the unexpected reply, murmured low.

"My—I don't understand."

There was a silence.

"It is about tomorrow." It was plain that she was in great agitation, and Desmond spoke now without irony.

"How can I be of use to you? Will you explain?"

Gay stammered at last:

"Are you going to tell that my husband knew you were a woman?"

"Certainly not. Never!" Desmond, taken by surprise, unfortunately gave the truth away; then, too late, tried to rectify the admission. "Besides, how could he know?"

But Gay only shook her head dolorously.

"That is good of you," she whispered. "But he did know and you know that he knew."

"I can't think what grounds you have for such a belief."

"He told me."

"O Lord!" said Desmond in a dismal boyish way very characteristic of her. "I never meant anyone to know that he . . ."

Gay watched her through bitter tears, humility and admiration in her glance.

"Don't you realize that if that fact is made clear it will get you off at once?"

"No, I don't," Desmond said obstinately. But they both knew the temper of Rhodesians and what their attitude was likely to be toward a man who knowingly attacked a woman and nearly throttled her. "Even if it would I shall never breathe it. Put your mind at rest on that point."

"How cruel and selfish you must think me—to ask it."

"Indeed I don't."

"But it is not for myself," continued Gay brokenly. "I would never ask it—never permit it, except for the sake of the child——"

"Oh!" The trembling exclamation

Is your skin exceptionally sensitive?

Is your skin especially hard to take care of?

Wind, dust, exposure: do they continually irritate and roughen it?

You can correct this extreme sensitiveness. By giving your skin the special treatment it needs, you can overcome its tendency to become painful, irritated, on the least occasion.

Use this special treatment for a very sensitive skin:

EACH night before retiring, dip a soft wash-cloth in warm water and hold it to your face. Then make a warm water lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and dip your cloth up and down in it until the cloth is "fluffy" with the soft white lather. Rub this lathered cloth gently over your skin until the pores are thoroughly cleansed. Then rinse, first with warm, then with clear cool water, and dry carefully.

Modern authorities have discarded the old idea that washing the face with soap was bad for a delicate skin. Skin specialists now agree that the layer of dirt and oil accumulated on the skin when soap is not used, is a constant invitation to various disorders.

Why the skin of your face is especially sensitive

It is a well known scientific fact that the nerves which control the blood supply are more sensitive in the skin of your face than elsewhere—and that consequently the skin of your face is more liable to disturbances.

For this reason the soap which you use daily on your face should be of the best quality obtainable.

Get a cake of Woodbury's today and begin now to give your skin the special care that will keep it normally resistant to dust and exposure; soft, smooth, and fine as you want it to be.

In the booklet around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap you will find special treatments for each different type of skin. The same qualities that give Woodbury's its beneficial effect in overcoming common skin troubles make it ideal for regular toilet use. A 25-cent cake lasts a month or six weeks.

Send 25 cents for these special Woodbury preparations

For 25 cents we will send you a miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations, containing samples of Woodbury's Facial Soap, Facial Cream, Cold Cream, and Facial Powder, with the treatment booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch."

broke from Desmond. This was tragedy worse than death! She did not know what to say, how to hide from the lovely desecrated creature what commiseration she felt for her. To bear a child of Constant Lypiatt's! Her mind cast wildly about for some oblation of pity to make.

"You have every right to hate me and to want to shield your husband's memory," she said at last. "And I can tell you one thing. It was my fault he attacked me. Woman or no woman, no man could have sat still under the cruel jibe with which I goaded him."

Gay's eyes looked at her, tragic but incredulous.

"I tell you that any man with blood in his veins would have done it. Why, it was you I attacked. I told him one had only to look into your eyes to see that you loved—someone else."

"Oh God!" breathed the other.

"Can you be surprised that he flung himself at me in a frenzy? Any man who loved his wife would have done it, and there is no doubt that he loved you—beyond all things!"

"What made you say it?" moaned Gay, her face pale as death.

"Just a woman's bitter tongue, I suppose," said Desmond lamely. She hadn't the heart to smite her with the whole truth. "I was hating him pretty badly."

"You have hated me pretty badly too? And despised me?"

"No," Desmond replied slowly. "Not exactly. But it has always been incomprehensible to me—why."

There was a long silence before she went on:

"You see . . . I met Lundi Druro one night in Paris—just at the time he was coming back to marry you. You were the star of his existence; the sun and moon of it. I don't believe any girl was ever so much loved. Such a noble passion, so pure in spite of its ardor, burning with such a clean flame. Men had loved me too, I was accustomed to monopolizing their attention, but he didn't even see me—except to talk to, about you. That's why he didn't remember me out here, recognize me I mean. His whole mind and heart and soul were filled by you. For you only he was alive."

Gay was shaking like a slim tree in a gale, but not weeping. Her eyes were dry and staring. Desmond went on, her voice somber, relentless. She was not thinking of the woman but of the man.

"I came out here a year later, disguised, as you know. I wanted to look upon this perfect marriage—to gaze like the beggar in hell upon the feast of happiness. The first thing I saw at Wankelo station was the broken down, hopeless wreck you had made of Lundi Druro."

She had not meant to say it, but the truth like long concealed fire had come flaring out.

Outside all was dark now. The last glow of day had gone and the moon had not risen. Even the euphorbias were hidden under night's somber shawl. In the room too all was dark. They could not see each other's faces, those two women, and they did not look at each other. Desmond stood staring out, pondering some words Gay had said behind her there in the dim room.

"I have never told anyone—but I will tell you now. My reason for not marrying Lundi Druro was because I wanted to save him and myself from the curse of drink."

Desmond had time to ponder that a long while before Gay's voice continued:

"You may have heard that my father and brother were drowned trying to cross the Shangani River? They were drunk; that was why they were drowned."

Another aching silence.

"Lundi was in England. I had much time alone in which to think. I recalled my mother's life until I was twelve, when she died—one long tragic struggle of nights and days with a foe that was stronger than herself. She fought the beast drink for the soul of my father, and she lost. Drink was too strong. Then my brother started before my mother died. I loved Derry—next to Lundi. He was clever, witty, gay. So chivalrous. So generous. It was only that one fault he had—and that, I think, not entirely his fault. He had inherited thirst without inheriting a will to control it. They drank like gentlemen and they were always delightful—but a little bit less so daily. Infinitesimally I saw them being destroyed before my eyes day by day. I was glad when they were drowned.

"In the loneliness that followed I made the terrible discovery that I too had the thirst. The curse was in me. You know the careless way people up here take 'sundowners' and 'pick-me-ups.' I had acquired the habit and thought nothing of it, but all the time drink had been putting its roots in, and I had to begin fighting against it day and night. I was determined to conquer it for Lundi's sake. But I found I could only conquer by keeping away from the sight and smell of the stuff. At last I realized that forever and ever I should have to put up the battle of spiritual resistance, of prayer and of absence from temptation, and for that reason I dared not marry Lundi. Even if he were strong enough to give it up we should always be in contact with it and I could not face the prospect. I thought of the children we might have—more victims to the long struggle. I could not face that."

Soft, sighing sobs fell in the darkness. Desmond did not stir or utter a word of the grief that was in her heart. She knew that nothing she could say or do would avail. Gay was one of "Sorrow's elect." She was good, she had done right by the light that was in her, but she must pay, pay to the end of her days for the sins of the fathers.

"I married Constant to protect Druro from my love and to help myself to face fate. He hated drink. That was his great appeal for me. I told him the truth and he was content to marry me even at that. But he could not forget, afterwards, that I had loved Druro, and we were never happy."

And that was the end of the story. A little while afterwards she went away. They parted with a handclasp in the darkness, never to meet again.

CHAPTER XVIII

ON THE first day of the Sessions, Wankelo simmered with excitement and was full of strange faces. But everyone seemed curiously reticent. Men looked at each other hard but said little. The subject of "young Desmond's" trial was in all minds, and one hope in each man's heart—that he would not be called to sit on the jury.

On the stroke of ten Derwent Henry Douglas, Solicitor-General for Rhodesia and conductor of cases for the Crown, stepped briskly from the Falcon. A popular man with a powerful job; but no one envied it that morning.

Inside the court the air was already breathless. A policeman resplendent in full uniform bawled forth:

"All arise in court!"

A door opened and Judge Vernon escorted by the sheriff stepped quickly to his seat, casting a shrewd but kindly glance about him. Men thought it propitious that the sessions should have fallen to Vernon. You could always be certain not only of fair play when he sat on the bench, but of a little milk and honey of human kindness too. Men suddenly remembered that the woman who was in all their thoughts had been one of the "youngsters" the Judge had liked to have near him at dinners and in the club. Desmond's gay repartee and exquisite cynicisms had always delighted him. It was not going to be any pleasanter for judge than for jury.

Abruptly looking up from his papers, he addressed the Solicitor-General: "What cases do you propose to take?"

Douglas rose and adjusted a pair of pince-nez before his shrewd blue eyes.

"The chief case is Crown versus Desmond," he said, and paused in the tense stillness. Feet ceased to shuffle. Not a whisper was heard. The judge glanced at his papers.

"I see that Desmond pleads not guilty," he remarked at last. "So it will probably occupy most of the day. In case it does we may as well arrange for the next two or three in rotation. Cite them, please."

The tense moment passed and men breathed naturally again.

The Solicitor-General busily recited his cases—all native.

"We will now take Crown versus Desmond," said the Judge. "Bring in the prisoner and proceed to call the jury."

A profound hush followed. The little courthouse, with sunlight and the scent of flowers streaming through the windows, did not look like a stage for tragedy, yet tragedy came stalking softly and laying its cold hand on every heart when two uniformed policemen entered ushering "young Desmond."

To everyone's relief she was wearing the clothes they knew so well—the loose tweed coat that gave her otherwise boyish shoulders a wide and burly effect, the rather bouffante riding breeches of khaki, and the tan topboots that no one ever dreamed hid a woman's slim foot. She had had to fight hard to appear in that familiar garb. O'Byrne, bitterly opposed to it, and computing the value of feminine graces suitably arrayed, had caused a beautiful simple gown to be sent from Cape Town. But Desmond would have none of it, realizing very well the danger that lay for her in women's garments—not of conviction but acquittal. If they saw her as a woman they would never believe she had killed Lypiatt. At best they might prefer to give her the benefit of the doubt. And she wanted neither doubt nor benefit. So she was just the same as usual, swinging along with careless but firm gait, hands thrust forward

Each night your skin needs a thorough cleansing. Always use the cream with just enough oil

The kind of cream for a thorough cleansing

No skin can be always lovely unless it is kept really clean.

To have skin with lovely transparency, softness and smoothness, you must give it a thorough cleansing every night.

Ordinary washing is not enough. It cannot reach the fine particles of dirt that bore deep into the pores. If this dirt is allowed to remain your skin becomes dull looking—it loses its lovely transparency. For a thorough cleansing your face needs a cream; and its choice is all important.

Only a cream made with oil can reach the deepest dirt. There must be just enough oil to remove every particle of dirt—not a drop more because creams with too much oil overload the pores and make the skin greasy. It must not be stiff because stiff creams are difficult to work in, and when once in the pores have a tendency to remain and stretch them. The cream that meets all the requirements for a thorough cleansing is Pond's Cold Cream.

Start using this cream tonight

Wash your face first. Then smooth in Pond's Cold Cream. In a minute it works its way deep into your pores and out again bringing every bit of dirt and powder with it. Wipe it off on a soft towel or bit of cloth. The grime will astonish you.

For daytime uses your skin needs another cream—a very different one—Pond's Vanishing Cream. It is perfect as a foundation for powder.

Both these creams are so delicate in texture they cannot clog the pores. Neither contains anything that can promote the growth of hair. The Pond's Extract Co., New York.

He who smokes last smokes best

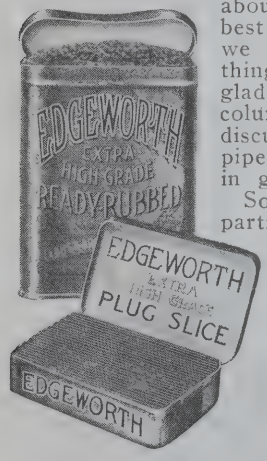
Wherein our correspondent takes a long shot at Zanesville, O.

When we printed a letter from a smoker who professed a preference for the early morning smoke, apparently we started something. Almost the next mail brought along a batch of letters, among which the following is a fair sample:

"Dear Sirs:

"Will you allow me to take issue with your A. K. K. from Zanesville who insists that the best pipe of the day is the one smoked right after breakfast?

"Of course, I have no intimate knowledge of local conditions down in Southern Ohio, but up here the majority of us regular pipe smokers have a decided leaning towards the last pipe of the evening.



"Take a night when you are sitting in front of the fire after the neighbors have gone. Your wife suggests it is bed-time, and while you admit it is, you have a craving for one last smoke. She goes on upstairs and you promise to follow directly. But instead you take out your pipe and light up. You smoke slowly and peacefully, calling out at intervals that you'll be there in a minute. Only you don't go until the last ash has died in the bowl of your pipe.

"That's my idea of the best smoke of the day.

"Yes, sir, for every smoker A. K. K. can produce who likes his after-breakfast pipe best, I'll guarantee to name a dozen men who prefer the last smoke of the evening. And most of us are Edgeworth smokers, too.

Yours very sincerely,
(Signed) T. S. FLINT,
New York City."

Yes, as we suggested above, when we gave space to an expression of opinion about which is the best pipe of the day, we started something. But we are glad to open our columns to friendly discussions about pipes and smoking in general.

So if you have any particular notions, fads or fancies, send them along.

And if you aren't an Edgeworth smoker, be sure and tell us about it. For we want to send you free samples, generous helpings both of Edgeworth Plug Slice and Ready-Rubbed.

Edgeworth has made friends all over the World. Some smokers may not care for Edgeworth, but those who do, we believe, settle down and never smoke any other tobacco the rest of their lives.

Edgeworth is sold in various sizes to suit the needs and means of all purchasers.

For the free samples address Larus & Brother Company, 61 South 21st Street, Richmond, Va. If you will also add the name of the dealer to whom you will go if you should like Edgeworth, we would appreciate that courtesy on your part.

To Retail Tobacco Merchants: If your jobber cannot supply you with Edgeworth, Larus & Brother Company will gladly send you prepaid by parcel post a one- or two-dozen carton of any size of Edgeworth Plug Slice or Ready-Rubbed for the same price you would pay the jobber.

in pockets, head flung back. Only, her curly satirical smile had been exchanged for an expression reserved and inscrutable, and she wore her hat pulled low over her eyes so that none might read them. There was a moment's laughter when the clerk of the court, from force of habit, said sternly, "Hats off in court!" and then suddenly subsided, covered with confusion at his own stupidity. Even Desmond smiled, but it passed instantly and her lips closed again in a firm line.

After a slight bow to the judge on entering she never looked his way again. She was sorry for that kind, handsome man with whom she had so often jested.

The business of picking the jury went rapidly forward, the clerk gabbling from a list the names of those eligible for this duty. The names, written on small cards, were then placed in a box and a jury of nine drawn. As the clerk shouted each name its owner disentangled himself from the crowd and slouched to the front, cursing his luck and wishing he were dead.

By a curious and ironical circumstance not a single friend of Desmond's had chanced to be drawn. In fact only two of those who wriggled uneasily upon the seats of judgment had ever even spoken to her. Rhodesian juries were a mixed lot at any time, but this one surpassed the record. There was a baker, a gardener of Teutonic origin, a Greek purveyor of sundries, a farmer, a hotel proprietor, a barman, a bank clerk and of course a mine manager. What jury would have been complete without a manager of sorts? This one as it happened came from one of Lypiatt's small properties. But he was known to be a straight fellow and no one objected to him.

With all in order the Solicitor-General rose and stated his case for the Crown. He did not use any rhetoric—just recited the bare facts, and they were bad enough. His concise yet homely phrases, delivered without a shade of prejudice in a pleasant Scotch accent, echoed through the court like mellow knells of doom.

The indictment of:

"This woman whom we know by no other name than 'young Desmond'—who has been among us for more than a year—in the unsuspected guise of a man," was damning in its sheer simplicity. People were almost afraid to look at the dock. They need not have been, for Desmond sat unmoved, her violet eyes gazing straight before her in a grave, trance-like glance.

The array of witnesses who had already given brief evidence at the inquest then took the box one by one and held it through the long hot hours of the morning. The lawyers argued and bickered, interfering with each other and browbeating those witnesses whose evidence was not to their taste.

O'Byrne had his hands full, as he had anticipated, with the Cape Town barrister. Douglas, a fair and square opponent, unbiased in his duty, was simple to deal with; the Hollander, a heavy-lipped brute with the soul of a sensualist and the tongue of an asp, was out for blood. But the Irishman was alert to the attack and on guard at every defense.

Through all, the accused sat very still, cheek resting on hand, eyes serene, like one whose mind is away on pleasant travels. She had pleaded not guilty because she had to do so—no other plea is allowed to a person charged with killing a fellow mortal. But she did nothing to back up and further the plea, and it early transpired that she would not be put into the witness box. This had an unhealthy look and caused depression amongst her friends. For when a person is innocent what more sane than to stand up and say so? The simpler the statement the better. Truth has a tongue and an air of its own.

But Desmond had no simple statement to make and preferred rather that the world should believe a lie than that she should be forced to speak the truth.

Though she looked so composed and aloof there, her heart often throbbed like an infernal machine that must soon explode. And her pulse was at fever pitch for fear of one thing—that Lundi Druro might turn up before the matter was settled, before she had been sentenced and swept out of sight. She knew from Guthrie that he had lately been regaining health and would presently have to be told what had happened. But she had not seen Guthrie for some days and was not aware that the prosecution had sent to take Druro's evidence on commission. When she realized this, and that the evidence was to be used against her, it thrilled through her like an electric shock of mingled relief and pain. For the first time her composure failed. She grew deadly pale and a little mist as if of tears came over her steady eyes. Strange that anything Druro had said could be turned against her! Strange that that hand she had warmed with the fires of her heart should aim a weapon at it! She did not really believe it. It was some vagary of the law that had twisted what he said into:

"I, Francis Everard Druro, being on a bed of sickness and unable to come forward at His Majesty's behest . . . do hereby take oath and declare . . . I know nothing about the death of Constant Lypiatt at my camp . . . and can give no information whatsoever as to how it came about."

There was more, dealing with a few disjointed memories of the day, but Desmond did not catch it. A buzzing and singing in her ears, a fiendish clamor in her brain, prevented her from hearing. She felt mortally sick too, and as though if she were not very careful she would fall from an exceedingly high point into a deep and jagged ravine. The only thing she could do to prevent this fall was to keep her eyes fixed on a little yellow smiling face she could see through the courthouse window. A sunflower had grown far above the other flowers in the garden and turned its face her way—a friendly golden face beaming like a star upon this dark impasse of her life.

She could not possibly know that the statement just read out, and of which she had heard only the beginning, was the result of expert questioning that elicited much and told nothing. Druro had not been informed who was charged with the murder and under what circumstances it had supposedly been committed. The precarious state of weakness to which he had fallen forbade excitement; also, Doctor Ryan, fearing brain trouble for his patient, had insisted on certain facts being concealed. So the prosecution had tenderly hidden from him the plight of his friend Desmond. He was told no more than that Lypiatt had been found dead in his camp. Even that was enough to send him into a wild fever.

"But what was he doing there? Who

The Road of the Loving Heart

ON an Enchanted Island—of the South Seas where the shining water is ever the sky's blue looking-glass, runs the Ala Loto Alofa, The Road of the Loving Heart—a Road of Gratitude.

The Road was built by the Samoan chiefs for their beloved "Tusitala"—Teller of Tales—as they called Robert Louis Stevenson, the Beloved of every nation.

In thanking the old chiefs who built the road as an expression of gratitude for his never failing kindness, Stevenson said:

"When a road is once built, every year as it goes on, more and more people are found to walk thereon . . . . so perhaps even this road of ours may be useful for hundreds and hundreds of years. And it is my hope that our far away descendants may remember and bless those who labored for them today."

Stevenson's Road—paved with love and gratitude—led to the Island home he built in a world-wide quest for health. The Road still climbs up the mountainside to Vailima, and is trod yearly by hundreds who visit Stevenson's former home because of their Gratitude for the priceless heritage of his life and writings.

But a far greater Road—is being built today—a road on which year after year more and more grateful people shall walk. A Road which shall not only endure for hundreds of years, but for all time. A Road for which far away descendants will remember and bless those who are laboring for them now.

It is the Road of Health—
Its builders are far-seeing physicians and public and private health agencies.

The Road of Health is the only road upon which the sun shines. It is the only Road from which the real beauties of life can be seen. It is the Road sign-posted with Happiness and Success. It is the Road which leads to the Delectable Mountains of fulfilled hopes and ambitions.

Health is not the monopoly of any one group or class. And so the Road of Health is a great Public Highway open to all who keep themselves physically fit to travel it.

For however smooth a Roadbed—however free from dangers, wrecks cannot be avoided unless the machine that travels the road is in good condition. And just as no locomotive or motor would be sent out, even on the best of roads, without occasional examination, so the human body—the greatest machine in the world—must be thoroughly examined by your doctor and regularly overhauled, if wrecks along the Road of Life are to be avoided.

Failure to have the complex human machine examined regularly means that you are ever in danger of being side-tracked to—the Road of Sickness—a road over which many thousands needlessly struggle.

The First Baby Steps—should be taken on the safe, smooth Road of Health. On it the boy and girl should travel eagerly to school. From it the young business man and woman must not be allowed to stray. Fathers and mothers will find it the one shining road that leads to a Happy Home.

Stretching clean and white before you is the untrodden Road of the New Year.

Therefore Be it Resolved—to swing wide the Gateway to the Road of Health—the wonderful new Road of Gratitude.

Take the first step today—become a traveler on the sunshiny, joyous thoroughfare—go to your doctor and have a thorough examination made of your body mechanism. The man and woman who find out just how they stand physically can, by proper care and right living, learn to avoid the Road of Sickness—can lengthen life and can get far more out of it.

Have your children examined. The examination of a child oftentimes means the discovery of disease tendencies or of defects which, taken in time, can be cured or corrected. It may save deformities, blindness or suffering that would make death preferable to life.

A Happy New Year!

Nine years ago the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company became convinced that frequent examinations of the bodily machine would not only add to health and happiness but would lead to prolongation of life. The Company thereupon arranged to offer periodic physical examinations, free of charge, to a large group of its policy holders.

The record indicates that among the persons so examined on whom the Company had an experience of five or more years following examination, there was a saving of 28% in mortality over what otherwise would have been expected under the general mortality experience of the Company. So satisfactory have been the results that the field of these examinations has been extended by the Company beyond the limits originally imposed.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company provides also periodic medical examinations of its employees. The first examination showed marked physical defects in 25% of them. A year later more than one-half of these impairments had been overcome.

Workers in American industries are said to lose one billion dollars in wages annually because of sickness and accident—much of which is preventable. It has been estimated that six hundred thousand people die needlessly every year in the United States—die years before their time. Within the past twenty years the average life span in the United States has been lengthened at least six years—a wonderful promise of what can be accomplished in the years to come when, along with other preventive measures, periodic health examinations shall have become the rule rather than the exception.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company will gladly mail without charge to anyone requesting it, a copy of its helpful booklet entitled "The Ounce of Prevention". It tells the whole story of what is here but briefly outlined.

did it?" he muttered, leaping up from his pillow with glittering eyes. The doctor, placing a hand on his shoulder, had flung a warning look at the inquisition. Wherefore they answered glibly:

"We don't know. We're trying to find out. You must help us by remembering all you can of that day and night"

"But I can't remember anything. My mind is an absolute blank from the time I left in the afternoon. I can only dimly recall riding towards camp . . . and once, after that, leading my horse up to an ant heap and getting on again. I suppose I had fallen off—probably that's how I got this bruise on my temple. Anyway, I must have been raving in delirium and wonder I got back to camp at all, as you say I did."

But how was Desmond to know of these things? She could only listen to the words, be thankful with her brain for their import, and suffer with her heart.

At luncheon time everyone scurried out of court, breathlessly anxious to exchange opinions, and Desmond in a little side room sat down to a dainty luncheon served by Mrs. Brade. But she could do no more than drink a cup of tea. Her throat was parched, her appetite flown. In a few moments O'Byrne came bustling in to consult with her, and she was left alone with him. She thought he looked at her oddly with some kind of fresh interest, but her brain was too sick and weary to bother much. O'Byrne did not understand, but supposing her to be depressed over the morning's evidence tried to cheer her up. He had not finished with them, he boasted gleefully. There was another shot or two in his locker yet . . . more than a shot—a cannon ball.

"I'll wake 'em up!" he said. "And as for Druro's evidence on commission, rats to it. I'll have the man himself here to-morrow, and we'll get more out of him than that."

"What!"

"Yes. Guthrie tells me he insists on getting up and coming over. Wait till I get busy on him! See if I can't make him remember a few things in our favor . . ."

"You must stop him from coming," interrupted Desmond, aghast.

"Stop him! Nonsense! Why should I stop him? Besides, he's a friend. Guthrie says he is mad to help you. Is it likely there would be any harm in anything he——"

"Yes . . . yes there is harm. I implore you, Mr. O'Byrne. Get a message to him. Beg him for my sake to stay away. Tell him I can't stand it. It will kill me."

O'Byrne glared in exasperation. But he was not surprised. He knew very well there was more in the case than had been told him. His client had never given him her full confidence and he did not blame her, but he considered there was a limit to reserve and that she went beyond it. As to preventing Druro from coming forward he had no intention of the sort. He hoped to drag all he could out of the latter once he got him in the witness box, and perhaps something his client would not tell him might transpire that could be twisted in her favor.

As it was, a priceless revelation had been made to him within the last hour of which he intended to take full advantage. A grande coup that he was not going to have crabbed by his client, so he decided to say nothing to her about it. It would only agitate her. He looked at her solicitously. He didn't want her agitated. Her composed and noble bearing in the dock was compatible with innocence and had made a good impression. He wanted that to continue and did not at all like the look of fright that had now come into her face. So he soothed her with the prediction that Druro would be far too ill to come over anyway and hurried away to make his arrangements for the afternoon.

She did not see him again until they were in court; then he nodded and made a sign to signify that it was all right. She understood him to mean that Druro would not arrive and was greatly relieved, for she felt she could not bear much more. The events of the morning had tried her bitterly. The reading of that strange phrase of Druro's had shaken the very foundations of her self-control. She wanted him to go free and unaccused, she desired to suffer in his stead. Yet . . . she could not bear that phrase she had heard read . . . These painful thoughts occupied her mind to the exclusion of all interest in what was happening in court; but suddenly her blind gaze fixed itself on a strange and unexpected apparition. Loochia Luff, a vision of soft blues and grays, in a picture hat under which her eyes looked very languorous and long-lashed, was occupying the witness box! And Desmond's heart turned cold as she realized that O'Byrne was silkily questioning her as a witness for the defense.

"Will you kindly tell the court how you came to know that Constant Lypiatt went that night to the Jubilate Deo, and to the hut where he met his death, in the full knowledge that the prisoner was a woman?"

"No!" a voice cried loudly.

It was Desmond who had sprung to her feet and flung out a hand, half in command, half in appeal, to the woman in the box. All eyes were turned to the dock in astonishment. She knew neither what she did nor said then, but two things quelled and silenced her—the judge's frowning reprimand and the subtle malice of Loochia's shaded eyes. Protest was useless. She was constrained to sit still under the soft tide of words that rose and fell from the lips of this unexpected witness.

Mrs. Luff spoke very earnestly, and her mien was of one eager to help in a soft, feminine way; to proffer her modest services as champion for another woman's hopeless cause; to do her best for a fellow creature. And since that guileless air had deceived the astute O'Byrne, small wonder it took in the rest of the world—all, that is to say, except her own husband and the prisoner in the dock. They knew. That eager expression of hopeful well doing with which she launched each carefully prepared phrase did not deceive either of those two.

"About three months ago Mr. Lypiatt was in my sitting room at Gatooma just before he went down country. We had occasion to be looking through a number of boxes in search of certain documents relating to our mine and hotel recently closed, and my husband being away I was helping Mr. Lypiatt. We had only recently moved and a lot of illustrated papers were among the things we had brought. Mr. Lypiatt got interested in some old Sketches and suddenly gave an exclamation that drew my attention to a full page portrait. It was a lady rather celebrated in London society about three years ago for her beauty and for a mysterious tragedy with which she had been associated."

Mrs. Luff paused, perhaps for effect, but was told very brusquely by the judge to get to her point.

"I at once noticed the extraordinary resemblance between the picture and—and"—she paused again and looked sadly, almost tenderly towards the dock—"and someone we both knew," she murmured, overcome with emotion.

"Was that someone the lady in the dock, known to you as young Desmond?" queried O'Byrne, more than satisfied with his grande coup, for court, counsel and public were alike transfixed at this fresh development.

"It was," said Loochia, clear as a bell.

Those watching saw Desmond lean back in her seat as though very tired; the wardress put a supporting arm round her. But O'Byrne had his back to his client. Besides, he now had to clamor and fight for the evidence of the witness to be accepted. And he was working for a grand climax.

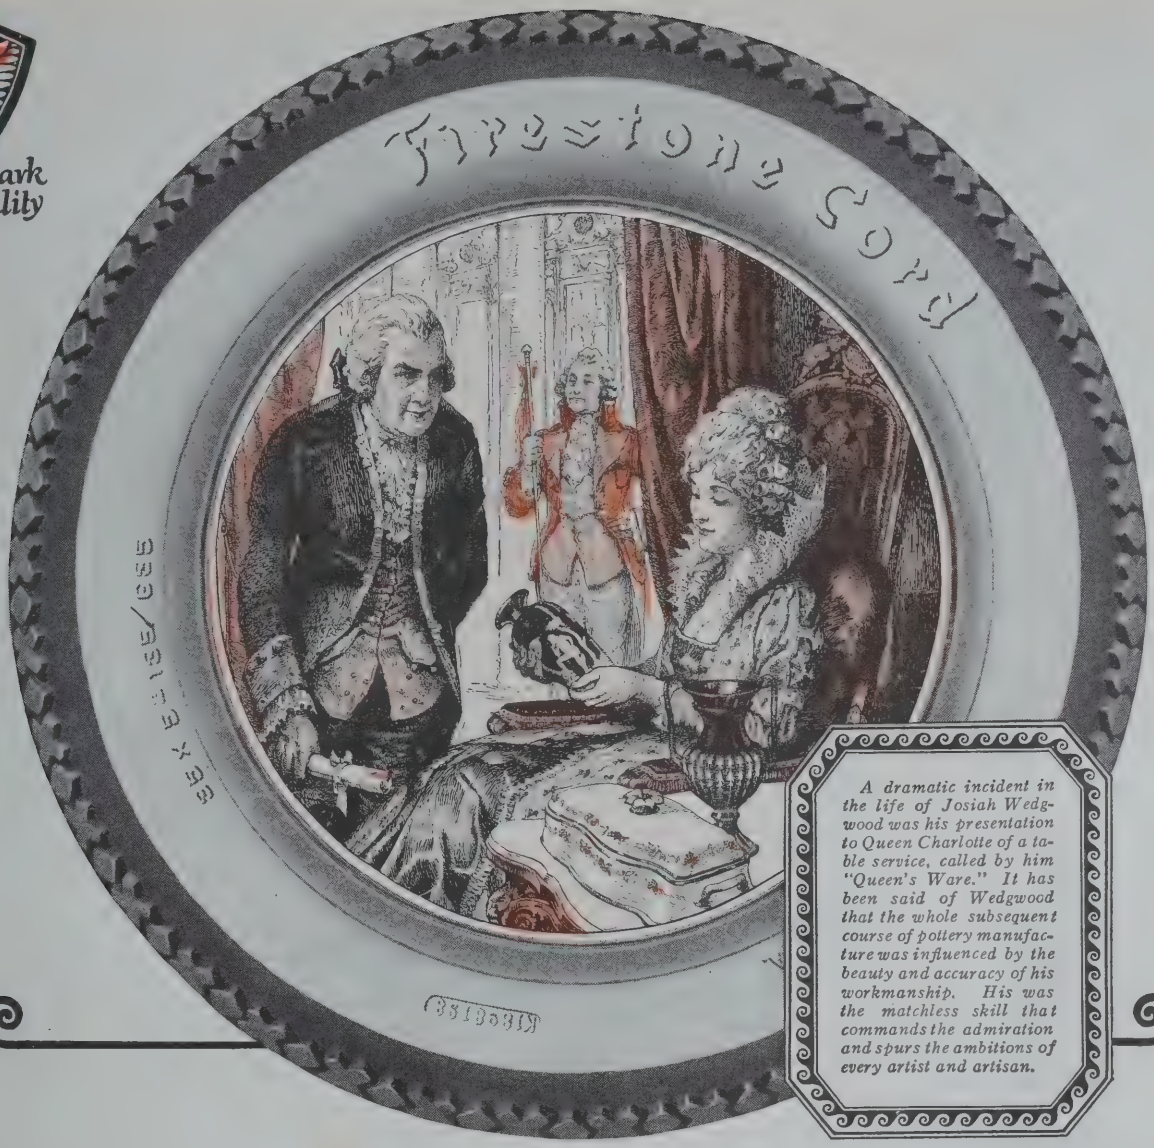
"What happened then?" he demanded when he had shouted everyone including the judge into silence.

"I protested that it must be merely a striking resemblance, but Mr. Lypiatt then told me that he had known ever since he took young Desmond to hospital and carried him into the ward that he was a woman in disguise." Profound emotion surged through the court.

"What then?"

"Lypiatt tore two pages from the Sketch and took them away with him. One page had a full length portrait, the other showed the same woman in the costumes of various rôles in private theatricals."

O'Byrne here made a dramatic interjection.



"Those folded pages, my Lord, were found upon the body of Lypiatt, and are produced for your information and that of the gentlemen of the jury."

The judge had already been earnestly studying them; they were now passed to the jury, rustling from hand to hand, while curiosity and excitement past bearing agitated the public. The significance of the evidence had not taken long to penetrate men's minds, and what remained of Lypiatt's reputation was in the dust. He had known she was a woman yet had gone to her hut at night, waylaid her, attacked her, terribly injured her throat. Small blame to her then for fighting him in self-defense. More power to her indeed that she had managed to throw him, and since he was killed in the overthrowing a good job too.

Each time a juryman relinquished his hold of the printed pictures he turned and stared with amazement and poignant curiosity towards the dock. But his stare requited him nothing. As for those standing and sitting at the back of the court they were sick to bursting point with a furious longing to be let into the secret. The rising of the Solicitor-General to crossexamine the witness—still standing there with her eager air of wearying not in well doing—brought a dead hush over all. He had only one or two questions to put.

"You say this happened some months

The Mark of Quality

A dramatic incident in the life of Josiah Wedgwood was his presentation to Queen Charlotte of a table service, called by him "Queen's Ware." It has been said of Wedgwood that the whole subsequent course of pottery manufacture was influenced by the beauty and accuracy of his workmanship. His was the matchless skill that commands the admiration and spurs the ambitions of every artist and artisan.

Matchless Skill

FORTUNATE for man's progress is the matchless skill with which a few individuals are endowed. For in these too rare instances are the worthiest standards of art and work established.

Josiah Wedgwood was, beyond dispute, the master potter of the ages. Yet his genius was not content with self-achievement. His splendid works, built at Hanley, England, in 1769, enabled other craftsmen to flourish under his guidance. And the beauty and value of Wedgwood wares were brought to the whole world.

In another time and in another field, the name Firestone has come to stand for the highest accomplishment—to set a new standard in the important industry of tire building.

It commands respect and has won to enduring fame because it, too, represents matchless skill in the coördinated effort of thousands of expert workers.

before Lypiatt's death? Have you ever mentioned it before to anyone?"

"No," said Loochia firmly.

"Is not that rather strange?"

She looked at him reproachfully.

"Why should I speak of what was obviously another woman's secret?"

Admiring glances were her meed for this. Here indeed was a heroine! A woman who could not only keep a secret but hold her tongue about another woman's secret! Such a phenomenon had never been known in Rhodesia.

"Did Lypiatt ask you to keep it secret?"

"He did. But in any case I should have done so," said Loochia, enjoying to the full the rôle of noble friend, especially as it gave her such a priceless opportunity of getting her own back from Desmond. Her only disappointment was that the latter's true identity had not at once been made public, but she still hoped for that.

Filgee now took her in hand.

"What motive have you in coming forward to blacken the dead man's memory?" he shot at her suddenly.

"None," replied Loochia, surprised. "Except to help another woman in distress by speaking the truth."

"Hah! You think then that it will assist this titled adventuress in the dock, this peeress who comes masquerading to South Africa in men's clothes — this lady——"

The judge here interrupted.

"I must ask counsel to confine himself to the bare question and not introduce irrelevant matters."

Filgee put up his eyeglass and stared for a moment in impertinent surprise, then bowed with mock humility.

"I bow to your Lordship's ruling, but I submit that it appears to me relevant to call the attention of the jury to what we now discover to be the prisoner's real name and history."

"We have discovered nothing of the sort," said the judge unexpectedly. "A theory based upon a strong likeness has suddenly been sprung upon the court, but I am not going to allow that to be dragged in to influence this case except in so far as it can be shown that Lypiatt knew or supposed the prisoner to be a woman when he went to her hut that night."

Filgee was obliged to submit to this decision but he did it sulkily enough, and his agile mind was not long in returning to the same attack by a different route.

"Do you think it will assist the prisoner to have it made clear that Constant Lypiatt visited her at night knowing that she was a woman?" he barked at Mrs. Luff. She looked painfully embarrassed. Patently such an ugly thought had never presented itself to her delicate mind. But what she was really revolving was how best she could use this happy opening. It was more than she had hoped for.

"Of course," she said slowly, "I do not know how soon it was before he told her of his knowledge. But I have an idea . . . there was a certain eagerness in his manner . . . he was deeply impressed by her beauty."

There was an immense sensation in court and O'Byrne leaped to his feet.

"I protest . . . this is outrageous! Are we to stand here and listen to the witness's ideas? To follow her studies and impressions? To accept her sensual imaginings——"

It was the judge's turn to protest and to remind him that Mrs. Luff was his own witness. Filgee also began to bellow and storm. In the midst of the heated wrangle as to whether or not the witness should continue her impressions, Loochia solved the problem for them. She was one of those who know the right thing to do at the right moment. Having shot her bolt she had no desire to linger. Besides, she was afraid of Filgee, recognizing in his full black eye an entire disregard for a woman's delicate feelings. So she decided that the best thing to do was to sink very gracefully into a profound faint.

Soon after this diversion the judge cautioned the jury and dismissed them to a night of their own society, at which some of them looked glum enough.

It was a respite for everyone else concerned, but the proceedings had left off at an unfavorable moment for Desmond. Some of the slime thrown by Loochia stuck in men's minds and there was a whole night in which to absorb it, together with the startling revelation of the prisoner's identity. For of course no sooner was the court emptied than the secret came out, and the name of Flavia Desmond, otherwise Countess Tyrecastle, was on every lip. No great effort of memory was required to recall that strange tragedy of three years before. There were some who remembered every detail, for it was one of those dramatic episodes that take hold of the imagination, and even as some grim story of the Australian bush or African black veldt will penetrate to every drawing room and kitchen of the old world, so this society drama had echoed its way to the far places of the earth.

It had been so public yet so secret; bruited throughout the world, it still remained shrouded and mysterious to the end.

From the day Flavia Desmond made her début in society the whole world seemed to have watched her, riding, driving, yachting, fencing, dancing her way through life. Artists had declared her face a classic, her figure a piece of Greek sculpture. She had a sort of valiant, boylike, beautiful bravery and a daring that distinguished her from other girls. Her eyes glowed. She was eager. She excelled in everything—one of those people upon whom the gods seem to shower almost too many gifts. Born to place and power, she achieved distinction for herself by her personality as well as her lineage. Her father, a famous general, had been elevated to the peerage, and her mother, who had died at her birth, had been one of the beauties of Queen Victoria's court. General, Lord Desmond, married again and had more daughters, but none of them could touch Flavia in looks and individuality. The well known fact of her stepmother's antagonism to her made people more tolerant of Flavia's caprices and escapades.

For of course like all young and beautiful creatures she was inclined to be excessive in everything she did—and among the mistakes she made was that of over-loyalty to people unworthy of loyalty, and insolence to people she despised for baseness and ill breeding but who were able to requite her disdain with injurious tales. Stories and scandals clustered about her name. She was the most popular but the most talked of girl in London. In spite of being unhappy at home she did not marry at once—she might have had anybody, people said, but—people also said—she turned up her nose at everybody. At any rate it was three years after her first coming-out before she bestowed all her gifts and graces and scandals upon one of the great partis of the day—Terence, Lord Tyrecastle of Tyre Castle, in the County of Tyrone. Rich, handsome, a noted soldier and sportsman, crack polo player and racing man, he did all the things girls admire men for doing and did them well. True, he was nearly double the age of the bride and had been somewhat of a viveur, men said, but they were declared to be madly in love and it was looked upon as an ideal match.

All the world went to the wedding. The bride with her valiant air, full of grace and eagerness, was radiant on her father's arm as some matchless golden rose for whose signal beauty the whole bush had been cultivated. Tyrecastle's fellow officers of a regiment with annals of great glory attended in force. There were many rakes among them, but they were rakes of distinction—and unmarried. One of the regiment's extraordinary boasts was that no officer had ever "stooped" in marriage, or having married ever disgraced its record by public infelicity; and Flavia on that bright day of sunshine, fanfare and fragrance seemed to offer herself as a crown to their boastful arrogance and pride of life.

Every visible sign of worldly weal and happiness was present in St. Margaret's at three o'clock, and at seven the same evening—snap, crack over the wires, sharp as the flash of doom that had ended two lives, came the startling news. It seemed to people they had only just come back from seeing the bridegroom leave the church with his bride on his arm, smiling, insolent with happiness, when the newsboys were shouting the tidings of his death.

"Terrible tragedy at Dover . . . Duel between two officers . . . Death of Lord Tyrecastle and Captain Gerald Sillinger!"

The mystery of that duel in the Dover Hotel had never been solved. Only Flavia could have told why the two men fought to kill in her presence, within four hours of her marriage; and no legal inquisition had been skilled or powerful enough to unseal her lips. All that they ever knew was that within a few minutes of Tyrecastle's arrival Captain Sillinger, just landed from a Channel boat, went to their sitting room. The three had remained shut in together for ten minutes or so; then shots rang out. When servants and guests rushed in it was to discover Sillinger dead, shot through the head by Tyrecastle, and Tyrecastle dying from a self-inflicted wound, the smoking revolver still in his hand. The bride, seated in a chair, was white but calm as a spectator at a play.

She had always been fond of the play, people remembered, especially tragedy, and now she had one all to herself. Some went so far as to say she had arranged it for her own entertainment. There was indeed no end to the mordant things people said as the days went by and no elucidation of the mystery was forthcoming. All that Lady Tyrecastle would state at the inquest was that the two men had quarreled violently about a private matter which she was not at liberty to divulge, that each had seized a revolver from a case that lay upon the table and fired at the other. Tyrecastle, having killed Sillinger, had turned his revolver on himself. They were his revolvers, beautiful, deadly little weapons he was taking with him because he and his bride were going to honeymoon in the desert. Only spoiled, capricious Flavia Desmond would have chosen a honeymoon that called for the carrying of loaded arms—and this was what had come of it.

One or two odd details stood out in the grim tale. Sillinger had been a friend of hers from her girlhood up, though like Tyrecastle he was much older than she. Then he went to India with his regiment, and it almost looked as if he rushed home at the news of the engagement, which had been extraordinarily short. As a fact everyone knew that Sillinger had always loved her. Asked at the inquest whether it was true that she had knelt down by Sillinger and tried to staunch his wounds whilst taking absolutely no notice of her dying husband, she coldly admitted it.

The tragedy might have ended there if it had not been for Tyrecastle's people. They were not Irish for nothing, and they did not content them with keening their dead. There were many of them and they came from the Tyrone fastnesses headed by Tyrecastle's eagle-faced old mother. She had been too frail and aged to travel to the wedding. But this was vendetta and the Irish are never too old and frail for that. They were like bloodhounds on the track. Blood had been shed, but they wanted more. It almost seemed as if they wanted the blood of the girl who would not speak. Failing that, they wished to strip her of the title and the fortune Tyrecastle had piled upon her in marriage settlements.

Neither of these desires was possible of attainment without the acquiescence of Flavia. And there the rather sordid side of the story obtruded itself. Flavia would give up nothing. She accepted the abuse and insinuations they heaped upon her at the legal proceedings which followed the inquest, but she would cede nothing. The Tyrecastle tribe fought fiercely, and so did she. The money was hers and she insisted on having it. She did not say so, of course, but she paid lawyers who said it and who wrangled with the Irish like a pack of wolves over a carcass while she sat by, stony and serene. She was alone by then. Her father had died of heart failure when the boys shouted the news of the tragedy in the streets. Her stepmother and young sisters turned their faces from her, and one by one friends dropped away. Those who could forgive her silence could not forgive her greed and the besting of the trembling, fierce old Tyrecastle dam.

So, absolutely alone, she made her fight—and won it. And of course she was absolutely within her rights. Grace, pride, generosity, disdain perhaps might have kept her from taking the money . . . But of these, once her distinguishing qualities, she showed no sign. So she won—and lost all else in the winning. It would have been forgiven in some women . . . but that exquisitely proud, disdainful Flavia Desmond should sell her birthright for a mess of pottage was beyond pardon. It was as though a goddess with all the fruits and flowers of enchanted worlds at her disposal should come forth and insist upon gobbling up Irish stew. That was how a poet who once had been her devotee put it. And the rest of the world put it in harsher phrase.

For needless to say surmise as to the cause of the tragedy was not distinguished by charity—what was first whispered came in time to be cried from the house tops—that Gerry Sillinger had been her lover and Tyrecastle, made aware of it through the former's jealousy, had preferred death to the dishonoring truth. Thus Flavia, Countess Tyrecastle, fell from her high place, and the world that had petted and spoiled her cast her out. Small wonder that she abruptly disappeared. No one knew where she had gone to. Once it was rumored that she was hiding in Paris, living amongst the rowdiest set of artists and students, but those who had known her well disbelieved this of fine and fastidious Flavia.

The years had gone by—and no word of Flavia! Until now . . . news indeed! The wires rang and hummed all that night, not only in South Africa but in Paris, New York and London town.

For Loochia Love-a-little had not been idle. Long before the case came on, in fact from the very day of Lypiatt's amazing Sketch discovery, she had been preparing her secret campaign for vengeance against the "boy" who had rebuffed her amorous advances on the ship and later defeated her plans for the capture of Druro.

The evidence she had given in court of Lypiatt's commanding her silence was true. He had acted on the principle that Desmond's secret might be of use to himself, and she dared not openly disobey a man who held both her and her husband in the palm of his hand. But there was nothing to prevent one so utterly unscrupulous as herself from passing on the information anonymously, and that she had done.

Among her accomplishments was that of scribbling paragraphs for the Cape and Johannesburg papers—snappy little scraps that just escaped being libelous. So it happened that she had plenty of newspaper openings for the batch of clever little sketches she proceeded to compose about "A Celebrated Countess" who lived in Rhodesia not only "incog" but in disguise.

At first she contented herself with mysterious hints; then later she began diligently preparing a narrative of Desmond's life and adventures on the veldt. The day she heard of Lypiatt's death and Desmond's arrest, in fervid delight and freedom from all fear, she brought her work up-to date, illustrated it with many snapshots, some of Desmond alone, some in company with Druro and others, and gave the full name of the "heroine." A mail left the following day carrying this manuscript, and almost coincident with the trial it was in the hands of the editor of a London paper renowned for its "scoops." The case, already immensely talked about on account of the accused being a woman in disguise, became through Loochia's story the sensation of the moment.

Nothing was omitted from her narratives, which began on the Glenconnor Castle and ended at the Jubilate Deo; and all the malice of a petty nature had been uncorked to the labor of hate. The unadoring Eric on reading it—for like all artists Loochia could not refrain from trying her work on someone—was moved to epigram.

"When dog eats dog there's something doing," quoth he. "But when cat eats cat hell's to pay."

As for the subject of the monograph, there was little rest or repose in her whitewashed cell that night. Not that she was aware of the full extent of Loochia's betrayal, nor of the revelation of her past with which the wires were humming. But enough had been told for her to realize that even if the best happened and she got free, her career as young Desmond, her loved life of the veldt was finished and past. The fact was so bitter and doomful that she thought she would not very much care if the law decided to take her life. She had from the first been willing to face the contingency of that for Druro's sake. What she had not counted on was the exhumation of the old tragedy—those sad bones that had been moldering in the grave for years and were now dragged forth into the highway for all the world to gape at. The name and title she had cast to the winds were back on her shoulders, branded there like marks of shame, stuck there with the gouts of mud the world had flung.

And there was another thing. Druro's evidence. What did that mean? Her heart turned sick, there was dust in her mouth. Was nothing and no one, then, worth love and sacrifice? Was nothing that was human, fine? Was there no beauty except in the inanimate things of nature—trees, flowers, hill and skies? Were all the rest just shallow mockeries? Words, words—words to cover up the baseness or at best the emptiness of the human soul? Sacrifice, self-immolation were great and wonderful privileges in the service of love. But if the object of them were unworthy and afraid, with a base, cowardly fear? Then indeed sacrifice was not great. It was dust and ashes. It was defeat.

These were some of the thoughts that kept her company through the night while she paced her cell or stood long at the window looking through the bars at the peace of Africa which seemed almost as the peace past human understanding. A great white moon rode glorious in the sky so bright that not a star could be seen. The land was full of a mysterious ghostly light, as though only for spirits to move in. All human beings had hidden themselves in their homes and beds. Even the insects were still, for they prefer darkness in which to utter their shrill calls of love. The fantastic euphorbia trees with their air of magic stood like ebony sentinels before the jail, stretching twisted arms to the sky as if in worship or despair.

The full thrill of Cynthia Stockley's great novel she has kept until its climax in the February COSMOPOLITAN. Don't miss it. On sale at all news stands January 10.

Pickles in Patterns

Just one example of uniformity in food preparation

EXAMINE closely a jar of Heinz pickles. They look good to eat, yes—but note the arrangement of the contents. Everything placed just so.

Now look at another jar. It shows the same uniform pattern. You can't tell them apart. And any number of jars, each packed by a different girl, show the same orderly, tasteful arrangement.

The neat, prim, white-capped "Heinz girls" do this very skillfully and rapidly. Visitors to the Heinz spotless kitchens marvel at their deftness.

This uniformity in packing is proof of a still greater thing—the uniformity of the products which are packed. It speaks volumes for the care in sorting and selecting.

And the Heinz principle of uniformity goes still further. It is uniformity of grade and quality as well as of size—uniformity in every phase of preparation. Any one jar of pickles or any one can of beans is exactly as good as any other jar or can. The uniform quality and taste of each of the 57 Varieties is something which can always be depended upon.

The reason is not only high standards of food preparation—but cheerful loyalty to these standards by the men and women who do the preparing.

with the wolf hound! And that little pair of flappers—what? It's good to be alive!"

He'd always treated me in a friendly but very reserved way. There was a big gulf between his station and mine and he'd never done anything calculated to make me forget it. But this morning he acted familiar and chummy, as if we'd been the same age. He dug me suddenly in the ribs and said:

"How'd you like to be a Turk, old top?"

V

He was altogether changed. And he wasn't changed for the better. He was like some wild, moneyed boy just out of college, and nothing tired him. He discovered Broadway and never got home till two or three o'clock in the morning.

I never saw such energy, such keenness, such curiosity and such enterprise. But he scattered the energy, wasted it and squandered it. He'd start some tremendous business deal, and in the midst of it he'd tire of it and start something different.

At times he seemed to forget all about Miss Pembroke, and then he'd remember her and write her lots of letters and send her pearls and diamonds. But she'd stopped being the only woman in his thoughts.

Still, when it got to be time for Palm Beach he was keen to go. And when he got to Palm Beach and could actually see her again and be with her, he went quite as crazy over her as ever. And he wanted to marry her then and there.

But something saved her from that—just the natural stubbornness of a girl who's happy enough the way things are and doesn't propose to be hustled into anything. And the old man had to put up with that; but he didn't like it. He sulked about it and acted spoiled. And then he'd forget that he had anything to sulk about and would simply blaze and crackle with energy and enthusiasm.

Nothing tired him—except work and concentrating his mind. Whatever he'd gained in bodily health and stamina he'd lost between the ears. His memory got worse and worse. And he knew it. He told me so frankly.

"I'm getting to be a regular scatterbrain," he said. "For Heaven's sake watch over me closely and don't let me forget too many engagements and promises."

He began to get himself talked about. But it was lucky that he wasn't living at the hotel but in his own house; so that some of the most eccentric things he did never got out.

One night, for instance, I heard a tapping on one of my windows. I got out of bed and went to see what it was. It was the old man's ten toes.

He was making a circuit of the house hanging to the gutter by his hands. No, not drunk. Asleep. Nearly every night now he walked in his sleep. But I ought not to say that he walked. He climbed.

You didn't dare wake him. All you dared do was watch him—and pray.

It got so bad that I telegraphed the doctor. I telegraphed in such a way that he jumped on to the first train. I met him at the station and told him all the awful things that were going on, and that I didn't know how to cope with them. The doctor seemed to be terribly shocked and frightened. He said "My God . . . My God . . ." And then he made a clean breast of the whole rotten unnatural business. "We had a young fellow—Smith—all signed up and paid up. At the last minute he lost his nerve and cut and ran . . . Sooner than disappoint the old man . . . Well, you know . . ."

"The thing that was under the sheet in the next room?"

"You looked?"

I nodded.

"What's to be done, doctor? He'll break his neck."

"Any other symptoms but climbing?"

I had to smile; the other symptoms seemed so petty and foolish.

"He comes home from the beach with his pockets full of bright-colored shells. He has hundreds of them in his room—all over the place; and he's got a craze for coconut milk, has it served at all his meals instead of water—awful stuff."

"How about Miss Pembroke?" asked the doctor.

"He wanted to marry her right off; but she wouldn't. And lately it's seemed to me as if she was afraid of him . . ."

I took the doctor straight to the club house because I knew Miss Pembroke and the old man would be playing roulette after their morning swim, and I wanted the doctor to have a good look at the old man without being seen himself.

He gave one look and turned white.

"Good God!" he whispered. "Doesn't everybody see what has happened? It's as plain as day."

And it was. I had a moment of clear vision and it was perfectly obvious that among the men about the roulette table there was one that wasn't a man.

But the effect lasted only a moment and left me blinking. After that my employer looked natural enough—only preposterously young and alive.

When he heard that the doctor was in Palm Beach he insisted on having him come to the house to stay. I was glad of that. The doctor might be able to do something—to undo what he'd done. I was powerless, and the responsibility was too heavy for me.

The doctor studied the situation for two days. On the third day it came out that Miss Pembroke, without saying a word to anyone, had slipped away from Palm Beach on a north-bound train.

I never knew just what had happened. If the old man knew the chances are that five minutes later he'd forgotten. But when he found out that she had gone he went into a terrible frenzy of rage.

He rushed up the stairs to his room and we could hear him screaming and breaking things.

The doctor may have been a bad man and a fool, but he was brave. He went upstairs and I heard the sound of the old man's door opening and closing. I don't know what the doctor said to him—that is, I don't know exactly. What puzzles me more is how he managed to get his attention so that he could talk to him at all. But he did. And all the awful noises stopped.

By and by they came downstairs together. The old man seemed to be under a terrible mental strain, but he was quiet and natural. His eyes were pathetic, though. I never saw an expression of such horror and misery.

He made a splendid fight to be himself—to be what he was meant to be. But the strain told and deep lines came into his face.

"I had to tell him," the doctor told me. "It was the only way. I had to tell him about—Smith—and he's enough of a man still to make a fight for—yes, for his liberty. And of course he has horror and disgust on his side to fight for him."

God knows he had, but they weren't strong enough. It was in his sleep that the evil forces got the better of him.

I suppose we ought to have kept better watch; but he'd been so quiet and reasonable for nearly a week that he caught us off our guard.

We found him lying at the foot of one of the tall palm trees back of the house. His neck was broken, and his right hand was still clutching the green coconut for which he had grown thirsty in the night.

It was nothing new to Carew—use had accustomed him to even greater squalor than this—but Geradine's disgust was evident as he stared about him with curling lip, spitting the sand from his mouth and shaking it from his clothing.

Wet and angry, and in no mood to be further inconvenienced, the sight of the horses vigorously propelled into the hut through the narrow entrance moved him to noisy expostulation. But Carew, who was stooping to unloosen Suliman's girths, waved an indifferent hand towards the door and intimated sharply that if he preferred the sandstorm he was at liberty to remove himself, but that as far as he—Carew—was concerned men and horses remained where they were until the weather conditions improved.

Unused to opposition, and too selfish to think of anything but his own comfort, the flat refusal was all that was needed to stir Geradine's smoldering rage to a white heat of fury. An ugly look swept across his lowering face and he started forward with a threatening gesture. For a few seconds it seemed as if the open quarrel Carew had feared was now inevitable. Tired and on edge, goaded by the other's insolence and overbearing manner, driven by his own hatred, nothing would have given him greater pleasure than to respond to the provocation offered him.

The atmosphere of the little room seemed suddenly to become electric—alive with naked passions—as the two men stared into each other's eyes. Behind them the Arabs, sensitive of the tension, were watching intently, and Hosein was edging nearer to his master, his hand stealing to the knife in his belt. Then with a tremendous effort Carew thrust from him the temptation to which he had almost succumbed and swinging on his heel without a word turned back to his horse. Checked despite himself by a silence he did not understand, Geradine made no further protest but fell back with an inarticulate growl and crossing the room dropped down heavily on the cleanest spot he could find, as far removed from the others as possible.

Lighting a cigar with difficulty, for his matches were wet, he smoked sulkily until the horses were unsaddled. Then fumbling in the pocket of his sodden coat he produced a good sized flask and, gulping down the remaining contents, shouted to the sullen faced Arab—who was leaning moodily against the wall beside the steaming horses—to bring him more brandy. Apathetically the man unstrapped the leathern holster from his master's saddle. Following him, Carew saw the savage kick aimed at him as Geradine snatched the second flask from his outstretched hand.

With growing hatred and disgust Carew listened to the uninterrupted flow of evil language. Was this what the girl heard day after day and night after night? He flung his wet cloak back with an angry jerk, scowling at the sudden thought. It was no business of his, no business of his, he whispered doggedly as he searched for a cigarette. No business of his—but remembrance, stimulated, was easier than forgetfulness and for long he stared somberly at the wreathing clouds of faint blue smoke that, curling upward in fantastic spirals, seemed to frame the exquisite oval of a pale, pure face.

When at last, by sheer strength of will, he forced his mind back to the immediate present, Geradine's grumbling had ceased and he seemed to be asleep. The men too were dozing. Carew wondered if he also had been asleep. Listening for the gusts of wind that before had shaken the crumbling building, he realized that the storm had passed. The atmosphere was stifling, and going to the door he wrenched it open and went out into the night.

There the change was almost magical. Swept clean, the heavens were blazing with stars and the desert lay calm and still in the soft clear light of a rising moon whose slanting beams shone silver on the sand. A peace and silence that was gripping. To Carew, still seething with the hatred that a little while since had almost mastered him, the marvelous beauty of the night was like the touch of a healing hand. Watching it, for a time he forgot even Geradine.

Behind him the tiny collection of huts straggled dark and mysterious in the deep shadow of a great bare rock. But he did not look at the sleeping village. It was the desert that held him—the desert that with its silent voice was whispering, enticing, as so often it had whispered and enticed before, drawing him with the glamor of its hidden secrets. DODGE BROTHERS
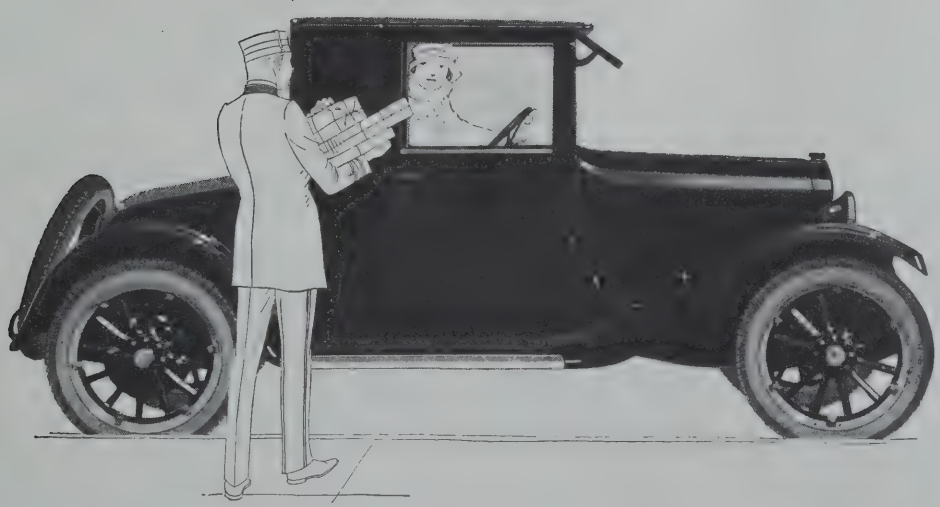
BUSINESS COUPE



Owners experience an appreciable new sense of security in this car—the first steel-built closed car ever marketed.

Dodge Brothers pioneered boldly and successfully to give it the qualities of the Pullman coach, capable of withstanding an impact under which the ordinary body would probably crumble.

But steel construction does more than contribute to the car's safety and durability; it also permits the use of Dodge Brothers baked-on enamel finish. It minimizes rattles and eliminates the possibility of shrinkage. All parts are welded or machine-screwed securely and permanently into place. This new preciseness is usually noticed first in the windows, which are entirely free from sticking and rumbling.

Such vital features are universal in their appeal. The continued, persistent demand for the Business Coupe is not surprising.

his eyes swept the moonlit plain. He was one with it now, a nomad for all time. More than the stately house in England, more than the miniature palace in Algiers, it was his home. For ten years he had lived in it. For ten years, seeking to cure his own hurt, he had tried to bring relief to others, fighting misery and disease, appalled by the magnitude of his task and seeming to have accomplished so little. But even the little was worth while. By even the little he was repaid. His toil had not been altogether in vain. By God's grace he had been enabled to do something, and by God's grace he would do still more. In the deep stillness of the eastern night the sense of the Divine Presence was very near, and in all humbleness Carew prayed from his heart for strength to continue the work that had become his life.

As he rose from his knees Hosein came to him, uneasy at his absence and the unwilling bearer of a message.

"The English lord is hungry," he announced briefly.

With a last glance at the shining stars Carew went reluctantly back to the hut.

Half hidden in a haze of cigar smoke and aggressively wide awake, Geradine hailed his appearance with no more civility than before.

"Clear out those cursed beasts," he shouted truculently. "I can't sleep in a damned stable! And get me something to eat. Something—to—eat. Quelque chose à manger, comprenez? You blasted fool!" he added, pantomiming vigorously.

The blood rolled in a dark wave to Carew's face but determined to keep his temper he swallowed the retort that sprang to his lips and gave the required orders with apparent unconcern. But he smiled inwardly as he watched the men lead the horses away. It was very doubtful whether food of any kind would be procurable at this time of night, and even if Hosein's endeavors met with success it was not likely that Geradine would appreciate the rough fare of the necessitous little village.

And when at length Hosein returned with a bowl of curdled camel's milk he was not surprised that the viscount after one glance of mingled dismay and repugnance, rejected both it and the unsavory looking little mass of sand-covered fruit with a disgusted "Lord, what beastly muck!" and retired into his corner with his hunger unsatisfied to curse himself to sleep. He was still sleeping heavily when Carew woke with the dawn and went out to find Hosein and the horses and make arrangements for Geradine's return to Biskra. It was not his intention that they should ride together.

To escape the leave-taking that was otherwise unavoidable he did not go back to the hut when, an hour later, he was ready for the road and had concluded his interview with Malec and the headman of the village.

But as his foot was in the stirrup Geradine appeared, yawning sleepily and swinging his arms to get the stiffness out of them. Having wakened for once without his customary morning headache, he was in a better temper than usual. Apparently oblivious of his incivility of the previous evening he lounged forward with an air of condescending geniality, prepared evidently to make himself agreeable. His shouted greeting terminated in a loud laugh as he glanced at Carew, clean shaven and immaculate as Hosein always contrived he should be, and then at his own soiled clothing.

"You look smart enough, by gad," he said, fingering his rough chin tenderly. "Where the devil do you find water and a razor in this filthy little hole? You're off early—what's your hurry? Oh, damn it, I forgot you can't speak English! Well, never mind, you're a sportsman whatever you are. I'd have been in the soup last night if you hadn't come along. Many thanks—dash it, I mean très obligé, mille remerciements—and all the rest of it, don't you know." And with another laugh he thrust out his hand.

But incited by the gentle pressure of his rider's heel Suliman plunged wildly and shot away, leaving Geradine with his arm still outstretched, half annoyed and half amused at Carew's abrupt departure.

Proud as Lucifer, like every other potty little chief he had ever met—but the beggar could ride, he reflected as he stood looking after the galloping horseman; and the man he had with him was worth a dozen of the fool he was landed with. And yawning again he turned back to the hut and roared for the fool in question.

CHAPTER VIII

IN HER bedroom at the Villa des Ombres, Marny Geradine was standing before the open window staring out into the darkness. She stood very still, her colorless face set like a mask of marble, her hands clasped tightly behind her. Only the tempestuous rise and fall of her delicately rounded bosom betrayed the inward tumult that was raging within her. Five minutes ago she had dismissed a white faced and pleading Ann and now, alone, she was facing a decision that took all her courage to sustain.

It was the night of the Governor's annual ball. By now she should have been dressed. But the wonderful Paris creation that Geradine had insisted on ordering specially for the occasion still lay in shimmering folds on the chaise longue and Marny had not changed from the simple tea gown in which she had dined.

She was not going to the ball. She was not going to submit again to the open shame and humiliation that had been her portion throughout her married life but which during the last few weeks had reached a culminating point of horror. Her husband's gross intemperance, his notorious infidelities, his callous disregard for anything beyond his own pleasure, had driven her at last to rebellion. She had reached the end of her endurance. She knew that at home she must continue to suffer the brutal treatment he meted out to her, but she had resolved never to appear in public with him again. How would he receive her decision? How would she brave his anger? A shudder of pure terror ran through her. If he would only come—as she knew he would come—to demand the reason of her lateness. Waiting was torture.

And yet when the door burst open and banged violently to again and she heard his heavy step behind her, the dread she had felt before was as nothing to the paralyzing fear that now rushed over her, robbing her of all power of movement.

She could have shrieked when his hands closed with crushing force on her shoulders and he swung her round to face him. But she managed to control herself and meet his furious stare courageously. He was in the quarrelsome stage of semi-intoxication that of late had been his usual state, drunk enough to be cruel and vindictive, sober enough to be dangerous.

"Not dressed yet! What the hell have you been doing all this time? You're damnably late!"

She was used to being sworn at; she had come to feel that nothing he could say could hurt her any more; and tonight it did not seem to matter very much what he said.

She forced herself to answer him.

"I'm not going to the ball, Clyde."

He glared at her in speechless anger.

"The devil you're not! And why, might I ask?" he bellowed furiously.

Panic-driven, the temptation to evade the issue she had raised, the cowardly impulse to plead illness to allay his wrath, was almost more than she could suppress. But she fought back the words that rushed to her lips and turned away with a little hopeless gesture.

"You know why," she said in a low voice.

"I'm damned if I do!"

She turned to him swiftly.

"You do know, Clyde," she said steadily. "You know perfectly well why I dread going out with you. You've known ever since we were married."

"I know you're a little fool," he retorted angrily. "Look here, Marny, I've had enough of this nonsense. You'll go to this damn ball whether you like it or not, just as you will go anywhere and everywhere I choose you shall go. I'll give you ten minutes to be ready—not a second more. And you can keep your infernal objections to yourself in future. I'm not going to be preached at by anybody, much less by you. Look sharp and don't keep me waiting any longer. Ten minutes—that's your limit," he shouted and moved as if to leave the room.

She shivered, her pale face whiter than before, but her determination was stronger than her fear.

"It's no use, Clyde. I'm not going," she said slowly. And for the first time he heard a ring of obstinacy in her voice.

He swung back towards her, staring at her for a moment incredulously, rocking slightly on his feet, his big hands clenching as he worked himself up to a pitch of passionate rage.

"You mean that?" he said quickly.

Her dry lips almost refused their office.

"Yes," she whispered faintly.

"You deliberately disobey me?"

She wrung her hands in sudden agony. "I've always obeyed you, always done what you wished. But this—oh, I can't!"

He towered over her, his bloodshot eyes menacing. "You can't?" he sneered. "I rather think you both can and will. There's only one person in this house who says 'can't'—and that's me. You'll do what you're told, now and always. Put on that dress—and God help you if you keep me waiting!"

She lifted a quivering face of appeal.

"Clyde—I—Clyde!" Her voice broke in a cry of terrible anguish as he struck her, the whole weight of his powerful body behind the smashing blow that sent her reeling across the room to fall with a crash on the parquet floor.

He looked down at her callously, his crimson face twitching, his big frame shaking with passion. Then he walked slowly across the room and sat down heavily on the bed, his smoldering eyes still fixed with a look of cruel satisfaction on the prostrate little figure that lay so still. He had no compunction for what he had done. She was his—and if she had not yet learned who was master it was time she learned it now, once and for all.

She stirred at last, moaning with pain, her slender body convulsed with terrible shuddering. Dragging herself to her feet she stood swaying giddily, her hands pressed on her throbbing temple, her heavy eyes looking listlessly about her till they rested at length on Geradine's massive figure, and into them there flashed suddenly the horror of dawning remembrance. With a little choking sound she turned and staggering a few steps fell into a chair before the dressing table, burying her head in her arms amongst the costly appointments that littered its shining surface, her shoulders shaking with hard, tearless sobs.

And as Geradine had watched her insensible, so did he watch her now, pitiless and unmoved. He had no use for half measures. If she had to be taught a lesson it should be at least a thorough one. He lurched to his feet and strode across the room.

"How much longer are you going to keep me waiting?"

The harsh words jarred like a stab of actual pain, and sick and faint she raised her eyes to his. One look convinced her of his determination. He meant it, oh, very well she knew he meant it! Too dazed, too broken to oppose him further, she knew that she would have to obey. With a stifled gasp of pain she struggled to her feet, her head reeling, and caught at the table for support, pushing the heavy hair off her forehead and wincing as her fingers touched her injured temple.

"If you will please go I will ring for my maid," she muttered indistinctly, choking back the sobs that rose in her throat.

"I'll go when it suits me, and you'll ring for no maid," he said sharply. "You'll dress a damn sight quicker with me in the room. It won't be the first time I've valeted you, and it won't be the last, I'm willing to bet. And I'm hanged if I'll have that grim faced old harridan you call your maid poking her nose in where she isn't wanted. I'm about fed up with her as it is. She's not the kind of woman I want about you, anyhow. She'll have to go, and the sooner the better. You can pay her her wages tomorrow and tell her to clear out by the first available boat."

"Clyde!" The sharp cry was wrung from her. And forgetting her pain, her fear, everything but the heartless ultimatum he had launched at her, she sprang towards him, clutching at him with trembling hands, her face working convulsively, pleading as she would not have stooped to plead for herself.

"Clyde, Clyde, you don't mean it, you can't mean it! You can't send her away, you couldn't be so cruel. She's old, I'm all she's got, it would kill her to leave me. And you promised—you promised me faithfully I might keep her. I know it's only to punish me—but don't punish me through her. It will break her heart. Oh, Clyde, be generous! Do what I ask, just this once. If you let me keep her I'll never oppose you again. I'll do anything you wish—I'll be anything you wish——"

A sneering look of triumph crossed his face as he flung her from him. "You'll do as I wish without any bargains, my lady," he said significantly. "You've had your orders and there's an end of the matter. The thing's finished. And might I remind you that the horses have already been waiting an hour?"

That was apparently all that mattered to him. Of less value at the moment than the pedigreed animals he prized, her distress of mind, the pain and weariness of her bruised and aching body, were beyond his consideration. A feeling of numbness came over her, a kind of frozen apathy that seemed to turn her into a mere automaton, and without a word she turned slowly to do his bidding. She had a curious impression that the white-faced, weary looking woman reflected in her mirror was some other than herself, that, divorced from her own body she was watching the suffering of a total stranger. And as she dressed with mechanical haste only one thing was clear and instant with her—the consciousness of menacing eyes that followed her every movement until their burning stare became a veritable torment. But throughout the process of her toilet he spoke only once, a characteristic remark:

"Put a bit o' color on your face. You're as white as a ghost."

"I haven't any," she faltered.

"Haven't—any? Good God!" he ejaculated and relapsed into silence.

But when she was dressed he came to her, and as his critical gaze traveled slowly over her slim figure the heavy scowl smoothed from his face and the old look of proprietary admiration crept back into his eyes. With the quick change of mood that was so marked in him he caught her in his arms with sudden passion.

"Damn it all, Marny, what the devil do you want to make me lose my temper for?" he grumbled petulantly. "Give me a kiss, and don't be such a little fool again."

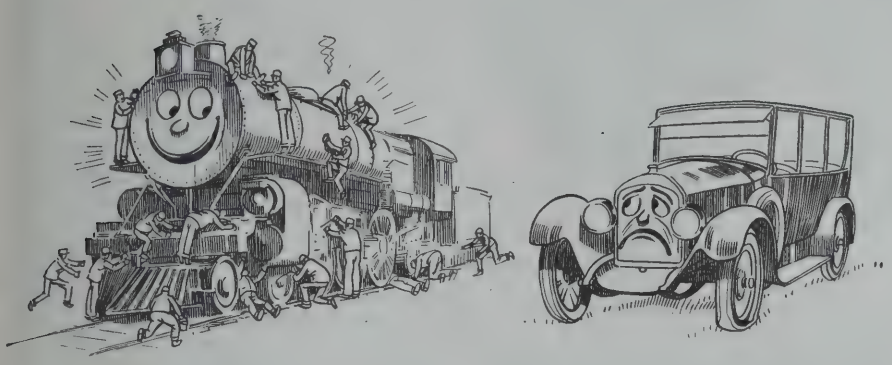
Sick with loathing but helpless against his strength, perforce she lifted her face to his. But unsatisfied, he laughed with angry contempt. "Do you call that a kiss? Gad, you've a lot to learn!" he said scornfully, and crushed his mouth once more against her trembling lips. Then he let her go and, swelling with the sense of his own magnanimity, hurried her with heavy jocularity to the waiting carriage, there to soothe his ruffled feelings with a cigar which he smoked in silence during the short drive into Algiers.

And huddled in her own corner of the roomy victoria, Marny leaned back and rested her aching head against the cushions, staring before her with fixed unseeing eyes.

During the five years that had been a physical as well as mental martyrdom she had suffered much at her husband's hands. In the furious rages to which he was liable he had often hurt her cruelly, but until tonight he had never deliberately struck her. But it was not of his brutality towards herself that Geradine's wife was thinking now as the carriage rolled swiftly along the deserted road. Her mind was filled with only one thought. Ann! How to tell her. How to break to the faithful old woman the fact that her lifelong service must end so abruptly, so callously.

Her husband's impatient voice roused her to the fact that the carriage was at a standstill. Tonight, the gala night of the year, the Governor's palace was filled to overflowing, a scene of vivid animation, gorgeous with oriental splendor, rioting with color and echoing with a confusion of voices laughing and chattering in a score of different languages. The spacious rooms, flaming with lights and decorated with a wealth of scented flowers, were crowded—a motley gathering of nearly every race and creed moving in a never-ceasing stream to the strains of the crashing military band.

The gaudy costumes of the desert sheiks, the crimson burnouses of the grave faced Caids, the striking and picturesque uniforms of Spahis and Zouaves, made distinctive notes in the brilliant assembly that eclipsed even the radiant hues of the marvelous toilettes of the French and English ladies.



There were many curious glances that followed and many eager tongues that discussed the tardy appearance of the two important English guests as they made their slow passage across the room, and the Governor, whose twinkling eyes were roving constantly in quest of new faces, was quick to notice their arrival. Punctilious to a nicety, he stepped forward to greet them with a deference that was due to Geradine's rank and to the beauty of his wife. But as she responded to his gallant and happy little speech of welcome Marny's voice faltered slightly and her pale face flushed with a wave of beautiful color; for near her in a little group of desert men beside the Governor's dais she saw Carew standing, clad like them in native robes but distinguished by the dark blue burnous he affected. And Geradine, whose French was as limited as was the Governor's English, while replying somewhat laboriously to his host's courtesies, had also noticed the tall Arab-clad figure and grasped eagerly at the chance of cutting short a conversation that bored him infinitely.

"I'm hanged if that isn't my friend of the sandstorm," he exclaimed, and waved pointedly at Carew who, unwilling to add to the public attention already aroused, came forward reluctantly and submitted to a boisterous greeting. With a loud laugh Geradine turned again to the visibly astonished Governor.

"Seems a decent sort of chap," he said condescendingly. "Pulled me out of no end of a hole in the desert a week or two ago. Introduce him to my wife, will you? She's interested in the natives. And Marny," he added, his own slight interest already evaporating, "you speak the lingo better than I do, say something civil to the fellow—only for heaven's sake remember he's a Mohammedan and don't put your foot into it and inquire for his wife and family. And when you're tired of him His Excellency will find you partners if you want to dance. I'm off to get a drink." And with a careless nod he swung on his heel in search of the nearest buffet.

His graceless incivility was no more than much that Marny had been called upon frequently to endure, but tonight his boorishness was almost more than she could bear. His mistake with regard to Carew though regrettable was a perfectly natural one, but his cavalier treatment of the courteous little Frenchman was unpardonable. Scarlet with shame and confusion, she could find no words to break

The Engine Gets It Your Car Deserves It

THE Twentieth Century Limited had stopped at Albany. An important executive of an automobile company got off the train with two friends for a stroll along the platform.

As they passed the engine he called attention to the crew of seven men which was giving a thorough inspection to all the important working parts, to be sure they were in condition to make the remainder of the run.

"That engine," he said, "has run only 146 miles. And just look what a careful inspection she's getting. Yet an automobile owner will drive his car for thousands of miles,—not on a smooth steel track either—without giving it any attention at all.

"Then, if anything goes wrong, he blames the manufacturer and talks freely among his friends about 'that piece of junk.'"

There's a lesson here for every driver. The automobile is a finely adjusted piece of mechanism. It is built for use but not for abuse. Give your car a chance.

The dealer and the manufacturer are let in for a lot of unnecessary criticism for car faults which, in many cases, are the result of neglect by the owners.

Don't wait for faults to develop in your car. Your dealer has a station where it can be inspected regularly. The old motto, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," applies to automobiles as well as everything else.

And the ounce of prevention costs much less.

the awkward silence that ensued. But the Governor, whose saving sense of humor was fortunately greater than his feeling of mortification, plunged nobly into the breach and made the best of the embarrassing situation in which he found himself.

"Madame," he stammered, with twitching lips, "I—I have the honor to present to you Monsieur Carew—a compatriot of your own," and fled to hide his secret enjoyment of a contretemps he found exquisitely amusing. Carew the woman hater—and he had just introduced him to the most beautiful woman in Algiers. Bon Dieu, quelle comédie!

But to Marny it was no comedy. Miserable and tongue-tied, giddy with pain, she tried vainly to collect herself, to formulate some adequate excuse that should cover her husband's blunder and lessen the resentment she was sure the man beside her must feel at being publicly forced into an action that was totally against his universally known principles. Would he blame her for being the cause, though the unwitting cause, of his present predicament? Would he too leave her in this crowded room, the cynosure of curious eyes, to find her way alone to the group of English dowagers with whom she had the slightest acquaintance? Super-sensitive and innately shy, the very thought of it made her shrink.

The few seconds that had passed since the Governor's hurried departure seemed magnified into hours. Angry at her own gaucherie, she had nerved herself to make some halting apology when the opening bars of a waltz rising above the din of conversation occasioned a general rush for partners and in the comparative quiet that followed she heard the deep soft voice that had become so dear to her speaking with the slow hesitancy she had noticed before.

"You are looking very tired, Lady Geradine. Shall I take you out of this babel?"

And almost before she realized it she found herself walking beside him down the length of the long room, piloted skilfully between the dancing couples who already filled the floor. Once or twice he paused to exchange a nod and a passing word with a uniformed officer or an isolated group of Arabs, but she hardly noticed these slight interruptions; and at length they reached the rapidly emptying entrance hall. Crossing it, he turned down a short corridor that opened into a little winter garden where chairs were placed amongst palms and banks of tropical plants. At the moment the place was deserted. And quiet and dimly lighted, to Marny it seemed a haven of refuge after the glare and noise of the crowded reception rooms. With a feeling of relief she followed him to a fern-screened couch at the farther end of the conservatory and sank into the low seat, stripping the long gloves from her hands and closing her eyes wearily. Looking down at her, Carew saw her face convulsed with a sudden spasm of pain.

In a scene more powerful and dramatic than any in "The Sheik," Marny and El Hakim and Geradine cast the die of destiny. See February COSMOPOLITAN on sale at all news stands January 10.

The Return of the Tide

"For Heaven's sake!" Josie exclaimed, turning from one face to another in distress. "That doesn't sound like ma! Is she as blue as all that?"

"Oh my!" Annie and Ida and Mary all ejaculated together, shaking their heads in mournful triumph. "You wouldn't know her, Jo. She's just—well, she's a different woman!"

Josie made no answer in words, but her eyes watered with a sort of angry and incredulous pain. The girls were exaggerating, she thought resentfully. She had come from her trim little home, her nicely managed little establishment, with its clean Danish girl in the kitchen and its delightful order and prosperity, and everything here in the old environment looked shabby, shiftless, unnecessarily ugly to her.

After the first flush of meeting Annie, she had noted the general poverty and plainness of Annie's house and the worn, patient courage of Annie's soul and body. She had at once suspected Annie's secret, and the fact itself annoyed her, as well as the fact that Annie did not tell her about it. Another baby! Jo thought despairingly, her intolerance springing from sheer affection for and loyalty to Annie, and yet hurting Annie far more than mere indifference would have done.

Then Jim hurt her, too, for Josie adored her only brother, and the thought that this wretched attempt at merrymaking tomorrow was to be made without him cut her to the heart. No, he said quietly to her coaxing, he'd a little rather not try it tomorrow. They weren't to worry about him, they weren't to think about him at all. He'd be all right.

To put a final touch upon Josie's discouragement, young Marty, who had been visiting her, developed a thick, painful throat this evening. If Marty had mumps, then of course Rose Agnes would have mumps! And probably the whole Curley nursery would catch them, and perhaps poor Ida, who never had had them, and who was in no condition to fight any illness. Josie wished heartily that they had never attempted this ridiculous party!

John and Frank and Jim and Danny, warned not to go near ma, went out after dinner to see old friends in the neighborhood. But the women sat about in Annie's crowded parlor, putting the finishing touches to Christmas dolls and beribboned doilies, and talking, in continually sinking and saddening voices, of family matters. And Josie was conscious only of a desire to scream at them all that they were a helpless, stupid, fearful lot, and then grab her baby and rush back to her own home, where women read the backs of the magazines and men were not afraid of losing jobs. Frank Curley had nothing to be afraid of—he was a master mechanic, after all, and there were other iron works in the world. To have Annie, who had been so pretty and so neat, sighing here and wiping her eyes and biting threads——

Marty, asleep upon a lounge, woke up fretful. His throat hurt. The women looked at each other, appalled.

"Try him on a teaspoonful of vinegar, Jo!" Annie whispered as they threaded

Good News

That millions of women tell

Millions of women, all the world over, have found a way to prettier teeth. Some by dental advice, some by this ten-day test.

They have spread the news to others. Now wherever you look you see glistening teeth, and more smiles to show them.

We urge you again to accept this test and prove to yourself what they know.

Must combat film

That viscous film you feel on teeth must be combated daily. Otherwise it clings, enters crevices and stays. It forms the basis of cloudy coats, including tartar.

It also holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film, and very few escape them.

Why it remains

The tooth brush and the ordinary tooth paste cannot effectively combat it. So nearly everybody, however careful, had teeth discolor and decay.

Dental science has for years tried to combat this condition. Two ways have now been found. Able authorities have proved them, and leading dentists now urge their daily use.

A new-type tooth paste has been perfected, called Pepsodent. It corrects some old mistakes. These two great film combatants are embodied in it for daily application.

It does far more

Pepsodent does more than that. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids—the cause of tooth decay.

It omits soap and chalk, which now are known to bring undesired effects.

You'll know at once

Pepsodent brings quick results. A week will make them conspicuous. Once you see and feel them you will never go without them, or let your children miss them.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear. Learn the delights of Pepsodent, with the added protection and beauty it brings.

Do this without delay. Cut out the coupon now. This is most important.

their way between the filled beds in the dark bedroom. "My goodness, I wish we could ask ma!"

They were to reach ma's just at noon the next day; by eleven o'clock they were all tired to the breaking point. Annie had dragged herself to early mass, sick and dizzy; had come back to roast turkey and boil potatoes even while every fiber of her being was in revolt at the mere smell of food. She spoke to the children gently, screamed at them, and spoke gently and apologetically again. Frank did his best, buttoning clean rompers wrongly and misunderstanding directions.

Through a sweet, clean Christmas noon, of dazzling snow and bright sunshine, with bells ringing and holiday joy abroad in every red-painted coaster and consciously worn fur collar, they presently trooped to the old house. By this time the children were in wild spirits, and John and Dan laughing together, and even to Annie's lifeless cheek an unwonted happy flush had sprung.

The gate creaked; they were up the path, they were at the door. How well they knew the rubbed dirty space about the bell, and the penciled "Roslyn 369" that some impatient messenger had scrawled there!

A long delay; then ma at last, with an amazed, almost truculent look in her handsome face, and one big foot bare. She had been soaking her foot in a bucket of warm water; she looked as if her privacy had been somewhat outraged.

"Well, whatever!" she said dryly. "I thought I was to go to Annie! And you're down, Josie? Forevermore! Take his cap off, Frank, for the Lord's sake, the way he won't have his ribbons all chewed to nothing on you! It's a wonder you wouldn't let a body know—I've a taste of stew in the ice box, and that's all——"

Even their greetings, their resolute laughter and comment, could not quite carry it, could not make the ensuing hours a success. Even when the kitchen stove and the stove in the parlor were roaring hot, and the presents had been given, and the table enlarged and set, and the cranberry sauce divided into glass saucers, there was a consciousness of something forced in their hilarity and something missing to their felicity.

The women chattered courageously; ma wasn't to do anything, but they did everything gaily as they moved to and fro. Annie's face blazed, she looked her pretty self again with her red cheeks and shining eyes; she had pinned on a great, stiff white apron, and put a cluster of red berries into her lifeless, meekly looped hair. Mary was irresistible, and Josie merry and affectionate and full of stories and gossip that were new. Ida sat near her mother-in-law, a little breathless and more than a little apprehensive. She kept running over the months upon nervous finger tips; June to February came out nine, over and over, and yet she did have a queerish feeling that was not quite unfamiliar, nor insignificant!

The men helped clumsily, eagerly, or stood about large and awkward, smoking. Any little topic of conversation that they could keep moving they followed with passionate seriousness. Also they spoke frequently to the children, who were beginning to feel restless and hungry, as the clock struck two.

It was ma who was responsible for all this discomfort. Ma, who in old times had been the animated, garrulous, loving, dictatorial heart of all their groups, was oddly changed and aged today. She received them magisterially, with a certain aloof dignity. She watched them, she listened, she considered her answers. There was a stiffness, a sort of tacit disapproval in her manner that made them all uneasy.

This had been home to her three girls, once. But nobody felt at home today. The irresistible currents of life had drawn them away, one by one, and they were alien here. The depth and passion of their mother's love had been able to show itself, after all, only in endless little services, in the daily intimacies of coffee cups and ironing board; now those services were no longer needed, and those intimacies had been long interrupted, and she felt her children to be strangers.

More than that, her only son was absent; roaming the snowy world desolate and alone, his big heart aching for his son. And when she remembered Jim, Mrs. Callahan's heroic struggle to seem natural and happy died away in ashes and despair. It was a fine Christmas Day whatever, she reflected, without a sight or sound of the lad!

"Do you know, I think she would have liked it better if we'd put the whole job up to her," Mary murmured despondently to Annie in a moment of privacy. "I believe she'd have liked to do it—I'm afraid it's kind of hurt her, our taking it out of her hands!"

"I think so too," Josie agreed, stricken. "She acts so funny. She just answers yes and no—not a bit like ma!"

"Well, we'll just have to go on with it," Annie answered, sighing. For the dinner was in the actual process of dishing up.

From an epicurean standpoint, nothing could have excelled the meal. Ma herself had never roasted more wonderful turkeys, Josie's biscuit was perfection, there were gravy and jelly and dressing and corn pudding for a multitude. The children stuffed, passed plates, and stuffed anew; their elders showed only slightly inferior appetites.

And yet there was a singular heaviness in the air. Ida secretly mourned for her absent Jim, and counted the months from June to December with a sinking heart. Annie filled Frank's plate with the choicest bits of everything, timidly watching for his smile. Josie talked gallantly, although a certain feverish heaviness upon the part of little Rose Agnes was making her heart stand still with terror. Ma ate, complimented the cooks punctiliously, addressed herself principally to her grandchildren. She remarked that little Francis had been with them at Christmas two years ago and wondered aloud who would go next.

Failure. The family dinner was an absolute failure. Annie could have wept, thinking of the money and time and effort that had been wasted to force this wretched affair into being. The men were heavy, dull and in the way, when the ice cream and cake were finished and the children were ubiquitous and quarrelsome.

The sun had gone behind leaden clouds, and a cold raw wind was blowing over the sunless snow. Josie was practically and briskly preparing the six children for a good half-hour's play out-of-doors when her husband, in his capacity as doctor, interfered. It would be dangerous, flushed and tired and excited as they were, to send them out so late in the winter afternoon, he said. No, Rose Agnes positively should not go. No, it was not safe.

John was always so gentle and kind that Josie felt his tacit reproof like a blow. Tears were in her eyes as she wiped glasses and spoons and knives, and plates and plates and plates, at the old familiar sink. Ida was ready for tears too; it was a strange Christmas Day without Jim. And Annie was exhausted almost to the point of joining them; she felt as if it were physically impossible for her to get home this afternoon, and get Frank a cup of tea, and tumble the children into bed.

"Put your coat on, Frank dear, and step up toward the cemetery and see if maybe you can't get hold of Jim and tell him how bad ma feels!" she whispered over the hot, clean knives. "Don't worry, darling!" she added, kissing him tenderly as he turned to obey.

But as the patient, shabby shoulders disappeared, in the stiff thick old coat, she felt a dry ache of tears in her throat, and she ran after him to kiss him again.

"Ma," Josie asked anxiously, "how do you know when it's mumps?"

"I suppose by taking them into a hospital and cutting something out of them!" her mother replied witheringly; and although Josie joined in the laugh that followed, it was not without a glance half pitying and half pleading to ma.

The shabby old rooms were very hot and heavy with food odors now, and in frightful disorder. Christmas toys were mingled in among the mussy plates and tumbled napkins, and the steamed windows were marked by dirty little sticky fingers.

It was Matt Curley, masticating an immense hard chocolate candy, and lounging in youthful ennui against one of these windows, who said suddenly, over the general hubbub of the dining room:

"Oh, gee, look—it's a drunk! Oo, no, it's not—they're bringing him in—it's a man that's been killed——"

"God save us, what's the child talking about?" Annie muttered, as she and Mary and Josie flew to the window. "Oh, God be good to us! God be good to us!" she said, in a hard tone that rang through the room.

One moment, peaceful dishwashing and cheerful Christmas disorder. And the next moment—this! This view of the familiar yard, the gate blocked with snow, the bare lilacs rattling in a bleak wind under a sullen sky. And the men—strange, silent, huddling men, in their heavy, worn overcoats, bringing in something hideous, heart-stopping—bringing something in——

There were screams, and the stamping of quick feet, and the children were pushed aside. A bitter draught of icy out-of-door air clove through the thick, food-scented rooms. Big muddy feet trampled in; the cluttered table was shoved aside; they laid Frank Curley down upon the dining room lounge. To the half-circle of pallid-faced, terrified women, some man, gruffly and awkwardly, spoke:

"It was Cottle's car—poor Frank was up by the Iron Works—he'd asked some feller there had he seen Jim Callahan. It was Cottle's fault—there was a cop right there, and he said so!"

"Oh, God help us—God preserve us!" the women whispered, their eyes upon the helpless, sodden lump that was Frank. A great gasp and shudder went through the craning group when Mary, her young face ashen, gently eased the crushed head upon a crimson velvet cushion, and Frank moaned.

Suddenly Annie came through the press; Annie, with the freckles showing upon her pale, strained face, and the years of patient motherhood stamped upon her flat, thin body; Annie, with work-worn hands and her sweet, trembling mouth.

She sank quietly upon her knees beside him and took the torn, discolored hand that had been roughly rolled in mud and snow in her own hand, and her thin cheek rested upon his rich disordered hair. Over and over again the motherly voice said softly, breathlessly:

"Frank—my sweetheart! My own true husband——"

She looked bewildered at John Concannon as he gently put her aside. Josie, crying bitterly, was holding a basin of water; Mary, ashen-faced, was behind the couch, supporting the stained muddy head. In the background there was a huddle of terrified faces; Annie saw her baby boy in his highchair, with his big new ball in his fingers, and with a piteous trembling of his little mouth.

She caught him to her flat breast, stumbled into the kitchen, Matt and Helen clinging to her blindly, and found herself and her children suddenly caught in her mother's great arms.

"Come now, darlin'," said the familiar voice, with all its old heartening vitality and ring. "Annie—be a woman, dear! He'll want to see you the minute he opens his eyes. It's only a bad fall, dear! Take courage to yourself——"

"Ma——" It was poor Ida, forgotten in the last few moments of uproar, but staggering with pain and clinging tightly to the big comforting shoulder. "Ma—I don't know that I can get home——"

Mrs. Callahan, distracted in spite of herself, fixed alert eyes upon her son's wife. With Ida writhing and helpless, and Annie sunk in a stupor of agony upon a chair, with children pale and frightened about her, a sudden energy and courage almost youthful seemed to descend like a visible mantle upon their mother.

"The dear Lord stand by!" she said, richly and heartily concerned. "Don't you have a moment of worry, Ida dear, you'll do fine! Matt, take a handful of wood and run up to Aunt Josie's old room and make a grand little fire in the stove," she commanded. "Get hold of Uncle Dan, Helen, and tell him Gogga wants him. I'll send Mary upstairs with you, dear, and you just take everything easy—it'll all be over very quick this time, I told you so a month ago! John's here when you need him, and as soon as poor Frank feels better—sit where you are, Annie, and keep the baby in your arms—you poor girl, you. I'll go in and find out how things are going——"

Brisk, capable, resourceful, she stepped from her kitchen with the old, erect step of long ago. She immediately assumed control of everything that was passing in the dining room; somehow the onlookers scattered, and the children disappeared, and the door was closed. And by degrees, with here a little help from Josie and there a little more from Mary the big table was cleared and pushed empty against a wall, and order succeeded chaos.

He thought he knew her well

NO matter how well you know a person—maybe even your very closest friend — there is one subject you instinctively avoid.

You may discuss the most intimate things about your family, your business and your personal affairs, but this one topic you dodge. There is something about halitosis (the scientific term meaning unpleasant breath) that seems to forbid honest conversation about it.

Yet the insidious thing about halitosis is the unfortunate fact that any one may suffer from it and in nine cases out of ten you are not conscious of it yourself. So unless you use some sensible scientific precaution you may go through your day or evening uncomfortable and concerned, wondering whether or not you are offending people about you.

Unless halitosis is a symptom of some serious organic disorder which a physician or dentist should correct, you may easily put yourself upon the safe and polite side by using Listerine, the well-known liquid antiseptic.

Meet halitosis in this scientific way—by using Listerine systematically as a mouth-wash and gargle. It is the ideally effective breath deodorant.

Fastidious people everywhere make Listerine a regular part of their daily toilet routine. It acts quickly and pleasantly. It halts food fermentation in the mouth and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean.

Your druggist has handled Listerine for years, and regards it as a safe, effective antiseptic of great merit. It has now been on the market for half a century, and has dozens of other uses as well.

Start using Listerine today. Put your mind at ease. Don't be in doubt another day about your breath.—Lambert Pharmacal Company, Saint Louis, U.S.A.

Outside, the dark, brooding Christmas Day moved heavily to twilight. The wind, howling bleakly, ruffled the shawls and hats of frightened women, gathered whispering and glancing, in the snowy yard. Josie and Mary, and John and the strange doctor, fussed incessantly about the still unconscious and occasionally moaning Frank. Annie had the old rocker close beside her husband now; the baby was asleep in her lap, one of her thin, work-worn hands held Frank's hand.

Dan came back with the nurse for Ida. John Concannon was free for a few minutes to step upstairs. And Josie waylaid him in passing, and drew him into the big bedroom next to Ida's—the bedroom that had for so long been Jim's. Would he just look at Marty and Rose Agnes? Wouldn't it be the terrible thing if this was mumps?

They had a brief talk, husband and wife, and then ma came panting up, to find Josie in frightened tears.

"Shame upon you, Josie Callahan, the way you would be weeping and lamenting over such a thing entirely!" said ma roundly, half shaking and half embracing the terrified Josie. "Wit' poor Annie never letting a cry out of her—and the child smilin' up in the face of her, and his father all but dead on him——"

"All but dead?" Josie echoed, shocked, and instantly upon her feet, her tears dried. "Ma—is he so badly hurt?"

"We don't know yet, dear," said John gently. But he slowly shook his head. Josie looked from one to the other, her lips steady and a new look in her eyes.

"Why, mumps are nothing!" she said, quickly and reassuringly. "Rose Agnes would have to have them sometime, and I don't know where I'd rather be than here with ma! I'll put her in one bed, ma, and Marty in the other, and John can go back home without me when he has to go!"

"Well, now you're talking like yourself, dear, and you a great comfort—for all you're so nervous about the child, entirely!" her mother said in approval.

"And is Ida better, John?" Josie asked as she dried her eyes and began to examine the available blankets and pillows.

"Ida?" he said, smiling a little. "You know what's happening there?"

"What!" Josie whispered, aghast. And as her look met their answering, significant glances, she turned a little pale, undecided whether to laugh or cry. "Ma!" she faltered. And then "Ma——"

"Well, why not? Sure, she's much more comfortable here, with the pack of us to look out for her," Mrs. Callahan said reassuringly. "It won't be much work! I've got the turkey pretty well cut up—we'll have a big pot of stew and a sheet of me cornbread for supper. And that'll be enough, with plenty of tea all night in case me young lady here"—she glanced toward Ida's room—"keeps us all up. And please God it'll be a healthy baby, boy or girl—for it's a little soon—and give Jim something to fill up the poor broken heart of him!"

"I'll get these youngsters to bed and fire up the other stove," said Josie, capably.

"Mumps, is it?" asked Mary, who had just come in, and stood, in her water-and blood-stained Christmas finery, smiling at the now consciously important Matt and Helen. "Well, never a dull moment—that's your house, ma! Kate's come in," she added, "and she said she'd take Helen and Matt home with her, the way they wouldn't get the contagion, and Jule Mooney's here, she's got the kitchen like a pin. Dan's gone off to find Jim."

"I'll give Jim Callahan a piece of my mind, walking off on all of us this way!" Mrs. Callahan said heartily. Her daughters' surprised looks met; there was in them a certain deep amusement and relief. It was good to hear ma scolding and bossing again! And ma went downstairs with the step that had not echoed so buoyantly through the shabby old house in months. She had mourned, she had brooded, she had petted and sympathized with Jim. But there was no health in all that compared with this sturdy and vigorous resentment!

"You'd think it would kill her," Mary whispered, following.

"Well, there's no help for it anyway!" Josie said.

At seven o'clock that evening Jim Callahan came quietly downstairs and into his mother's kitchen. He looked weary, but there was an expression of utter peace upon the handsome dark face, and his Irish blue eyes were dark with happy tears under the black crest of hair.

His mother, in an iron-gray calico, with a great stiff white apron tied about her waist and a knitted pink and gray shawl about her shoulders, was seated in a big rocker by the range. A good fire was going, and now she rose, opened the oven door and placed before her son a great plate of smoking, delicious food.

Jim looked at her a little timidly; her expression was magnificently stern. But it was wonderful to him to have ma her old, scolding, busy self again, managing the whole crowd of them with this scornful, brisk superiority. He brushed his face against her arm affectionately and said boyishly:

"Go on, ma. Jump me, and have it over!"

"A big, strong feller like you," his mother began readily and witheringly, "stravaging the streets on Christmas Day like a Turk that has no home, and poor Ida and the little one-een laying up there—and might be dying like poor Rose Devlin herself, and you maybe at that minute buying yourself a cigar!"

"I didn't buy myself any cigars today," poor Jim said meekly. "I—I'm ashamed of myself, ma. But somehow—being Christmas—and thinking of him—the square little friendly feller he was——"

"Well, now you've got another boy to worry the heart out of you and have measles and sauce you back and play hookey and smoke cigareets on you, the way you done on me!" his mother said roundly and unemotionally. "Did Kate give you a peek at the child?"

"She brought him in. Ide and I had a look at him, and then Ide went to sleep," Jim said, grinning, and then openly wiping his suddenly wet eyes. "He seems a fine little feller. I—I am grateful, ma. I'm not going to let little Frank's going spoil everything for Ide any more. I'm going to take her and the children out for picnics—the way we've always done—I know I've made it harder. I'm sorry, ma. I don't know what got into me. But it'll all be different now. You'll see!"

"I wouldn't wonder if the Lord would take the others now, if there's any more of this running off from your good wife and breaking her heart on her!" his mother warned him sternly.

"Yes, I know, ma. You'll see, ma!"

"Well, I hope I will!" Mrs. Callahan said briefly. "Fine goings on for the man of the family," she muttered. "And now," she added suddenly, with a glance at the closed dining room door, and in a lowered voice, "now maybe with Annie—poor ger'.l!"

Jim's face shadowed.

"I know it!" he said quickly. "It makes me ashamed that I ever thought of my own trouble. Ma, we'll stand by her if poor Frank don't pull through, won't we?"

"She'll have her mother and her mother's home, and we'll do what we can," his mother said, with a sudden quiver of her handsome mouth.

"Any change, ma?" And Jim glanced in turn at the dining room door.

His mother compressed her mouth, narrowed her eyes and slowly shook her head. Mary and Dan, returning from a trip to their own home, where Cecelia and Helen and Matt were established for the night, quietly entered the kitchen, shuddering with the cold, and powdered with the first flakes of a fresh blizzard.

"Any change, ma?" Mary whispered. And "Any change, ma?" Josie, returning from a last glance at the victims of the mumps, echoed anxiously.

"No, there's no change," their mother answered with a significant look. And heavily she added: "There'll be no change. John's there, and poor Annie sits there—she won't go to bed. We'll have to stand to poor Annie now, ger'rls——"

"Oh, ma, we will!" Mary and Josie cried passionately, one on each side of her on their knees, arms locked about her.

"She and her children will never want," Jim said steadily. "Poor Frank didn't speak to me. But when she was out of the room I knelt down beside him and I said that to him. And the look that come into his eyes—he knew what I meant! There's many a millionaire that doesn't leave his children what Frank Curley does!"

"You said the truth then," Mrs. Callahan assented, with a great sigh. And for a few minutes there was silence in the warm, orderly kitchen. Then ma roused herself, glanced at the stove, glanced at the clock.

"Well, I'm going to set me bread," she announced, rising. "With sickness in the house there's not much good in baker's stuff. Christmas—and all of us together for a little celebration—and look what's in it! May God make us resigned! Life's short for all of us!"

But in the firm, capable hand that reached for the pan, and in the bend of the straight back, and in the keen glance of the black Irish eyes, there was no sign of breaking. Life and death were hovering over her house, and the future was chaos, but the years had brought back the Callahan children to ma's guidance and ma's service, and the heart of Agnes Callahan, little as she or anyone else suspected it, was singing a song of gratitude and triumph within her breast.

A very small thing may change a man's whole life and outlook. It did with "The Man Afraid of His Job," by Kathleen Norris, in COSMOPOLITAN for February.

The charm of your Complexion depends upon the care you give it.

PRACTICALLY everyone has a reasonably good skin. Barring digestive disorders which cause skin eruptions and can easily be remedied by proper dieting, the real cause for so-called "bad" skin is just neglect. This is not a pretty thought but a plain statement of fact. If you stop to consider the millions of atoms of dust and dirt with which you are thrown in contact in every day life, you can begin to see that a good deal of it probably works its way into the pores of your skin. If this is not cleaned out thoroughly at least once a day, particle collects upon particle and the result is clogged pores and muddy skin.

Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream is the best skin cleanser you can use. It will remove the dirt from the pores and give them a chance to breathe, thus starting the blood circulating properly. A very simple treatment which applies to all skins is worked out as follows:

Just before retiring—this time is best because your facial muscles will be relaxed while you are sleeping—take a piece of cotton or soft gauze and squeeze it out in cold or tepid water. Dip this in your jar of Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream and apply it liberally to the face, the neck, behind the ears, on the hands. Close your eyes and enjoy the delicious sense of relaxation. After a few minutes wipe away the cream with a clean soft towel or bit of gauze. Regular nightly treatment of this sort will make your skin as fresh and attractive as Nature ordained it to be.

Daggett & Ramsdell's Perfect Cold Cream is sold everywhere at Pre-War Prices. In Tubes, 10c, 25c and 50c. In Jars, 35c, 50c, 85c and $1.50.

His Children's Children

lifted her face and he saw that her eyes were swimming with tears.

"Come to the reception room!" he said, taking her by the arm and leading her towards the door. She followed willingly enough—but rather as if in a trance. Over his shoulder Maitland could see Florian hurrying down the corridor in the direction of the dining room. He could feel Sheila's heart beating against the back of his hand. They reached the reception room and Maitland pushed Sheila gently across the threshold in front of him, closing the door as Diana took her sister in her arms.

"Forgive me!" she begged. "I was horrid to you this morning!"

Sheila let Diana kiss her, then stepped back and threw a glance of inquiry at Maitland.

"Did you two come together?"

"Naturally," he answered. "I couldn't take you back to New York with me without a chaperon, could I? And, you see, you really can't stay here because your father is in trouble and needs you all to stand by him. He would not understand it if you didn't want to go."

"He never stood by me!" she retorted. "Neither he nor mamma ever took any real interest in me! Everything that makes life really beautiful I've learned from Doctor Dhal——"

"Doctor Dhal!" cried Diana fiercely. "That miserable sham!"

Sheila's eyes flashed and she clenched her fists.

"He is nothing of the kind! He is very wise and good." Her voice became thin and high. "He is 'all good.' I will not hear you say anything against my guru!" She faced Maitland with clasped hands. "I will go with you if you really want me to," she said. "I will go because you ask me—for no other reason. I do not believe papa needs me at all. That is just a trick to get me away. But I don't mind if you ask me to go. Do you understand?"

"I do ask you," Maitland assured her.

"Very well," she said. "I will come. But I must get my things. They are in the little house in the grove. I shall only be gone a minute."

She walked a few steps towards the door, but as she stretched out her hand to turn the knob it opened, disclosing Doctor Dhal upon the threshold.

"What is this?" asked the Yogi.

"Miss Kayne has decided to return to New York with her sister," said Maitland sternly.

"No one stays here against his will," Doctor Dhal answered with a smile. All are free to come and go as they will. How is it, my child—do you wish to leave your guru?"

He leaned towards her, looking into her eyes and still smiling, smiling. His wreathed lips murmured some word in a foreign tongue.

Sheila faltered, smiling faintly in return.

"You do not wish to leave your guru!" he said in a harsh metallic tone quite different from his ordinary glutinous utterance. "You do not wish to go! You will not go!"

"I do not wish to go!" repeated Sheila mechanically.

"You see, she says herself she does not wish to go," smiled Dhal without taking his eyes from her face.

Maitland saw he was losing ground.

"Sheila!" he said authoritatively, stepping between her and Doctor Dhal. "I ask you to come with me. You said you would do so if I asked you. Come!"

He put his arm around her and drawing her to him led her towards the door where stood the Yogi. The smile did not leave Dhal's face, although a wicked gleam flashed for an instant in his black eyes.

"Wait a moment!" said Doctor Dhal.

He raised one of his short dangling arms, barring their passage with a pudgy open palm.

"Get out of the way!" ordered Maitland sharply.

"Sheila! Little one——" purred the Yogi, dropping his hand to the child's shoulder.

With his full weight back of the blow, Maitland drove for the pulpy face just where the lips parted to show the glint of white. It was a blow that would have felled a far tougher philosopher than Doctor Dhal. The Yogi's head flew back, his knees gave way and he pitched forward to the floor, where he lay motionless, a bizarre and grotesque figure, his arms flung wide like a gaudy doll.

Maitland had struck without full realization of his act or of its possible consequences. But the satisfaction he derived from the blow would have amply compensated him for a month in jail.

Sheila seized him convulsively by the arm and buried her face in his shoulder, while Diana and he stared at the body on the floor as if they rather expected another Doctor Dhal to come floating sweetly out of a corner with a "Here you should look!" But nothing of that sort occurred. Apparently, if you hit him quick enough and hard enough you could dislocate Dhal's astral machinery.

The left foot in its crimson slipper twitched. An arm stirred; a stertorous sigh came from the swollen mouth. The omnipotent one was coming back from Nirvana or wherever he had been excursioning. From the other end of the corridor could be heard the echo of approaching voices. Maitland quickly snapped off the light in the reception room and dragged Sheila into the hall. Mr. Oscar Florian's scarlet dinner jacket flared close by. One of the women in bathing suits followed just behind him.

"Have you spoken with Doctor Dhal?" demanded the artist.

"Yes," answered Diana, "and I am taking my sister away."

Florian turned inquiringly to the young woman, who was evidently puzzled.

"I am afraid there must be some misunderstanding," she interposed, stepping forward. "Miss Kayne told me less than ten minutes ago that she expected to remain at the club for at least a week."

"She can speak for herself," said Lloyd. "Are you coming with me, Sheila?"

The girl raised her head but at the sight of Florian and his companion she turned away her face with a look of aversion.

"Yes," she whispered.

Without further parley Maitland and Diana hurried Sheila down the hall to the veranda. As they stepped upon the gravel path the lights in the reception room burst forth again. They could hear the frenzied ringing of an electric bell. Shadows, like huge bats, darted to and fro past the windows. There were muffled shouts from within.

"Run!" directed Maitland. "Let's do a vanishing act ourselves!"

There was a key on the inside of the door in the wall and Maitland removed it, closed and locked the door behind them, and tossed the key into the bushes.

"And that's that!" he remarked. "Don't throw on your lights until we get farther down the road."

Next instant they had glided off into the darkness, Diana at the wheel, Sheila and Lloyd upon the back seat. She was trembling and after putting his coat over her shoulders he kept his arm about her. But she soon became calm and by the time they reached the highroad she was in her usual spirits. She would not permit Lloyd to remove his arm, however; it was more comfortable, she said.

The prosaic red and white lights in the drug store windows at Jamaica gave them all a sense of comfort. It was quite natural to Sheila to let her head rest on Lloyd's shoulder, as she so often had in her dreams, and to find herself answering all his questions so unreservedly. Now that the Butterfly Club was twenty miles behind them, her visit there seemed to have a curious quality of unreality.

Tactfully and by degrees Lloyd extracted from her what little there was to tell. She was sorry for Doctor Dhal, she said. He was really a well meaning man; but of course once you got away from it the whole thing did seem rather silly. She had had a pleasant enough time. There had not been the slightest need to worry about her. She was half asleep by the time they reached Queensboro Bridge and when Diana pulled up at the curb in front of the house the child seemed disinclined to get out. Before she did so she lowered her head as if to look for something in the bottom of the car, caught Lloyd's hand and pressed it swiftly to her lips.

There were two closed motors already there and Jarmon threw open the front door before they had reached the top of the steps. Two strangers were talking together in the front hall.

"Has anything happened, Jarmon?" asked Diana apprehensively.

"Your grandfather, miss. He had a stroke in the Park. He's upstairs in his room."

Instinctively Diana put her arm about her sister. One of the strange men accosted them.

"Miss Kayne? I am Doctor Wheelock. Is your sister Sheila here? Your grandfather keeps asking for her—that is, so we understand him. Will you see that she goes to him at once?"

Diana half closed her eyes. "Oh, Lloyd! Lloyd!" she murmured.

He took her hands. "This is where you're needed!" he said.

"And where we all—I—need you!" she answered feverishly. "Come, Sheila!"

They found Claudia upstairs sitting with Uncle Billy. The old man appeared stupefied at what had happened. The door to their grandfather's bedroom was open, light streaming from it.

The Pirate lay on his cot, his shaggy white head slightly thrust forward by the extra pillow behind it, staring at the door. A nurse stood in the background. Their father was kneeling beside the bed. In a chair at the foot sat their mother. There was something noticeably unnatural in their grandfather's position. Every moment or two he would make a spasmodic effort with his right arm and from his lips would issue an odd sibilation, a grotesque labial hissing. The nurse saw them and stepped forward with a smile of professional encouragement. Their father lifted his head, but Diana could hardly recognize his face. Elizabeth had the strained look of the self-consciously sympathetic. She got up and motioned to Sheila.

Sheila, her hands clasped before her, drew near the foot of the bed.

"Grandpa!" she whispered, forcing back a sob. "It's me—Sheila."

The eyes of the Pirate widened, and he lifted his head the fraction of an inch. It could not be said that a light came into his face, but the lines of his forehead moved upward and the pathetic semblance of a smile twisted one cheek. He made a heroic effort to articulate but his tongue had lost its power.

"Th—th—ss——"

Then his head sank to his chest and he gave vent to a long suspiration of relief.

When half an hour later she came downstairs, Diana found Lloyd waiting in the hall. To his glance of inquiry she said:

"He is quite helpless, poor old man! He may live as he is for some time. Conceivably he might make a partial recovery. But another shock would end it. It's terrible for father!"

"Come and let us get a bite to eat somewhere," he proposed, and he could see that the suggestion pleased her. They descended the steps just as the chauffeur was taking the car away.

"How lucky Sheila came with us!" she said as they walked along the avenue. "Grandfather knew her at once and it seemed to make him quite happy." Under its burden of sorrow her face seemed to him the most beautiful and the most tender that he had ever seen. "Of course you know the reason she came back?"

He read the answer and hurriedly looked away. "I never suspected," he answered in a gruff voice. "Poor kid!"

"But why?" she continued, very softly. "She's so sweet! And she needs someone so!"

"No!" he replied. "It can't be! It's no use! I'm sorry. But I've nothing to blame myself for!"

"Except for being you!" she said.

His heart was leaping, leaping! Was it possible that he had been wrong, misjudged her entirely all along? Slowly his vision cleared.

"Oh, Lloyd, you can't guess how I've been worrying about her the last forty-eight hours! She's so innocent! So easily influenced. And now everything seems to be falling about our ears. If I could only feel that she was safe!"

"It can't be!" he repeated, his brain awhirl. He was not going to find Diana merely to lose her! "It can't be!"

They walked on nearly a block without speaking. Then she said:

"How strange that all these misfortunes should happen to us at once. If I believed in a god I should almost feel as if it were a judgment of some sort. If it weren't for you, Lloyd, I don't know what I should do. You give me strength."

Again his heart leaped, forcing the blood to his eyes, his ears, his fingers!

"And I need it, Lloyd!" she went on. "For I have nothing else to cling to. I've never had any father of the ordinary kind at all. Church and all that sort of thing has never meant anything to me. I've never believed in a future existence of any sort. I've never been able to satisfy myself that there's any reason why any of us should accept the moral doctrines that are preached to us. We find ourselves here—that's all! And usually it seems wiser to play the game according to the rules."

She lowered her head and dropped her voice.

"Sometimes I've followed the rules and sometimes I haven't—but in the end, if I haven't, I have always been sorry—for no reason that has seemed adequate."

His heart stopped entirely. Obviously she was speaking of Devereaux. It was as if a lance had been thrust through his breast. Yet he knew that the pang was only lest she should still love Devereaux and not himself.

"At first it doesn't seem to matter what you believe, because life is such fun anyway. You have the idea that nobody is really bad except in books. And then you discover that in point of fact the world is full of all kinds of crookedness and that the people on top and often the most respected are apt to be the worst of all. You wonder what is the use of trying to be on the level yourself. You run into two poor souls like Claudia and Nigel and you realize that there isn't any justice in the world. And—and—sometimes you want to kill yourself!"

She spoke with a bitter intensity that almost frightened him.

"You have never felt like that!" he challenged desperately. Why should she have ever felt like that, except for one cause?

"Indeed I have!" she answered gloomily. "Most lives on their face aren't worth living. And sometimes it seems as if the game wasn't worth the candle."

"Then why," he demanded, "are so many sure that it is? If life is nothing but 'dead sea fruit' why are there so many people who are really happy?"

"Perhaps they aren't!" she replied. "Perhaps something has blinded—doped them. Perhaps in every case the man or woman who thinks he or she is happy is doped by success, or money, or fame, or popularity, or—something. If they die before it wears off, well and good; then perhaps they die happy. If they live too long they just—for the most part—keep up a pretense."

"But haven't you been happy?" he asked in surprise. "I certainly always thought of you as that."

"Oh, Lloyd!" she answered sadly. "If you only knew!"

"Then you were never doped by money or popularity?"

"For a year or two perhaps—not any longer. You see now why I need your help—your encouragement? I'm the only one of the family that isn't in some sort of trouble. I've got to pull things out if I can. And somehow I feel as if I were entirely alone. I've got nothing really to go by. I don't say I'm an absolute cynic, but only that, so far as I can see, there's no logical answer to the cynic's argument of 'what's the use?' I don't know of any reason for being honest or decent or sincere. That's what makes everything so hopeless!"

"Why do you tell me this?" he asked suddenly.

"Because it's only fair that you should know—if I am asking your friendship."

He began laughing excitedly. The last six hours had been fairly emotional for a dry-as-dust. What a jolly ass he had been!

"But Diana!" he cried, pulling her around so that she faced him. "Don't you see—hang it all!—that you've answered the question yourself? The reason you do the things you ought to do is because you must do them if you want to be happy. And you always know what it is, every time!—or pretty nearly every time," he qualified himself.

"Conscience?"

"That's what I call it."

"But I don't believe in conscience!"

"Call it anything you like, then."

"Conscience didn't make me want to tell you about myself."

"But something did!"

She twisted away from him, but he caught her by the arm.

"Diana! Why tell me the truth if you don't believe in it? It's because you do believe in it! You may think you don't believe in anything and refuse to admit that you've any religion. But all the time you know that you're part of the whole works, and recognize it by what you call 'playing the game' and 'being a sport.' I'd rather have your instinct than my conscience, all confused as it is with law and ethics and inherited conventions. Oh, Diana, you are just as you look! You think you're cynical and materialistic but you're not—you're generous and true—and—and beautiful!"

"No! No!" she protested but her eyes sought his hungrily. His heart swelled in a great ecstasy.

"Diana," he cried, "I love you! I love you! I love you!"

He felt her arm tremble in his grasp and heard her catch her breath. They were passing a flight of steps and he led her into the shadow. A policeman eyed them suspiciously. Maitland took her by both shoulders. She lifted her face to his and her eyes were closed.

"I love you! I love you!" he repeated excitedly. "You're everything there is for me in life! I've always loved you! You're the most wonderful, astounding person in the world for me! I can't live without you. You must have known it. Of course you knew it. Why did you try to get me to say I cared for Sheila? When I love you—only you—never anyone else! Diana! Say you love me! Say it! Say it!"

"Oh, Lloyd! Lloyd!" was all she said. But there was a radiance in her face.

He was kissing her now, holding her head in his two hands, and her tears were slipping warm across his fingers. He brushed them away with his lips.

"Anyhow say you need me!" he whispered.

"I—love—you!" she answered, holding her cheek to his.

He was wafted to paradise, all about him he heard the chiming of bells and the strains of celestial music, smelled the odor of strange and intoxicating incense.

"Quick! Let me go! That policeman is coming across the street!" she said.

He felt like a giddy fool as, tightly holding her hand, they continued without consciousness of direction along the avenue.

"And I always thought—was sure you were in love with Larry. Are you quite positive that you were not?"

"Quite!" she answered, laughing. "I liked him tremendously but I never was the least little bit in love with him. I never was in love before. One can't mistake it, you know!" And then she added, glancing up at him with a little husky laugh, "I may be 'doped'—but I'm happy!"

CHAPTER XXIX

A RED flag drooped—flapping intermittently—from an oaken pole protruding from one of the lower windows of the Kayne house. It bore in large dirty white letters the word "Auction." It was the hour when Rufus Kayne usually made his appearance at the head of the brownstone steps, deferentially followed by Jarmon, and descended, buttoning his gloves, to his waiting motor. But on this particular morning his place was occupied by a colored boy in green livery, wearing a pillbox cap marked "Peterman" in gold letters.

The colored boy, leaning against the iron grille of the open door, regarded the pedestrians below with hauteur. Until Mr. Burleigh should arrive—which would not be until precisely one minute before ten o'clock—he was in charge, and he was full of the insolence of office.

Spring had burst the invisible bonds forged secretly by winter, and in an unrestrained paroxysm of relief had scattered its evidences everywhere up and down the avenue like confetti after a carnival. And on the ledges of the Kayne house bloomed window boxes full of geraniums, heliotrope, crocuses and yellow cowslips, since nobody had warned the florist that his semi-annual visit was to be unnecessary that spring. There was certainly something incongruous in this tax on permanency, this last touch of personal luxury and elegance, and the huge canvas sign suspended between those flower-decked windows, reading:

For two weeks now the Pirate had hovered between life and death upon the upper floor. In the excitement attendant upon the old man's collapse no one had had time to think of business matters and the preparations for the auction had gone on until it was too late—at any rate Mr. Burleigh said it was too late—to cancel them.

The old man had hardly stirred since they had laid him upon his narrow cot—the hard narrow cot that he so preferred to Miss Lamb's box springs. They knew that he was probably dying and by virtue of that fact he regained for the time being in their imaginations all his colossal proportions. The Head of the House, the Founder

It forms new sanitary habits among women

Thousands of women have used Kotex for the first time during the last six months. These remarkable sanitary pads have been on the market only two years, but their widespread use today is truly amazing.

Meets the most exacting needs

Kotex is particularly appreciated by girls and women whose time is fully occupied with studies, athletics, business, or social engagements. It is comfortable and safe. It meets the approval of women in charge of hygiene at girls' schools. And women of refinement recommend it to their friends as a great personal discovery. One of the important and exclusive advantages of Kotex is that it is not laundered, but easily disposed of by following simple directions found in each box. It is cheap enough to throw away. So far ahead of other sanitary pads it seems odd now to think of birdseye and old-fashioned makeshifts.

Two sizes—Regular and Hospital

The Hospital size Kotex has additional thickness and is even more absorbent than the Regular size. Many keep a supply of each always on hand. Sold in dry goods, department, and drug stores, everywhere. Ask for them by name.

of the Family, the Giant—was dying! They thought no more of him as a gentle, feeble octogenarian. The frail body that lay motionless in that silent room harbored the soul of a great man, a hero, a pioneer—and they thought only of that great soul. He had come back. Once more he dominated their minds, their very bodies, seeming to pervade all the rooms and to stand at the head of the stairs.

Just as their steps inevitably led them to his door, so their thoughts centered ceaselessly about his bed. Rufus left the room only for his meals. He was dazed, dumbfounded by his own grief. Nothing else had touched him. He could imagine life without the trust company, without Elizabeth, without any of his children—but not without the Pirate. He knew that the Pirate's room was the only church in which he had ever really worshiped. And now the shrine would soon be empty. Anxiously he watched his father's set face; watched until his eyelids were weary and his eyeballs ached, watched until he seemed to be in the same sort of trance as that in which the old man lay.

The girls spent much of their time there too. Everybody had been very kind and the front hall had been kept full of flowers, for which Diana wrote the letters of acknowledgment besides taking over the entire management of the house. But although they all made a pretense of being cheerful and of believing that the Pirate would get well, they knew in their hearts that he would never leave his room again.

Still, on the morning of the auction Doctor Follansbee, who had been in faithful attendance, said that the old man really seemed better. He could detect a slight return of muscular power in the leg and arm. The nurse might even use her discretion about letting him sit up for a while in the armchair. It was possible that it would do him good. But they must watch him and not let him make any undue effort.

So while the colored boy in his pill-box cap lounged below in the sunshine smoking his cigarette and waiting for his master to come and knock the house down to the highest bidder, the man who had built it lay upstairs ignorant of all that had happened. So far as old Peter knew the House of Kayne might last forever. Rufus, sitting beside the bed with his hand thrust beneath that of his father, was struck by the dignity of the old man's profile as he slept, the nobility of the marble forehead as it rose from the aureole of untrimmed hair and beard in which it was framed. There was in the face an austere and august stateliness.

Gently, so very gently as hardly to be noticeable, the sheet upon the Pirate's breast rose and fell. Two sparrows lit upon the adjacent sill, twittered, cocked their heads at Rufus and darted off again. Far up in the blue there could be heard the drone of an aeroplane.

The Pirate thought he heard a fly buzzing and woke. He objected to flies, and there was a bell—a doleful bell—tolling! All his senses were alert. He had not suffered; he was not suffering now. It was only that strange numbness of his left side—a touch of sun in the Park, the doctor had said. He'd be all right. Well, it had been worth it! Those children! How they had enjoyed it! He mustn't be cross! And Sheila had come back. She was over by the window looking up into the air.

"An airplane, grandpa!" she said. "Right up there!"

He followed her glance, but his eyes could not get beyond the frame of the window in which she stood. Not a fly, then. The clatter of the plane filled the room. It made him angry. He stirred and uttered a sound of feeble protest.

"Yes, father! I'm here!" answered Rufus.

Sheila came from the window. "What is it, grandpa dear?" she asked.

"I want to get up!"

They were startled. It was the first time that he had articulated normally since he had been stricken, and his voice seemed like a voice from the tomb. Yes, his appearance was reassuring. Surely there was a slight tinge of color in those waxen cheeks! Could it be that the fighting spirit which in the past had overborne all his competitors was now to vanquish his last and greatest enemy for another round?

The nurse hurried forward from the corner.

"If he wants to!" she said. "The doctor suggested it himself. This lying in bed is so weakening!"

She turned down the sheet and the soft shriveled body filled Rufus with acute compassion. Slowly they raised him to a sitting posture and lifted his thin old legs over the side of the bed. Tears were in Rufus's eyes as he knelt down and put his father's feet into his slippers.

Then the nurse thrust his arms through the wide flowing sleeves of his dressing gown, and unassisted transferred the wasted body to the invalid chair, stuffing pillows about it for support.

"Fine!" said the Pirate, highly excited by so great an adventure. "I'm—going—to—get—well! You'll see—Sheila!"

It was half-past nine as Maitland approached the Kayne house. There was to be a military funeral at the Cathedral that morning and as a member of the Legion's local post he had donned his uniform for the first time since returning from overseas. How strange to be walking up Fifth Avenue in a uniform which he had worn within sound of German guns!

He had thought constantly of Dorman ever since the news of the latter's suicide had been made public. A brave soldier, a loyal friend, a good fellow, a chivalrous spirit! One of the heroes of the war! Their regiments had struggled side by side through the ravines of the Argonne. His mind refused to grasp the fact that Dorman was dead—and by his own hand. He had seen him only recently at the Players and now recalled that he had seemed discouraged over his lack of success in finding work for such of the survivors of his regiment as were partially disabled. He could suffer himself—but he couldn't stand watching their suffering. His nerves had buckled under the strain. His poor brain had cracked. Another gallant lad gone West!

Maitland paused on the corner opposite the Kayne house. Motors from which fashionably dressed women were getting out stood at the curb. A few stragglers were idling on the sidewalk. The front of the house wore an unfamiliar look, as if its mouth and eyes were opened in surprise at what was going on. Maitland stood and looked at it. So it was going! Just as the Kaynes were going. Such houses, such families, rose and fell, came and went, with hardly anybody the wiser. Monuments to the inconsequence of human life!

He crossed the street, ascended the steps and entered the front hall where the auction was to take place. It looked gloomier than ever with its rows of folding chairs. One of the big tables had been swung around crossways at the foot of the organ. Upon it had been placed a huge pile of catalogues.

There were a score of people already seated or wandering around examining the objets d'art and more were coming in at the doorway every moment, bringing with them an odor of cigars reluctantly discarded upon the topmost steps. These earlier arrivals for the most part were seedy looking men among whom was a scattering of sharp-featured, capable women—obviously professionals, second-hand dealers.

What were they doing there, these strangers? Were they lost to all sense of decency that they could thus swarm through another's house, straggling through the rooms, fingering the rugs and window curtains, tracking up the stairways, examining the pictures and china, prying into the closets and opening the piano? The soul of the house was being violated; its sentiment, its atmosphere defiled!

It was shocking to expose these intimate possessions of the family sacred to them by long association! Here they had dwelt—four generations of them—sheltered from public view in what the law had said was their castle. Here Rufus had brought his young wife and entertained their friends. Here his children had been born. Here they had passed their girlhood. Here Claudia had been married with the organ pealing out the wedding march and the hall crowded with uniforms. Here Elizabeth had lived her life, such as it was, and gathered her fat friends about her. Here the old Pirate had climbed—before the elevator—to his room on Uncle Billy's arm. Here, in the earlier days at least, there had taken place family quarrels and conclaves, childish tears, confessions and repentances, whispered avowals and laughing protests, sad goings-away and gay homecomings—and up those stairs no longer than two weeks ago the stricken form of the old Pirate had been carried to the room where now he lay.

With what care and study—no matter what the taste exercised—each of the pieces of furniture had been chosen! What an event the purchase of the tapestries! No room, no passage, no landing, no stair, no square foot of floor space that was not pregnant with memory, peopled by the ghosts of former years!

The crowd behind shoved Maitland along and he made his way through the hall and ascended to the second story, where he encountered Jarmon. From him Lloyd learned that the old gentleman seemed to be somewhat better and that Miss Diana had gone out.

Lloyd descended to the landing on the mezzanine floor and paused, surveying the hall below. The visitors were coming in now in a steady stream, each receiving at the door one of the circulars, then working around among the chairs for an advantageous place.

Squarely implanted in the middle of the second row Lloyd could see the robust figure of Mrs. Brice-Brewster in a coquettish straw hat fringed with spears of wheat.

Senator Krass, a vacant expression upon his long pink face, made his way towards the front followed anxiously by his small wife like a dog at heel. He indicated a seat in the front row, removed his hat with solemnity, reached for a catalogue and sank down beside her. In the center of the room sat Mrs. Wingate and beside her Rita Ricardo to whom, evidently, Doctor Dhal had extended a half-holiday. Most of the chairs were taken by this time and a line of standees had formed on the side next the staircase. In one of the front windows he could see Darcy and Longwood, and wondered what they could be doing there. A couple of hundred women formed a solid phalanx in the middle of the hall. It was like an afternoon tea.

The same old crowd—drawn by curiosity, cupidity, or by the desire to experience that satisfaction which La Rochefoucauld so cynically claims the best of us derive from the misfortunes of our friends. This tragedy of success was nothing to any of them. With the exception of a few dull souls, who like Emily Brice-Brewster had a sincere if mild affection for Elizabeth, none of these people cared two straws for the Kaynes or what became of them. Most of them actually disliked Rufus and disapproved of his children—were glad of the opportunity to say "I told you so!"

Maitland glanced at his watch. It was one minute to ten. He looked about him for a place where he could comfortably see and hear all that went on, self-consciously aware that his uniform made him too conspicuous to go downstairs. He was vitally interested in the price which the house itself might bring, since upon the success of the sales depended his future father-in-law's ability to meet his obligations. There was to be no "upset" price; it was to go for what it would fetch, and the auction might be a fiasco.

The mezzanine gallery ran entirely around the wall and he stepped into it and sat down on a bench over the organ. On his left hung the three great Flemish tapestries purchased by old Peter thirty years before for forty thousand dollars—to cover up Howlett's original scheme of decoration, which Elizabeth had regarded as too commonplace; huge affairs fourteen feet by twelve and correspondingly heavy, hung by a few brass hooks on a gilded molding and entirely covering the westerly side of the hall, including the cornice. On the one nearest was depicted an amorous, or possibly merely amiable, group of Olympians quaffing goblets of nectar amid the clouds, their muscular arms about one another's pillar-like necks—undoubtedly the best people of their time.

At that instant, as foreordained, Mr. Burleigh made his entrance, pushing authoritatively through the crowd about the threshold. The vital moment had at last arrived. In spite of himself Maitland experienced a choking of excitement. Mr. Burleigh—short, abdominal, with a gray beard and horn-rimmed glasses over his watery blue eyes, a carnation in his buttonhole and a tiny pair of golden antlers pinned just below it—strode past the rows of chairs with the air of a benign autocrat. For thirty years he had been the popular auctioneer of the metropolis. He was the master of ceremonies—the whole show—they could not get on without him. He knew who everybody was, who meant business and who was there merely for the fun of it. But knowing these things did not affect his detachment. It was nothing to him what price anything brought or who bought it. It was his business to sell to the highest bidder whatever was offered; and he would sell with like indifference a rug, a picture, a basinette, a statue or a rolling pin. Had he lived prior to 1861 he would, with equal nonchalance, have sold slaves.

There was that about Mr. Burleigh which made Maitland shiver. Was it possible that the man was entirely destitute of feeling?

"I'll sell the house first," said he in a mild but penetrating voice. That was all: "I'll sell the house first." With no more ceremony than that did he open the obsequies of this palatial brownstone edifice. He was no barker—no mountebank—although he knew his business.

"The house itself is of course worth nothing," he continued. "But the land—the possibilities of this location—are immensely valuable. It is undoubtedly one of the best sites in the city."

Worth nothing? Lucky that old Peter Kayne lying on the top story could not hear him! Worth nothing? Maitland imagined the walls quivering with mortification, the floors trembling with indignation. Worth nothing! Had it not cost, with its furniture a million dollars? Did Burleigh not know that that house had been built to last? That it was the best house of its time? That its beams and rafters were of the finest seasoned timber, its brownstone chiseled from a special quarry, each brick handpressed and baked, its foundations excavated to the solid rock, its floors sound-proof, its walls of double thickness—a mansion, a castle, a citadel, a stronghold, a fortress! Worth nothing?

The words reverberated along the mezzanine and among the pipes of the organ. Maitland no longer heard what Burleigh was saying. Could it be true that it was worth nothing? The House of Kayne worth nothing? He looked over the rail behind which he was concealed. Directly below him in the second row beside Mrs. Brice-Brewster was his partner Vincent Pepperill, nodding at the remarks of the auctioneer. He recalled vividly what the old gentleman had said the first time he had deigned to discuss the Kaynes, stigmatizing them as materialists, all the more significantly for that he was one himself; intimating that they worshiped the golden calf of wealth, place and fashion, that they lived "by bread alone." Had he not been right? And was not Burleigh right—although in a different sense? Was the house worth anything? He had seen those figures on the roof! Had Howlett with his keen insight into men known what would happen to the Kaynes?

Mr. Burleigh was announcing the terms and conditions of sale—twenty-five thousand dollars down, balance in fifteen days. Maitland, stretching his spurred and booted legs, became conscious again of being in uniform. In a few minutes he would be following Dorman's coffin up the aisle of the Cathedral. Poor Chuck! One more gone to join the fifteen million upon whom had been visited the penalty of the world's materialism.

"Boom!"

The Cathedral bell had begun to toll. It trembled in the organ pipes and the shudder in the air took him back to the Argonne. It was like the detonations of a German heavy; like those on that misty morning after the Boche had felt them out and got the range, when the two regiments had received the order to advance and he had talked to Dorman over the field telephone and they had wished each other luck. That same morning when he had fired at the gray ghost and it had screamed and died. Had that been for nothing? Was it all for nothing?

"Boom!" He must go—go to Dorman!

What was Burleigh saying? "Seven hundred thousand?" Ha-ha! He and his faun-eared assistant were laughing at such an offer! Someone had bid seven hundred and twenty-five!

The floor creaked. A hand fell lightly on Maitland's shoulder. A kiss brushed his cheek. Diana! He seized her hand, drew her down beside him on the bench and touched his lips to her forehead and hair.

"Grandfather's better," she whispered. "He's quite wonderful this morning! The doctor has let him sit up in the armchair, but if he should get well he'd be frightfully upset about the house. Poor old house!"

Maitland held her to him without reply.

"Why are you in uniform?" she asked suddenly. "I like you in it!"

"I'm going to a military funeral," he answered. "You can hear the bell."

"Whose?"

"Chuck Dorman's—we were together on the other side."

She shivered and drew closer.

"Boom!"

He looked at his watch. Ten minutes yet. Burleigh's rasping voice rose from the floor below, punctuated by the tolling bell.

"Seven hundred and thirty thousand? Giving it away I tell you! Do I hear the five? Thank you! Do I hear forty? Forty—forty—forty? Thank you! And five? It's your bid, sir. Thank you. Seven hundred and forty-five thousand dollars! Do I hear the fifty? Fifty—fifty—fifty? Do I hear the fifty?"

The bidding had centered between two men in the front row, and the audience was pressing forward the better to see and hear what was going on.

"Boom!"

Mr. Burleigh leaned over the banister and looked inquiringly at a snuffy little man next the aisle. The little man nodded almost imperceptibly.

"And fifty!" ejaculated Mr. Burleigh, and the crowd exhaled with relief.

"Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars! Do I hear the five? Going at seven hundred and fifty. Fifty-five—fifty-five—fifty-five? Do I hear the five?" He looked at the opposing bidder, who shook his head and reached for his hat.

"Boom!" went the Cathedral bell.

"Going at seven hundred and fifty thousand!" intoned Mr. Burleigh in the same key.

The Pirate sat in his chair, his arms extended, his shaggy head protruding from the pillows like that of some law-giver of old. Rufus had gone downtown to finish up his business at the trust company and Sheila had taken Uncle Billy out for a walk. The nurse, hoping that her patient would go to sleep again, had gone into the next room and, leaving the door open between, was reading a detective story. But the Pirate could not go to sleep, and he did not want to. All his irritation had disappeared.

It was not right to be fussy when they were all so kind. The air was sweet—sweet. The Pirate could feel new strength stealing into his veins. Yes, he was going to get well! More of life! The thought filled him with painful gladness. The numbness that had made his left side feel like lead was almost gone.

And now, through the door left open by the nurse, there came to his ears a rasping, intermittent noise like that of a distant phonograph. It rose and fell, paused and began again; a curious noise to be in a private house, as if somebody was delivering a lecture downstairs. He stood it patiently for a while although it annoyed him. Yes, somebody was talking in an exasperatingly loud nasal tone. His irritation returned. Why couldn't they keep the house quiet! Where was the nurse? Why had she left the door open? He called her name, but at that moment she had stepped down to the pantry for a glass of milk. Angry at his failure to get any response, the Pirate pushed off the coverlid from his knees and stood up. The effort did not inconvenience him and he took a few steps towards the door, intending to close it to keep out the sound of the voice. He seemed to be able to walk as well as ever!

He paused with his hand on the door frame and listened. From where he stood the whole house seemed full of strange squeaks and murmurs, whisperings and rustlings, broken by the sing-song shouting of the voice which floated up from the front hall. What was going on down there? Strange people had intruded into his house. Who could they be? He must see about that!

Shakily, with his hand upon the banister, the Pirate felt his way down the stairs. The noises grew louder with each step of his descent; and his anger grew proportionately. Who was making all that fuss in his house? He reached the third landing and started down toward the second, just below which the gallery of the mezzanine led off. The noise that now filled the house was like that of the sea crashing upon the rocks. Above the thunder of the surf he could hear the tolling of a bell buoy. Someone was shouting to him, but the waves drowned the voice so that he could not distinguish what it was saying. Clang! went the knell of the buoy. Clang! He was on the second landing now, and the roar of the breakers in the entrance hall was like thunder in his ears. He would not go down there. He would only go into the gallery and peek over to see what was happening.

"Going at seven hundred and fifty thousand!" Mr. Burleigh was chanting down below. "Do I hear the five? Fifty-five—fifty-five—fifty-five? It's being thrown away, I tell you! Thrown away! For the last time—going at seven hundred and fifty thousand! Going once! Going twice!" He raised his pencil and looked round the hall. "Going three times!" He brought the end of the pencil down with a smart tap.

"Sold! To the Goethals-Schwenken Company for seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars!"

There was a general murmur of relief, a shuffling of feet. Mr. Burleigh poured out a glass of water and drank it slowly. Half a dozen people got up and went out.

"And now," continued the auctioneer, picking up the catalogue and opening it at the first page, "we will dispose of the furniture and objets d'art. I will begin with the three tapestries hanging on your right. Number one. Very rare allegorical eighteenth century Flemish—fourteen by twelve. Buyer to have option of purchasing either or both of the others at same price."

The spectators resettled themselves, turning with one accord towards the corner by the organ where hung the Olympians.

"These tapestries, ladies and gentlemen, are museum pieces and should bring a handsome figure. They were bought in Europe for Mr. Peter Kayne at the time the house was built. I may say they were the talk of New York."

He beckoned to the negro boy. "Now Jo, just lift up the corner of number one—yes, that next the organ—so the ladies and gentlemen back there can see the design."

Diana and Maitland, from the gallery above, watched the boy walk across in front of the first row of chairs, past Senator Krass, past Mr. Pepperill and Mrs. Brice-Brewster, bend over and take the corner of the tapestry in his hands. Many of the audience moved their chairs to get a better view. There was going to be a chance for everybody to pick up a bargain.

"Boom!"

The Cathedral bell had begun again. The "minute bell" for the dead.

Suddenly Maitland felt Diana's clasp tighten.

"Look!" she gasped. "Look!"

At the other end of the mezzanine, but twenty feet from where they sat, under the full glare of the electricity, stood the patriarchal figure of her grandfather in his dressing gown, gazing down upon the throng. His face wore a puzzled look, but his figure in its flowing garment had an austere and rugged grandeur. For an instant only did he stand there. Before either Diana or Maitland could stir to help him they saw his left hand clutch the tapestry at his side, his body stiffen and collapse backward into the gallery.

The tug on the tapestry loosened one corner from its fastenings. The group of Olympians sagged sideways. A hook leaped singing into the air over the heads of the audience. The molding cracked ominously.

"Look out!" cried a voice. "It's going to fall!"

"Boom!" came from the Cathedral. "Boom!"

There was a frenzied rush on the part of the spectators to get clear. Two or three women screamed. Chairs were overturned. With a loud report the tapestry ripped the molding from the wall and fell upon the floor in a crumpled heap.

There was a momentary hush. A cloud of dust rose towards the mezzanine, slowly settling again, while the startled onlookers gradually regained their composure. There burst forth a confused hubbub of ejaculation, jocularity, laughter—followed by silence as their eyes turned to where the tapestry had hung. Upon the wainscoting beneath, totally forgotten and now revealed for the first time since it had been carven there forty years before, appeared the inscription:

"Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it."

THE END.

"Do you mean that?"

"Look at me."

When she looked at him he kissed her; and then they sat together, side by side, gazing out at the ocean.

"This is certainly wonderful," he said, hushed. "It's great. Yes, sir, this is one of the finest spots in the world!"

And so, at dusk, he took her back to a dingy house at the seventeen dollar end of Seaward, and then, fortified by her promise to meet him again at eight, he walked briskly back to the flower stand opposite Herzfeld's Chowder Pavilion. The old woman with the sea-blue eyes was still there and glanced up from her newspaper to give him her wrinkled smile.

"Now look here, mother," said the young man with grim directness, "I paid you for two dozen of those——"

She held up both hands to interrupt him. "And do you know what happened? I give them to the prettiest little girl you ever see—all shabby-like—one of the girls from the club—and she's that surprised she would almost have fell in a faint—and then she turns around and sees Miss Anne Hudson over there—Miss Anne Hudson with all her millions, that lives at the club and spends every penny on the poor, God bless her—and the little girl, she takes out four roses and she runs over and gives the rest to Miss Hudson. 'There,' she says, 'take them,' she says. 'You don't know me but I know you, and I want you should have them,' she says, and with that she runs off down the beach." Here the old woman winked slyly. "And she's there yet—with the night clerk from the Strand, and a nice boy as ever you saw he is, too. And I doubt he'll be wearin' one of them roses behind the desk tonight, so I do."

The young man stood like a soldier. "Miss Anne Hudson!"

"The same . . . What's wrong?"

Nothing was wrong at all, except that at the same moment he had caught sight of a headline of that local newspaper. "Percy D. (Lucky Dan) Carroll at the Seaward Inn—He Arrives Unexpectedly—Avoids Reporters."

"Not a thing, mother," he said thoughtfully. "Much obliged."

He struck out for the Inn, where his suite was costing him sixty dollars a day; but presently, when he saw two figures silhouetted against the afterglow, he quitted the boardwalk and took to the sand. The two young people, oblivious to the universe, were sitting with their arms around each other; at the girl's breast were three red roses, and a fourth was in the man's buttonhole.

And not hearing Carroll's footsteps on the sand, they kissed each other.

Under his breath Carroll laughed blithely. The old woman had been right; and four separate people were believing in fairies all over again.

the bed to go. Being an east window it looked toward Fifth Avenue, but of Fifth Avenue there was visible, from this point, only a fretted and formidable skyline that rose beyond a jumble of boxed-in courts, and odds and ends of lesser buildings, and queer-shaped slices of wasted space enclosed in high useless fences. Also there was a tree. It was one of those trees which seem to grow exclusively in New York back yards. Such trees thrive on dampness and everlasting shade and the Monday drippings from somebody's clothesline.

They are curious fronded trees which give off a sour smell when the sap rises in them in the spring and again when their leaves wither in the fall. I do not know the right name for them; let's call them back yard trees. They are to be seen only when the wreckers tear away the houses in front, thereby exposing an inner walled town of rear tenements and unsightly sheds, which until then had been unrevealed and unsuspected; or when you live, say, as in this instance, on the third floor, back.

When the occupant of the room in point wearied of her own private view, which was often, and when she had the time to spare on her hands, which was generally, she might, by walking the length of a short hall to a window at the farther end of this hall, command a different outlook. Here, spread beneath, was life and plenty of it. The elevated, like a thousand-legged earwig, spraddled by just below her, with its striped back narrowing in perspective and finally diminishing off this way and that to nothing at all. And when the trains went past, like lesser insects scooting along up and down the spinal column of this greater one, their weight and their speed made the long endless worm shake; and the grating of their wheels for the moment would drown out the sound of everything else.

The L's centipede chopped the vista short off at the downward angle. Even so, there was much to be observed by one stationed above. Within the compass of the block might be seen a taxidermist's shop, an undertaker's shop, a shop for the curing of raw furs, a misfit clothing parlor where garments which had died once elsewhere came to undergo a purgatorial delay under hot irons and benzine before their next reincarnation; a painless dentist's, a loan parlor, called by the vulgar hock-shop; a bird and animal store advertising itself by its own aromas; a stationery store, a tobacconist, selling likewise daily papers and periodicals; a Yiddish lunchroom specializing in cold fried fish and strictly kosher hot frankfurters; a hat-cleaning establishment, a basement dweller who dealt in ice, coal and kindling wood; a Greek employment agency, a club for Swiss waiters, head, side, and omnibus; two orangeade stands, an Italian greengrocer's, a hardware store, a second-hand furniture store, a museum of human anatomy—Boys under Sixteen Positively Not Admitted; a corner where a saloon has been, now For Rent, With or Without Fixtures; a boot-blacking stand, a jobbing house in artificial flowers, a trunk store which always was on the point of going immediately out of business and therefore offered sacrificial bargains in suitcases and grips. Not all these were on her side of the street nor yet all on the ground levels. They began in the cellars and they mounted above one another, flight by flight, to the attics; but all of them and more besides in that same briefened stretch, from crossing to crossing, might be ticked off on the fingers by one who had leisure for such employment, as this one had; and sundry establishments among them might also be smelled, especially where two or three firms hived together as joint lessees of a single floor, pooling, as it were, the essential perfumes of their respective businesses.

Lesser merchandisers, of the itinerant cast, throve on the sidewalk trade, preempting space for themselves in doorways and along curbstones and even out on the perilous roadway beyond the pavement line, and holding their ground against a clamorous and occasionally a threatening opposition. One day, warranted all-silk neckties seemed to have the favor of these ardent competitors; about every other one of them would be offering silk neckties at one for thirty-five, three for a dollar. Another day it would be bath sponges that they pushed, or patent pants hangers at ridiculously low prices, or roach poisons in handy packages. But the pretzel venders never sought to tempt the popular fancy with new wrinkles. Their stocks, coiled like varnished brown snakes on upright spindles stuck around the edges of baskets or pushcarts, were staples, dependable and in constant demand. This likewise was true of the dealers in dill pickles; they knowing their public and having their regular clienteles.

Always, in the daytime, the avenue crawled with motion and went clanging the cymbals of industry. It was most active, though, and rivalry for customers reached the highest peaks, at noontime when the loft workers came downstairs for lunch and air and conversation; surface vehicles scarcely could get through the wedged pack then. There were two Jewish men of this persuasion who daily stationed themselves in an areaway almost directly under the window where our lodger watched, coming together for the resumption of an argument which, it seemed, would never be ended. In time she came to know both of them and to be on the outlook for them. In a dulled sort of way they fascinated her; their inevitable appearance made an interlude in the deadened monotony of her own midday. One of them, a small shabby man, talked with his mouth, his shoulders, his legs, his arms, his collarless neck and his hands—notably with his hands. His hands were forever in motion. Frequently, in the fever of debate, his fingers clutched the air as though he would seize argument out of the ether. His antagonist, a second generation American and dressed accordingly, rarely spoke and never gesticulated. He expressed all varying emotions—contempt, doubt, acquiescence, denial, conviction, wavering—by three mediums, to wit, his eyebrows, his under lip and the cigar that teetered between his teeth. His silence, somehow, was infinitely more potent than all the outcry of the posturing adversary. He probably had the most skeptical pair of eyebrows in the world, and the most eloquent lower lip. Certainly a more facile or a more oratorical cigar than his has never been rolled.

Your true creator of pictures could find material here to keep him busy squeezing tubes for a year. For this place, with its grindings and shriekings and its overhead quiverings, with its swarmings underfoot, its countless eager concerned faces, its jamming together of nervous bodies, its swirls and masses, its stinks, even, was a profile and a perfect cross-section of life that fairly dripped with the city's essence. Its component parts fell naturally into panoramic groups, and its local color was every color of humanity there is. But, as was said some pages back, this one had not within her what a bona fide artist must have. To her it was a brazen desolation of ugliness and heartlessness and harsh sounds, peopled with alien breeds of men and women following noisily after alien gods—the strange gods that were so disregardful of the lonely and the forsaken.

Down yonder in Whippoorwillville Eddie Sackett got so he just naturally couldn't stand it any longer. Faithfulness cannot feed forever on itself; it needs more material provender, lest it starve to death outright. Anyway, from the standpoint of the economics, he was in position to take a trip. Out of its annual earnings and the fullness of its heart the railroad had at length seen its way clear to granting that raise in salary. Eddie put on his new mail order fall suit and caught Number Seven, east-bound. It had been nearly four months now since that last puzzling short letter came to him, nearly eight months since he had seen its writer.

A common carrier deposited him at Grand Central in the latter end of an October forenoon. From the moment of his arrival, almost, New York began jolting him financially. He knew what hotel he meant to stop at; it was one that advertised in the Dentondale Weekly Sun-Independent, mentioning moderate rates for single rooms with bath. The directions concerning street cars which a policeman at a door of the station gave him seemed distressingly intricate. To be on the safe side he took a taxicab. And the taxicab literally ate up money. Nearly every time he looked at the meter it had jumped another ten cents. Eddie Sackett wasn't stingy, but in Whippoorwillville a dime was nevertheless a dime and you expected some proper return for it.

Then there was the hotel when he arrived there, a confusing, a mastodonic, and despite its printed promises, an expensive establishment. A clerk gave him a room at a rate per day which the clerk evidently regarded as a very reasonable rate. It was dinner time now—dinner time comes in the middle of the day at Whippoorwillville—and Eddie Sackett, for all his devotion, was none of your puling and pining lovers; Eddie was hungry. He asked the location of the dining room and was directed to a place called the grill. But the tariffs, as set forth on the menu, were calculated to bitt his appetite. Moreover, there was a waiter of an aggressive aspect who exhaled in evident and audible impatience as Eddie ran a forefinger down the price list, and this fussed the new guest. In his flustered state his eye finally fell, halfway down the card, on a fish dish—fish a la something, with sauce something else—which alone, of all the items named, seemed reasonably priced.

He told the waiter he would take a piece of that, with coffee and bread and butter and fried potatoes. It was quite a long time before these things were brought and after they had been brought and he had eaten, a genuine shock awaited him. The total cost of the meal, as scribbled on the check, was the cause of this shock. To begin with, there were separate entries for the bread and the butter and for the cup of coffee and the potatoes. They threw those things in free with every meat order at the owl wagon or the Elite Restaurant back home; but it appeared that in New York they were charged for—and when he questioned the amount entered on account of the principal dish the waiter, producing the menu which, in accordance with the metropolitan custom, he previously had taken away with him, directed Eddie's attention to the figures plainly printed there. Eddie saw his error then; all things considered, though, the mistake had been, on his part, a perfectly natural one. The "20" hadn't meant twenty cents at all; it had meant twenty minutes.

In spite of the prospects of mounting outlays it became necessary for him to take another taxicab in order speedily to reach his next destination. After listening to certain involved and bewildering statements by the uniformed official who warded the hotel entrance, he had a conviction that, going afoot, the trip would eat up hours of his time. And he was in a hurry to get where he was going. At least, so he was at the moment of starting.

But as the taxi took him on his way, crisscrossing in and out of streets which roared to the traffic in them, a grave doubt as to the wisdom and the advisability of his adventure began to assail Eddie. Considering it, he almost forgot to view the shifting sights or watch for the spasmodic bounding of the meter. That same doubt had been living in the back part of his mind since before he started for New York; his advent into the city and a sudden daunting realization of the size of the city had quickened it into this present activity.

He had not written to his sweetheart of his intent. He had jubilantly designed to take her by surprise. Just what was to follow on the heels of the surprise—what he would say and do, what he would propose, what he would suggest, he did not exactly know. At no time of his exciting thirty hour journey had he known exactly. He had been content to let the immediate future take care of its own contingencies; and now here he was in New York, bound for her studio and due there shortly, and still with no definite plan of campaign—practically with no valid excuse for having come at all. Question marks began to pass before him in a succession of heavy curlicues.

What right had he, without invitation or encouragement, to bring his puny desires, his hopeless longings, his unimportant countrified self to her here in this place of her great endeavors and her greater aspirations? She would be busied in noble undertakings; engrossed inevitably in congenial and suitable companionships; and he—well, he was just plain inconsequential Eddie Sackett, forlorn and desperate from lovesickness. He was a fool and it was a fool's errand that had brought him and, for him, humiliation and regret must lie at the impending end of the journey. Maybe it would be better, all round, if he turned round.

The jolt of stopping jarred him back to realities. The taxi had halted almost directly under some sort of overhead railway. As he stepped out, Eddie comprehended the surroundings. Dubiousness arising from a fresh cause—from a condition now and not from theories—assailed him. Was it possible that this neighborhood actually bordered on Fifth Avenue? It wasn't possible, surely!

"Are you certain this—this is the right place?" he asked, making exact change to cover the amount of the fare as recorded. "Looks to me like we must have made a mistake."

"Same address wot you gimme," stated the driver. He flirted his thumb. "Dis is Sixth Avenoo and dere's your number." He derisively flipped the coins Eddie put in his hand; the absence of a tip annoyed him sorely. He set his car in motion and went briskly away.

Right enough, the proper number was set above a door directly in front of him; but the door opened into a small cluttered cigar store. Within, behind a showcase, with his back half turned to Eddie, was a dark, foreign looking man. He swung a broad and sullen face about as Eddie hesitated on the threshold.

"Vell?" he inquired. His voice seemed to come rumbling from his lower abdomen.

"I'm looking for Miss Leatrice Ember," said Eddie, "in care of a Miss Harriet Devore."

"Mush Devo'?" With the least possible waste of physical energy the man motioned to the left. "Dwo vlights upt!"

"Which?—did you say two flights up?"

"Pshure!—don' you onderstan' Unglish? Oudside und upt der shteps. Ring der doorbell on der landink ven you get dere."

So Eddie, more mystified than ever, went outside and up the steps indicated—remarkably dirty steps they were—mounting a well of semi-darkness until he came to the second of a pair of long narrow halls and to a door which faced him at the turn of the staircase. Set in the jamb of the doorway was a push button. There was a card tacked to the woodwork alongside the button but in that light he could not read what was written or printed on it. Something was wrong; this couldn't possibly be the place. He might be pretty ignorant of New York, but some things he knew intuitively. Still, since he had come this far he might as well go farther. On a venture he rang the bell.

Response was immediate. The door opened part way. A woman's shape showed rather dimly in the opening—Eddie was vaguely aware of the details, of much and very bright hair and a vivid kimono—and a woman's voice challenged him with:

"Well, what?"

"I'm looking for a Miss Harriet Devore's house," stated Eddie; "but I guess maybe——"

"Quit guessin' then, you got your wish."

"Could I see her a minute?"

"You're seein' her now." She seemed unnecessarily short. "And part of your minute is gone already. Make it snappy, Waldo!"

"Was there—is there a young lady named Ember——"

"They was—and they is." She had such a disconcerting way of interrupting.

"Well, I just happened to be here in New York," said Eddie, his diffidence increasing, "and I just thought I'd drop in——"

The suddenness with which she moved caused him to break off his speech of explanation. With a jerk she had opened the door wider so that a better light from within, where the gas was turned on even though it still was mid-afternoon, shone past her on him. Her voice had sharpened, too:

"Say, are you by any chance from down yonder, wherever it is, that she come from?" Seeing him now more distinctly, she answered herself: "Yes, you must be! And, say, are you a friend of hers?"

"Yes, I am."

"Good friend—know what I mean?—old-time friend from the old home town and everything?"

"Yes, of course."

"And still they's some'll say this religion stuff is the bunk!" This speech was not a question; it was an exclamation, rather.

"Which, ma'am? I don't know as I get you. You see, I've known her pretty much all my life and I——"

"You have? Then come on in here with me a minute."

She backed away and he followed her into what plainly was a room where the domestic side of living was consolidated with its social side, and she revealed to him a head of golden hair that was too good to be true—even Eddie could tell that—and a curiously pouched and mottled middle-aged face. With a puffy hand she closed the folds of her red robe at her throat and spoke rapidly:

"Say, listen: It's almost like as if you'd been sent—comin' today of all the days in the whole year. Here all day long, ever since this mornin', I've been wonderin' what they was for me to do. And then in you walk! And you ast me does she live here! And say you're a friend of hers!"

"Is she sick? Has something happened?"

"Something has mighty near happened. Say, listen: How long is it since you seen this kid?"

"Not since the eighteenth day of last February, when she first started East," replied Eddie.

"And how long has it been since you heard from her—letter or message or something?"

"June twenty-third was the last letter I got."

Seemingly without reason and all in one moment, the woman turned violent:

"Say, what the hell was you and all the rest of the people in that hick town thinkin' about anyway, leavin' her all alone here all this time? Wasn't they nobody nowheres that'd have the interest in her to find out about her?"

Eddie stiffened. In that same instant, too, he had found himself.

"She had me," he said stoutly. "She's got me now. Only, if anything serious has been the matter I didn't know a word about it."

"You're goin' to know about it in a minute. It'd be better for me to tell it to you first—much as I know—and then maybe that'll sort of save her feelin's. Listen: She's been sick, all right, but it ain't nothin' that a doctor could cure her of. It's a different sort of medicine she's needin'."

"Where is she? Let me——"

"Just a minute. Lemme give you the dope first. I reckon it's news to you, ain't it, to hear that she's been strictly up against it? Well, she has, like many another like her is, in this man's town. She come here—let's see, it was back yonder along about the end of May it must 'a' been—and taken my small back room on this here same floor. I lease these here two top floors and rent them, furnished, by the week, get me? I ain't payin' her any mind except to collect from her every Sat'day night. These here lodgers don't mean anything to me; they come and go. I got my own worries, me doin' the best I can and just about gettin' by, what with some of these skates runnin' out on me every little while and bilkin' me out of my rent money and all. So all I notice about her is that she's quiet and ladylike and minds her own business, whatever it is. But here lately it seemed like she's been stickin' in her own room mighty close—well, that's all right, too. But this mornin' early I smelled gas 'scapin'—we burn gas here—and I traces it to her room and they she is, layin' in bed with the gas turned on full."

He seized her by her arms and shook her. He was altogether a new Eddie Sackett—masterful, white, tense, on edge to defend and to succor his womankind.

"She's a l right? It was an accident? She's still here?"

"She's all right, so far as that goes. And she's still here. But it wasn't no accident, Mister—Mister——"

"Sackett—Sackett's the name, damn it!"

"Not no accident, Mister Sackett. She was fixin' to do a Dutch—get me? She wasn't far gone, though—the gas hadn't had a good chance yet to get her. A little fresh air and me workin' over her a spell and she comes right out of it. And then, bein' weak and all, she just breaks down and spills the whole thing to me. Seems like she come up here from that comic town of yours with the trick name, aimin' to set New York on fire paintin' pictures. And right away she falls for some sort of a greasy faker that promises to set her in right, and he skins her out of the biggest part of her jack—her money, I should say. And then he turns cold on her and gives her the air. And she comes down here and hires a room off of me, figurin' maybe she can live cheap and get by for a while doin' picture jobs for business houses or something. But the stuff she turns out is the limit and nobody don't want it—the poor kid! And what little money she's got left begins to run low on her. And she begins to get wise that she's been playin' a big game of pretend and it ain't got her nowheres—and never will, neither.

"With a girl like her in that fix, here in New York, they ain't but one of three ways out—she can go on the streets, or she can go back, licked, to the place where she come from, or she can bump herself off. And this kid was too decent to turn hustler—excuse me if I speak plain language, but that's the facts of it. And she was too proud to go back home and own up to everybody that knows her how she'd flopped. She just couldn't bear the thought of that, she told me; seemed like anything else was better than that. She can't bear the thought of 'em knowin' it, even now. So, what with her bein' so lonesome and down-and-out, and livin' for months on bum food and not any too much of that, and never gettin' nowheres, she just decided to turn on the gas. She tells me she'd heard that gas was one of the easiest ways of croakin' they is.

"What I guess I should 'a' done, findin' her that way, was call a cop and get an ambulance sent for and have her taken off to the hospital or the station house or somewheres. But I didn't have the heart to do it. So, instead of attendin' to my own business, I been settin' here wonderin' where she was goin' to head in and what I was goin' to do about her myself—and then this here bell rings and in you walks—the first, last and only person that ever come astin' for her all the time she's been here. I'll say it again—it's like as if you'd been sent as an answer!" Suddenly a note of doubtfulness came into Miss Devore's voice. "But say, listen: Think you can get her to go back home, Mister Sackett? She's still dead set that her home folks ain't ever to know the truth about how she failed—says she'll die first, before she'll tell 'em. If she goes, you'll have to cover up for her, some way."

"Think I can get her to go? Huh, I'm going to take her! She's good enough for that town or any town. She's too good for this damn town!"

"Boy, listen: You and me live more'n a thousand miles apart, I guess, and our ways of thinkin' may be even further apart than that. But when you talk like that I got to hand it to you for bein' an all-right guy. But—but what'll she do when she gets home—without money and no way to earn her own living and not no kinsfolks to fall back on neither, from what she tells me? That's something for you and her both to think about."

"What does she need with money?" The manner of the protector and the provider competently was his. "I've got the money. I reckon I can make a living for two. My wife won't have to work."

"Your wife?"

"Certainly! We're going to be married —married right here in your house, if you'll let us."

"If I'll let you? Say, listen, man, I'll give the bride away."

"Then let's go tell her!"

"Tell her what?"

"Tell her she's going to be married, soon as the minister and the license can get here.'

"Say, for a guy from a rube town you're swift, ain't you? When I first saw you five minutes ago I didn't think it was in you, honest I didn't. How long have you two been engaged anyhow? She never mentioned bein' engaged when she was spillin' her troubles out to me this mornin'."

"A long time," said Eddie; "only she didn't know it. But I knew it all along. And say, Miss Devore, there's a reason why I'm specially glad you're going to let us get married here."

He half shut his eyes, the journalist, shaping in his mind the introductory sentence of the telegram he would send that night for publication in the ensuing issue of the Dentondale Weekly Sun-Independent: "Wedded: At the studio apartment of the bride, in Greater New York City, one block from Fifth Avenue, Whippoorwillville's most gifted daughter, and more lately one of Gotham's rising and successful young artists, Miss Leatrice Ember, to ye proud and happy scribe——"

He snapped back to roseate earth again.

"Well, what are we waiting for, Miss Devore? Let's go tell her."

The woman led the way for him out into the hall and down the hall to its darker and deeper end and there swung open a door for him to enter by. As the girl on the cot bed sat up and cried her joy at sight of him who crossed the threshold to take her in his arms, Miss Devore, turning her head, uttered, aside and to herself, what was at once a defiance, a boast, a triumphant pronouncement and, yes—by the blowzy Miss Devore's curious standards—a prayer:

"And still they's some'll say they ain't no God!"

of diplomacy, he sang the potency of love. Martha, standing against the wall, crushed her hands together and winked at the triumphant tears. They could not be controlled; she fled to the cold quieting spaces where, a tall pine between her and the house, she faced the grim late afternoon and throbbed with her human happiness. She stood out there in the bleak stretch of ground under iron mountains and steadily moving dark sky, like a torch. Winter had no power over her young blood, marching against him, bannered. But something else had power and all her blood stopped dead when Trent, coming softly under the branches, gathered her up against him—all of her, in tight arms.

He put his mouth to her ear and said: "Now! Martha."

"You mean?" she turned her head so that she could look into his eyes.

"I mean—Delila's waiting to see me and Carey. I've asked her for five minutes first—alone. I'm going to tell her about us, Martha, our love. I'm going to ask her to give us a cabin for our own. I'm going to ask her if she doesn't want her foreman to be a married man."

Martha, as though suddenly she felt the cold, shivered.

"Not now," she begged him, "not now."

"Why not—you queer child?"

"I'm afraid."

"How I do love you! You small coward! Do you think I can wait another hour after all these hours of years?"

"And you want to go—now—and tell her, ask her about—me?"

"Yes. Now—now—now! Love has been choked down in me so long that I am eaten by it. It's got to have its way. Think how I've worked—God!—and sweated and frozen and held back. Now is the time. Winter's coming. Don't you feel that wind? Don't you smell the snow?

I want you here, warm in my arms. Last winter, when you left me——"

"John, listen! You want to tell Aunt Lila now when she's given you the biggest reward in her power that you've done this work for just me! Please listen! You are her foreman, her—well—Dandy, who's so clever with the men, calls you her 'favorite.' This dinner's been given just for you. Today sort of winds up your work, what you've done for her, I mean. It's something she only dreamed of—being the boss of the whole valley—but you've made it come true. Now, when she's given you the best she has, you come to her and you say 'Let me marry little Martha,' just when she's thinking you all hers, for her plans, her future work. Oh, can't you see?"

Trent shook his shoulders stubbornly. "No—damned if I can see. Is she a generous woman, your aunt—or not?"

Martha struck his chest lightly with a small urgent hand. "John! John! Yes, she's generous, but you don't understand her—well, any woman—like I do. You see, she's awfully proud. You've done a lot for her and, what's more, for her ranch, which is just her child. What did you tell me you said to her—you're so smart!—when you asked her for a job, way back that first day?"

"I don't know. Let me go in, Martha."

She clung. "Wait! I can tell you what you said. 'I want to work for the biggest man in Bear Valley, and that's you.' Didn't she take you on because of that speech? Now you want to go and tell her, 'I was working, not for you and Circle R all this time, but for—Martha.' See!"

"Well, why not?"

"Because it'll be the end of you, John Trent." She looked away to the iron hills, moving her soft-haired head, restless and sad. Her eyes had lost their pretty love laughter. They were desolate. He took off his coat, put it around her and said: "Wait here, you darling fool, I'm going in."

She seized him then. "Don't do it, John! Or at least don't do it like that! Don't tell her the whole truth suddenly. You're clever. Can't you put it some way like this? You've worked for her—yes—you've devoted your whole strength and brain and feeling to her work. But you're a man and she's a woman. She's too high up for you to think of, but while you work and sort of—worship her, there's a little niece you kind of get into the way of telling how you feel towards the greater woman—so, gradually, being hopeless——"

Trent laughed and a snowflake touched his lips.

"All right. I can put it like that if you think that will make her happier. I think she's too great a woman to need such flatteries. My way would be—the whole truth."

"But I know her, John. I love her. Please do it my way."

She pulled herself up, both hands on his shoulders, and pressed her lips upon his.

"Anything for that!" he whispered when he could speak, and went away, alert and smiling.

Martha shrank into his big coat, drew herself under the tree and waited, pale now and tremulous. Suspense gave her a sensation of sickness. The fine snow began to sift across the ground, dusting the sage and the fence rails, the corner logs of the cabin only a yard away. She could hear the murmur of Trent's voice, hesitant, groping, shy. She wondered if he were clever at such diplomacy as this. Abruptly he was silent. A chair scraped, Delila said a quick word or two. A door opened and shut. Martha, parting the branches, saw her aunt walking swiftly towards her. The eagle eyes flared soft and wet, the mouth trembled, the hands moved against each other. "Martha! Martha!" It was an urgent soft calling for help.

Martha stepped out and Delila clung to her, drew her back into the shelter of the swinging boughs and began to talk breathlessly.

"Marty, is it true? Speak—quick!"

"Y-yes—why, yes."

"O God!" The woman put her shaking fingers across her face. "Then it don't seem funny to you? Or out of all sense? You're so young and pretty, like a rose. I thought he must love you, just seeing you about. I didn't believe a man would work like he did except for loving someone. And why wouldn't it most naturally be you?"

Martha gasped once and stood still. Delila whispered on. "I'm near to fifty. They tell you, or I guess you just tell yourself, that you're too old. It's too late; leave the loving to girls. Be—just a ranchman, go on, get rich, be the biggest man in Bear Valley. And so you get older and harder and you don't care for the gray hairs coming in or the wrinkles round your eyes. But all the while way down you know that, being a woman, nothing in your life is good for anything but love. Don't you forget that, Marty, when your time comes! Love. Just love. Give it and get it, let the rest go by. You know I love you, girl."

"I love—you," Martha murmured.

"I guess you did it, Marty. He told you things. Hadn't it been for you he'd never have dared. Listen, when he came in to ask me for something I thought it would be for you. That'd be so natural. And I'd have told him, 'Sure, go ahead and marry her!' though it felt tight inside my heart. But Marty, he told me—Oh God—don't smile!"

"I'm not smiling, Aunt Lila," the girl whispered through her shuddering.

"He told me over and over again—about love. He hadn't dared—but he'd worked for me. He thought of you, he said, as something near to me—like me. Marty, there are men, clever men, that'd think more of all the everlasting love and worship and power I'd give them—wouldn't they?—than just of brown eyes and pink cheeks. There have been women who've loved great older men. When he was speaking, trying to tell me—I was scared. I felt like choking. Everything broke up inside of me. I told him to wait. I must go out and speak to you . . . another woman."

She started violently. "There he comes now. Martha! Martha!"

He strode up close and, turning his white face and steady eyes to Delila, he took Martha into his arms.

"I want her," he said quietly. "She's what I want. I was trying in a stupid, muddled, half lying way to tell you so."

Martha writhed against him, put up her hand to his lips. "Only because you think you can't get—her, John. Only because you think she's too great a woman for you."

Delila was looking swiftly from one to the other of them, a terrible change in her eyes.

"No, by God!" swore Trent and laughed out between the two tormented beings. "I want you for yourself. She's big enough to understand. I tried to put it the way you wanted, Martha, but that won't do." He held out his right hand to the eagle woman. "You're great and you're generous. I loved your niece. That's why I came here. I worked for you, yes, with all my mind, and I'm your man always, but I worked to win her—Martha. Now let me see the stuff you're made of, Delila Jameison."

She had a bleak gray face. She turned on her heel and strode away from them.

Trent laughed angrily. "Women like lies better than truth—even you, Martha. Kiss me. I'll forgive you for twisting me out of my own intentions."

"It's too late," Martha sobbed. "I'm afraid. You ought to take her, John. See, you were made to be a great man. She is the woman you ought to marry. I was trying to let you go."

"Stop trying!" he said sharply.

A girl came to the cabin corner, sheltered her eyes against the snow filled air and called: "O-o-o, Martha! Martha! Miss Jameison wants you."

Martha tore herself from Trent and ran across the open space into the house as a moth flies straight into fire. Trent moved a few steps and his body struck the fence. He stood with his head down, the light snow drifting across him, and remembered an azure evening, a groping mountain head, a star.

The air had grown warmer with the coming of snow. Behind him, round the corner of the building, the guests were leaving with sound of wheels and hoofs muffled. It was getting dark. Lights were showing in the cabin windows. Dishes were being washed, with rattling and laughter. He began to walk moodily to and fro, restless, uneasy and depressed. He wanted to stay out here in the swirling dimness until the women should have cried themselves out to each other's hearts. A sort of horror of emotion, of Delila Jameison, was upon him. He wondered if he were coward enough to be afraid. When, after an age of chill darkness, his summons came, he did not run, blindly brave, like Martha; he dragged himself over to the house on leaden feet.

He came into the living room and faced Delila. The long boards that had done service for the feast had been cleared of dishes and of draperies. They stretched, as bare and dry as years of lost labor, between the woman and himself. She pointed him to stand at the foot. He saw then that a dozen men, Dandy amongst them, were lined up on either side of her. All were standing except Delila, who sat with incandescent eyes in a drawn, beaked face.

Under her hand lay a roll of bills and a bag of silver money. She spoke with the voice of a dull saw driven through hard wood.

"Boys," she said, "I've been a fool, but it isn't too late yet to admit it. That young gentleman was too clever for me. Jeff Carey gave me a hint, but I was set in my own opinion. Today, before I made him foreman—likely he hadn't guessed at my intentions—there was found under Trent's bed hidden at the bottom of his box the money that I'd drawn to pay you fellows off with—the whole of it—for a season's labor. Today I found out he was planning to carry off my money and my niece. Lucky Jeff Carey found him out—and Martha talked to me . . . in time."

The men moved, and swore, boards creaking beneath their feet. They breathed rapidly. Trent, half closing his dizzy eyes, thought of a pack of dogs. The other method, Dandy's, was the safer, then. Keep your hand on the pulse of the people, be flattering, adroit, study the mob. Let the queen favor whom she will. The queen was speaking again:

"Now, since I've caught him with the goods and since we're none of us losers, I'm not going to hand him over to the law. I'm going to hand him over to you boys. It was from you he was trying to steal, wasn't it? Carry him down to the bunk house quietly—I don't want any rumpus on the way; Parson's turned in and Doc—but down there, when you're good and through with him, let him loose. He can travel down country afoot, like he came. Don't kill him. I'd suggest"—for a second she lost control of the boiling tumult of pain, humiliation, jealousy that scalded her breast, and snarled, leaning towards him—"a quirt."

Trent spoke. "Where's Martha?" he asked quickly.

"Come back and ask me when you've had your licking," said Delila. "Maybe I'll tell you then."

Dandy and Scout took him by the arms and he walked between them quietly out into the snow. He remembered with a queer detachment some scene from mediæval history read out to him when he was a child. Wasn't this always the end of the favorite, the queen's plaything—hard hands of a mob, torture, death? In the bunk house, with a sudden wrench, he freed himself and set his back against the wall. He spoke with his bland English smile.

"No use telling you men that I didn't take the money," he said. "Why should I, when I'd so soon be drawing a foreman's wages?"

"Ah, but you didn't know that when you took it—damn you!"

"Well, that's so. It's no use. Dandy's primed you against me. God knows he's been at it long enough. But this is a good country—a man's country. I ask you, because you're square, for fair play. You're a dozen to one. Let me fight. Let me take on, one at a time, your five best men. If, after they're through, there's anything left of me, will you let me off? I've worked with you for nearly two years——" There was a pause; he swallowed audibly. "Boys, I don't like the idea of a quirt." He looked about the room from face to face. "Isn't that fair?" he asked gently.

Well, they argued, he hadn't been a bad sort; he'd been a decent fellow enough; a fight was always worth looking at; five fights in succession, something of a treat. Perhaps the man in them half guessed at the woman in Delila's vengeance. Dandy struggled against the rising change of humor.

"What did the boss say? Hold him down on his bunk, a couple of you, and the five best men will take it out of him one by one with my quirt. That's orders."

No, sir—public opinon ran—thief or not, he's too good a man for that sort of thing. You can be the fifth to stand up to him, Dandy, and if after Scout and Buster and two others have finished with him, you can't quirt him without sitting on his head, why, he's earned his getaway, I'll tell the world——

Dandy was clever enough to recognize finalities. He drew back his lips, sat down on the edge of his bunk, smoking and swinging his booted leg. The floor was cleared. John pulled off his flannel shirt and stepped into the middle of the ring; white and hard as marble with glinting eyes and a set smile. A little feverish child's hand seemed to be plucking at his heart. It was for Martha's hand he fought.

Delila sat at the end of her table and broke her heart slowly on a wheel. Trent's sufferings, she suffered. She was racked and, though she herself had sentenced him, the pangs twisted her out of her woman's stoicism. This man had tricked her, betrayed her, broken her pride. She had been head and shoulders above men. Hadn't she always ruled them—dealt them her favors or her punishments? It was for this bland-eyed young cat to steal the softness out of her with lying words, to melt her heart and then set into it his claws—laughing. He and Martha—kissing and loving and promising themselves success! Oh! she had been a fool, cheated, flattered, and at last made into a shape for eternal masculine mockery—an old maid who fancied herself loved by a young lover and smiled and beckoned and grimaced. God strike at the man's heart, cut it and scar it so that it never again beat to the tune of laughter! She lighted no lamp; the fire glow showed her grim stillness, crouched forward over her hands, nails sunk into her palms, eyes closed to endure her misery or opened wide to stare it down. They took a long time, those men, to beat the boy out of his consciousness. How noisy the night was with its whistling march of snow!

There had been no outcry. Surely she'd have heard, even through the storm, his voice of rage and pain, perhaps a cry for mercy. She'd like to hear that. What mercy had he for her? There would never be an end to this lashing on her naked pride.

She looked up because a cold wind, smelling of snow, blew across her and the fire jumped. By its sudden vigorous burning she saw Trent come across from the door slowly. He moved as though his limbs were half torn away from his body, and rested near her, his weight against the table edge on two bleeding hands. His clothes hung about him in strips, his face was torn and bruised. He said something three times with his lips before his words were audible.

"Where's Martha?"

She steadied her topaz eyes to look mercilessly into his dim and bloodshot ones.

"I sent her down the valley, on foot, the way she came."

He lifted his head a little and listened, with bruised lips apart, to the storm.

"On foot—in this?"

"Yes. She started after the last guests had gone. She can foot it now as far as Van Breuwen's before she drops. He'll take her in."

Again his bruised lips painfully shaped themselves to words.

"She told Van Breuwen she wouldn't marry him—you knew that?"

"Yes. There are a few things I did know."

"But you didn't know what he said to her." Trent drew a long breath and mustered strength for longer speech. "He said: 'You've lost your chance of being made respectable. I'll make you what your mother was.' "

Delila half rose. "He wouldn't dare say that!"

A film passed over her eyes. John turned away.

"I'll get my horse," he muttered.

"No more horses for you from Circle R, John Trent. You follow your girl on foot. But before you go, tell me your opinion of Jeff Carey's quirt."

John looked at her again. He used his smile.

"Miss Jameison, I fought my way into the boys' belief, so that they made me a present of a horse and saddle. If I were going to stay here as your foreman, I'd be a popular fellow now. They love a man's fists in this valley even if they hate his brains. Ask Dandy that question of yours about a quirt. He thought I was done after I'd laid out Buster and he came third—two turns ahead of his original intention. I cut the truth out of him with his own whip. He ate his lies."

Trent laughed shakily, drew the back of his hand across his eyes, smearing the lids red, and moved away from her, steadying himself now and again by wall or chair. Just before going out he said, as if to himself:

"The girl has your blood. Because of that, I used to call her the eagle's feather—good by."

Delila flung up her head sharply, as though she had heard a calling in the distance. The eagle's feather . . .

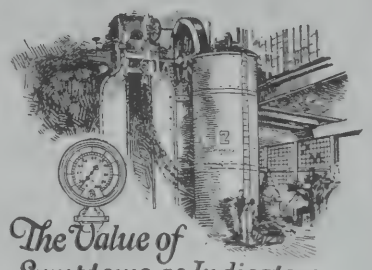
She heard him go, went to the window and saw a dim mass moving away, accompanied by a long whirling phantom of snow which wrapped its arms about the horse and the body of the exhausted rider. Delila did not go back to her chair. She crossed to the inner door and stood gripping its knob. Fifteen minutes brought her to her decision.

She buckled her six-shooter round her waist, got into a coat of coyote skins, went down to the stables and, commanding no help, harnessed her sturdiest team to a buggy. She left them in the barn and returned to the house, where she knocked on the parson's door. He was presently awakened, a big, young, pleasant natured fellow, and received his orders meekly. Delila was easy to obey. "We've got to travel down country, storm or no storm," she told him. "It's a matter of life and death, or—if the words suit you better—of Heaven and Hell. Just your business, Mister Sin-Buster."

He protested once feebly when, on his way to the stables, the snow squall struck him almost off his feet, but Delila laid her hand on his arm and he found himself presently seated beside her in the buggy. The woman, a bear in her furs, backed the team and lashed them out and down the smothered road with their noses to the wind.

There was no man in Bear Valley who could get from a team so nearly all the strength and cleverness that was in it as could Delila. Her horses, working against a stinging wall of wind and sleet, carried her and the bewildered Joseph Winger with sure speed. If they slipped, her hand was there to pull them up; if they lagged, her whip was searching and clever; if they reared, her iron voice sawed into their docile consciousness. She found herself straining her eyes ahead for a bent figure on horseback, though reason told her that Trent, if his will kept sense in his pounded body, must by now have reached his destination.

Van Breuwen's ranch house lay near the river at the base of a steep decline from the open ranges. Until a rider was just above it, it was as secret as a lair. Delila herself, though she knew her directions and distances half automatically, was startled when the buggy plunged down and she saw a snow-veiled light. The cabin by its situation was sheltered from the storm and as they descended the air grew softer and stiller, the noise dropped from their frosted ears. Here the snow fell straight and soundlessly through leafless aspens and the gray tangle of cottonwood. It had not drifted.



The team took itself into an empty corral amongst the trees, and Delila, with the aid of an electric torch, closed the gate on them and, hushing her companion, walked softly through the damp carpet of fresh snow towards Van Breuwen's visible window. It was uncurtained, and beckoning Winger to stand back and be silent, Delila crept up close to it and looked in.

The room, after her long blind driving, seemed ablaze with light; a stove glowed with red iron sides in one corner and a big glass lamp, unshaded, stared at her from a central table. Van Breuwen was standing near it in his shirt—its sleeves rolled up to the elbows showing his red hairy arms, its collar open across the red and hairy chest. He was moving his head to and fro and talking in a slightly accented voice that rumbled out, thunderous and reproachful. Martha was crouched up in a big elk-hide chair, her hands tightened into fists, her hair hanging in half dry wisps all about her neck and shoulders. Her face was shrunk into a mere symbol of resistance, its eyes narrow, its mouth set; no color, no flesh, nothing but the bones of her young will stiffened to a fight to the death. She was as fierce as a cornered wildcat but wasting not a breath in spoken defiance or in outcry. Delila's eagle blood must have thrilled at the sight of her . . .

At first the woman's eyes missed Trent altogether; then, starting, she distinguished him from the corner post of a great set of shelves to which he had been roped. He was conscious and every nerve and muscle was strained so evenly, so tensely, that he seemed statue-still. Tears were running down his battered face and every place the rope touched showed frayed and stained. His lips moved continually but Delila could not hear his voice above the noisy Dutchman's.

"I vas goin' to keeb her here undil she vould decide to marry me. She coom to me, eh vhat? of her own vill. I didn't fetch her. She coom flutterin' again' my door like a white moth, half dead with dat cold, dat snow. Didn'd I took her in and tread her fine, like a vather—vhat?—dry her and warm her and gif her a drink? Was I hurdin' her? No. You—vool! to

OSTEOPATHY

The Value of Symptoms as Indicators

SO FAR as their significance is concerned symptoms must be regarded much the same as the reading of the gauge is regarded by the engineer.

As the indicator quivers, advances, hesitates, falls back, every fluctuation of the motive power generated by the machine is recorded. When trouble is there, the gauge will warn. Unfailingly, it will tell when things are wrong. Yet it cannot tell where nor why.

Symptoms have the same limitation. They are but indicators, dependable enough within certain limits. Yet alone they cannot identify the source of the trouble nor can they locate the cause.

For thorough, reliable diagnosis, the true physician must go far back of the surface indications pictured by the symptoms. It is not enough to know that trouble exists. It is necessary to know where that trouble is and above all why it has occurred.

Osteopathic Diagnosis is Thorough

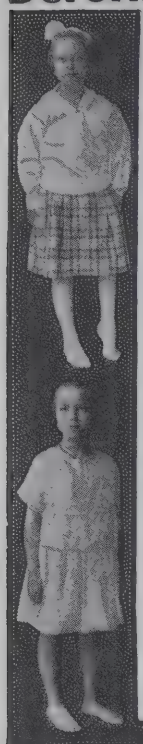
In order to locate the cause that gives rise to the symptoms the Osteopathic physician brings every procedure of proven scientific value to bear upon the problem.

Laboratory diagnosis, with chemical tests of structure and fluids, is resorted to. Environment, diet, personal habits, all are searched for the contribution they can make toward finding the irritating factor.

And more important still, the methods of structural analysis that characterize Osteopathic methods are called upon. Quite like the engineer, the Osteopathic physician searches the mechanism of the body to locate parts that fail to properly function, and to determine the cause of that failure.

To the Osteopathic physician nothing is more important than thorough, intelligent diagnosis. Upon this depends all of the effectiveness that has given Osteopathy its high place in public opinion. Diagnosis, careful and responsible, is the first duty.

Nature of Treatment



Osteopathy treats sickness without the use of drugs as curative agents. In their stead adjustment of structure is utilized. Spinal adjustment originated with Osteopathic principles and is still the cornerstone of the science.

The Osteopathic physician makes use of all the principles involved in diet, hygiene, sanitation, environment, and surgery. His training is a standard course—four years of nine months study in each.

Deformed 7 Years by Infantile Paralysis

Frances Hall's condition after 5½ months at McLain Sanitarium astonished those who knew her as a cripple for 7 years. Read her parents' letter:

It hardly seems possible that Frances' foot could be so changed in 5½ months. Her heel was 3¼ inches from the floor when she left home. Now she steps flat on the floor, although slightly lame. Her limb has increased in size, is straight and she has good use of it. All her friends think it is almost a miracle.

coom and meddle with me. She'd haf stopped here safe wid me undil she hat made up her mindt for herself to marry me. Pefore the snow haf gone she'd haf been ready—oh yiss, sure! Now vhat you done? You haf mate me mad. Now I vill punish you. You stand dere and cry and fight vhile I teach dat girl nod to say —no. She say—no to me vonce too often. She now goin' to learn how to say yes—to one big strong man. Before the day coom she'll be prayin' for me to vetch parson—eh vhat?—prayin'."

Delila stepped aside, beckoned to her companion and, loosening her pistol, walked quickly to Van Breuwen's door and flung it suddenly wide.

"Some prayers get answered, Pier, before they're prayed. Here's Martha's parson now."

Van Breuwen staggered round on his heel. Martha screamed faintly. Trent paused in his soft, delirious cursing. The room became Delila's audience chamber. Big in her furs, and bigger in the fiery vengeful intentness of her will, she dwarfed even Van Breuwen. They seemed boys and girls, children, startled at some wicked play.

She spoke to the pastor over her shoulder in a voice like a saw singing through soft wood.

"Step across there, Winger, will you, and untie—the witness."

Winger obeyed, using his knife. His face was stern, pale and bewildered, but he was Delila's henchman. Trent fell forward from the post and the clergyman supported him to a chair where he drooped, half fainting, fighting against complete unconsciousness. Martha rose to go over to him when Delila spoke again and halted her.

"You got the marriage service by heart, Joseph Winger?"

"Yes, ma'am. I think so."

"Then pull out that table there and stand beside it. Marty, step up in front of him. Do like I tell you—don't you see my gun?"

Martha moved over, white and light.

"Now we got our witness"— she glanced at Trent— "and we got our bridegroom. Hold on, Van Breuwen, I got you covered. Just you wait for orders, savvy? John Trent, you were held for witness, weren't you? Have you got the strength to step up there near Winger?"

He pulled himself together and wavered to the parson's right. He looked at Delila with his dazed, half comprehending eyes.

"Now, Van Breuwen, you come along with me. Read out the service, parson."

The clergyman stammered. "W-which —who—who am I marrying, Miss Jameison?" he asked, flushing and dubious.

"You are marrying my niece, Martha Jameison, to the man she's chosen."

Martha slipped forward, was caught up by Trent and stood there, swaying, while the parson spoke.

Except for the rather melodramatic circumstance that Delila kept Van Breuwen covered with her gun, the service went with conventional smoothness to its close. The bridegroom's responses were whispered and the bride's tremulous, but there was no hesitation or doubt in the faint, determined voices. Delila, eyes and pistol on the Dutchman, stepped forward sideways and gave her niece away. The pastor raised his hand: "In the name of the Father, of the Son and of the Holy Ghost —I pronounce you man and wife. What God hath joined together let no man put asunder——"

"Amen," said Delila and bent down her head.

"Now, Winger," she said brusquely after the pause during which they all heard the tapping of snow and the snapping of the red hot stove, and looked at each other with strange eyes, "you take this six-shooter of mine and march Van Breuwen into the store room—give him some blankets—and lock him in. Afterwards I'll drive you back to Circle R. I figure we can just about make it before we're drifted in. It's near daylight now so we can make time."

After Van Breuwen's enforced departure —he seemed crestfallen and resigned— Delila spoke more softly.

"John Trent, you take your wife into her bedroom. There's near about nothing left of her."

He led the girl to a door, watched her creep through, closed it gently and looked across the room towards Delila.

She had sat down in the big elk-hide throne near the table end. She looked pale and old and tranquil.

"John," she said, "I never did believe that lie of Dandy's."

He was silent, leaning against the door.

"John, I've got a wedding present for you—Van Breuwen's ranch. You're coming into Circle R as my partner. As soon as the snow's melted enough for holding a business meeting, we'll fix up the arrangements. Meanwhile I'll leave Van Breuwen here—you can have my gun, though I don't think he'll bother you any—until you can send him down country with his team and his belongings. The personal stuff, you know, is rightly his. He's a mean actor but I'm sort of sorry for him." She sighed. "You'll have a good home down here, you and Martha, after she's had a chance to tidy it up."

She began to stroke her silk skirt with one dark and restless hand.

"Likely," she said in a low voice, very patient, "I'll learn to love your children, John . . . eagle's feathers . . . " Moisture filled the long wrinkles in the corners of her lids.

He came over to her and, after standing before her a moment, he bent his knee, took up one of the restless hands and bowing over it touched it lightly with his lips. Then he rose and walked backward, gracefully, gravely, forgetful of himself as he had been once in the presence of an august Personage. Just before he went in to Martha he straightened to look up at her again.

She sat erect, the right hand across the left, which he had kissed; her eyes, haughty and wistful, were looking far and away beyond him as though they could see across the mountain barriers to some conquest vaster than any of which in her narrow valley she had dreamed.

running the point of his knife in at the shoulder and turning back the corners and catching them between his strong thumbs and forefingers. The skin came away as he pulled, came away clean and intact. Then with a quick double sweep of the knife he removed the backbone and cut away the belly, leaving only the white flaky cutlets which he dropped on his hot skillet greased with bacon fat.

She watched him admiringly as these cutlets browned in the steady heat and an odd pang of hunger took possession of her. She watched him with a vague wonder in her eyes as he made ready their meal and pushed the rough table over close beside the bunk and propped her up against the shack wall padded with a couple of wolf skins. For the first time they ate together. Yet they talked little.

When he had finished, Holgar got up and started for the door, for he had made it a rule, since she had been in the cabin, never to smoke there.

"Would you mind not going for a little while?" she asked, still leaning back against the gray wolf skins.

He put his pipe in his pocket and sat down again. But the heaviness of his face did not make it easy for her to say what she had wished to say.

"Do you live here all the time?" she asked, after a silence.

"Yes," he acknowledged in his non-committal bass.

She looked slowly about the shack, from the leather-hinged grub box above the water pail to the trap door that opened on the cool-hole beneath the floor. It seemed miraculous to her that life could be so simplified. The accepted primitiveness of it all puzzled her. She was even more puzzled, however, by the row of books above the pegged array of mink traps and snowshoes and stretching frames, and the incongruous "college eight" photograph on the wall above the bunk.

"Do you like it?" she finally asked.

"I put up with it," was his response.

"But what have you got?" she found the courage to inquire. "What have you in your life?"

His morose eye studied her face.

"What have you?" he countered.

She compelled herself to laugh, at that. But she was soon solemn again. For she found certain difficulties in framing an answer to that question. What, after all, did she have in her life? What, above and beyond the nonessentials of existence, could she claim as distinctively her own? It was an unformulated dissatisfaction with everything about her that had driven her from the city, that had made alluring the thought of a stabilizing month in the North Woods. For already, that spring, she had felt something sharper than the steel jaws of a bear trap. She had seen her trust in her husband snap like a bead string. And she had asked for solitude, for the pine woods and the peace she had always loved, in which to reconstruct her shaken world.

She turned and studied Holgar, shadowed and silent beside her. He, too, had betrayed her. She had been made to suffer this time, not through a man's deceit, but through his cruelty. It disturbed her to find that she was still seeking some extenuating source of that cruelty, some secret injustice of an earlier day to excuse a strong man's weakness. For the fixed impression she now got from Holgar, in the face of his foolish timidities, was one of strength. And she was disturbed still again at the thought that she might in some way forgive cruelty from the strong while she stood unable to forgive deceit in the weak.

"I don't suppose it matters, after all," she said out of the silence that had fallen over them.

He asked her what she meant.

"I mean, it's not what we have that counts, but what we are. That's what decides whether we're to be happy or unhappy."

"I guess it's what other people do that counts most," said Holgar, staring out of the open door.

"Is that what brought you here?" she asked, struck by the pathos of the browned face in the strong side light.

He did not look at her. But his color deepened.

"I was thinking of you," he retorted. "And what I did to you."

"Let's not go back to that," she said, quietly enough, but with a deepening of her own color.

"I can't help it," he protested with an inadequate gesture of his huge hands. "But I'll pay for it, all right!"

"How?" she prompted, stirred more than she cared to be.

"I used to like to be alone," he said. And as he spoke he looked heavily about the neat but blank walled shack.

"Well?" she prompted, breathing more quickly than before.

"It'll be different," was all he said as he got up from his chair.

She sat with knitted brows as he strode out of the shack. When he came back an hour later she asked for a needle and thread and her clothes.

He brought her the bale of neatly folded clothing without speaking.

"I ought to be able to get into these in a day or two," she said as she shook out the garments and looked them over.

"I suppose so," was his listless response.

"Surely I can get around a little now," she argued.

"I suppose so," he repeated as before. Then he took a deep breath and added: "I'll make you a pair of crutches tomorrow. They'll help."

She thanked him absently, and then asked: "How long will I have to use crutches?"

"A few weeks," he told her.

"And then?" she prompted.

"Then I'll have to take you back," he said to the russet range into which he was stoking stovewood. But the flat deadness of his voice prompted her to lean a little lower over the garment seam which she was sewing together.

THE days grew warmer as spring crept over the land, and the northern silences grew vocal with the twin business of migrating and mating. When Adrienne

At last she found out

Something was amiss. Her animation and buoyancy, once so marked, were giving way steadily, it seemed, to lassitude, indifference and depression.

In despair, she determined to take careful inventory and try to regain her failing powers.

Back, at last, upon the road to robust health, she had learned—as thousands are now learning—that nine-tenths of all human ills come simply from wrong eating habits and deficient foods.

In other words, if you deprive your body of any vital element, you are bound to suffer from lowered resistance and many ailments usually known as "rundown" conditions.

One particular element that many common foods lack is found in greatest abundance in Yeast Foam Tablets. They supplement your regular food and help you to utilize its full value.

As a tonic to stimulate the appetite, improve digestion and correct many disorders due to malnutrition, Yeast Foam Tablets have been prescribed by physicians and taken by thousands.

Made of pure, whole, dehydrated yeast. Unlike baking yeast, they keep; they are easy to take and they do not cause gas. Sold by all druggists and made by the Northwestern Yeast Company, 1743 N. Ashland Ave., Chicago, Ill. (Makers of the famous baking yeasts, Yeast Foam and Magic Yeast.)

A TONIC FOOD

Wheelock was able to creep out into the open again she found an odd lassitude taking possession of her. It was not altogether peace that came to her, and it was not altogether unrest. But as she went on with her sewing, seam by seam and garment by garment, she wondered more and more about the world that had forgotten her.

It was a week later, as she sat alone in front of the shack, drying her hair in the sun, that an emissary from that world broke in on her solitude. It was Michel Pecotte, the halfbreed, on his way to the Post. And she resented the silence of his approach just as she resented the pointedness of his stare.

"Where heem?" asked Pecotte, with his squintıng old eye on the dooryard tracks.

"He's away," retorted the woman, with an echo of her visitor's impassivity.

"Heem back soon?" demanded Pecotte with another of his intent stares.

"Yes."

"You hees woman?"

Adrienne Wheelock flushed painfully. "No," was her sharp retort.

The metis grunted.

"How long you stay wit' heem?" he asked.

The color by this time had gone from the woman's face. "I was hurt in the woods," she explained, "and he took care of me."

Again the metis grunted. She hated that animal-like and half derisive sound. She also stood vaguely in fear of it, for it seemed to typify far off difficulties which would some day have to be faced.

"Gimme leetle taback and I go!" announced Pecotte.

She turned and studied the immobile old face. Then she took up the crutches padded with rabbit skin and made her way into the cabin. The metis said nothing as she returned with a handful of Holgar's tobacco and passed it over to him.

She watched him, equally silent, as he went down to the river, stepped into his canoe and paddled away. But her brow was so clouded with thought when Holgar returned that he was prompted to study her face.

"Has anything happened?" he asked. He had scant need for putting that question, since his trained eye had already read the history of that morning's intrusion. He had read it in the gum rubbed from Pecotte's canoe on one of the shore stones, in the fresh moccasin prints on the path, in the crutch prints that met the footsteps of the visitor.

"An Indian came here this morning," she explained.

"That was Pecotte," acknowledged Holgar. Then he stopped short. "Did you send out word by him?"

"No," she replied, without meeting his gaze.

And nothing more passed between them, at the moment. That night after supper, however, as they sat watching the sunset from his rock shelf above the river, she told him that she was able at last to walk without her crutches.

"That means you want to go back," he said, staring into the pine-fringed west. She sat silent, arrested by the tremor in his voice. He impressed her as being like the land which had engulfed him, sorrowful and silent and touched with mystery.

"That's the odd part of it," she confessed. "The part that rather frightens me. I've got to go back, of course, but I've no impulse to go. It almost terrifies me to think what the last month or two has done to me."

"What has it done?" he asked.

"It's given me time to think certain things out. And I've been wondering why women are so fond of Sèvres and cinnamon toast and azure silk and cut glass things with gold stoppers."

"They'll seem essential enough when you get back to them."

"It'll be different, of course," she said in a slightly flattened voice.

He half closed his eyes. "You know how it'll be here when you've gone," he surprised her by saying.

"How will it be?" she asked, quietly enough.

He uttered the one word "Hopeless!"

"Why should it be different?"

"It'll all be empty."

"Empty of what?"

"Of you!" he asserted with his first show of vehemence.

She seemed to be thinking this over. "You mean empty of companionship," she corrected. "And I'd call companionship essential to life, in a country like this."

He neither agreed nor disagreed with her. So she finally found the courage to ask:

"Why did you ever come here?"

"That's something I've never talked about."

"But talk about it to me."

"Why should I?"

"It may explain something I need to know."

"It will," was his curt retort. "It was back in your world, in November, after I'd been moose hunting up in the Temagami country; I'd been married the June before. I got back unexpectedly. There was a man there. The bedroom windows were quite high, and I threw him through one of them. His neck, they found, had been broken by falling on the terrace balustrade. I waited until things were settled, as much as such things could be settled. Then I came away."

The woman beside him did not speak for a long time.

"So that's why you hated me!" she said at last.

"I don't hate you," was his solemn reply. "It's the world you come from."

"Where we were very much in the same boat," she amended under her breath. Then she broke the silence by saying aloud: "Will Pecotte tell them I'm here?"

"I'm afraid so," he acknowledged, though he wondered, a moment later, as to the reason for the half tragic and half trivial twist of her interlocked fingers between her knees . . .

Holgar, however, was not in error as to the tendencies of Michel Pecotte. That traveler out of the North, it is true, had not a great deal to tell. But an audience had been prepared for him. A woman of wealth and position in the world had dropped out of life. The wildernes had sent back no echo of her; frantic searching parties had found no trace of her; and Erskine, Wheelock's field engineer at Coppermine Camp, still brooded hour by hour over the wording of the ominous message that must eventually go to his manager in the East. But the advent of Pecotte, with his brief statement of having stumbled across a white woman in the wilderness, took that unpalatable task out of Erskine's hands. The news traveled by "moccasin telegraph" from the Post to Buckhorn Landing and from there to the rail head, where, dramatized to self-justifying dimensions, it was put on the wires and in due time made its appearance in a New York evening paper. There the abrupt information of how a millionaire's wife had survived fierce combat with a wounded bear and had lived in the woods on bark and roots until rescued by a sourdough trapper who had taken her into his home brought Robert Wheelock to his office telephone, where his pale face grew still paler as he called for a time table, sent a hurried message to his valet, ordered a taxicab and caught an evening train for Montreal.

He was more composed the next day as he thundered westward on the Overland Limited, but an undefined sense of betrayal mingled with a sense of remoteness once more took possession of him as he turned north on a rough logging line, carefully outfitted at the rail head, and struck overland for Coppermine Camp. Only fools, he felt, went into a country like that. And his errand, he remembered, was as foolish a one as a man could undertake.

Yet as he approached the Wapiti River country he became less openly restive. He was given to long silences and found little to say to his guides. He seemed to have a great deal to think about. And when they told him they were within a day of Holgar's territory he ordered them to make camp while he took a canoe and went on alone. With him he took a blanket and food. And Pierre Cat, the head guide, noticed that he also took along with him one of the rifles.

Wheelock's progress down the river seemed an advance into unreality, a world of amber colored waters and reaches of green-tinted gloom twining through receding hill tiers fringed with pine tops. His distaste for the territory increased, even before he came to a still lonelier area of burnt-over stumpage. They spoke of it as the "New North," he remembered, yet it impressed him as a land not new but sorrowful and immense and infinitely old; the oldest formation known to the geologist, he idly recalled. He could not imagine anyone willingly living in such a country. Even the river along which he advanced began to impress him as a waterway leading to the phantasmal end of a phantasmal earth, a stream of dull mystery creeping off into the heart of darkness.

Wheelock did not hurry. A second wind of craftiness had come to him by this time, immured in his black joy of turning over fragment after fragment of unpalatable information on which he had stumbled along the way. He wanted to come on them at dusk, at nightfall, when they would be least looking for a visitor.

He tried to be cool about it all, but he was more excited than he had anticipated. He even fell to dramatizing the meeting with his wife and that other man; that other man about whom he could not now think without a hardening of the jaw muscles. And when that meeting came about, he intended to be the master of the situation. Life had confronted him often enough with problems more complicated than this one, and he had engineered his way out to success. He even nursed a growing impatience to see the thing brought to an issue.

Yet he was wary enough in his approach to that culminating moment. He watched the sun go down behind the black fringe of pine and as it went it seemed a sun that had gone out for all time. The desolation of the country more than ever depressed him. But he refused to be overawed by the barbaric.

He had intended to hide his canoe upstream and effect a secret approach on the cabin in the woods. But he suddenly realized, as he rounded a bend in the river, that it was already too late for any such maneuver. For on a rocky bluff overlooking the water, silhouetted against the sunset, he could see a man watching him. He sat motionless as he drifted on with the current, staring at that sentinel figure as he approached it, resenting its silence and its inalienable air of dignity. It seemed gigantic, in the clear northern twilight, grotesquely gigantic, on that enthroning black rock that thrust it up in clear profile against the vivid orange and green of the paling sunset. Yet neither man spoke.

Wheelock glanced down at the rifle lying along the bottom of his canoe. He could, without trouble, send a ball into that sullen black figure. But he could not construe this as any final solution of his problem.

The man, after all, was subsidiary. The vital factor was the as yet undisclosed woman beyond the man.

Wheelock beached his canoe and climbed to the top of the rock bluff, taking his rifle with him. He resented the Titan-like immobility of his enemy, who did not even turn as he approached. He resented the fact that he had to circle about that silent and somber figure, like a sheep dog circling about a mastiff.

Then the two men stood face to face in the twilight. They stood for several moments without movement or speech. The newcomer spoke first.

"Where's my wife?"

He uttered the three words quietly enough, yet they came with a savagery which was not to be mistaken. The other man, however, merely moved a massive head towards the cabin half hidden in the pine trees above him.

"How long has she been there?" demanded Wheelock, with his narrowing eyes on the barricaded big face.

"Nearly two months now," was the final response. Yet that response was uttered in a voice so quiet that the newcomer found something maddening in its assured tranquillity.

"What have you got to say about this?" he cried out, with his jaw squared.

"A great deal," was the still unruffled reply.

"I guess you ought to have!" contended the other.

Wheelock, for all his anger, found it hard to speak. He too had a great deal to say. But he sensed limitations to the manner in which it might be said. And it was betrayal touched with exasperation that sounded in his voice as he cried out: "What have you done to her?"

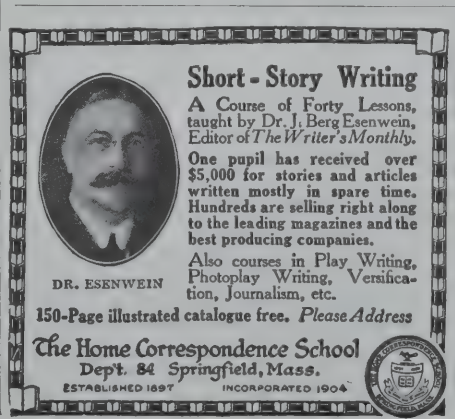
The other man stood silent a moment. "What I ought to be shot for," he said with a gesture of helplessness that seemed grotesque from a figure so huge. "But I want you to understand how it happened."

Expansion

A million new subscribers were linked to the Bell System during the past two years—putting into operation a million new routes of talk, and a corresponding increase in all intervening facilities such as switchboards, cable and long distance lines.

No other country is so well equipped as the United States for telephone communication. Yet, because of this—because the telephone is so useful—the demand for service keeps growing greater.

The growth of telephone demand in the United States is greater than the growth of population. It is an intensive growth. An increasing percentage of the population is seeking telephone service.



The Bell System is providing for more investment, further technical achievement, more wires, switchboards and stations—and more subscribers. The American people require the best service. The best service means the most comprehensive service, not only for the necessities of to-day, but for the necessities of the future.

"Isn't it enough that it's happened," retorted Wheelock, "without hairsplitting over it? Damn you, I don't even want to hear you!"

Slowly Holgar drew his forward-slumping shoulders together. It seemed to take him some time to master his voice. He finally said: "Then what is it you want?"

"I want my wife," retorted the other man. "What's left of her!"

"She's there," said Holgar, pointing heavily towards the cabin, where a light now shone from the window. Then he turned and walked slowly off into the forest.

Wheelock stood looking after him. For the second time his turbid brain cradled the thought of sending a bullet into the shadowy figure. More than once one man had killed another, in that country, and claimed his victim had been mistaken for a moose. But that story, instinct told him, would not be easily swallowed. There would be a better time and a better way.

Wheelock lowered his rifle and went slowly up the wooded hillside. He stood panting in the clean swept dooryard between the frugal piles of stovewood. He waited, wondering at the silence within the low-walled cabin, puzzled by the thought that a place so small could house destinies so vast. Then he stepped forward and swung open the door.

IV

WHEELOCK'S wife did not even look up as he stepped inside. She was seated at a rough table on which stood two lighted candles. These candles were home-made, from the fat of some animal, and the smell of them in the closed cabin was unsavory. It made him think of an Eskimo igloo. It combined with the animal skins and the ax-hewn furniture and the inadequate sheet iron stove to bring home to him an impression of the primitive, of the barbaric. And the sight of his wife, bent placidly over her sewing, served to strengthen the impression. He thought of her as something docile and squaw-like, humiliatingly roughened in the rough apparel which tended to translate her into a being he had never before known. And with her needle, he noticed, she was stitching a patch on a man's flannel shirt, worn almost threadbare.

She looked up at him, at his gasp of anger touched with bewilderment, and their glances locked together. He waited for her to speak. But she seemed to have nothing to say.

"I guess this just about puts us even!" he cried out, with his foolishly recurring waves of anger. But still she sat studying him with her level, hard stare.

"Apparently you weren't expecting me?" he mocked, hurt beyond expression by the beauty he could still find in that remote and slowly paling face which floated before him in the uncertain light.

"I knew that you would come," she said at last, very quietly.

"You mean you wanted me to come?" he taunted with a protective parade of incredulity.

"I knew that you would come," she repeated, as quietly as before.

He advanced into the room, with his jaw set. He came to a stop at the end of the table where she sat. Her linked fingers rested on the rough flannel of the man's shirt she had been mending. But her eyes, all the while, were fixed on her husband's face.

"And what did you expect when I got here?" he demanded, hot with the knowledge that she was in some way throwing him on the defensive.

"That rests with you," she said with her maddening quietness.

"Well, it's a sweet mess for a white man to be dragged into. It's a sweet pill to swallow, with half the world knowing your wife's been——"

She stopped him with a gesture.

"I didn't expect you to feel sorry for yourself," she said, with her first show of spirit.

"You couldn't expect me to feel sorry for you!" he countered, with the last of the color gone from his face.

She sat back, studying him once more.

"Listen," she said at last. "All that life means to us, all our future happiness, stands like a lighted candle on this table between us. It must not and cannot be handled like this. If it goes out, it can never be lighted again."

Her sustained impassiveness was only fuel to the fire of his anger.

"For two months you've lived along with this bushwhacker and then you mouth about the delicacy with which the subject must be mentioned. It isn't a matter of lighting candles," he cried out, "it's a matter of commonsense and decency. For two months you have lived in this shack with a man who isn't your husband, and when your husband turns up you warn him to watch his step! And I'll tell you right here and now that most husbands wouldn't take the trouble to turn up!"

She stared at him with a slow look of illumination creeping into her face. She was able, at last, to articulate the scattered skeleton of all her earlier distrust.

"And what do you propose doing with me?" she finally asked.

He sat down, at that, as though she had thrust on him a burden that was too heavy for him. He sat for a long time, with his face working. Then he looked up at her.

"I propose getting you out of here," he said in a steelier voice than she expected.

"Do you mean you're taking me back?"

"Yes, I'm willing to take you back," he finally conceded.

She closed her eyes, to absorb the enormity of his mistake.

"That is good of you," she said with embittered tranquillity. But her face saddened, involuntarily, at the thought of the gulfs that yawned between them.

"This time—but never again!" he qualified, resenting her passiveness before a situation which still impressed him as calamitous.

"When are you taking me?" was her next question.

"Tonight," was his short reply.

She sat studying the flannel shirt, the abominably conspicuous flannel shirt, under her linked fingers.

"Where's Holgar?" her husband heard her ask.

"What's Holgar got to do with this?" he barked out.

"I'd like to see him before I go," his wife explained.

"I guess you've seen about enough of that man! You've——"

But her gesture once more brought him to a stop.

"I think there's something you don't understand," she said after a moment's silence. "Something about Holgar and me. Do you realize just why I've been here nearly two months?"

"The bald fact that you've been here ought to be enough for most people."

"But the fact isn't as bald as you may have believed. It's mixed up with other things, like most of the facts of life."

"Well, it's not the sort of mixture I want a wife of mine to be in!" he cried out at her in a hardened voice. The hostility of his face held her silent for a moment or two.

"You don't think this man—cares for me in any way, do you?" she demanded. Her husband's embittered glance swept slowly about the four crowded walls that enclosed her.

"I can't see much evidence to the contrary!" was his deliberate retort. And again their glances locked.

"But when I'd been lost for two days and came to his door, he turned me away. He refused to help me. He did even worse than that. He let me walk into a bear trap."

"He what?" cried Wheelock, incredulous.

"He stood and let me walk into a trap he had set for a wild animal. That broke my leg and left me helpless."

Wheelock stood up, his face strained. Yet he spoke quietly enough.

"You mean he deliberately let this happen?"

"I'm better now," observed the woman. Her statement seemed inconsequential to the man confronting her.

"Then by God he'll get a dose of his own medicine!" Wheelock bit out with a quiet savagery that brought the woman's eyes back to his face.

"That's impossible!" she said in little more than a whisper.

"We'll see if it's impossible!" was the other's embittered cry.

"But that would make you worse than he was," she reminded him.

Her husband stopped short. "You're not arguing a case for this half witted bushranger, are you?"

"No, it was more for you."

"For me?"

"Yes, I was hoping for bigness from you," she said as she relinked her fingers over the flannel shirt.

"Then, by God, you'll get it! I've played second fiddle in this situation just a little too long. You seem to have a weakness for the cave man stuff, so I'll give you what you want. Get ready!"

"For what?" she asked, her breath quickening.

"To come back with me," he retorted.

"When?"

"Now! At once! As soon as you get together what you need!"

She laughed for the first time, though not without bitterness.

"I've nothing to get ready," she explained to him. "All I brought with me was my rifle."

His gesture was one of impatience.

"Then get that," he commanded as he went to the door and looked out.

In silence she put on her hunting coat and cap and took down her rifle from the two wooden pegs in the wall where Holgar had placed it. Her husband was staring at the iron bear trap that hung in the farther corner of the room. And she took her turn at looking out into the night.

"Can we travel, in darkness like this?" she asked.

"I'm not as helpless as you seem to imagine," he retorted as he waited for her beside the open door.

She noticed, as he followed her outside, that he had forgotten his rifle, but she said nothing about it as they groped their way down to the river bank.

"Shall I come in my canoe?" she asked.

"No; you come with me, in mine," he promptly announced. But he stopped short before he stepped into the canoe after her.

"I've forgotten my rifle," he said. "Wait here for me."

Several times, as he climbed the hill again, he waited and listened and peered about through the gloom. Then he made his way back to the cabin. Once inside, he swung the door shut. After a quick inspection of the room he took down the heavy bear trap and placed it within three paces of the door. Then, with the ax he found in the cabin corner, he drove the bit of the trap's anchor chain deep into the heavy timber, drove it until the head was well sunk beneath the surface. He next gave his attention to setting the trap. To do so took all his strength. Sweat stood thick on his face when he had finished. Then he so placed the rough chairs and table that they marked off a narrowing alley, an alley which led directly over the set jaws of steel. Anyone moving in through the darkness from the door to approach the bed bunk would have to pass over those waiting jaws. Before he put out the two guttering candles, however, Wheelock took up the man's shirt on which his wife had been sewing, studied it, and then with infinite care draped it lightly over the outspread iron jaws.

He was composed enough by the time he had returned to the canoe and pushed out into midstream. He was grateful for his wife's silence. She did not speak, in fact, until he had paddled a mile and more through the uncertain light.

"Why did you nail up that cabin door?" she finally asked.

"What made you think I did?" he countered.

"I heard you."

"That wasn't a door being nailed up," he said with his little laugh of triumph, "I was doing something quite different."

"What was it?"

"I was getting a dose of his own medicine ready for that backwoods Romeo of yours!"

She did not seem to understand him for several moments. Then even in the uncertain light he could see her shoulders stiffen against the canoe thwart in front of him.

"The trap!" she said in a thin whisper of comprehension. But there was no further sound or movement from her.

She sat ominously silent until Wheelock, an hour later, announced the futility of trying to make further headway in the darkness. He was tired, and they could land and sleep comfortably enough until daylight left things easier for them.

She watched him as he made ready a sleeping place by spreading jack pine on a sloping rock shelf.

"There's only one blanket," he observed. "So it'll have to be a case of sharing again."

She made no reply to that, and he accepted her silence as weariness. But she lay awake, painfully awake, listening to his breathing. She waited until he was asleep. Then she slowly and quietly slipped from under the blanket and crept to the water's brink. There she headed downstream again, groping her way through the darkness. It was not easy going. Sometimes she found fallen cedars to climb over. Sometimes there were boulders and tree roots to trip her up. At one time she was wet to the waist and at another she had fifty feet of a pebbly cut bank to climb. But she realized the need of keeping close to the river. Once a bobcat screamed, within a stone's throw of her, and her blood curdled at the sound. The acids of fatigue filled her body and her leg hurt her more and more. But she fought her way on, hour by hour, with her clothing torn, with her face slightly smudged with blood from a briar scratch on her hand.

The presaging gray light of morning was creeping over the land when she won back to Holgar's cabin between the pines. She had to rest several times before she could mount the path leading from the river to the worn little dooryard. She had to climb slowly, steeling herself for what awaited her between the familiar low walls of spruce so neatly matched and dovetailed together.

Her breath came in short gasps as she hesitated a moment outside the door. She listened in vain for some sound from within. Then with a deep breath she swung the door open.

The cabin was empty. On the table, restored to its accustomed place, lay the flannel shirt on which she had been sewing, neatly folded. On its hook in the far corner hung the huge bear trap, and beside it stood Holgar's ax and rifle and broom of shaved hickory. The floor was fresh swept and the bunk made. Over the room, with its humanizing odors, hung a fortifying air of neatness, of competence unshaken and unshakable.

She turned in the doorway and sat down on the narrow threshold. A deepening rind of orange and opal showed in the east above the receding loneliness of the hill tiers. The forest birds were choiring a new day into being.

There Holgar, coming back with a pail of water from his spring, found her with her head on her arm. He put down his pail.

She heard the sound and looked up. Slowly she rose to her feet, with one hand against the rough door frame. Just as slowly he advanced towards her.

"I've come back," she said, very quietly.

He stopped, amazed at the desolation in her voice. About her heart, too, crept a tightness at his silence.

"Was it the trap that made you come back?" he finally asked.

"No, it was something bigger than the trap," she acknowledged with a tremor in her voice. "But I was afraid of that, too."

"Afraid I'd walk into it?" he asked, incredulous.

"Yes."

He drew a deep breath. "We woodsmen are taught to have keen eyes. We see many things that other men never see."

"Then you know why I came back?" she asked, with that odd band of pain still belting her quick beating heart.

"I know," he said as he kneeled down in front of her, and his great arms clasped hungrily about her wet knees.

"Do you want me?" she asked, with her briar-scratched hand reaching out for his bent head. She could feel the momentary tremor of his body. But he did not look up.

"When I've earned you," he said with his head against her knee.

You won't want to miss Louis Joseph Vance's "The Lone Wolf Returns," each chapter of which is a thrilling mystery story in itself—beginning in February.

The Talking Vase

No one could fail to be impressed by such gravity of mien, by such tones as issued from that majestic robed and turbaned figure. With some nervous giggling, the library filled up and the door was closed.

"Sit erect, with your hands upon your knees. Concentrate wholly upon the questions you have asked." The professor stood near the vase; his eyes were gleaming, his brow was furrowed, he had become dominant, immense. Again his voice became sepulchral. "Concentrate! Be silent! Wait!"

Followed a long pause, insufferably intense. "O Voice of the Vase! Great Spirit of Poopar!" Tremblay cried sonorously. "We knock at the gates of the Beyond. We await the sign."

Again a breathless silence; then came a faint rustling as of dry leaves, or the sighing of a breeze, and the bearded figure stirred. "He comes! The Voice! Yes, Mighty One, you call for—for Mary? Miriam? Is there a Miriam?"

Miss Donaldson spoke in a reedy, frightened voice.

"Ith it me?"

"Come forward, please."

Miss Donaldson rose and went blindly to the table; she inclined her head and listened. Through the silence was heard the unmistakable tones of a thin, far away voice. Far away indeed, since it spanned centuries. Miss Donaldson gasped and clutched at her throat; she nodded as if in answer to a question; then she tried to form words but her lips failed her. The murmur from the vase was like the faint tones of an oboe but evidently the message was distinctly audible, for the girl's pallor increased with every sentence. Her bosom heaved; with her free hand she pawed aimlessly. Those who watched her growing agitation were appalled when, without warning, she uttered a piercing shriek and collapsed.

The door to the living room was flung open. Ginsberg, Hyman and others crowded through. They were met by Professor Tremblay bearing the unconscious star in his arms.

"It is nothing," he calmly announced. "The first subject has fainted, as usual."

brought the victim around. She opened her eyes to discover Bush Thorndyke, white and helpless, staring down at her the while her employer, Ad Hyman, feverishly massaged her hands. A most amazing thing then occurred. Miss Donaldson snatched her hands away and spoke to Hyman as follows:

"You dirty dog!"

Hyman sat back upon his heels; his mouth fell open; then, attributing the outburst to hysteria, he spoke soothingly. But the diminutive beauty would not be soothed. "I've got your number, you—you therpent!" With one small palm she smote the producer a resounding smack upon his full olive cheek. "Buth! Buth!" she wailed and held out her arms to Thorndyke.

Thorndyke knelt gracefully beside the couch and gathered her to his bosom. He moved slowly, as if through force of habit he timed his action to the cranking of a camera. Over his shoulder he explained:

"We didn't intend to announce it, but Miriam and I were married a month ago."

"Ach!" Hyman recoiled, his eyes blazed. "There goes fifty thousand off 'The Gutter Lily'! And after I've spent a fortune advertising her as the Public's Darling. Co-starring with her husband! Why, it's like announcing that Jackie Coogan is a married man. Isn't business rotten enough without trying to run the fans out of the theaters?"

Miss Donaldson had won fame by her ingénue portrayals, by her playing of placid sixteen year old innocents, but she qualified now as an intensely emotional actress. She withered Hyman with a glare of hatred. "You thnake in the grath! Wait until I tell Buth! Wait!"

"I must warn all of you," gravely announced the professor, "that the Voice is pitiless. How could it be otherwise when it speaks only the Truth? Perhaps some of you fear disappointment, bad news——"

"It wathn't bad newth: it wath good newth," declared the bride of a month, the "Gutter Lily." "It—thaved my happineth." She bowed her head upon Thorndyke's chest, in the exact spot where she had bowed it so many times for the slow fade, and wet his shirt front with her tears.

"She seems to be all right again, so let's go on. There's something I simply must know." It was Stella Green of the expensive spine who spoke, and when others shared her eagerness the sitting was resumed.

This time it was Madame Turin who was summoned from the circle. "You may take the vase in your arms," Tremblay told her. "Let us be sure there are no concealed wires—no trickery of any sort."

Reverently the singer lifted the relic and bore it to her chair. There was nothing hysterical about Turin; hers was the blazing ardor of a zealot. "I am waiting!" she declared in her full, round voice.

Again came the eerie whispering from the shadow world, but this time those sitting near the great artist could distinguish occasional words and phrases, and their scalps tingled.

". . . glorious gift of song prostituted . . . this vile and degrading employment . . . multitudes waiting to acclaim . . . Paris, the entire Continent in grief at your desertion . . ."

"Yes, yes, but my contract?" Turin cried in tones of panic. "It calls for four more. I—it's—oh, that is impossible!"

The birring continued for some time. Closer the songbird clutched the urn; she strained it to her bosom; her eyes were tragic. She questioned it, she argued, she protested. Hers was indeed a demonstration and she made the most of it. "Thais!" she cried at last. "But it was promised to another . . . I—understand. It is the climate. I've noticed the change . . . It will go and never return? . . . There's more money in opera . . . I—I thank you."

It was plain that the singer had experienced a great shock; nevertheless she withstood it nobly. Like one in a trance she returned the vase to its guardian. Breathlessly she told him: "This was a priceless privilege. Priceless! And a superb demonstration! It has changed my entire career, my life."

Next the vase called for Wilbur Kent, most popular of the Notable Film Company's directors; then "Red" Courtney of the Screen Writers' Guild, and Stella Green the last of the Gins-Art stars. Several others were likewise summoned.

Despite this unique opportunity of learning something about the spiritual world, about the beatitude of their departed relatives, it seemed that each and every one of these earnest students of the psychic had propounded questions concerning their own material selves—questions of a purely business nature. Their yearning to prove the existence of life after death, strangely enough, had taken the form of requests for professional counsel—the future indeed concerned them, but their own immediate futures only. That the Voice conversed in terms of dollars and cents, that it discussed salaries, contracts, renewals and options indicated that the Rajah's spirit was not only endowed with a god-like patience but also that it possessed an amazing familiarity with the film business. Much "inside" information passed between it and them and no more convincing evidence of a supreme intelligence could have been adduced.

The first group of sitters became enthusiastic converts and the library rapidly filled up for the second show.

Ad Hyman was among the first to receive a message and evidently it was not a pleasant one. He said little, but he perspired freely and even after he had gone back to his seat he continued to mop his face. He was no longer a skeptic but a worried if reluctant apostate.

As for Ginsberg, when his turn came he talked frankly to the vase—upon banking matters. "So? . . . It ain't possible? . . . Listen, I don't care if it is the biggest group in Wall Street. Why should I let 'em put in four hundred thousand dollars when already we got more money then we need? . . . Six percent, eh? . . . Sure! And I don't know if I want to take on any more stars, either, with salaries coming down every day . . . Wait! Don't tell me!"

Whatever it was the Vase told him, Ginsberg was astonished. He could barely credit the good news and when he had finally finished his spirit interview he announced to his hearers:

"Maybe it's a fake, but for what I just heard I wouldn't take a hundred thousand dollars, cash." When he reseated himself, he was seen to nod and to smile and to compute upon his fingers. He was heard to mutter strange and cryptic words.

The last guest had gone. In Ginsberg's dining room was laid out a midnight spread, largely liquid. At the table sat the producer himself, Jimmy Lord, Moe Apple and Joe Thomas; before them was a stack of envelopes and sheets of note paper. These Sol and Moe were reading between drinks.

"Listen to this from Ad Hyman," chuckled the host. "'Is it safe to risk Myrtle Sawyer in a leading role?' Ha! It should take an Injun Rajah to answer that! Only for Myrtle's sake and yours, Joe, I could wish Jimmy had boosted her for a Bernhardt."

Lord shook his head with a grin. "I warned him to beware of a blue eyed woman who had recently come into his life and said the home office had got wise. Told him they were sending out an efficiency man to cut overhead and it meant her job or his. But Donaldson will put an end to Miss Sawyer's future, anyhow."

"Say! What did you pull on her?" Ginsberg inquired. "I never heard such a screech."

"She's been getting candy through the mails for a month—some nutty fan, of course—but I told her it came from Ad and he intended to poison her so as to put Myrtle in opposite Thorndyke. Well, candy is poison to Miriam. Another five pounds and she'll be too fat to get over. While we were shooting 'The Bride of Hate,' she ate a box of Turkish paste and her liver went bad. It cost us six thousand dollars. Of course I didn't know she and Bush were married—that was pure luck. I'll bet they'll be back on our lot in a week."

"It looks like a big night's work for you," Joe Thomas told his host, "with Madame Turin eager to cancel and hurry to Paris while there is yet time to save her voice and the future of Grand Opera, and with the Passion Flower wedded to Gins-Art for life, not to mention the others! Some of them spoke so low I was afraid the dictaphone wouldn't pick up their voices."

"I didn't catch everything they said," Lord confessed, "but after Donaldson did her flop they were ready to take anything."

"What made you call Red Courtney?" Ginsberg inquired of the director.

"He's married to a rotten sequence in his last script and I thought I'd clean it up, for my own sake."

"Maybe you told him five hundred dollars was too much for a bum original?" Sol beamed hopefully.

"Say, you're in luck that nobody wandered downstairs and found Apple and me with that wireless rig and these written questions!"

Apple agreed to this. "Sure! A lot of 'em came here to kid the thing and they'd have done it, too, only for Joe's thought transference. That one had me going and I don't know yet how he did it."

"Don't you fellows believe in anything except alcoholic spirits?" Joe grinned and put a new "collar" on his glass.

Ginsberg shook his head positively. "After tonight, spirits, with me, runs in the end book."

"Well, there is a bright bellboy at the Ambassador and I hired him to stay in

MINERALAVA BEAUTY CLAY paving the road to Beauty in Natures Way

By HECTOR FULLER

THE amazing success of MINERALAVA has not been entirely due to its high-grade advertising and publicity; nor to the word-of-mouth endorsements of Mothers, Fathers, Sons and Daughters to their friends and neighbors.

These, of course, have helped.

There are other great factors!

MINERALAVA is now sold and recommended by over 28,000 dealers throughout the United States and Canada, and by at least 100,000 clerks and proprietors of dependable Drug and Department Stores.

These stores serve millions of people who depend upon the intelligent service and advice of owners of stores and their sales people where high-grade articles such as MINERALAVA are sold.

The owners of these stores instruct their sales people:

"Sell Mineralava Beauty Clay and Face Finish to your very best trade, with the complete understanding that we will return their money without question if Mineralava does not give entire satisfaction."

That is why MINERALAVA is not sold by mail. We want each purchaser of MINERALAVA not only to have our own unqualified Money Back Guarantee, but also the guarantee and endorsement of their own local and dependable dealer.

Do you wonder that the readers of this magazine have no hesitancy in ordering MINERALAVA? Thousands order it over the telephone daily!

THE SECRET OF MINERALAVA'S SUCCESS

One of the big factors in the success and large sale of MINERALAVA have been the editors of Beauty Departments of great magazines who tell their readers, as did the editor of The Druggist Link, a magazine that goes to thousands of retail druggists: "One treatment demonstrates Mineralava to any man or woman. It is the Toilet Goods Discovery of the Century."

A strong endorsement, you will say at once. But absolutely true!

MINERALAVA will make good on this recommendation, as it will on any and all of the endorsements from Editors of Beauty Departments of such notable women's magazines as:

Woman's Home Companion — Pictorial Review
Theatre Magazine — Harper's Bazar
Fashionable Dress — Toilette Goods and others.

Of course you have read the testimony of such beauties of the Stage and Screen as Billie Burke, Julia Sanderson, Irene Bordoni, Zitelka Dolores, Irene Franklin, Kyra, Marjorie Rambeau, and we have endorsements from thousands of readers of this magazine.

THE EVILS OF SKIN-MALNUTRITION

Every face that is subject to premature wrinkles, sagging muscles, pimples, blackheads, sallowness, coarse and oily skin or enlarged pores is suffering from Skin-Malnutrition.

Sir Erasmus Wilson, M.D.,F.R.S., famous skin specialist of London, states that the human skin is made up of two layers, the outer called the Epidermis; the inner, called the Dermis. As it grows the outer skin flakes and falls away, but all the time the Dermis, or baby under-skin, is preparing to take its place.

MINERALAVA acts directly through the pores on the under-skin. It builds up the tiny muscles, restores the vitality to the tissues; stimulates a healthy circulation of the blood; corrects skin-malnutrition of no matter how long standing; and so nourishes the under skin that it is ready when the time comes, to take its place in the perfect complexion, new-born and beautiful.

Wash off the mask—look into the mirror—and you will see a newer, fresher, more colorful and a healthier face!

Enthusiastic women declare that:

A MINERALAVA SKIN NEVER AGES

In spite of its original high cost MINERALAVA is at the service of all women today at $2.00 a bottle. Each bottle contains enough for eighteen full treatments for the face and neck; a trifle more than 10 cents a treatment.

my room. With him I left a list of names—two columns. The first column contained ten given names, like John, Henry, George and so on, and each name was numbered; the second column was made up of ten family names, Adams, Murphy, Graves, Johnson, similarly numbered. When Hyman asked for Henry Graves, the boy looked at his list. Henry was two, Graves was three. He read my mind and knew I was thinking of twenty-three. It was as simple as Moe's conjurer's bag with the double pocket and the duplicate envelopes. That is an old gag but I couldn't think of any better way to get those questions into Jimmy's hands."

"Tse! Tse!" Ginsberg clucked and shook his head. "It's a shame you should waste such brains on the electric business."

Moe Apple was examining the turban Joe had worn. He looked up to say: "Wasted, is it? And him with the patents granted for his new coil and this head set. It's too bad you won't have a piece of his royalties to waste on pictures. The first time I looked at that vase, I'll say it fooled me. I had to run a wire up the spout to detect the amplifier."

Thomas was of a similar mind. "Yes, if I've cured Myrtle of the movie habit I won't consider my brains wasted. 'Fragrant Myrtle Thomas, the Wonder Wife'! I'll be around in the morning, Sol, and rip the wiring out of your library."

It was a week later. Joe Thomas looked up from a magazine as his wife spoke his name. Outside the car windows the desert was gliding past.

"Yes, dearie?"

"Are you getting tired of me already?"

"Why, sweetheart, I'm in Heaven." The groom leaned forward and kissed her pouting lips.

"I didn't know. You haven't said anything nice for—ever so long. And Joe! You'll never tell anybody what a miserable failure I was in pictures?"

"Nonsense. Who says you were a failure?"

A moment passed, then Mr. Thomas was again interrupted. "What are you reading, pettie?"

"One of those articles about spirits. It's great."

"Surely you don't believe in such things?"

"Of course I do. There are certain phenomena of nature——"

"You're one of them, dear." Mrs. Thomas favored her husband with an adoring gaze. "You're better looking than any of those leading men and I'm going to be frightfully jealous." The speaker ran her fingers through her husband's head of wavy midnight hair and he grinned fatuously at her compliment. "Poor, hard working Joe!" Again the pouting lips invited him. "This trip must have cost a fortune! And we could have spent the money for furniture!"

"Nothing like it, honey! You see I wired Ginsberg's house for him while I was in Los Angeles and he gave me a tip to buy Gins-Art stock. The trip hasn't cost a cent."

THE best novels grow for several years in the author's mind. "THE HOPE OF HAPPINESS"

By Meredith Nicholson

Mr. Nicholson and I are fellow Hoosiers, graduates of the same newspaper in Indiana. We see each other in New York or in Indiana several times a year; and there hasn't been a time in five years that we haven't discussed his plan to write a novel which would put in understandable form the human yearning for happiness.

After all, that's what we all want—happiness. Some of us think it comes from money, some think it comes from love, some from success, some from religion. Mr. Nicholson believes it comes from something which is none of these individually but is compounded from all of them.

He expresses his belief in one of the most dramatic stories I have encountered in my fifteen years in the magazine business.

Barney Oldfield crossing over Raton Pass in mid-winter—A painting by F. S. Cole

"My Marmon Surely Stands the Gaff
-cross continent eight times"
By Barney Oldfield

"I've driven many makes of high grade cars, but none ever had such hard service as my Marmons.

"The reason for this is that since adopting Marmons I have undertaken the manufacture of Oldfield tires, which I test personally. To get definite, first-hand knowledge of how my tires stand punishment, I've driven my Marmons continuously under most extreme conditions—high speed on race tracks, ordinary travel on bad roads and hard going on cross-country trips.

"My Marmons have served as pacemakers for a lot of races during the past two years, and I have driven all over the country visiting Oldfield dealers.

"Mrs. Oldfield is equally enthusiastic over her Marmon Coupe, having driven it across the continent twice. She comments constantly on its easy handling, comfort and dependability.

"I've had a hunch that the national survey of Marmon mechanical maintenance would prove the great economy of this sturdy car, and I'm not surprised that the monthly average is as low as $4.71. My Marmons pile up mileage with practically no maintenance expense to me.

"Believe me, there's no car to equal a Marmon for dependability, performance, and economical maintenance."

Not Guilty

by S. E. KISER

I'M glad I'm not the man who takes
The rent a certain widow pays;
With dulled eyes and a heart that aches,
She drudges while her landlord plays.
Her children bitterly have learned
That want and wealth are constant foes;
I'm glad that when her wage is earned
I'm not the one to whom it goes.

I'M glad I'm not the man who wrecked
The hopes an anxious boy possessed;
His proud ambition has been checked,
His eager spirit is repressed.
I'm glad I did not turn him out,
To wander forth, pursued by fear,
His daring undermined by doubt,
The victim of a spoiled career.

I'M glad I'm not the man whose greed
Has caused distress and want to spread
Where old men lack the warmth they need
And their old wives are underfed.
Because of profits others take
They have been driven to despair;
I'm glad I have not helped to make Them think that God is deaf to prayer.

I'M glad I'm not the man for whom
The girl found floating yesterday
Renounced the world and sought the gloom
No morning breeze will blow away.
Her spirit may be where there's none
Who challenge her by word or look,
But I am glad I'm not the one
Who sent her on the course she took.

How Can We Regard With Awe

By GEORGE ADE

ERNEST WISEMAN has loitered in every kind of settlement, from the one bordered by cornfields to one bordered by crime, and yet to this day he cannot lay down a working rule for safely dividing the socially important from the bourgeoisie, the déclassés, the second-raters, the impossible, the ones who do not belong, the persons one is not expected to know, the non-eligibles, the culls, the discards, the dubs, the sorry ornaments of the fringe, the climbers, the pretenders.

In every community sufficiently ripened to have samovars and country clubs and a vague interest in English lecturers, there is a segregated band recognized by the local newspaper as "society." It is set apart from the commonalty of lawn sprinklers and those who carry to their homes ice cream and oysters in paper buckets.

No one living within the radius of illumination generated by aristocracy can be left in doubt of the fact that there is a wall of fire dividing the elect from the plebes.

But no one can tell just what requirements a candidate must flash in order to sneak past the cold-eyed ladies who guard the sacred portals.

Many persons of impaired credit, bad manners and rancid reputations are safely inside, holding life memberships, while kind hearted couples with bank accounts and one hundred percent deportment and well behaved children are pacing up and down outside—not a Chinaman's chance of edging past the turnstile.

Let us not scoff at them too hard for wanting to have their names put down in the golden volume. They think they are missing a lot of Elysian days and Arabian nights. In the meantime the favored ones are missing a lot of sleep.

Have you ever met any families of enforced morality who would gladly trade their respectability for just one mention in the scandal weekly which circulates openly at resort hotels and surreptitiously in perfumed boudoirs? Did Washington's men freeze their feet at Valley Forge in order to give us this brand of democracy?

If prizes were to be awarded for best answers to the question "Who is the lonesomest and unhappiest mortal in the U. S. A.?" do you think the winner would name the sheep herder out on the plains; or the derelict stamping his feet on a warm grate in the pavement; or the keeper of the lighthouse, surrounded by churning waves and reading a paper six weeks old; or the country girl who weeps over mother's picture in the most forlorn back bedroom of a cruel city?

No, after all investigations had been sifted over it would be learned that the lonesomest and unhappiest mortal among us is the woman who has closets full of clothes and chamois bags full of jewels and who wants to give a parade but cannot exhibit her accessories of grandeur to anyone except the husband and the waiters. The only definite ambition she will realize is finally to become acquainted with a celebrated nerve specialist.

Now, if we can keep our faces straight, let us regard the steel-clad defenses thrown up against an attacking horde of "newly rich." Of course there is no money, even in New England, old enough to be redolent of anything except the mint. Furthermore, there is no habitation west of Pittsburgh in which the plaster has thoroughly hardened.

Statistics show that 996 out of every 1,000 women who smoke in public still feel like circus performers and the man who can wear white gloves without being self-conscious is practically nonexistent except in the most depraved centers of continuous revelry.

How can anyone become reverential in front of a family tree which dates back to the Chicago fire? It has just begun to bear nuts.

A family tree does not inspire awe until it is withered at the top, tattered in the boughs and encrusted with lichens, fungi, moss and parasites.

There is this to be said for almost any set-apart unit known as "society." Only a few of the individuals who have been herded into the royal stockade become emotional over their good fortune. Most of them don't know how they got there and wonder what the whole darned thing is about. Some who have moral heroism of the Savanarola kind climb out and live happily ever afterward. Not many. The show isn't much after you get a front seat. But think how scarce the tickets are!

The Lone Wolf Returns

Indisputably a fascinating creature, Folly McFee. "Who," she cried, "wants to take me down for this tango?"

"I LOVE you," said Michael Lanyard.

He spoke in French; and that simple phrase, covered by the surging song of strings and wood winds, was inaudible to other ears. Only the woman with him heard and, hearing, roused from the reverie into which she too insensibly had lapsed, turning back from the prismatic pageantry of the dance eyes whose grave regard gave never a clue to the emotions his words had inspired.

Making no more acknowledgment than this, she studied him intently but kindly, touched by the wistfulness that shadowed the demeanor of unpretending dignity which she had learned to like best of all the many phases of the man their friendship had revealed.

The severity of evening dress in line and lack of color became him well, setting off the lean, sculptured contours of his face, giving value to its even warmth of tone. Traces of silver at his temples hinted at that history, not too happy, with which she was in part acquainted. The strength with which his mouth was modeled affected her, as always, with a faint, strangely pleasant thrill of alarm; the dark, clear eyes, at once deferential and demanding, held her in a spell she had no wish to break.

"I love you," he repeated.

Her brows took on a quaintly plaintive cast. "I know, my friend," she replied, in the same tongue and tone. "For a long time I have known . . . as you have known my love was all for you. And yet . . ." The slender, exquisite shoulders lifting their fairness out of the corsage of her jetted gown sketched a shrug.

"I had to wait to tell you," he said, "till I was sure——"

In indulgent raillery she interrupted: "Sure that you loved me?"

He smiled, but wagged his head in stubborn earnestness: "Sure of what else I must say."

"There is more?"

"Much more." The man leaned nearer over the table, with a deepened accent of sincerity. "I love you so dearly, Eve, the thought of a life without you is beyond my understanding . . . Yet I may not ask you to be my wife."

"May not?" Hands of consummate grace fluttered above the cloth in tragi-comic impatience. "Or will not?"

"Will not because I may not."

Eve de Montalais held a small pause of perplexity, made a small sign of frustration. "It is a riddle," she said. "But when one speaks in riddles, one speaks playfully . . . as you do not. Tell me, then, my Michael! why you think you may not ask me to marry you, when between us all else has been said?"

"I love you too well——"

"Too well to make me happy!"

"Too well to let you risk your happiness on the hazards of such a life as mine."

"You forget, if you deny me the right to share those hazards, whatever they may be, I shall have no happiness to risk."

"You are young," the man stated thoughtfully, "the best of your life lies before you. And you are, I think, the loveliest woman that ever lived. Many men after me will long for and love you; one of them you will find worthy . . ."

"Still, you forget, my heart is given."

"Time heals all memories."

"You believe that?" She withdrew a little, settling back in her chair, and used her fan, gazing away over its nodding plumes. "I was mistaken, then," she commented. "I believed you loved me too well to hold my love the whim of a day or a month or a year. I thought you knew me too well to think my love was lightly given, or once given might be recalled."

He winced under that reproach. "Without your help," he pleaded, "how shall I be strong? You know what it costs me to say what I am saying, that I could not say anything to displease you if I held your happiness second to my own. It is of you alone I am thinking—you whom I love and who are not for me."

"If you love me," Eve de Montalais said quietly, "you will never leave me."

"Better that, better you should learn to hold the memory of me in contempt, than I should risk your waking up too late, as some day you would surely waken, to realize you had joined your life to the life of one whom the world esteems a common thief."

"'The world esteems'!" Disdain touched her lips. "You are not that."

"I was once——"

"The past is dead."

"Or merely sleeping: who shall say?"

"Ah, no, my friend! You waste your time if you ask me to believe that."

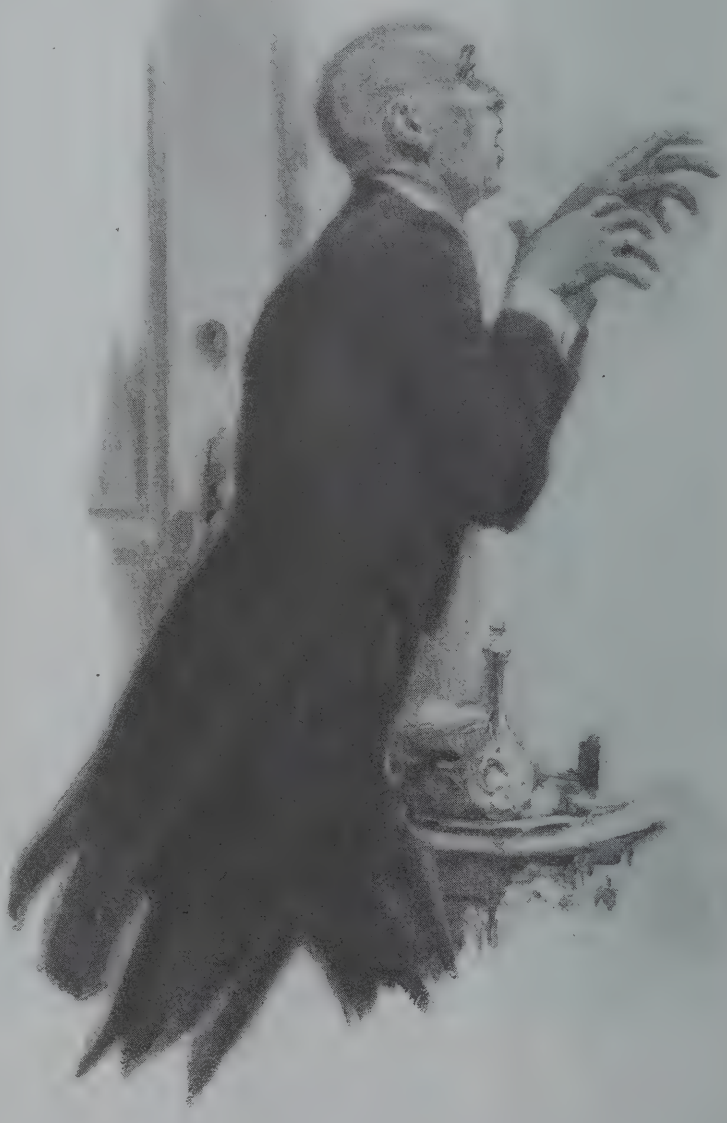
The music fell, and the gay rumor of voices that replaced it, as the dancers began to move back to their tables, was not enough to warrant the former sense of security from eavesdropping by inadvertence or intention. In tacit silence, Madame de Montalais extended her hand; Lanyard offered his cigarette case, then a match. But after a single inhalation the woman forgot to smoke and permitted the tobacco to fume to waste in its jeweled holder, her attention seemingly diverted by the pomp and vanity of that sumptuous cavern wherein the folk of her world were accustomed nightly to foregather and play yet once again the time-old game whose fascination never fails, whose stake is love . . .

But Lanyard had eyes for his love alone.

Her beauty in his sight was like a pain in his heart, a hand at his throat. Slender and gracious and fair, with a sense, hard to define, of something more than human in that warmly human loveliness, something that made one think of a sickle of moon afloat in an azure midnight sky, of dawnlight fleeting breathlessly athwart a summer sea . . .

And his for the asking!

He had loved before, but never as now, never with this tenderness, this all-possessing wish to serve and safeguard, this passionate self-abnegation . . .



"What is it?" he asked, seeing her start, with an almost imperceptible suggestion of aversion, as she sat looking away across the room.

"That man," she replied—"that creature, rather, whom one never sees without shuddering. And one sees him everywhere."

Even before he looked Lanyard had divined the occasion of this antipathy. It was true, what she had said; ever since the tides of destiny had brought these two together in New York, no matter where they had turned in quest of amusement, or rather for an excuse to be with each other, of an evening, at some time in its course it had seemed fated that they should cross the path of this personality, odd, compelling and in some how forbidding.

One saw the man now, with a party of guests laying claim to a table on the far side of the floor, a table that had been conspicuously reserved and refused to others, though the Crystal Room was crowded and late comers were importunate. A gross body, ponderous and slow of movement, with a heavy face of singularly immobile cast, resembling, and for all its fleshiness as destitute of color as, a mask of papier-mâché, with a strange effect of transparency as if lighted by an inner glow akin to phosphorescence. Punctiliously mannered and at all times dressed with the nicest care as to the cut and propriety of his clothing, but unfailingly bedecked like a sultan with an incalculable wealth of jewelry in sets meticulously matched; yesterday with emeralds, today with diamonds, tomorrow with rubies, at another time it might be with fire opals burning on fingers and watch chain, serving as cuff links, waistcoat buttons and studs for his shirt. A bizarre shape to meet in the haunts of fashion . . . And never alone, always surrounded by a little court of sycophants seldom twice of the same composition, but as a rule including a few fragile beauties, apparently of the stage, and invariably one whom Lanyard took to be a paid clown, an undersized man with the face of a sage droll, the dress and deportment of a diplomat, and something in his fixed solemnity which suggested an ever present expectation that his lightest word would win a gale of laughter—as, indeed, it seemed to.

The other sat, as by habit, taciturn and aloof in the heart of his noisy company. A dull man or a deep. Speaking seldom, eating little, drinking nothing, never smoking, holding one pose without stir for long minutes at a time; only the eyes beneath hood-like lids, eyes of a repellent pallor and surprising brightness, were restless, ranging from face to face, not only of his companions but of every person within his scope of vision, peering into each with a steadfast, imperturbable and penetrating curiosity . . .

Lanyard had more than once been resentfully conscious of that prying look. He was conscious of it now and rather hoped its author could read his lips, reckoning its impertinence ample justification for the temper of what he was about to say.

"The Sultan of Loot," he observed, adding in answer to Eve's quick and mirthful glance: "My private nickname for the animal. If it does him injustice, he ought to take in his sign, don't you think? I know him by sight, of course, but that is all. Some bucketeer or bootlegger, no doubt. Prohibition no less than Providence makes strange bedfellows nowadays in this mad country."

"Strange," the woman mused, "how people one doesn't know sometimes seem to haunt one."

"When it is strange."

Her eyes narrowed. "Why do you say that, Michael?"

"I hardly know," he confessed with a deprecatory laugh. "More, at least, than this: that it has seldom been my fortune to be so haunted without something in the nature of a sequel."

She made a mental shudder vivid. "In this instance, for your sake, I trust the rule will not hold good."

"I hope so, indeed. I entertain the least inclination imaginable to better my acquaintance with that monsieur. And yet, it would surprise me not at all if I were to see much more of him before I see less."

There was music again, a retrograde movement from tables to open floor.

"Why so mysterious, Michael?"

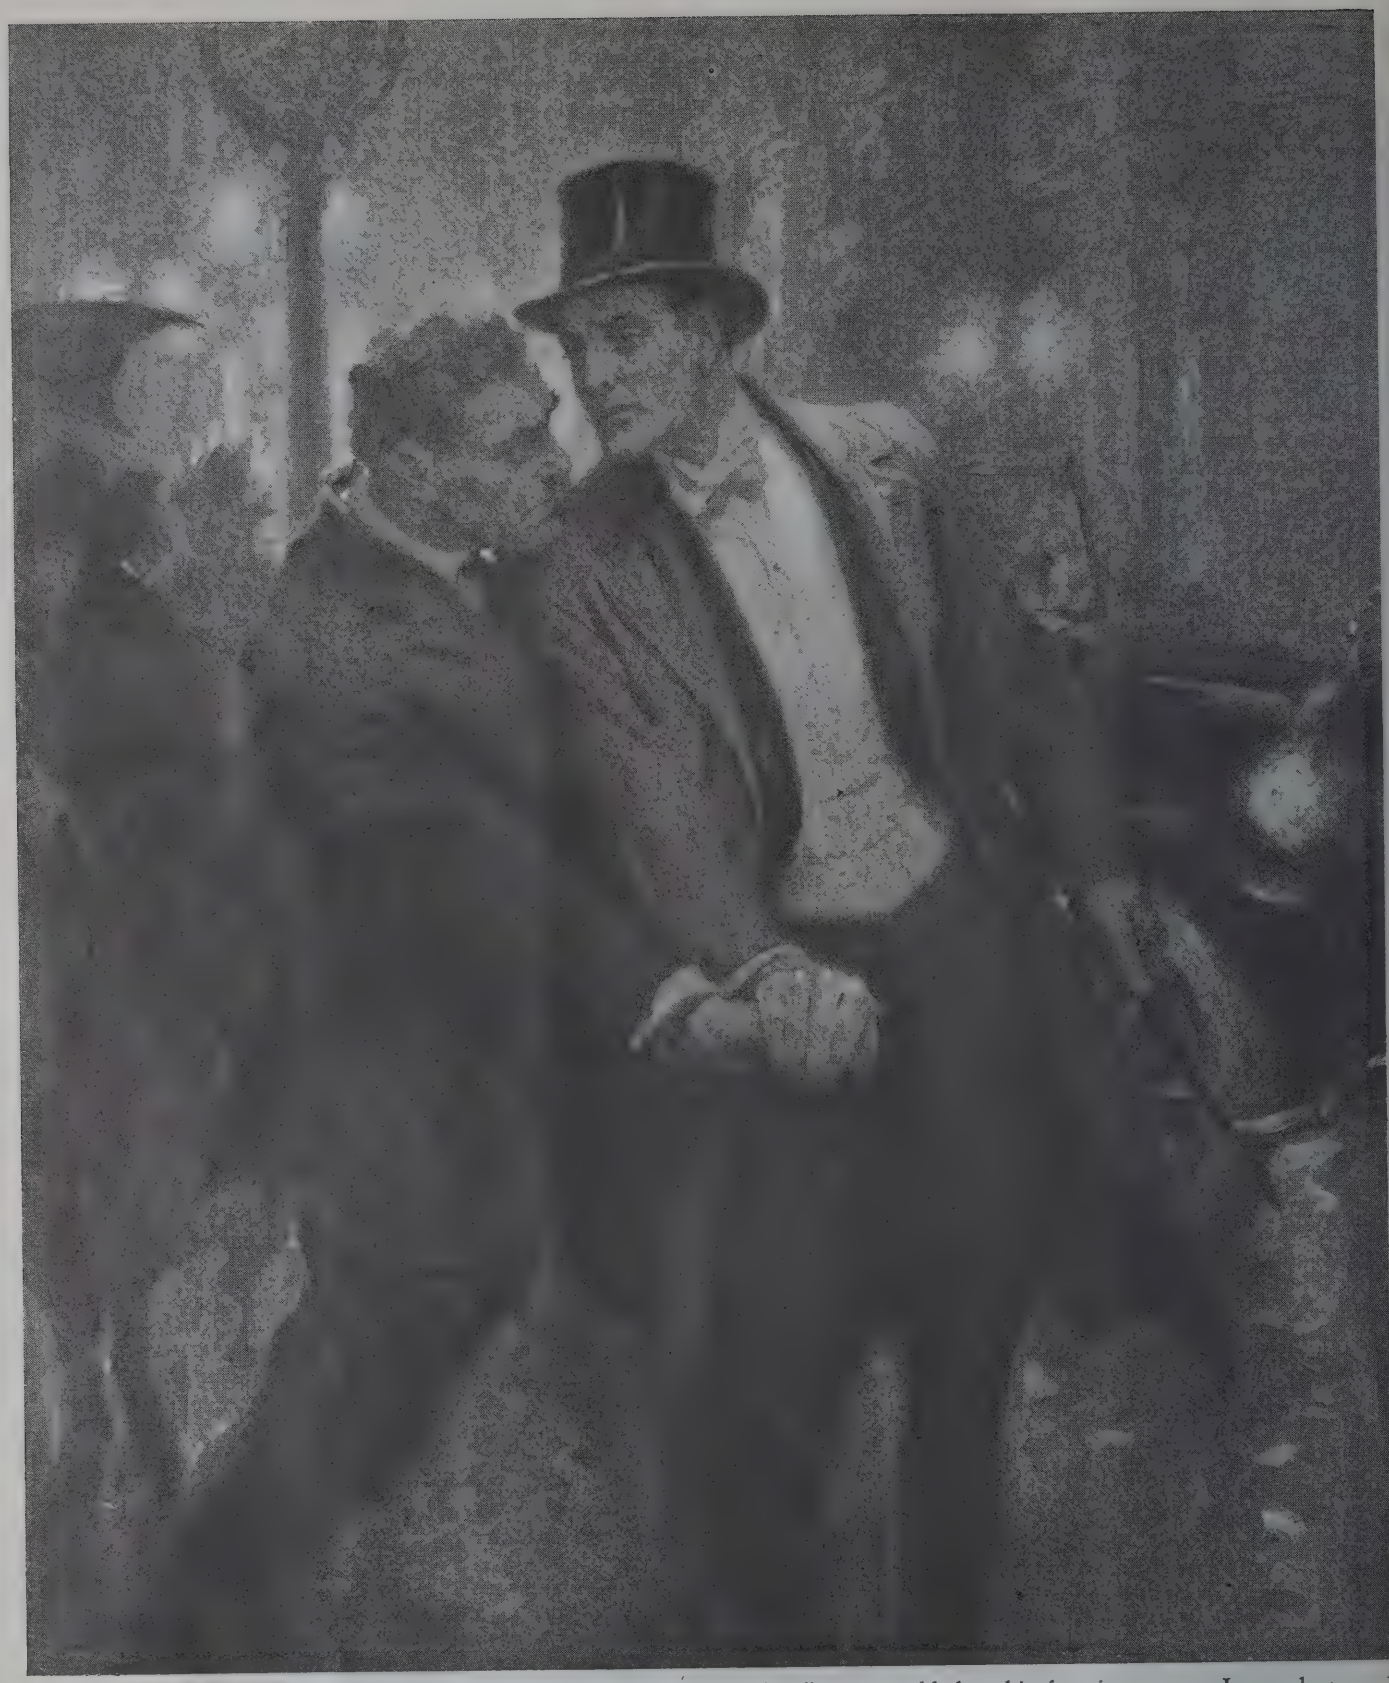
"Upon my word, I can't tell you! Why did you shiver when you spoke of the fellow? Blame it, if you like, to that sixth sense, that instinct of self-preservation which serves some men as intuition serves most women—call it what you will, I have quite definitely a feeling I am no more done with that one whom I do not know than I am as yet begun with him."

A sidelong glance discovered the personage in question indulging one of his rare smiles, an introspective smile that might mean he had indeed been reading Lanyard's lips, or might mean nothing of the sort. True, he was no longer looking at Lanyard; it remained equally true that he was apparently paying no attention to the conversation of his company . . .

"And that is why"—a derisive shift of the woman's eyes indicated the quarter of the room in which the subject of their speculations had established himself—"you are trying to jilt me—is it?—and excusing your ungallant conduct with vague references to the 'hazards' of your life!"

Lanyard shook his head, again possessed by the gravity of his purpose. "I am scarcely so childish," he said. "But for days—for months, indeed, but especially in these last few days—I have been thinking of the life I had to offer a wife, the life of a man hunted, without fortune or position, friendless in a strange land but for you."

"Hunted?"



The echo deprecated the strength of that term, but he would not modify it. "Hunted," he reiterated. "The life of an outlaw. Society does not forgive; it will sometimes applaud a successful transgressor, but it never has patience with the penitent."

"Tell me why you say that, Michael. I have the right to know . . ."

"It is this, then," Lanyard said with reluctance: "Wherever I go, I am a marked man. The world wears mocking eyebrows

"Monsieur Morphew!" stuttered Theodore between clashing teeth. "The police! A raid! A raid!"

As the woman uttered peal upon peal of laughter the chauffeur scrambled to his feet in a rage. Lanyard stepped when it hears that the Lone Wolf no longer prowls. 'Perhaps, today,' it says; 'but wait. Let him prove his sincerity and fortitude against the dead drag of my indifference; let him make his way if he can; I have my own affairs to busy me . . .' The police are satisfied my change of character is merely a blind. Another class, even more skeptic, is composed of those whose lot today is as mine was yesterday, creatures of envy, greed and uncharitableness, all those qualities that make criminals. These, should they see me in rags, would say, 'One more turn of the screw and he will be one of us again.' Seeing me apparently prosperous, they say, 'Observe that he wants for nothing; he is cunning, that one.' Or suppose some unknown make a famous coup; the chorus is then, 'The Lone Wolf has done this thing!' . . . Society indifferent, its police distrustful, its enemies envious; one needs strength to make way against so strong a tide!"

"You have it."

"But will it last?"

"With mine to comfort and encourage you when your strength wearies . . ."

"But figure to yourself a possible event: We marry. What happens? Your friends are affronted, they turn from you——"

"Did you call them friends?"

"Even friendship fails when one flouts its self-esteem . . . You are left alone," Lanyard pursued obstinately, "but for me. And for every friend you have lost, you have found an enemy—between them. "None of that!" he enjoined, raising his voice to drown the man's snarl.

my enemies. These good haters of mine will resort to every expedient to poison your mind against me, while to me they will come saying, 'Do as we bid you or be prepared to see her suffer.' Conceive me mad enough to tell them to go to the devil; the next time we find ourselves conspicuously placed in public, a hand falls on my shoulder, I, your husband, am arrested on a trumped-up charge. Assume that I clear myself; still the disgrace remains, the shame. And I its cause! . . . No—never ask me to condemn you to a life like that!"

He sat brooding in a silence which she respected for a little, watching him with shrewd vision all the while.

"Something has happened," she said at length, "to make you think such things."

"You are right." He nodded heavily. "I have come to my senses. These months I have spent in almost daily association with you have been the sweetest of my life. I have been happy . . . But they can't continue. I love you too well."

The plumed fan was arrested, the woman's eyes widened and darkened, her breathing quickened. "What do you propose?"

"I think you know."

"Tell me!"

He entreated her with haggard eyes. "Since we may not marry, what else can I do but go my way?"

"No!" she countered impatiently. "There is something more in your mind than you have told me."

"Neither there nor in my heart."

"You are keeping something back for fear of frightening me, some danger that threatens you . . ."

"Nothing."

"Nevertheless you have reason to fear——"

"I have always to be on my guard. Misfortune visits in strange guises, and most often unannounced. For myself I am accustomed to that, I do not greatly care. But for you—that is another matter!"

The fan resumed its weaving. After a pause Eve said: "If you must go, so be it. But 'whither thou goest, there go I——'"

"No!"

"It matters not how far," she nodded. "What is it to me where I live, so I am with you?"

"Can you require that of me?"

"I?" she cried, startled. "Of you?"

"You are a woman of this world, Eve. Do I not know? Can I forget how you were when I found you, buried to life in that isolate château half a hundred years to the south of Paris? Can I not see what a change has come over you in these few months of your New York?"

"Of you——"

But he would not listen. "You were born and bred to breathe this atmosphere. Can you ask me to doom you to exile in some hole or corner, some place so lost that the whisper of my ill fame will not find it? Some kraal in South Africa; some iron hut in the Australian bush! Where else? . . . You would die of such a life, or live only to learn to hate me."

"Never that. Love outweighs all."

"So we tell ourselves, so we believe, until we are required to lay down for love even our self-respect. Could I retain that—could I forgive myself—knowing I had robbed you of all that had made life fair for you, and left you only the happiness of giving up your life for love?"

"What is it?" asked Michael Lanyard. "That man," Eve replied, "whom one never sees without shuddering."

"Selfishness speaks there . . ."

"Vanity, the father of selfishness, is present in every human affair. It is not a pretty thought; but men and women in this world are made that way. There is my vanity, too, to be thought of." Lanyard had a twisted, apologetic smile. "Consider that you have never known a want you could not gratify out of your private means; while I am a penniless adventurer, a man living from hand to mouth, today on a modest pension from the British Secret Service, tomorrow on God knows what . . ."

"At last!" said Eve de Montalais. "It is that, then; it is your pride that stands between us."

"A man with less is not a man whom you could love."

She made no direct answer, but after a time she stirred, sat up and began to gather round her the folds of her evening wrap.

"I am a little weary," she told him. "There is more to be said than you ave said, my Michael! but not now, not here . . . Perhaps another night . . . Please take me home."

CHAPTER II

The breath of that November night was soft and warm, its dim sky distilled a pensive rain with frequent pauses. Burnished by the daily traffic of eighty thousand tires, the wet pave of the Avenue resembled a broad channel of black marble veined with pulsing gold. Over churning tides of after theater travel the police towers watched like great gaunt goblins, stabbing the misty murk with angry eyes, ruby, emerald and amber.

The brougham drifted sedately with the northbound press; its pace all too swift notwithstanding, its journey too quickly accomplished. Yet neither of the lovers had spoken since leaving the Ritz. Only when the gray palisades of the Hotel Walpole loomed ahead, spangled with the gilt of a thousand windows, the woman stirred in her corner and sat forward, peering with sweet concern into the face of the man, giving him her hands.

"Be patient with me, Michael," she murmured. "It isn't that I can't read your heart. I know, my dear, I know! All you said just now was true enough; but all the truth has not yet been said. Neither are my wits as ready as yours. You must give me time to think. You will, I know."

"I am altogether yours," he answered. "Your happiness is all that matters."

"Not all, not my happiness alone, but yours as well—ours!"

She swayed into his arms; for the first time Lanyard knew her lips . . .

He came to himself—after a fashion—standing bare of head beneath a lamp-fringed canopy of bronze and glass, formally touching her fingers and mouthing polite phrases as to a woman he barely knew . . . Absurd!

And on her part only enriched color and the deepened radiance of her eyes betrayed the revolutionary work of those too few moments . . .

"Tomorrow," he heard Eve saying . . . "No—not tomorrow, I'm dining with the Druces. The day after. Call for me early, Michael; we'll have a long drive and a little dinner somewhere in the country."

Her look said so much more, he had no certain knowledge of what he stammered in response. But presumably the phrases served. She nodded gayly, hastened up the steps. He watched her whisk through the revolving door and fade from view in the hot illumination of the foyer before it occurred to him to re-cover his head. And his stare was vacant when her chauffeur delayed him with a respectful query; to which, after a moment, Lanyard replied, many thanks, but he felt more in the humor for a stroll than to be motored to his rooms; he wouldn't mind the drizzle.

The goblin eyes blinking from red to green, he profited by the interruption of up- and downtown travel to cross to the west side of the Avenue before settling into stride for the walk of a mile to his modest lodgings; in a mood of exaltation too rare to countenance return of those misgivings to which he had that night for the first time given voice, those doubts and fears by which his lonelier hours of late had none the less been ridden, ever since he had learned that his love for Eve de Montalais had grown to be a passion passing his strength to withstand.

He had done his best but had essayed the impossible tonight, in attempting to make her see that marriage between them were for her a madness. He saw that, now he knew of her own confession that she loved him. Now with the music of her incomparable voice still chiming that assurance in his memory, now with the fragrance of her lips lingering on his own, Lanyard knew that whether he had fought well or ill to save her from himself, the fight was lost, one course alone remained to him: to do away with every hindrance to the firm establishment of Eve's happiness, to reorganize his life so that every objection to their union might be compromised, every echo of the past silenced, every embarrassment of the present compensated.

A task to tax the wits and heart of a superman, contemplation of it in that hour affected Lanyard with no dismay; armored in and inspired by her love, he could not fail.

In this ecstatic temper only subconsciously aware of his surroundings, the man was measuring off a round four miles an hour, southbound on the sidewalk over across from the Cathedral, when that occurred which brought his head down from the clouds: the semaphores signaled for another suspension of traffic on the Avenue, and an instant later a taxicab inexpertly driven at unlawful speed passed Lanyard crabwise, skidding wildly on the greasy asphaltum as its chauffeur threw out clutch and applied brakes to avoid crashing into a file of cars debouching from west Fiftieth Street.

An old-fashioned, gloomy contraption, of that high-chested hobbledehoy type now fast becoming extinct, the cab performed two complete revolutions like a skittish monstrosity chasing its tail, and toppled perilously as if minded to try a somersault as well, before it brought up, rocking and growling, broadside to the curb a dozen paces or so ahead of Lanyard.

From its black pocket of a body noises of embittered expostulation were issuing in a woman's voice and a foreign tongue; neither the voice of a gentlewoman nor language such as one would employ with whatever provocation. It was to Lanyard, indeed, like a souvenir of younger years to hear that broadside of vituperation couched in the argot of the thieves' kitchens of Paris. And at a discreet distance he paused, diverted, humanly hoping for the worst.

At the same time a badly rattled driver, comprehending no word of the abuse cascading upon his head but sensitive enough to its tone, fell off his box and made for the door, vainly seeking to make an authentic brogue audible. But his hand was no sooner lifted to its latch than the door flew open in his face and a lovely lady in resplendent attire and a towering fury bounced out and—a figure of flaming color in the blue-blacks of the nocturnal scheme—addressed herself to the man with gesticulation so vividly adequate to her temper that instinctively he lifted both arms to guard his features and, stumbling over his own heels in panic retreat, sat down with suddenness and shocking force.

No national spirit is so exquisitely responsive as that of the French to the comedy of physical misadventure. When the chauffeur coming into contact with the sidewalk gave up his breath in one vast "Ouf!" of agony, his fare forgot to be angry, cut a blistering epithet in two, and incontinently passed into such spasms of mirth that she was fain to lean her finery against the dripping side of the cab lest her limbs fail to support her. And while she shook and held her sides and uttered peal upon peal of laughter—heedlessly permitting her wrap to fall open and expose to the inclement air the most cynical of décolletages framing flesh quite literally crusted with jewels—the chauffeur was scrambling to his feet in a rage that threatened to rival her own late transports; and a crowd was beginning to gather, too, as crowds will in New York, upon any provocation, in any street, at any hour of any day or night. On which accounts Lanyard reckoned it time to interfere.

Hurriedly consulting the taximeter, he stepped between the two, fished a bill from his pocket and pressed it into the palm of the chauffeur before this last comprehended what was happening.

"None of that!" he enjoined, peremptorily, raising his voice to drown the snarl with which the man was tuning up to repay abuse and derision with the drippings of his own vocabulary. "You've got your fare, so clear out before this officer whom I see approaching gives you a summons for careless driving. D'you hear?—not another word!"

A gross body; a personality odd, compelling and in some how forbidding.

And as the chauffeur, cowed by this appearance of authority, shut a gaping mouth and stumbled to his seat, Lanyard turned to the woman and caught her arm in a firm grasp. "Come, Liane! Compose yourself. I'll find you another cab."

The woman responded with a moment of stupefied silence during which her eyes rounded incredulously, then with a squeal of rapture—"Lanyar-r-r-rd!"—and an impulsive offer to enfold him to that generous bosom which clever footwork alone availed to foil.

"Michael!" she cried in French. "My Michael! Of all men living the one whom I most have longed to find!"

"Observe that the lost is now found," he advised in the same language, smiling. "But be so amiable as not to keep me waiting here in the rain. Pull yourself together, Liane—your wrap as well, if you don't want to catch cold in your chest—in most of it, at least." In a more urgent voice he added: "Can you not understand your danger? Cover yourself, Liane—you are mad to expose such treasure on a public street at night!"

"What flattery!" the woman responded demurely. Nevertheless she did as he bade, clipping her cloak at the throat with one hand while the other slipped beneath his arm. "I am so overjoyed to find you again, my friend, I do not believe any evil could affect me. But come . . ."

She tugged him out of the grinning (Continued on page 102)

Love Lyrics of a Lounge Lizard

Illustrations by

You think I'm a gay bird, a young cabaret bird
Who shakes a mean dog just for fun.
Well, can that impression, I'll make a confession—
I do it to harvest the mon.
These fat dames of forty who think they are sporty
Fall hard for us pleasant young men
Who're willing to drag 'em around in the dance
And kid 'em a little when there is a chance
To make 'em feel twenty again.

And so if these hens who would like to be wrens,
Who gad around town pretty much,
Should on some occasion without much persuasion
Hand over a twenty or such—
Well, why should I spurn it? Believe me, I earn it.
Consider the stress and the strain
Of hearing 'em talk about systems of diet,
And teaching 'em dance steps. Oh baby, you try it!
It's tough on the feet and the brain.

[2]

I didn't think that I could get a thrill
From any kind of Jane. I thought I'd seen
Most every sort: the kalsomined chorine,
The haughty dame, the peppy little frill
Who flirts with danger as these flappers will
With baby face, and eyes both hard and keen.
But say, tonight I lamped a little queen
Sweet as they make 'em. Honest, I could spill
A line of talk about her for an hour.
For she was like the simple forest flower
I've never seen, but that I've read about.
Her eyes were warm and soft, she seemed to glow
With happiness at all this Broadway show—
The place seemed kind of dead when she went out.

[3]

She came here last night with a bird that I knew;
I breezed up and met her—and danced with her too;
She shakes a mean pump and she's light as the breeze
That sometimes I've heard in the Central Park trees.
She isn't a bit like these cute "baby vamps,"
But nevertheless since I've looked in her lamps
I've gone off my nut and I can't do my stuff
Of tossing these middle-aged damsels the fluff.

The kid is so young and so gay and so bright
That after I'd sat at her table last night
The rest of the women appeared, for a fact,
Like painted wax figures whose varnish had cracked.

Her color's her own, and it's peaches and cream,
Hot dog, she's the marbles—a blonde little dream.
Her front name is Prudence, her last name is Hall,
She came here from Kansas and "just loves it all!"

She "just loves New York with its hurry and strife,"
She "just loves the gay cosmopolitan life,"
But I'll tell the world with some vigor and pith,
I don't think so much of that crowd she is with.

I'm not any preacher, but I've got a hunch
To slip her the low-down on all of that bunch;
The women aren't much and the men are a mess
—But still, it is none of my business, I guess.

[4]

There's something the matter with me,
For some way I don't seem to be
So pleased with the stunts
That I've done. All at once
I'm watching myself, and I see

A guy who is playing a part
Which he thought was clever and smart,
But lately I find
That it troubles my mind,
Or maybe it's mostly my heart.

I'd patted myself on the back
For craftily "getting the jack"
From middle-aged dames
By my cute little games;
I'd prided myself on my knack

Of getting by, easy and slick.
But now—well, it's making me sick;
I'm a poor sort of fish
And I certainly wish
I never had pulled such a trick.

I wonder just what she would think
Of any such cheap little gink
Who'd grafted and lied
Like a crook and a snide
To pick up a handful of chink?

It isn't much fun, you'll agree,
To look yourself over and see
The kind of a mutt
That a Nice Kid would cut—
There's something the matter with me!

[5]

Isn't it funny how you'll go along
Mixing around among the "giddy throng,"
Working your graft and dragging down the kale,
And then—and then you'll meet some little frail,
And after that it never is the same,
You cannot keep your mind upon the game,
She comes between you and the easy money—
Isn't it funny?

Isn't it funny? I have seen her twice
And I've met lots of other girls as nice
(Or some would think so), but this dainty kid
Has got me skidding, I can't keep it hid.
It's weeks since she has been here, but I find
I keep her all the time within my mind,
Her face and figure and her voice like honey—
Isn't it funny?

Isn't it funny how a bird will get?
She's probably forgotten me, and yet
I fret about her, hoping that the child
Won't get in wrong. That crowd is pretty wild
She travels with. I'm not the guy to pan 'em,
But if she asked me I'd say, "Kid, you can 'em!"

Say, think of me, the hard-boiled Broadwayite,
Wanting to show a girl the way that's right,
Wanting to keep her sweet and pure and sunny—
Isn't it funny?

I never seem to mind the paint
The others wear. But on the dead
It pretty nearly made me faint
To see Her lips a drug store red.
She's put mascara on her eyes,
The rouge upon her cheeks is thick,
It may get by with other guys,
But say, it makes me kinda sick.

It never shocked me when a Jane
Got slightly edged on bootleg booze,
But when She did—well, speaking plain,
I guess I changed my former views.
I even mentioned it to her,
She answered, sort of cold and clear,
"You're not my guardian, kind sir,
I'll thank you not to interfere!"

I guess I've put myself in bad,
I guess my good advice is barred,

But though I'm not an angel lad
I hate to see her growing hard.
I'd like to help her if I could
And be her buddy, if I might,
But—she thinks I'm not any good
And probably the kid is right.

[7]

She's getting quite jaded
And faded
And thin,
She can't stand the pace she is going—

You cannot get frisky
With whisky
And gin
And not have effects of it showing.

This here cabaret life
Is gay life
All right,
No harm if you use moderation,
But she steps out daily
And gaily
Each night
She seeks for some novel sensation.

She looks like a "cutie,"
Her beauty
Will lose
Its innocent charm and its flavor,
The kid's actions grieve me,
Believe me,
I'll use
The best that is in me to save her.

[8]

I guess I'm just a zero
Or not much, anyway,
Why can't I be a hero
Like a fellow in a play?
Why can't I think up something
Some action, brave and strong—
And not act like a dumb thing
That lets his girl go wrong?

Why can't I get a jigger
Of courage in my heart?
Why can't I show some vigor
And play a decent part?
Why can't I have the gizzard
To prove I'm better than
A smooth-haired dance floor lizard,
Why can't I be a Man?

Slip me some laurel, and I'll tell you why,
For I am a hero, I cannot deny.
I've rescued my lady
From ways that are shady,
For once in my life I'm a Regular Guy!

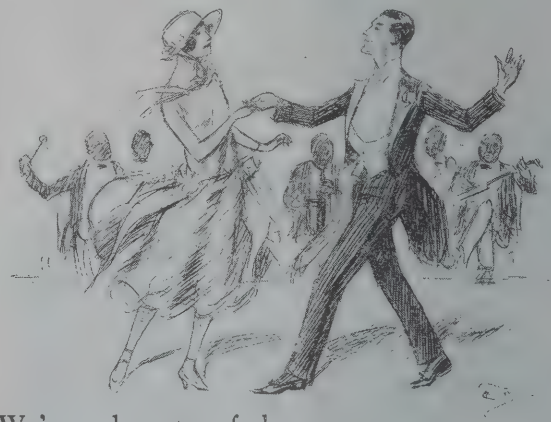
Some hard little chicken slipped Prudence some stuff
That looked like the snow to me—boy, I got rough,
I jumped in, oh mommer!
And grabbed the dope from her;
"Too much," I remarked to that bunch, "is enough!

"Hereafter this nice little kid trots with Me,
I trust all you ladies and gents will agree—
If not, some smart lollop
Is due for a wallop—
Ah, everything's pleasant and peaceful, I see!"

I took the kid home in a taxi. She cried,
Her face on my shoulder, for all of the ride,
And shaky and teary
She sighed, "I'm so weary,
Please take me away where a bad girl can hide!"

I kissed her and called her my own little queen,
And well, it was Great, if you know what I mean.
And it thrilled me all right
When she called me her Knight,
I need a new Kelly—say size seventeen!

[9]



She knows the kind of a bird I've been,
But she says to me: "Dear, you'll find
That out in the West where the Men are Men
We can leave our past behind;
We will pack and go where the Great Winds blow
And the air is sweet and clear,
And out afar from where cities are
We can build a new career!"

And I said to her: "It's a noble plan
But I haven't the railroad fare
To take me out where a Man's a Man
And—what would I do out there
Where there's not a chance for a bird to dance
Which is all the trade I know?
But I know for a fact we could frame an act
That would go in a Broadway show!

"I've had my lesson and you've had yours,
And in Broadway's 'open places'
We both can find as permanent cures
As 'out in the open spaces,'
For it's not the town that has pulled us down,
No matter how much it's tried us,
We can both come through like we ought to do
If we've got the stuff inside us."

[10]

We're a syncopated couple in a syncopated town,
But although some kinds of people look us over with a frown,

We've a decent roof above us
And some decent friends who love us
And we earn a decent living in a syncopated way.

We're the king and queen of Jazzland and we surely make it pay!
Life is all in how you take it,
Even Jazz is what you make it,
It is deadly for the foolish, but a tonic for the wise;
We are getting wealthy by it,
And I'll whisper, on the quiet,
That we rock our kids to slumber singing jazzy lullabies

The Man Afraid of His Job

Illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg

"AH, HERE you are at last, you old darling! Freezing, of course; and are you dead? And what sort of a day?"

Maryland, fragrant, eager, loving, came with the words, in a rush, from the little warm sitting room. Scott Waterman could see the glow of the lamplight behind her, and her pale pink knitting under the lamp. He shed his big rain-spattered coat, and as she put her young, strong arms about him he leaned against her wearily, her warm, living cheek touching his cold and lifeless one.

"Fine! What kind of a day yourself, sweetheart?"

He tried to say it spontaneously, convincingly. But he was too weary in soul and body. His voice slackened oddly on the words; he went past her into the dining room, and silently, her own face grown suddenly sober and tired, Maryland followed him.

They repeated this little failure night after night. No use to try to deceive each other; they were too close. Despite her most desperate resolution Maryland could not meet him gaily; despite his anxious determination Scott could not seem to reach home in a happy and confident mood.

The instant their arms went about each other Scott felt a great weariness and relief overwhelm him, and Maryland's eyes flooded with the tears that rose from weakness and great need. And in frank admission of fatigue and unhappiness they would cling together, unable to wear any longer the trying masks of the long day.

"Idiot!" Maryland would usually say of herself, half apologetic, half laughing, when he wiped her eyes on his big handkerchief. And "I'm a little tired—be fine when I've had dinner!" Scott always added. Without ceremony they immediately began the meal. Sometimes Scott said that he was too tired to eat, but he always liked to have her coax him into it.

They had been married four years, four hard years. Life was, to them, pretty much what it was to thousands of other young persons, and yet of late they had begun to be a little bit frightened.

Of what? Maryland used to muse, in the quiet, brooding days, when she went about slowly wiping dishes, dusting the piano, peeling the dinner potatoes and putting them into clear cold water. Nothing was really wrong. Other women kept house and had babies and managed somehow. There was no real reason for this constant sense of uneasiness, of apprehension. Yet she felt it, always, and she knew Scott felt it too.

She knew Scott looked at other men bewilderedly; men who talked about turning in the car for a new car and sending the little girl to a private school. How sure they were of themselves! They played poker—they belonged to clubs—they were free——

Scott and Maryland had no particular ambitions regarding poker and clubs, but they would have been grateful for a little margin—for a surety that when the baby came everything would be all right—that they could keep their heads above water.

"We aren't beaten so far!" Scott would say when they went over their bills every month. And once, lately, Maryland had added fearfully: "Scotty, what happens—to people like us when they are beaten?"

He had merely laughed at her; he had said that as long as Iverson and Ivers were in business, his job was safe. But the laughter had died, as all Scott's laughter did in these days, upon a drawn, tense expression intended to be a smile. Scott was beginning to have uneasy dreams, or rather one dream, over and over. The dream of losing his job.

He would start up, wide awake, in the night, staring about the little bedroom into which a street lamp sent bright bars of light, his brain confused, his heart hammering——

It was all right, only a dream. Scott would sigh, sink back ready for sleep again. It had been only a dream of himself humiliated and dismissed, pleading with Eckstein, with Floyd, for an explanation, for mere justice.

But the dream made his nights dreadful and lingered with him through the silent, worried days. He held long mental conversations with his various superiors in the firm, desperately morous conversations beginning with a "Say, what's the idea? here do they get this stuff . . ."

Scott's brow was dark when he found the McGavins at the country club—bootlickers, he inelegantly described them.

Fired! He was cleaning out his familiar desk. He was ing away. Maryland was going to have a baby, and the city as big, and dark, and coal-less. And he was being pointed t, the Iverson and Ivers man who had been fired . . .

No. That was just another dream. Damn the dreams! e was awake, looking feverishly and breathlessly about e room, with the street light brightly barred across the wall and bureau. His forehead was wet, his mouth dry.

Scott would lie wakeful for awhile, counting and recounting the arguments that made him sure—absolutely sure—laughably sure—of his job.

Scott was thirty; he had been eight years with the big furniture house; his father had been a trusted employee of Iverson and Ivers when Scott was born, and for all his life. Maryland's father too had been head of their storerooms for thirty years, and Maryland had been old "C. P.'s" secretary when she and Scott met.

The firm had more than a business significance for them; it was the important, the fundamental, fact of life. Iverson and Ivers was the world, eternally absorbing. Maryland asked every evening for the news from the office. What about the new man? Who had taken Miss Rogers's place?

Especially she was interested in the personalities; the Ivers boys, the Iverson girls and their husbands. Alice was in, was she? And what did the man Bella was going to marry look like? It always pleased Maryland, when she went into the offices, to meet some member of the firm and have a personal word. And she had been made really happy two weeks ago by a message from magnificent Mrs. Floyd Iverson, just a word, to Scott to tell his wife to take care of herself now, and that the Iversons were very much interested to hear that there was going to be a baby.

"I wonder how she knew?" Maryland had said, deeply gratified. "That was awfully gracious of her!"

"She always liked you," Scott had reminded his wife. And Maryland had said with pleasure, "Yes, I believe she did."

"You remember," Scott had said, "that they sent us flowers——"

"Yes," she had answered quickly, "I remember! And Bella wrote me—I'll never forget that! They've always been kind to us."

"I guess they keep a closer eye on us than we think," Scott had continued, less to keep the conversation moving than to drive the shadow from his wife's brown eyes. It always came there when she remembered the days, more than three years ago now, when the Iversons and the Ivers and all the rest of their little world had sorrowed with the young Watermans, who had lost their baby.

They had sent flowers, and Bella, from the Fitch School, had written. And before that they had sent Scott Waterman and Maryland Bliss, both of "the office," handsome wedding presents. And not long after the marriage both the Ivers and the Iversons had invited the young pair to dinner, an honor not paid to many of the office force.

So Scott and Maryland were bound to them by a hundred ties; the glories, the trips, the country homes, the fashionable weddings of the Ivers and the Iversons were a part of their lives. They felt that they belonged to the firm and the firm to them.

But then, why were they afraid? They did not know. Old Ivers hated to let any employee go, much less a trusted one of eight years' standing. And Floyd Iverson was personally fond of Scott. But both men were rich, their word was law in the firm, and their ways and thoughts were not the ways and thoughts of their trooping hundreds of employees. Scott, almost a product of the firm, and a dozen other trusted clerks, had an actual reverence for the way they managed affairs, stood in a sort of superstitious awe of them.

Tonight he was unusually silent, unusually grave. He came to his dinner with a long sigh, attacked his soup absent mindedly.

But Maryland had a way with soups; she had made a knowing combination of what was left of the cream of tomato with what was left of the green pea. It was scalding hot and strewn with crisp croutons. Scott had a second plateful, finished the little tureen. His color began to come back.

"Mrs. Floyd Iverson was in today," he said then, after a long, relieved breath, as he relaxed in his chair. "She asked most particularly for you."

"She did?" Maryland said, smiling.

"And wants us—there!" Scott tumbled a crumpled letter on the cloth. "Wants us to lunch with them at the Beachways Club, some sort of special occasion, a week from Sunday."

"Scott *Water*man!" Maryland was really pleased. "They've never asked us there before! Isn't that nice of them? Won't it be fun?" she said.

"Sure it will." But he had not warmed to it; he was holding something back. She eyed him expectantly. "Oh, yes! by the way," he said casually, doubling a bran muffin over a lump of butter, "they've given Phil Knox the mail order department."

Maryland was turned to stone. She moved only her brown eyes; they rested upon his.

"They have?" she said quietly, with a dry throat. And immediately she looked down, moving her fork slowly back and forward; he saw that her lips were trembling and that her eyes brimmed. There was a silence.

"Don't feel so badly, you little old sweetheart!" he said then tenderly, trying to laugh.

"Scott," she said thickly, imploringly, "they haven't!"

"Oh, yes they have!" he assured her lightly and philosophically. "You know we thought they would? Old C. P. made it a point to stop beside my desk today, and he told me himse He said that the directors had been watching Phil, and that t boy really seemed to have settled down, and that they all su gested it."

"Phil Knox—that kid!" Maryland said bitterly. Her fa had flushed darkly. "Scott, it's not fair——" she pleade "C. P. himself promised it to you, when Babcock resigne Don't you remember?"

"Yep, perfectly!" Scott said. "But that was before Be got engaged to Knox."

"I hope he ruins the department!" Maryland exclaim passionately after another pause, in which their eyes we riveted together.

"Well, he won't," Scott said with a rueful grin. "For course I'm there, under him, to save him!"

Maryland flushed again; the thought was insufferable. H splendid Scott, at thirty, working under this boy of twenty-fi who had been but a matter of months with the firm! In silen she rose and carried the empty plate and the tureen to the kitche returning with Scott's chops and his stuffed potato and her ov bubbling bowl of milk toast.

Breakfast sickened Maryland, in these days; luncheon w at best an experiment. But supper, of hot rice or hot milk anything thin and simple and hot—hot—hot, was the revivi time. She lived all day for this blue bowl of comforting fo at supper.

Her face dark, she began it in silence. Fury seethed in h soul. It was hard to go on quietly sipping with this tempest rebellion within.

"Nothing you can do, Scotty?" she said, forcing her to to patience, after a while.

"Nope. Kenyon spoke to me about it—the boys feel ve badly. But there's nothing to be done. I was showing Phil t ropes all afternoon."

Oh, insufferable! Maryland narrowed her eyes to hide tea

"You couldn't go to old C. P. yourself?"

"No. Not very well. They're cutting down everywhere, y know. Everybody's nervous. It wouldn't do any good, a it might hurt me. My best bet is to stick behind Phil—Bell got a barrel of money, he may not stick it out long. They decide to go to Europe or something——"

Maryland looked across at him, and the contrast between th younger woman's lot and her own, this younger man's lot a Scott's, was bitter in her mouth. Bella would be married in glo and excitement, Bella would decide to go abroad, just abo the time that the Scott Watermans were painfully figuring o what hospital and nurse expenses would be.

There was probably a big dinner going on at the Iverses' th minute! Butlers were passing all sorts of wonderful food——

She was suddenly reminded of the invitation.

"So this is why we are asked to the Beachways Club!" s suggested scornfully.

"I suppose so," Scott admitted. "Doesn't it make y mad?"

Maryland studied the letter darkly.

"I won't go," she said flatly. "They shan't treat you like dog and then have us dress up and smile and talk all a whe Sunday. I won't do it!"

"I'd rather not go," Scott said simply.

"Scotty," said Maryland after a pause, and out of a brow study, "Scotty, do you suppose the Iversons know how bad they're treating you? They've always been so nice—do y suppose they realize——"

"Well, I suppose when a business gets to be as big as ours he conceded mildly as she paused, "it's hard to keep the person element in view. Their main idea was to place Phil somewhe But it knocks all my plans into a cocked hat. I hoped for th job, and then if the old man fell for my advertising idea I w going to ask him straight out what the prospect was of my son day buying my way into the firm—not this year perhaps, b if we work that royalty basis and you keep well I thought perha I could let the royalties pile up——"

"You ought to be in the firm some day, Scott!" his wife sa warmly. "Think of it—you in Iverson and Ivers! Wouldn't yo father be proud, and wouldn't my father be interested?"

"If Phil blows up and the old man drops out—he's eighty mused Scott with shining eyes. "I don't see why not. Ivers began with a little crossroads store, you know, sixty-one yea ago. Funnier things have happened."

Maryland had finished the milk toast and looked ten yea younger than the woman who had welcomed Scott home hour ago. Her cheeks blazed with brilliant color, her brow

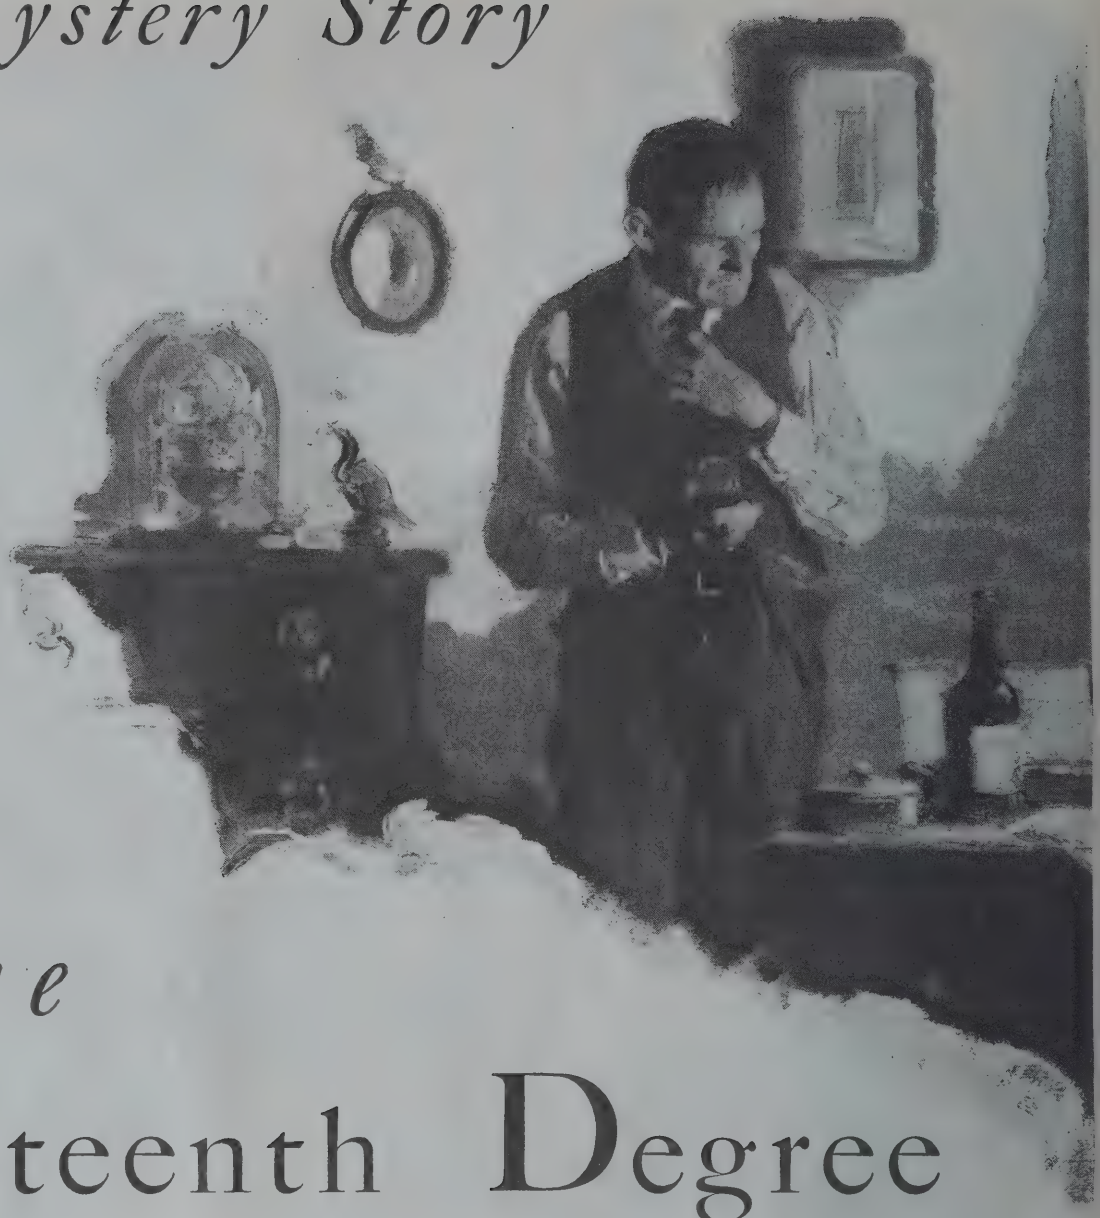
"I'm as big a man as any of them. World's full of things I could do," said Scott. "And I'm free."

es shone, all her radiant vivacity and animation had come back. "Scotty, you darling, I only mind this for you!" she said in r tender, motherly voice, laying her hand over his own. "But ver mind, dearest, the Iversons had their bad days sixty ars ago, and we're having ours now! It can't go on being so rd. And I don't really resent their being so rich," added aryland, establishing herself in her husband's lap now and ing her soft cheek against his, "it's none of my business what ey do—there's plenty left for us, and we'll have it some day! I rather have my own darling baby in my arms, and just old len to cook for us, than all their servants," said Maryland. This is bad luck, but the next'll be good, and meanwhile don't orry about my grumbling, Scotty, because this is really the etchedest time! In a few weeks I'll feel gorgeous, and it'll spring, and thank God there's no influenza now to complicate. ut let's not go to their party at Beachways—that's a little too uch. And if ever I see C. P.—I hope he'll get over what I say him, that's all!"

Scott laughed luxuriously, unalarmed. For her voice was at its pleasantest now, childishly severe, and between her pretty eyes was a stern little pucker that made her look like a cross baby. And she was young and sweet and fresh, and—despite worries and responsibilities—it was heavenly here in the little house, warm and alone, rested and fed, and with Maryland to talk to.

"Lord—Lord, I wouldn't change places with any one of 'em!" he said.

Maryland put the letter in her mirror rim, and for several days she was extremely scornful about it. Then the tide began to turn.



In the first place Phil Knox was very friendly with Scott, and although Scott was sore and resentful he could not but somewhat unbend. Then it appeared that Floyd Iverson was really anxious to have the Watermans come to his Sunday luncheon because Billy Brooks had turned up from somewhere and was also to be entertained on that day.

Billy Brooks was a man of fifty. He had been employed by Iverson and Ivers some eight years ago—had even owned some stock in the firm—and had known (Continued on page 138)

A Mystery Story

By

Irvin S. Cobb

The Thirteenth Degree

HERE the other day you may have seen by the morning paper that former Inspector Daniel P. Bryce was dead at his farm up in the Catskills. It was only a paragraph, though, that the paper gave him, giving his age and a scant chronology of his service in the police department and winding up the briefened obituary with the date of his retirement.

In the account you probably saw his official connection with the Caspar murder was disposed of in a couple of lines. But at the end of the week one of the Sunday editions followed up with one of those full page specials so beloved of Sunday specialists. There was a spread head and a heavy picture layout, and much emphasis was put upon the Nemesis which, it would seem, had pursued so many of those individuals who figured prominently in the Caspar affair.

Anyhow, the writer of the article professed to see in it the Dread Hand of Nemesis—which is his phrase, not mine. He set forth a whole sequence of fatalities; a sudden death or a tragic one for first this and then that actor in what had been a famous drama out of real life—the drowning of the woman in the case; the accidental poisoning of the chief attorney for the defense—some ptomaine in some canned lobster did for him; the foreman of the jury losing his life in an automobile smash-up; his honor, the trial judge, stricken by heart failure on the bench within the past year, and so forth and so on; and now, for a climax, ex-Inspector Bryce passing out while yet in the prime of life.

But in his mortality list he failed to include the name of Ben Ali Crisp, late city editor of the Daily Star, and this was an oversight which certainly should be corrected. Still, and after all, the bright young man of the Sunday staff was not so much to be blamed; his sin of omission was an unintentional sin, no doubt of it. Even at the time—and the time is some fifteen years back of us now—probably not half a dozen persons knew of Crisp's part in the affair. The Star got glory for a beautiful beat; Bryce took a promotion. But Crisp garnered his rewards anonymously—in private satisfaction and a handsome bonus from his journalistic overlord. He was like boozy old Omar in at least one respect: just slip him the cash and he'd as lief let the credit go.

The Caspar murder story was one of those stories which are as jam and whipped cream to a city desk. It had mystery in it—and everything. It furthermore was unique in this respect, namely: that of the three individuals who fell under suspicion, each one of the three presumably had a motive for killing the man who was killed. Finally, there was the personality of the victim to be played up and made much of. It was a veiled and a sordid life that Watkins Caspar had lived, and his death, by its manner and in its setting, was of a pattern to match with the rest of his earthly material.

Briefly, these were the prior facts of the case: Before he reached middle age Watkins Caspar had made a tidy fortune out of Dr. Blue's Bitter Balsam, a proprietary pain killer. He owned it, name, trade mark and formula. It was a panacea, so advertised, and fine for whatever ailed you. It carried forty percent of alcohol in the blend, with a good strong dash of morphine and certain flavory essences to make the mixture bland to the taste. Those who tried one bottle usually returned for another, praising it as a remedy and for its invigorating and tonic properties. But a muckraking magazine went prying into the patent medicine field and put a crimp in its popularity; and shortly thereafter along came the Federal Pure Foods Act and practically ruined the market so far as this particular cure-all was concerned.

Caspar and Melody had been drinking all evening and had fallen to quarreling.

Mr. Caspar took his and got out while the getting was good. As the saying is, he retired from active business on his earnings.

But the game must have got into his blood. He kept on playing it from under cover. Right on up to the end of his life, when he was in the sixties, he played it. He furnished the brains and the financial backing for a ring of ver 'ers of forbidden narcotics. They peddled the stuff—cocaine, hashish, heroin, opium, what not—among drug fiends, looking to him for their stock in trade. They took most of the risks and fifty percent of the profits. He, dealing with these retailers through a middleman or go-between, took none of the open risks and the remaining fifty percent. The go-between was a man named August Melody, who passed for Caspar's confidential secretary but who really was his man-of-all-chores—a sort of combination of butler, valet and associate in an unhallowed and despicable huckstering. This Melody was a drunkard and a thief.

Two persons other than Caspar, the master, and Melody, the underling, lived in the Caspar mansion. Let it be stated that it wasn't a mansion really—that was what the newspapers would have it—but a weather-beaten, monstrous bulk of frame, all jig saw cornices and wooden belfries and slate mansards, that dated back to the dark ages of our native domestic architecture. It spraddled its weird and rambling contours under the neglected trees of a two acre plot in a part of the Bronx already threatened but not yet entirely beleaguered by a creeping invasion of model tenements. There was something pathetic, something almost wistful in its shabby state and utter homeliness, and yet its hooded dormers, with blinds that never opened, gave a sinister aspect, too—like a sloven mid-Victorian damsel wearing a highwayman's mask. It was precisely the sort of house any fiction writer would have picked on as fitting background and locale for a conventional detective yarn—a prison place for an abducted heiress, a hiding place for coiners or conspirators, the scene of some dark and unfathomable homicide. For once, fact was to live up to the conformed demands of story book fancy.

As just stated, two others had a home of sorts there. One of these was a woman who, for respectability's sake, called herself the housekeeper. Well, to her credit it should be said that she did do such housekeeping as was done for those who abode under this roof, also the cooking and the chamber work. She was a washed-out, dyed-in blonde of forty or thereabouts. In her day she had been a professional fortune teller, a self-ordained trance medium, a keeper of a furnished room house in the old Tenderloin. She spoke of herself as Madame Cabanne; her real name, it appeared, was Sarah Ann Morgan.

Caspar's nephew and his only known kinsman by blood was the fourth member of the household. This was one Jared Rusk, a man in his late thirties. He, however, was scarcely to be reckoned as a regular resident. He came and went. Operating on capital furnished by his uncle, he was a partner in a bucket shop down in Wall Street. Even by the flexible and generous ratings of his brother bucketeers he was of a most dubious repute.

This, then, was the confederated group of dwellers in the said establishment—a clutch of four bad eggs, as you might say, all in the one fouled nest. You'll understand, though, that the world generally neither knew nor cared what the past behaviors of the several individuals had been, nor what their present traffickings might be, until a thing occurred which thrust them out of a congenial obscurity into the broad sun-glare of publicity. That which occurred was the murder of the patron of the remaining three, Caspar; it was then that the police—and the reporters—dug out these historical details.

The act of the murder was discovered on a morning in September. A milkman coming soon after sunrise took note that the window sashes of a front room on the lower floor were raised and the shutters thrown back; also that behind the drawn curtains lights seemed to be burning. These small phenomena quickened his curiosity; he made so bold as to set his eye to a convenient peep hole where the curtains at one window failed to overlap. What he saw then sent him, with a face almost as white as his own milk, running to find a policeman—or somebody.

It was a policeman he found and the policeman climbed in through the window. It was a most untidy living room that he invaded, but the untidiest object in it was its late owner, clumped in a stiff ugly posture in an armchair, his legs spraddled, his arms dragging, and his shirt front a mess of dried red stains.

Someone, presumably someone who stalked him from the rear, had stabbed him in the throat with a dagger, a knife or a sword—anyway, with some slender sharp blade—so that, probably without struggling, he had bled to death where he sat. The weapon itself was nowhere about; the murderer must have withdrawn it from the wound and carried it away. Apparently, robbery or intended robbery had been no part of the purpose. The dead man's wallet, containing a considerable sum of money, was in the dead man's pocket and seemingly nothing of value was missing from the room or from the house.

Madame Cabanne was asleep, or apparently asleep, in her room on the second floor. As regards Melody, there was no possible doubt that he slept when the policeman came to his door, his being the profound slumber of drunkenness. Both professed a complete ignorance of the murder. The woman said she had left Melody and Caspar in company when she retired shortly before eleven o'clock. They had been drinking together all evening but they had fallen to quarreling, she said, as she went upstairs. Melody admitted the drinking, and under pressure of cross-questioning, the quarrel. Dispute had arisen, he said, over certain money matters but he swore that when he quit his master, shortly after midnight, the latter was quite as usual except for the effects of liquor. Melody was tremulous and frightened; he broke into tears when confronted with the Madame's story of a violent dispute, and quite went to pieces on being told he would be held for further inquiry.

The woman, when she saw the body, had an attack of hysterics—or, rather, what those thought who watched her, eager for any betraying signs, was a creditable imitation of one. She turned defiant and abusive after they told her that she also would be kept in custody as one having in possession material facts.

Shortly after eight o'clock the nephew, Jared Rusk, reached the house. Detectives halted him as he entered the front gate. He had not been in the Bronx at all, he declared, since the afternoon previous. He had spent the evening at a theater and the rest of the night at bachelor apartments which he maintained in west Fortieth Street. Arising early, he had come by subway to the borough for some private papers which he left behind him after changing his outer garments the day before. The first he knew of his uncle's death was when the officers told him of it. This was his story and he stuck to it.

He stuck to it in the face of circumstances immediately transpiring. So, too, did the remaining pair of suspects maintain their respective positions, proclaiming their innocence in the face of more or less correlated developments. Very soon, then, the men of the detective bureau and the newspapermen working with them came smack up against a most extraordinary situation, to wit, as follows:

To begin with, there was no scrap of proof to support the theory that a thief, entering the late Mr. Caspar's house by stealth, had killed the late Mr. Caspar. By simple reasoning it therefore followed that the killing had been accomplished either by a person already in the house or by a person having access to it and familiar with its interior.

"Danny," said Crisp, "you said the third degree hasn't got you anywhere. Well, this will be the Third Degree Plus."

The woman, Madame Cabanne, used to be a fake spiritualist and give bogus séances.

Now, of such persons there were three and three only—the so-styled housekeeper, Madame Cabanne; the inebriate odd-jobsman, Melody; the dissolute nephew, Jared Rusk. Which one of these three, each of them with a more or less unsavory past, had plausibly a reason for desiring that Caspar be put out of the way?

That was the big question. The answer to it was that each one of the three had a reason, which, from the standpoint of the investigators, was no proper answer at all. They had set out, aiming, through processes of deduction, to eliminate two of the suspects, which naturally would put the burden of presumptive guilt upon the third. And lo and behold! they found now that though there was no seeming collusion, nevertheless they could eliminate neither one nor yet two of them. They had to include the whole trio. There was a three way trail to follow and following it, by this route or that, merely brought you right back where you had started from. Like this:

First: Take Melody. He had been stealing from his employer for months past, perhaps for years past. In his stealings he finally had been detected and had been faced with the proof of them. The early phases of the inquisition brought this out. That drunken quarrel of the evening before, to which the woman had testified and which Melody himself admitted—that had been an outgrowth of it. Under fire he owned up that Caspar, in a maudlin rage, had threatened him with prosecution. If Melody, himself already far gone in liquor and fearing prison, had stabbed Caspar to death as the other lolled in his chair helpless from drink, why, see, wasn't that exactly the sort of thing which a man of Melody's habits and nature might logically have been expected to do? Score a heavy mark against Melody.

Second: But there still was the woman to be reckoned with. The inquiry very soon showed that she had even more at stake than Melody had. Not ten days before his death, as shown by the date on the instrument, Caspar had made a will in her favor, leaving her practically all the worldly goods that he owned, which were considerable. He had not signed it, but she thought he had—thought so up until the moment when it was brought forth from a wall safe that was in the room where the murder took place. Seeing it then, all properly done in the dead man's writing, but lacking his signature and the signatures of witnesses, she genuinely renewed her hysteria, using most shocking language under stress of a terrific disappointment. Set a black line opposite the name of Sarah Ann Morgan, alias Cabanne.

Third: The third bracket stands for Jared Rusk. He did not know until now that his uncle had been cajoled into drawing up a will by which he was disinherited. He figured himself the sole heir. At his uncle's death he had expectation of coming into sundry hundreds of thousands of dollars in realty and funds, and in stocks and bonds on hand.

Moreover, he was at this particular moment in acute want of money. While he and his partner had been cheating the gulls who patronized their deadfall of a bucket shop, he, not content with a trapper's half share, privily had been cheating his partner; and the partner had found it out and had demanded restitution and was undeniably in position to press the demand to the point of putting him back of a row of steel bars. Besides this, he had other needs and pressing ones—needs having to do with bad checks and the claims of a lady in a leg show.

Altogether, it would seem the wasteful and self-indulgent young Mr. Rusk had wound himself in a tight mesh of entanglements. For him, in this emergency, there had been but one conceivable way out and that way was by coming into immediate possession of the Caspar estate. In the equation let X represent the desperate and harassed nephew.

Jared Rusk was seeing something. With eyes popped and riveted, he was

And there you were—at a standstill, with three separate individuals under scrutiny and under suspicion; three persons having three separate motives, three persons capable, any one of them, you would figure offhand, of doing the thing. And yet, as the issue stood, there was no skein of tangible evidence against any one of them—no footprints, no accusing finger marks, no bloodstains on garments or person, no nothing, really, that was definitely incriminating.

The papers went at the story—naturally. They spread-eagled it all over the front pages.

There were times when the Daily Star, being by policy a great one for crusades and investigations and reform campaigns, was on the outs with the Department. When in doubt, pound the cops—this axiom was matrixed into the editorial creed. Then again there were times when the paper and the police pulled together, amiable as seasoned yokemates. It so happened this was a season of truce between them, which same considerably simplified things for Captain Bryce, at present in command of the Bronx detective bureau.

On an evening when the Caspar mystery, unsolved and seemingly impregnable, was turning the corner of its second week, Captain Bryce sat across the table from City Editor Crisp, of the Star, in a good little chop house under one of the Manhattan-side arches of the Brooklyn Bridge. Orders had been given; their double sirloin was on the fire.

In the ancient days of the old Intelligencer when Crisp had been its star reporter, Danny Bryce had been its spriest office boy. A good many office boys graduate into sport writers or circulation rustlers; but Danny, growing up a tall and handsome stripling, followed in the broad-flanged footsteps of his Irish-Scotch dad and joined the force and rose therein. He was the youngest captain in it. He had ambition to rise yet higher.

He sat now, fiddling with his plated tableware. Crisp, pronging a fork into the pickled beets, squinted a chill gray eye at sight of this finger play.

"Well, Danny," he said as the waiter passed on beyond earshot, "what seems to be weighing on your mind? Heiney seeing something which it was not good for any human in normal case to see.

says that steak ought to be here inside of two minutes; that means we'll wait at least twenty. By the way, you look a bit jumpy."

"It's that damn Caspar case," said the younger man. "It's got me groggy for fair—I can't sleep. I'm working on it day and night and not getting anywheres. I need to get a new slant on it, just like I'm telling you when I calls you up this afternoon asking you as a special favor will you meet me here at Mallory's for a bite and a talk after you're through at the shop. I need help—need it bad, and that's the holy truth."

"What makes you think I can be of any help?" asked Crisp, reaching for the rye bread.

"You? Think I'm ever going to forget the times you're setting this man's town on fire covering police under old Pop Stein, and I'm a runny nose kid hustling copy for you and tagging you every chance, trying to pick up pointers from seeing you work?" The boy worship of his youth was revived in Bryce's tone. "Think I don't remember that night when you turns up with the kidnaped Starbuck baby after the cops have all fallen down on their foolish faces? Think I don't know that if you hadn't went and sewed yourself to a city desk you could give any professional detective in this country cards and spades and then go out on him? Well, I do—and knowing it, I'm asking you, for old times' sake, to lend me a hand in this case if you can."

If this evidence of a sincere admiration coddled Crisp's vanity he chose not to betray it.

"Never mind the old times' stuff," he said, ignoring the flattery. "We'll put it on a plain business basis. It would mean a lot to you, wouldn't it, to find out who killed Caspar? Well, it would mean something to the Star to pull off a nice juicy beat. I don't mind telling you this story appeals to me. I've been wishing all the week that I was on the outside again, covering the assignment. I think I know what angle I'd take."

"What'd that be?" In his eagerness Bryce snapped the question.

"Never mind that now—I want to get your reactions. Looking at it from your end, how does it stand?"

"Right where it did two days after Caspar gets bumped off. We're holding three parties. I pull the regular routine on 'em—arraign 'em on short affidavits. None of 'em give bond and so I've got 'em under my eye right from (Continued on page 112)

Which Tells a Dramatic Episode of Salem in 1683

[Writ by ELIZABETH BALDWIN]
[London Town, June 16, 1682]

THERE be strange and divers religions and controversies abroad, the which seem far from us, and in no wise should I wish to be a part thereof. "The fanatiques" is how they are mouthed about, meaning Pilgrims or Puritans. Coming tonight, I met one, Lord Hastings, who did impart to me, to my grief and chagrin, the grave news that Lady Isabella is outfitting a boat wherein to sail to the New World to practice there amazing religions.

"It is the talk of the time," quoth he, "that with her she will convey her niece, the toast of the town, the lovely Mary Newton but lately come into her heritage."

Lord Hastings, very scoffing, told me of Sir John Tyndale, who did talk high of the fanatiques as ever he did in his life. He finds that he and this company are the true spirits of the nation—and the greater part of the nation, too—who will have liberty of conscience in spite of this "Act of Uniformity," or they will die. "If they may not," saith Sir John to me, "preach abroad, they will preach in their own house."

In the next room one was playing very finely on the dulcimer, another sang; there was much merriment. Lord Hastings stood overlong on leaving. He did seem to hint such a question, "Know you aright of Lady Isabella, this most racking gossip, or of this adventure?" He said this most discreetly, and though quite against his judgment, he did add the name of Mary Newton, and he did so denounce the non-conformists and separatists as fanatiques, and with fine flattery to me as the companion piece to Mary Newton, protesting that I, Elizabeth Baldwin, were fairer, and he did ring all the bells of folly for my persuasion, as if I were in secret communication with this mad conception of duty. So was I then in a longing mind of going to see Mary Newton on the instant, but the following day came she herself in coach and four, with all the new furbelows and jewels from France, a goodly and worldly sight, and like to excite envy and covetousness.

So absorbed were the multitude only when the smoke of the faggots curled slowly did they hear a bugle

My cousin, Mary Newton, with tenderness and dignity did announce her intention to cross the seas with the Lady Isabella to the New World to worship in freedom and abide by the teachings of the Pilgrims. With tears and entreaties I did beseech her to think on the joy of life, renounced by her; to consider the perils and dangers to one so young and beauteous.

Alas! Unmoved was she by my sorrow, and to reconcile me to our separation she promised to set down daily some account of her life in the wilderness.

"By so doing, dear Elizabeth," saith she, "you will be with me to share the hopes and fears which may beset me. You will know all the happenings, and if I fare ill, let it be a secret between us, and you will protect and guard my memory."

[Writ by MARY NEWTON,
Salem, May 5, 1683]

THAT the reading may sometime testify for me, by the advice of several worthy persons and many who are anxious for my well being—among whom is my cousin, Elizabeth Baldwin—I will set down daily some of the happenings to me in my life in the wilderness and send what I have writ, as chance offers, to my Cousin Elizabeth. My loneliness in this manner will albeit be comforted and she will seem a part of each day, united in thought and prayers by me.

[Salem, July 7, 1683]

TO ELIZABETH:

I think of you in the smooth symmetry of events, of your well ordered life, and I am the tempted one—tempted of a thousand blow thrice. A shouting and tramping of horses was, and a great cloud of dust rose from over the hill.

winds, each blowing across the wide ocean. "Come back from the wilderness," they call to me. "Come back to ivied towers, to fragrant gardens where roses bloom, where beauty lives, wanton and unrepressed."

But I turn away; I close my ears to vagrant suggestion, and pray for grace and submission to the law and rule of the new church. I am tormented by an ever lashing conscience: Am I following the straight and narrow path preordained for the Pilgrims? Shall I be one of the elect to raise the banner of righteousness in the New World? Have I, in reality, a frivolous tendency toward gaiety? Doubts beset me by night and peer at me from the dark places of my soul.

Then—oh! then, I fear I may weaken; and I wish that I had not followed my aunt, the revered and pious and lovely Lady Isabella, on her mission to this new and strange world. The historians will, no doubt, write of her, "She left an earthly paradise in the family of Earldom to encounter the terrors of the wilderness for a pure worship in the house of God, but in a few months left that wilderness for the Heavenly Paradise." Such, indeed, is already the Reverend Sidney Brown's tribute to her, written by him to her brother, the Earl of Lincoln.

Elizabeth, you have a tinge of worldliness when you ask me what it is all about and why should we not remain at home and worship, conforming to the rites and regulations of the church, since Heaven may be obtained by fasting and prayer under whatever sky.

I think of you, dear Elizabeth, now, in the long twilight, smiling, mayhap twining jasmine in your hair, gathering flowers unmolested. A terrible longing has possession of me to take passage on the good ship Fortune. She is soon to be in our harbor—but only four nights—and then weigh anchor for home. I have days of longing and nights when all is dark. I fear I have not enough of piety, not enough of the spirit of adventure—which in itself is of great assistance to piety—coming into this new country, this wilderness. My brother Walter is endowed with an imagination that makes every cabin a palace. The red men are his friends; his only foe is the unknown land, which he desires to conquer.

He goes forth, armed with an ax and a compass, a hymn on his lips and a prayer in his heart; he discovers hidden springs of water; builds roads; and inspires hope in his followers. He is ever being sent by the Governor on long journeys to plan where towns shall be and to devise such matters with other dreamers. His goings leave me alone, and though I am unafraid, yet the great trees cast daunting shadows on moonlighted nights, the wind knocks on the cabin door, and the noises of the night conspire against my spirit.

Lately, since Lady Isabella's death, I have sought refuge from myself and my lonely dreams. I leave our cabin to be under the protection of Elder Winslow and Mistress Winslow. Sometimes people, dear Elizabeth, but contribute to one's loneliness. Tonight even prayer seems to rise no higher than the smoke of the camp fires of the new-come settlers. The smoke tries to reach up to the stars, but rises feebly as the embers fall, and the stars shine on, knowing naught of what troubles us so far, far down here below them.

Dear and good cousin, you do not believe that the flesh and the Devil are at work to destroy the soul of a maid if she pause to look at the sun rising from the sea. The sun, in its joy of finding the earth, safe overnight, having left us to the insecure light of the stars, repentant, mayhap, pours its treasure of golden light over the earth.

But such notions are the wanderings of an idle mind, Elder Winslow would say, and unbefit my calling. I will pray to be more like Mistress Winslow, or Humility Cravens, but to you I may say foolish things. You did well warn me I was not the stuff to make a martyr or a saint; that one must have a very genius for martyrdom, and I think you spake wisely.

When my brother said he would embark on the good ship Isabella, outfitted by my aunt, the Lady Isabella, in her zeal for the Pilgrims, and when she herself determined to go into the new world and said she had need of me, then, ah, my dear, I prayed for wisdom, I listened to the voice of duty and conscience, and I came. Now I am finding how to be of service, and with the littlest aptitude for nursing, I am taking care of the sick. Doctor Warren, a chirurgeon of some note in the world, obeyed the call to come into the wilderness and teaches me the use of fair medicines. He has a right merry humor, being one who has not forgotten how to smile, and at times I go to his cabin, set apart for his experiments in medicines. When trouble lies heavy on me, I go to him for help and one of those smiles, which I know I will find in Heaven, if Heaven be truly, as they say, a happy place.

Doctor Warren comforts me upon the harshness of the church; he insists that strong and stern foundation must be builded on a rock. He says that religion is not just a warding-off of fire in the next world; it is meant to be a source of joy, a refuge and a belief in the eternal life, with a knowledge of the sovereignty of the Eternal Will.

This same Doctor Warren has taught me some cunning in the use of such herbs as he gathers and distills and he insists that I could even administer medicines. The distilling of sweet waters from violets and lavender for the use of the sick is another of my accomplishments; and I might be a skillful nurse under the chirurgeon's direction, when he takes me with him to visit the sick. My liking was never for spinning or weaving, knitting or cooking, although I must do my part in all of this; but I love better to be of direct use to those who are fainting in heart or body. And there are beautiful days when the sun shines and I find I have a gift I never knew except in the wilderness: The birds come to my call. I whistle in the forest and they answer; they call out a welcome to me. They will fly to me as I quietly gather the herbs, moving so slowly that nothing could fear me. Doctor Warren says merrily that I cast a charm, and that is why the birds come.

I am happier since I am learning to be of service, and in my heart I know that service leads to happiness, the kind of happiness that has little to do with place or circumstance but is a part of the treasure laid up in Heaven, a state of mind. And yet—and yet I remember in every song of bird or blushing tree of spring a lost moment and a neglected explanation. There was a rose garden, moonlight, and Merry England. I wore a white embroidered muslin, lately come from France, brought to me by the Lady Isabella. And there came Sir John Tyndale in great bravery of velvet and fine silks.

He came into the garden where I was to beg me for a rose, and I could not forbear, but gave him one, which he put to his lips saying, "With this rose I plight thee my troth," and he did beseech me to say those words with him that I listened and did repeat the words as he desired. With that he knelt, kissing my hand, and did say various praises of my hair, my eyes, my singing, and did greatly beseech me. But it may have been, dear cousin, the madness of midsummer—a rose garden, a silvery moon, someone singing in the great room beyond the terrace. Then Lord Alfred Hastings, a gentleman not liked by me, came into the garden, and seeing us pretended to withdraw, but did not so. He stood observing us, hid from Sir John's vision, but seen by me. Sir John responded to my quick desire to return to the drawing room where Lady Isabella was with her guests and thither came Hastings smiling, with a triumphant look, wearing a red rose—one purloined by him from the garland I had left on the bench in the garden. Sir John, taking his farewell of Lady Isabella, saw the rose (who could help it—worn so jauntily?). He looked at me strangely then, and Hastings bowed before me, taking my hand for a dance as the fiddlers set up a strain. Sir John vanished, but his strange look, as of one greatly hurt, will stay with me forever. But oh, my dear Elizabeth, how could he believe that on that night I could give my favor so lightly? If he believe that of me, how may I trust him?

I saw Sir John once again, at Court. He bowed low when, as misfortune would have it, I passed by with Lord Hastings. In truth Sir John took a step forward, held out a protesting hand. How was I to know that land and sea—perhaps eternity—would separate us before I saw that look again? And as I went from Court in the coach with Lady Isabella, she told me that she had suffered a grievous disappointment. Sir John Tyndale, on whom she had so put great faith, had told her that it was well-nigh impossible for him to journey to the New World. The King had promised him fifty thousand acres and a goodly number of men, so she told me, for the founding of a new colony, but events would detain Sir John, who was now to be sent on an embassy to France, possibly sailing for the New World a year later. It was after my aunt had told me this that she did entreat me to go with her to America. So I came.

If you know aught of Sir John, I pray you tell me, and if I should again see that look of tenderness, of forgiveness, as he looked at me that last night I saw him, I would know that I had died and gone to Heaven.

The good ship Fortune sails tonight, bearing what I have set down to you, Cousin Elizabeth.

[July 23, 1683]

I BLUSH in my sleep that I wrote of past vanities instead of the seriousness of life. I rebel at the belief of the Elders that levity is sin and joy or gaiety a quality of the Devil—and yet, much of roguery is done in thy name, O Gaiety! Governor Bradstreet's nephew has come to town. He is a sincere and solemn youth. He comes to this house and sits and sits. He seems to be educating me; he talks of the saints and martyrs and infant damnation, in which he devoutly believes. Henry came upon me reading Shakespeare, and what appeared upon his countenance seemed to discover me in a murder. He made report of me forthwith to the Elders. I would have been fined, aye, and imprisoned, had my brother not taken the crime of bringing the book into the house, testifying that it was but a maid's curiosity that led me to open it. The book was burned in the square and my brother Walter publicly chidden. It is my belief that Henry Bradstreet is "courting" me, as they say here, and endeavoring to make me worthy of his great name.

Henry has lately builded a house on the outskirts of Salem, which denotes a looking toward housekeeping on Henry's part. Many of the maidens greatly appreciate Henry and his possessions, and look askance at me. I may have earned the dislike of Humility Cravens, unwittingly, through Henry's visits to me. Humility, no doubt, thinks of Henry's orchards planted by Mr. William Blackmore, and of his house and garden. Henry himself is an honest, sturdy specimen of yeomanry, and of fine deportment. Humility discovered me, one evening in June, wearing a white muslin frock, white slippers and hair curled, capless, with Henry sitting in the chimney corner, as (Continued on page 168)

The BOWERY—

By O. O. McINTYRE

Chuck Conners

THE BOWERY is no more!

The picturesque midrib of New York's East Side squalor has flung off tattered garments. Instead of shiny serge, there is now the faint rustle of silk.

Windows once crammed with pawn pledges are spilling with roses. Blue Nose Murphy's swing door saloon is labeled "Silberstein–the Florist."

Where once the bung-starter spoke with authority, the Bowery now "says it with flowers."

McGuirk's Suicide Hall, whither soiled ladies crept to quaff the hemlock, is a spick-and-span electrical shop. Next door at the old Kelly Garden, John Callahan is angling for lost souls at his rescue mission.

Gone are the iniquitous cesspools, "The Flea Bag," "The Alligator," "Nigger Mike's" and "The Doctor's"—where one beer was served with two straws and "third rail" whisky was a nickel a shot with a back room "flop" thrown in.

The scrofulous façades of other myriad bazaars that specialized in "knock-out drops" and ten dollar murders are bright with new paint—their vices swallowed in respectability.

The Bowery may not wear silk hat and spike-tail coat but it has discarded cap and sweater. Bells that guided uncertain steps to pawnshop doors are stilled.

The Bowery purse is mirrored in the Bowery Savings Bank—one of the strongest financial institutions in the world.

In its new dress the Bowery has not entirely lost its shades and colorings. It remains the dark, brooding, sunless street—one of the widest in Manhattan.

Fat wives of shopkeepers sit in dingy doorways and the human lees still eddy there as hopelessly forlorn as the midnight shriek of the elevated high above the roof tops.

Yet the bread line's surge of misery in every block has vanished. "Dummy chuckers" are no longer throwing their fake fits in front of Beefsteak John's.

The one-cent coffee houses are white tiled cafeterias. The bedraggled old women who screamed their imprecations on passers-by have disappeared.

Gum chewing girls in plaid skirts, faded blouses and rakish tams exist only in Bowery fiction. Broadway modistes have branches along the Bowery.

The secondhand book stalls flaunt Tolstoi and Ibsen along with yellow-back thrillers. The public libraries of the Bowery are more generously patronized than those in uptown New York.

Once sailors flocked to the Bowery to have hearts and anchors etched on manly chests and brawny arms. Now they go to the "De-tattooing Parlors," on the same street, to have them removed.

The urge of beauty is keen. Indeed, Slip McGuffin's old stuss house has become a ladies' coiffure parlor in the strange Bowery metamorphosis.

Fire escapes are not filled with balloon bedding and flapping wet wash in the early morning. The strange loaded silence that hung over the gray street has been replaced by the sharp jangle of commerce.

All the old Bowery characters who tinged poverty with romance have ascended the starry trail. What characters they were! No other city has produced their like.

Doc Shuffield in high hat and boiled shirt—a fellow of a Royal Surgical Society—does not minister gratuitously to the Bowery sick. He died in a snowdrift struggling to reach a patient.

Chuck Conners with his bowler derby and pearl buttoned short jacket—a self-appointed Mayor, philosopher and intimate of the great. And his "skoit" Nellie, the best "spieler" in the dance halls.

Chinatown Gertie who cast her miserable lot among the Chinese and emerged from the foul causeways "a white lily" whose oratory drew sin-stained wrecks to the mourners' bench.

The Sullivans—Big and Little Tim! Owen Kildare, the Bowery poet. Spike O'Day who pawned his peg leg each morning and retrieved it at night with a beggar's spoils.

Jew Dave Kelly, a fiery little despot who licked cops and spent his earnings feeding friendless cats. Margolly Nickerson—the Bowery dude, remittance man and Oxford scholar.

Sophie the Scrubwoman whose life-sized painting now hangs in a Doyers Street Mission. Blind Toots the singer of Chatham Square. Stubby Tolliver the Bowery hackman. Salvation Annie!

All are gone!

Merchants now park limousines at the curb of their Bowery shops. From Chatham Square, where the Bowery begins, to Cooper Square, where it ends, there is not a "reliever shop" left. In these cellar hutches the outcast changed his shoes for those a little more worn and received in the bargain the price of a drink.

The dim-lit one flight up hotels have flashy electric signs and offices with mosaic floors. Their signs no longer read "For Men Only" but "For Gentlemen Only."

Ghastly museums that stressed the horror of social ills while Van Dyked medical charlatans—French-American doctors, Berlin specialists—awaited trembling victims upstairs, have been swept away.

The famous guinea pig store near Broome Street is now a London Dog Shop and sells the chow and fashionable borzoi. Signs of interior decorators greet the eye on all sides.

A lone penny arcade and shooting gallery is dying of inanition, a survivor among scores of other days.

Hogan's Roost in Bleecker Street where uptown beggars drifted for the night has become a printing house for Bible tracts.

The breath of reform has also spread to Chinatown, whose narrow, winding streets sprawl precipitously off a hip of Chatham Square.

The old Chinese theater is a house of Christian worship. Lantern-hung buses continue to carry visiting lodgemen and school teachers to see Chinatown wickedness, while a ballyhoo barks of the shuddering terrors.

But the Chinatown horror is only imagined—the pale young man in the opium bunk is a mere illustration of cosmetic artifice and he languidly puffs Virginia leaf instead of the dreadful poppy. During the day he is a gay soda jerker on Park Row.

White wives of Chinese no longer peer from latticed windows at a forbidden world. Slippered myrmidons of Opium Kings do not flit ghostlike in the shadowy catacombs underneath the sidewalk nor do frail young girls huckster their souls in a Hell's market place.

The ancient joss house is a "yokel yanker"—a prop setting to lure coins from tourists. The real Chinatown long since moved to suburban Jersey hide-aways.

Chinese merchants have their Chamber of Commerce and settle differences with silk-voiced diplomacy instead of tong wars. Gunmen have taken their "gats" to Harlem and the Bronx.

Big Jack Zelig, Louis the Lump, Foggy Bernstein and a score of others have died, as they lived, by the gun. To the new Chinatown they are not even memories. "Ganging the Cop" is a lost art.

The thieves' "fences" have moved to Avenue A. Nothing indeed is left that is remindful of the days when the Bowery was a hell-roaring street, ruled by the might of fists.

When the booze joints dried up, the Bowery bloomed with Danish pastry shops, bonbon parlors and soft drink stands.

The Bowery's "new front" is due solely to Prohibition. The disintegration began with the passing of the Volstead law.

With the coming of the debacle, the attempted Boweryization of Broadway began. The army of "grifters" bivouacked northward with their dime museums, snake charming parlors and catch-penny devices.

But the invasion withered up in a puff of scorn. A street that had bubbled with champagne foam was not ready to welcome beer-buying invaders from Steve Brodie's stamping ground. The tarnished "Fly-trap" could not compete with the mirrored elegance of a tea dansant.

When the Bowery started to move the soul of it died. It had completed its cycle and is now returning to its pristine simplicity. It is going back to the days of flagstone walks and flowery dells whence it derived its name.

At an old chemist's shop in the very heart of the thoroughfare, the aged proprietor shook his head.

"We don't keep leeches for black eyes these days," he said.

The Bowery, indeed, is no more.

The DESERT

A Résumé of Parts One to Four:

IN ALGERIA and the near-by Sahara occurs the drama of the following lives:

SIR GERVAS CAREW, followed the old call of the desert when the young wife he worshiped left him, abandoning her dying infant son. A somber, mysterious figure, hating and despising women, he found something of peace among the Arabs, whom he served tirelessly as a desert healer, his closest companions a native servant, Hosein, and a blind desert waif, Saba. But the old wounds of memory are suddenly opened, and Carew, who thought himself done with women, is thrust into a terrific emotional turmoil when one night he rescues from

MARNY GERADINE. As for Marny, she too for the first time knows the meaning of love when this silent and chivalrous man, whom at first she thinks an Arab, because of his native garb, comes into her life. Twice again fate brings them together, each time intensifying the attraction between them, and making more bitter Marny's own problem; for she is the wife of

SIR CLYDE GERADINE, the most brutal debauchee in Algiers, and her life with him has been torment since he practically bought her from her dissolute brother five years before. Carew instinctively hates Geradine, whom he had nevertheless rescued one day in a desert sandstorm; and this feeling is not lessened when Geradine treats him with patronizing boorishness on the night of the ball at the palace of

THE GOVERNOR OF ALGIERS, for whom Carew has performed on occasion certain delicate missions among the Arabs. Geradine leaving for a drink, Carew takes Marny—who is dizzy and sick, having that evening been struck by her husband—to a quiet spot away from the throng, where, looking down at her, he sees that her face is convulsed by a sudden spasm of pain.

Part Five: CHAPTER VIII

CAREW was still inwardly raging at the incident of a few minutes ago, still seething with the strange hatred that had laid so strong a hold upon him—a hatred that, aggravated by Geradine's discourteous and overbearing manner, seemed tonight to have reached its culminant pitch. It was with difficulty that he had controlled himself just now in the ballroom. But something had restrained him, something more impellent even than his desire to avoid a collision that could only have ended in a public fracas—that had risen up within him at the sight of the girl's strained face. And as he looked at her now with his black brows drawn together in a heavy scowl he was still wondering at the impulse that had come to him to shield her, still trying vainly to understand his own motive in bringing her here. What had prompted him? Was it anger or pleasure or only pity he felt as he stared again at the little drooping figure? A curious expression crept into his somber eyes. What a child she looked—what a weary, white faced child!

"You ought to be at home and in bed," he said, almost roughly. "Can I get you anything—champagne or a cup of coffee."

She glanced up with a tart.

"No, please, it's nothing. Only a headache," she stammered. "I don't know what's the matter with me tonight," she added with a shaky laugh. "I'm not given to headaches. I'm as strong as a horse, really." But as she uttered her valiant little boast her voice broke and she looked away, twisting her gloves nervously between her hands. He could see that she was struggling with herself but he made no attempt to forestall the explanation he guessed was coming, and waited, still standing, for her to speak. She turned at last, her troubled gaze not reaching his face but lingering on the picturesque details of his Arab dress.

"Sir Gervas—I'm sorry—that stupid blunder——" she faltered. Then suddenly her eyes met his and words came tumbling out in breathless haste. "But you were with him that night in the desert, you let him think you were an Arab. He couldn't possibly know you were English, that you could understand——"

"Do you think I mind being taken for an Arab?" he interrupted, pulling his heavy cloak closer round him and sitting down beside her. "It was a perfectly natural mistake and not worth a moment's consideration; certainly not worth the value of a pair of gloves," he added with a faint smile. And reaching out he drew them deliberately from between her twitching fingers. His voice was extraordinarily gentle but there was in it an underlying note of finality that made further apology impossible, and with a little sigh she relapsed into silence.

For a time she watched him smoothing the creases from the crumpled gloves, wondering at his unexpected presence.

"I didn't think you would be here tonight," she said at length. "You don't really like—this sort of thing, do you?" she added, with a vague movement of her hand towards the distant ballroom.

"Loathe it," he answered promptly, moving slightly to face her and settling his long limbs more comfortably into the corner of the sofa. "But I make a point of coming to this particular function if I happen to be in Algiers. I meet old friends."

"Desert friends?"

He nodded assent to the eager question.

"Is that why you wear Arab dress?"

"Partly," he shrugged. "They would hardly know me in European clothes. But principally because I prefer it."

"As you prefer to speak Arabic or French, rather than English?" she hazarded.

"I have scarcely spoken English for twelve years," he said shortly. Then as if to cover the slight piece of personal information he had let slip he added: "There is no longer any need for you to restrict your rides, Lady Geradine. The woods are safe enough now."

She turned to him swiftly. "What do you mean?" she said with sudden breathlessness. And as she listened to his bald, unvarnished account of the end of Abdul el Dhib the color that had risen to her face died out of it, leaving her white to the lips. She was shivering when he finished, her hands clenching and unclenching in her lap.

"And it was because of me—because of what you did for me that night," she burst out passionately. "Oh, I never thought, I never guessed the risk you were taking! And you knew all the time! It was he you meant when you warned me not to ride alone. Oh, if he had killed you, it would have been my fault! And I—I——"

She pulled herself up sharply, aghast at the sound of her own voice, at the confession that had been almost wrung from her. A wave of burning color suffused her face, and tingling with shame she averted it hastily, veiling her eyes with the thick, dark lashes that swept downward to her cheek—but not before he had seen the look that flashed into them, a look that sent the blood racing madly through his veins and made his heart leap with sudden violence. For a moment he sat rigid, stunned with self-realization, the hands that were clasped around his knee tightening slowly until the knuckles shone white through the tanned skin. With a tremendous effort he mastered himself.

"Nobody's fault but my own, I'm afraid," he said with forced lightness. "I knew the man I was dealing with. I have good friends in Algiers who gave me warnings in plenty, and because I chose to ignore them what happened was due to my own carelessness."

"It still doesn't lessen my obligation," she said in a stifled voice. But his quiet tone, his imperturbable manner, were fast restoring her own self-possession. Indifferent himself, why should he guess the true cause of her agitation? Perhaps what had seemed so blatant to her had escaped him, and he had seen in her outburst only a natural womanly distress for the danger of a man who had risked his life on her behalf. And the formal courtesy of his next words further reassured her.

"There was never any obligation," he said quietly. "I merely did what anybody else would have done under the circumstances." And abruptly he changed the conversation to the recent race meeting at Biskra.

Convinced that he had not divined her secret, her feeling of self-consciousness and restraint gradually wore away and only the joy of his companionship remained. She would get from it what she could, she would live for the moment and its transient happiness and leave to the future the misery and loneliness that was going to be so much harder to bear than it had ever been. Enough that she was with him and that she loved him, loved him as she had never thought it possible to love. A love that should be her secret strength in the bitter years to come.

Silence fell between them again. Content to wait until he should choose to speak, she sat very still beside him, watching him covertly as he leaned back with his hands clasped behind his head, his half shut eyes staring straight before him as if he saw more than the ferns and fairy lights at which he was looking. Tonight his face seemed graver, sterner than she had ever seen it. A tragic face it appeared to her, a face that bore the deep cut marks of sorrow and disappointment. And she wondered, with a dull pain in her heart, what had been the tragedy that had driven him to the solitary wilds of the desert. She knew nothing of his history—his name and the nature of his work amongst the Arabs were all that Mrs. Chalmers had confided—and she had no means of ever knowing.

A being apart, a type that had been a revelation, he would pass out of her life abruptly as he had come into it, to forget her in the greater interest of his chosen vocation. In the pitiless years that stretched so barrenly ahead she would have only a memory to cling to, a memory that would be at once her consolation and her pain. Into the tender, brooding eyes fixed on him there came a look of mingled pride and anguish. He would never know, thank God he would never know! But if he had cared, if she had brought sorrow to him—her lips quivered, and she began with fumbling haste to draw on the long gloves he had laid on the sofa between them.

"Oughtn't we to be going back to the other room?"

He turned his head slowly.

"There's plenty of time," he said lazily. "They are still dancing."

"But your desert friends——"

"—— can wait," he said succinctly.

Dreading the noisy ballroom, too tired and too utterly indifferent at the moment to care if she were outraging the proprieties, Marny did not press the matter. The quiet conservatory, the restfulness and courage she seemed to derive from the mere presence of the man beside her, were giving her strength to meet the ordeal that still lay before her, the ugly scene that invariably terminated Geradine's so-called nights of amusement. She thrust the thought from her and turned again to Carew.

But before she could speak the peaceful little winter garden was invaded. Not a dancing couple seeking for a solitary spot in which to continue a flirtation begun in the ballroom but two men who, deeming the place empty, did not trouble to modulate their voices as they took possession of a wicker seat a few feet away from the fern-hidden sofa.

"And this soi-disant countess—this copper-haired goddess you are raving about——" The words were uttered in fluent French but with a rough Slavonic accent.

"Soi-disant! I have it from her own lips," interrupted an indignant voice that Carew recognized as belonging to Patrice Lemaire.

"Possibly," was the caustic rejoinder, "but not necessarily correct for all that. An Austrian, you say, from Vienna? The wife of a Count Sach who held a court appointment, and who abused her infamously—and now, since his death, a lady of independent means who travels through Europe trying to forget her unhappy past?"

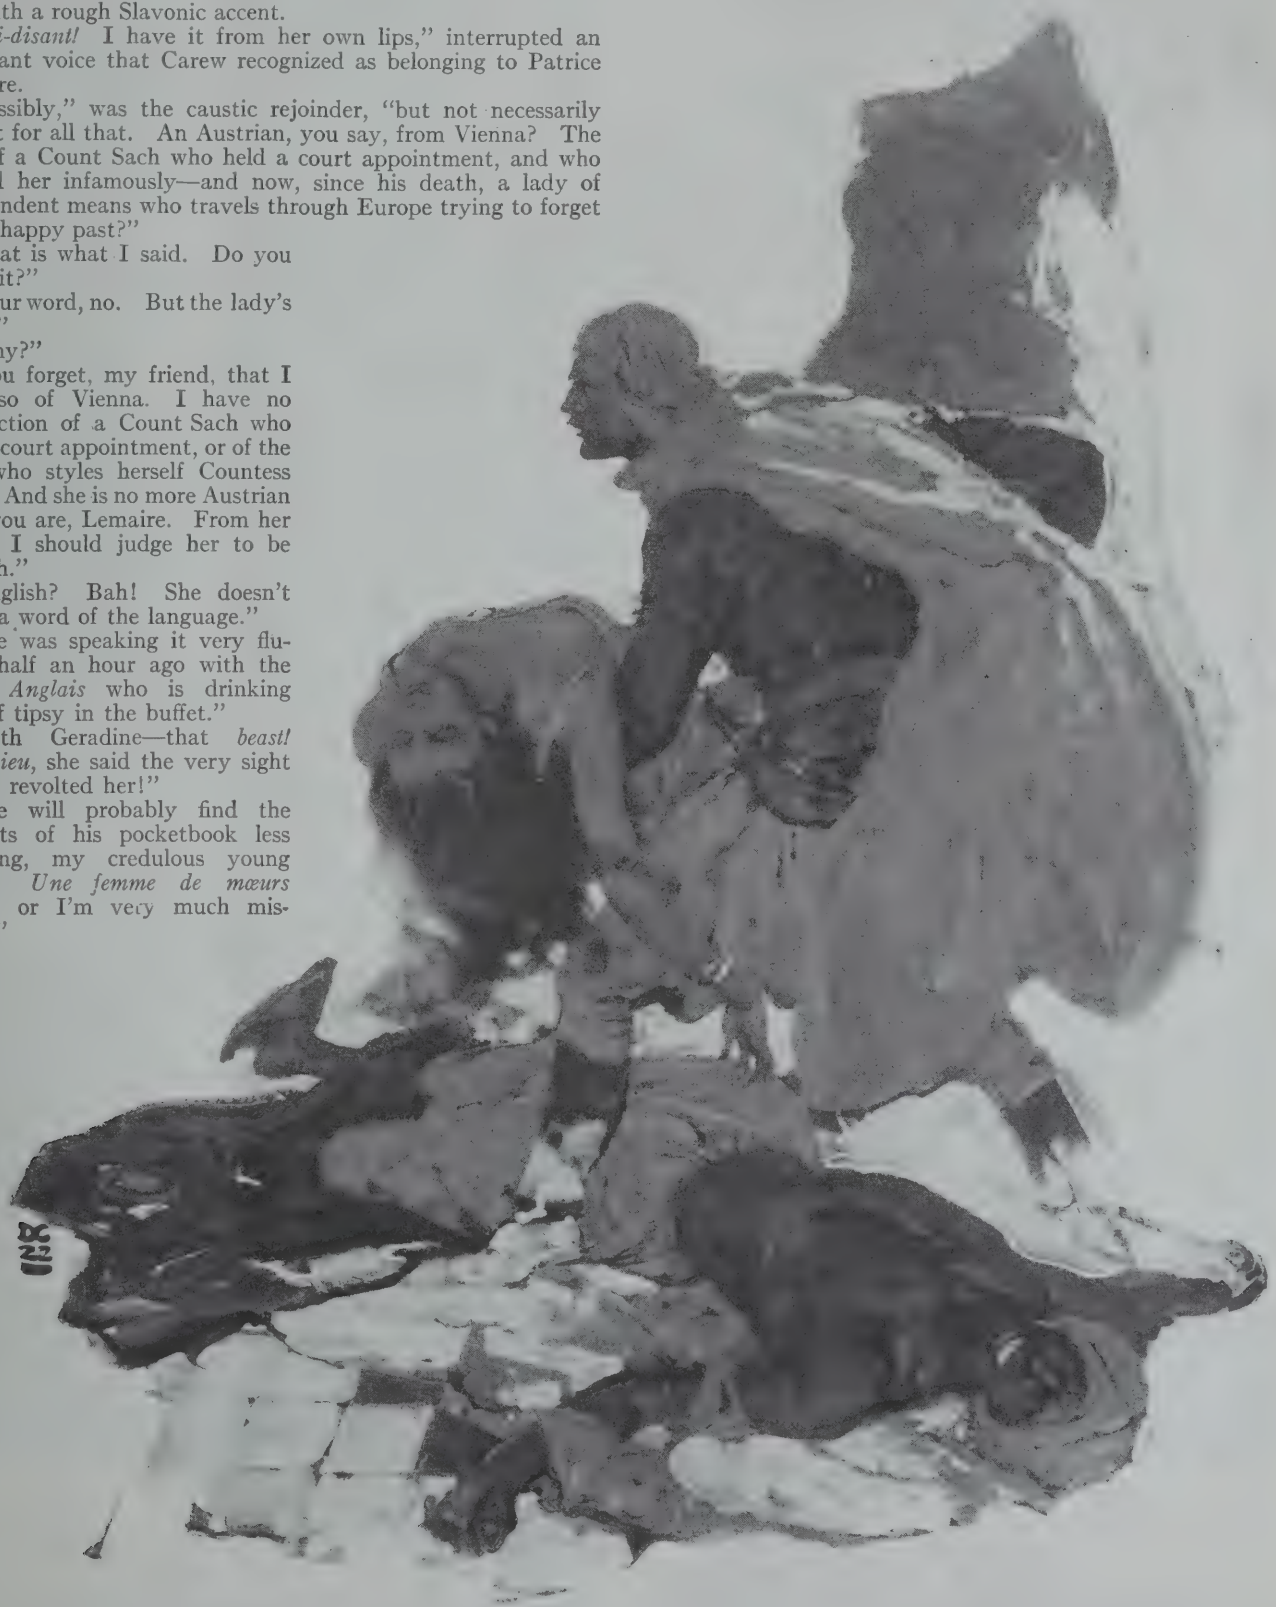
"That is what I said. Do you doubt it?"

"Your word, no. But the lady's —yes."

"Why?"

"You forget, my friend, that I am also of Vienna. I have no recollection of a Count Sach who held a court appointment, or of the lady who styles herself Countess Sach. And she is no more Austrian than you are, Lemaire. From her accent I should judge her to be English."

"English? Bah! She doesn't speak a word of the language."



"She was speaking it very fluently half an hour ago with the grand Anglais who is drinking himself tipsy in the buffet."

"With Geradine—that beast! Bon Dieu, she said the very sight of him revolted her!"

"She will probably find the contents of his pocketbook less revolting, my credulous young friend. Une femme de mœurs légères, or I'm very much mistaken."

And listening to the cynical laugh that followed Marny wondered bitterly what more of shame and humiliation was yet in store for her. At the first mention of her husband she had been startled into a quick, involuntary movement but a strong arm had held her back in her seat and cool, steady fingers had closed warningly over her ice-cold hands. Wrestling with her own misery, she was scarcely conscious of Lemaire's furious protest or of the stormy altercation that ensued, and when at last the sound of the men's angry voices died away as they took their dispute elsewhere it was some time before she realized that her hands still lay in Carew's firm grasp.

She disengaged them silently. There was nothing to say, nothing that either of them could say. They had overheard what was not intended for them to hear. And the Austrian's insinuations were very likely true. Geradine had spoken more than once of the beautiful Viennese who had recently dawned on Algiers society with no introductions but with an audacity of manner that had served her amply instead. That his acquaintance had probably developed into a more intimate relationship was no matter for surprise to the wife who was fully aware of his flagrant infidelities. It was only one more insult added to the many indignities he had put upon her, one more humiliation to bear—and ignore.

Hardly conscious of what he did, Carew lifted the pitiful figure of Marny in his arms and carried her away.

But if she was to retain any kind of hold over herself she must end at once the brief companionship that had given her so much happiness. The proximity of the man beside her, the sense of his unspoken sympathy, the sudden realization of the sensuous appeal of her surroundings with their dim obscurity and intoxicating odor of languorous scented flowers, was filling her with an overwhelming fear of herself. She dared not stay with him, dared not give way to the emotion which, growing momentarily greater, seemed to be robbing her of all strength. The exalted feeling that before had made her glad that only she should suffer was weakening in the natural human longing for the love that would never be hers. If she could but tell him, could feel if only for once the clasp of his arms around her, the touch of his lips on hers! She shivered. What was she thinking—what shameless thing had she become? And trembling with the very madness of her own wild thoughts she rose quickly to her feet, her face coldly set, her voice tuned to level indifference.

"I am quite rested now, Sir Gervas. Shall we go back to the ballroom?" Moving away as she spoke, she gave him no option but to follow her, and an incoming stream of people put a period to anything but trivial speech between them.

He did not go back to the public rooms and the end of the evening found him sitting in the Governor's study with Sanois and a few of the more Gallicized chiefs. And for some time after the sheiks had retired he lingered chatting with the General, delaying as long as possible the moment when he must face alone the shattering self-understanding that had come to him.

The chiming of a deep toned clock warned him at length of the lateness of the hour. There were still a few guests wandering about the hall waiting for carriages that were delayed, and a harassed attaché seized upon Carew to beg a lift for an elderly Frenchman who was forlornly contemplating a weary walk back to his hotel at Mustapha.

Only when he had dropped his talkative companion was Carew able to give full sway to his own thoughts, and when he reached the villa he walked up the flagged path too absorbed to notice the shafts of light filtering through the closed jalousies of the big front room which, though kept in scrupulous orderliness, had never been used since his mother's death.

He passed into the Moresque hall and was moving slowly in the direction of his own rooms when Hosein, emerging from a shadowy corner, glided forward to intercept him. "The lalla," he murmured hesitatingly, his hands sweeping upward to his forehead in a quick salaam.

His master faced him swiftly.

"The lalla——" he repeated sharply.

The big Arab nodded.

"The lalla who awaits my lord," he said softly.

For a moment Carew's heart seemed to stand still and under the deep tan his face went suddenly white. She had come to him—God in Heaven, she had come to him! Hosein's tall figure was wavering curiously before him as he forced a question in a voice he did not recognize for his own.

"Where?"

"In the salon, lord," replied Hosein and gave way with another deep salaam. And the whispering swish-swish of his robes had died away before Carew moved.

"In the salon." He started violently. She had come to him—and he—his face was rigid as he went towards the painted door.

It yielded to his touch and swung to noiselessly behind him, too noiselessly to be heard by her who, at the farther end of the room, was standing before the portrait from which she had stripped the curtains that had veiled it for so many years. She was humming a little song, a frankly indecent song of the boulevards, her copper-crowned head thrown back, her gleaming shoulders twitching from time to time with a petulant movement of impatience.

And behind her, leaning against the portière in which his hands were clenched, Carew stood as if turned to stone, staring, staring—not at the slender girlish form he had hoped and yet dreaded to see, but at the tall, sinuously graceful figure of the woman who had been his wife. His wife—that brazen thing of shame, half naked in a dress whose audacity revolted him! Fool, fool to have thought his own mad longing possible! To have thought that she——

He wrenched his thoughts from her. And the other? Why had he not guessed, why had nothing warned him when he sat listening in the little winter garden to the angry protests of Patrice Lemaire and the caustic comments of the Austrian who "was also of Vienna"? And yet, how could he have known, how imagine that she could ever come into his life again? And why had she come? Between them was an unbridgeable gulf—and the memory of a tiny, fragile child abandoned with callous indifference. A rush of cold rage filled him and with blazing eyes he swept across the room.

His soft booted feet made no sound on the thick rugs and still unconscious of his presence the woman broke off her song with a yawn and a flippant remark addressed to the portrait, and turned to find him at her elbow.

For what seemed an eternity they stared at each other, her eyes but little below the level of his; then she turned away with an odd little strangled sound that might have been either a sob or a laugh.

"Why are you here?"

His deep voice was hard as steel and she raised her head slowly and looked at him, a look in which there was latent admiration, wonder and an underlying suggestion of cunning curiously blended.

"I saw you at the ball. They told me you were going back to the desert. I had to come," she faltered.

"Why?" His face was devoid of all expression as he flung the single word at her.

With a lithe, almost feline movement of her graceful body that was undisguisedly alluring, she swayed nearer, her eyes all languorous appeal, her hands outstretched towards him.

"I came because I could not stay away," she whispered, her voice a subtle caress, "because—because—oh, Gervas, can't you understand? I had to come—because—I—love you, because I have always loved you—in spite of what I did. And I didn't know what I was doing—I didn't think, I didn't realize; he swept me off my feet. And then when it was too late—too late"—her arms were round his neck, her palpitating limbs pressed close to his—"can you guess what I suffered, can you guess what my life has been? Gervas, you loved me once; for the sake of that love forgive me now, forgive——"

Throughout her amazing declaration he had stood like a rock, his face averted. But as her voice died away in a trembling whisper he turned his head quickly, too quickly for the comfort of the woman who clung to him with passionate fervidness, for in the eyes that drooped almost instantly under his searching gaze he read not the love and contrition her words implied but a look of hard, eager cupidity. The look of a gambler who watches a last and desperate throw.

Though his heart was dead to her, almost he had pitied her, almost he had believed her. She had played her part with a skill and eloquence that, but for that last fatal slip, had almost convinced him. But self-convicted she stood for what she was, a consummate mistress of deceit—a liar as she had always been. To how many others had she made that same glib appeal? To how many others had she tendered the charms she so lavishly displayed? The hateful thought leaped unbidden to his mind as he looked at her with a kind of horror, fastidiously conscious of the deterioration that was so apparent in her. With a shudder he unclasped her fingers and put her from him.

"I could have forgiven you—anything," he said slowly, "but the child"—his voice broke despite him and a look of bitter pain convulsed his face—"the child you left to die alone—and you knew he was dying——"

"It's a lie!" she cried shrilly. "I didn't know."

He raised his hand with a gesture that silenced her.

"It is the truth," he said with accusing sternness. "Do you think there was nobody to tell me? The doctor, the nurses, everybody but you, his mother, knew that he couldn't live. And you left him. My God, you left him!"

She flung him a glance of furious anger. "You always cared for him more than me," she sneered, and for a moment she braved him audaciously with heaving bosom and quivering lips. Then she flinched under his steady eyes and shrinking from him flung herself face downwards on a sofa and broke into a storm of tears.

Heartsick and shaken by the scene he had gone through, he crossed to a window and stood staring unseeingly out into the night, striving to solve the problem of the woman who lay

"Oh, Gervas," Marny cried, "have pity! Take me away! If I see him again I shall go mad!"

sobbing on the sofa behind him. What did she want that she had come to him like any common courtesan, seeking by purely physical enticement to regain the old ascendancy she had had over him? There seemed only one possible solution. And yet, remembering the liberal settlement he had made on her, he wondered how even that was possible. With a deep sigh he at last pulled himself together and went slowly back to her.

"Why did you come to me tonight, Olive?"

At the sound of his voice she sat up, shivering as though the room were cold.

"I told you," she said sullenly.

He made a gesture of impatience.

Maddened with the thought of her suffering, Carew wielded the heavy whip, still "Don't tell me any lies!" he said wearily. "You never cared for me, you don't care for me now. Tell me the truth. For only the truth will help either of us tonight. Why did you come?"

For a second her eyes met his; then she looked away. "Because I'm at the end of my tether—because I'm broke," she said with a reckless laugh that made him wince.

"And the money I settled on you?" he said slowly, hating the necessity that forced him to speak of it.

"Gone—long since. Did you think that I could live on that?" she flashed contemptuously.

With an effort he restrained himself. What use to point out to her that what she regarded as a pittance would have kept an ordinary family in luxury?

wet with her blood, till Geradine's moans grew fainter and finally died away.

"Then what you want is money—just money?" he said, his voice as contemptuous as her own.

"I must live," she retorted.

"And how have you lived?" he said heavily.

The color rose to her face. "What is that to you?" she muttered.

"Nothing—in one sense. If I am to finance you again—everything," he said curtly. "But I must have details. Without them I will do nothing." He paused for a minute, fighting his abhorrence of the whole situation. "You call yourself the Countess Sach. It is not the name of the man for whom you left me. Is he dead?"

"I don't know—I left him," she answered, very low.

"Why?"

—one of the most tantalizing feminine complexes in your entire course of study. Yes, indeed.

BEVERLY BINGHAM allowed Horace Amboy Smith to kiss her. That was kiss number two in her life.

No, Beverly was not a babe in arms as you suspect. She was twenty-one or twenty-two and aging rapidly, judging from the rate of speed at which she lived.

She did everything—rode, drove, cooked, flew, smoked, swam, danced, rolled 'em, swore occasionally, took a cocktail when needed, flirted, golfed, tennised, skated, sailed—oh everything! It just happened that she had mid-Victrolan ideas about being kissed by a man. You know how it is. Everybody has his limits; a stock-broker stops at second story work, a pick-pocket hesitates at murder and even an I.W.W. probably has some boundary which he will not go beyond unless especially irritated.

Switch back to Beverly Bingham's second kiss—number one was administered, awkwardly, back in high school days by a lad who was just learning osculation himself. Considering how long she had deferred the stimulus Beverly found the caress rather uninspiring. Was that all there was to it? Why did Horace appear to want to do it again? Well, they were engaged; she supposed she'd have to let him. Perhaps her appetite would increase with practice.

Finally she stopped him. A conversational interlude seemed to be in order.

"Now tell me," she suggested, "about the women you have loved before."

"I never have," Horace replied.

Beverly looked at him suspiciously. Did he think that was a funny line? No. Horace meant it.

"Don't be afraid, Horace," she encouraged. "I was not asking in order to lay up evidence against you. I was merely seeking entertainment and perhaps instruction. Speak right out whether it's the truth or not. What are the interesting facts in your life that are concealed from the public but which the partner of your joys and income taxes ought to know in order not to be surprised no matter who comes to call? Recount your adventures."

Horace looked at her half doubtfully. "Nothing ever happened to me," he confessed. "I volunteered for service during the war but all I did was drill cavalry in Texas. It was not very exciting."

Beverly agreed that he was probably right. She felt sure, though, that he was concealing something from her, but she was a patient person and could wait. Win his confidence first and get him started once; then, doubtless, he would be a fund of incident and a reservoir of anecdote. For the present Beverly herself could supply the conversational stimulant that elevates a "petting party" from a mere sexercise of the emotions into the realm of adult intellectual entertainment.

Because things had always happened to Beverly. Her life had been so crowded with incident, adventure and even melodrama that she was as full of plots as Scheherazade. She had been a stormy petrel in the midst of whirling world litter from the time she was born in Yung Ching during the beginning of the Boxer uprising in China, through the San Francisco earthquake at six years of age, through two shipwrecks, a hotel fire in New York, a race riot in Alabama, a hold-up in Wyoming and many other minor complications, including the time she was kidnaped, drugged, married and rescued before she regained consciousness when she was spending the winter in Paris. (If she was kissed that time she did not know it so it doesn't count.)

None of it showed on her face. Beverly Bingham was a placid blonde who looked sixteen physically and really much more unsophisticated than that if you compared her face with that of the average high school siren of the "jazzplus" period. There was only one thing that was wicked about Beverly's entire physiognomy—that was the look out of the corner of her eye when she was making up a few facts to entertain you; then the contradictory expression on her face made you realize that you had met up with one of the most tantalizing feminine complexes in your entire course of study. Yes, indeed. And no matter if you were the owner of several of the higher postgraduate degrees.

She was quite small, too, with thin legs that helped to carry out the illusion of youth. That mature swelling at the calf never appeared on Beverly's shin. In fact she was rather boyishly built from neck to ankle—brassières and corsets had never cost her a cent. Her skin wasn't masculine, though. Not so you could notice it. Soft cream colored rose leaves it was that never tanned or freckled or did anything that ladies have to put mud on themselves to remedy.

If the description seems to fit Mary Pickford it isn't intentional. Besides, Mary is older than Beverly even if she doesn't look it. No, this story is about a girl unknown to fame—as yet—and from the way things look now she al ways will be.

She hadn't really intended to get married at all but Horace Amboy Smith had appeared so overwhelmingly desirable to the other feminine inhabitants of the city of Charlotteville, Pennsylhampshire, that Beverly had given him an inspection to find out what gave him his kick and in the process thereof had become overpowered by the sheer masculine force of the man and had succumbed to his proposal. There was a lot of him, six feet plus, and all of it sound and good looking; he danced like a feather out of a goose's bosom; and he was making more money than his father had and in the same business. Life was cinched so far as Horace was concerned. Beverly was the ultimate jewel on his escutcheon.

Before giving up hope of drawing him out Beverly pricked him with one more question. "Who, Horace dear," she asked, "is your worst enemy? Tell me so I can help you to put an occasional tack in his garage."

Horace thought. "I don't believe I have any real enemies."

"But surely," Beverly insisted politely, "somewhere in all this world there must be someone—somewhere—who hates your—er—your digestive tract—and who won't be entirely happy until the violets are blossoming vigorously on your own personal cemetery lot."

Horace shuddered. "To think that anyone hated me like that would make life a hell."

"On the contrary I should think it would make life distinctly interesting." Beverly appraised nim carefully as she said it. She was glad he was shocked. At least that was something. You couldn't plan on living all your life with a man who didn't react to anything you did or said no matter how bizarre.

II

They embraced a few more times and parted until that evening. Beverly had a number of things to attend to and Horace Amboy was not loathe to have a chance to tell somebody of the good fortune which had befallen him.

One of the first to hear about it was Hubbard Kirk, the unpopular dramatic critic of the Charlotteville Times and occasional contributor to the standard fiction magazines. For some reason or other Horace and Hubbard were friends—probably because they were so different.

Hubbard received the news sourly. "Am I supposed to up and kiss you to show my glee?" he demanded when Horace suggested that a little enthusiasm would be appreciated.

"Well, don't you think I'm a lucky fellow, Squash?"

"Don't call me Squash. I don't mind much but it shows such lack of imagination on your part. If I must be nicknamed let it be 'Hub' or 'Bard' or something fairly dignified. Who is this girl?"

"Her name is Beverly Bingham. Do you know her?"

"No, but the alliterative monniker is vaguely familiar. I suppose I've seen it in the society section of the news sheet. But you know what a rotten memory I've got for names. It's all I can do to recall yours and I see you nearly every day. What's she like?"

"Like an angel."

"I can visualize her perfectly then. Tall, commanding, cold, white feathers, sport model portable gold harp and—am I wrong? I see clouds of disapproval gathering upon your manly brow."

"This is no joke."

"I should say not—not if you have gone as far as an engagement. But perhaps we can get you out of it even yet. I suppose that is your real reason for coming to me. Now, I'm busy all day today but about tomorrow I'll agree to devote thirty minutes to thinking up a way for you to retract, in a gentlemanly manner, of course, some of the passionate statements to which you have doubtless committed yourself. Just at present my editorial boss wants me to cover an amateur matinée given by the Ladies' Something or Other to raise money to put flowers on the soldiers' graves on Decoration Day. Sweet assignment—what? You can come along if you like."

"No thanks, I've got to go around to the office and tear off a little work."

"Business as usual," Hubbard Kirk murmured after the retreating back of his friend. "Praise to thee, Allah, that it isn't me—no, isn't I—shucks, Allah, let it go at 'me'—it sounds better between friends. Well, I wish him luck. And you, too, Miss Whatever-your-name-is. I've forgotten."

Hubbard Kirk raised an imaginary beaker of wine on high and quaffed it at a single draft in honor of the happy couple, afterwards wiping his mustache—also imaginary—with great gusto.

"What vintage is that stuff, Bill?" he asked of the white-coated heavy-set wraith who had served him. "'Ninety-six, eh? Send two barrels of it over to the house this afternoon."

III

The matinée was well attended. The lady press committee which had thought up the stupendous idea of inducing the managing editor of the Times to send his real, honest-to-goodness critic to cover the effort thought very highly of itself and greeted Hubbard Kirk rather effusively, and triumphantly escorted him to a box where they sat with him.

Hubbard Kirk never chose a box when he had anything to say about the selection of location himself. He never took anyone to the theater with him and never conversed with his neighbors.

By the time he had listened to the committee for an entire act he was all tied up inside into tight knots of nerves that were all set to let go and break something.

It was certainly a great idea on the part of the chairman of the committee to insist that he address the audience between the acts.

Hubbard Kirk had to do it because he was so conspicuously seated that his attempts to evade the honor attracted giggling attention.

"Ladies and—er—ladies," he said from the stage after looking vainly for another man in the audience, "I never say what is expected of me. Anyone who does might as well bow and be seated without taking up time with articulation.

"Therefore, instead of comparing this performance favorably with the work of Sothern and Marlowe, which would involve a more violent lie than I am accustomed to employing in my business, I will take up the time while the carpenters are repairing the damage done by the actors during the first skirmish by talking on a subject about which we all know nothing and can therefore discuss on even terms."

For the first time that afternoon all the ladies gave their undivided attention to the stage. Their interest had been diverted from their own affairs at last. It looked as if somebody were going to get hurt and they wanted to see the victims carried out.

"My text is taken from the program of this performance. Your program speaks of 'The Unforgotten Dead.' I say 'Let's forget 'em!'"

First blood—a gasp of shocked dissension.

Kirk smiled. Trampling on sentiment was one of his favorite diversions.

"Now tell me," Beverly suggested, "about the women you have loved before." "I never have," said Horace.

"Forget 'em!" he repeated. "They have forgotten you and moved on, we hope, to better things. We have a better thing to do ourselves than to shed expensive remembrance on the graves of dead soldiers. What is that better thing, you ask? Of course I had the answer ready before I suggested the question. It is 'Forget the dead, but for Heaven's sake remember the living.'"

Kirk cast a practiced eye over the theater, filled from pit to dome with fluttering femininity. "I don't know what you paid to come in here because I was admitted on a pass but even if it was only a dollar apiece it amounts all told to a couple of thousand dollars which you have spent for entertainment which does not entertain, to which most of you have not even paid attention.

"Get in," invited Beverly, "and I'll drive you wherever you're going. That is, if you're not afraid."

And the money will be spent on flowers for soldiers who would have scorned them, living, and who don't give a damn about them now that they're dead. And meanwhile two thousand live soldiers out at the Soldiers' Home on the outskirts of our city are starving. Not for food—they get enough of that—but they don't get any of the real essentials of life. You know what I mean by essentials of life—a few of them are entertainment, the companionship of women and the exhilaration which was technically eliminated by Mr. Volstead, all grouped succinctly by the poet under the heading 'Wine, Woman and Song.'

"You, the two thousand of you, could have conveniently forgotten the boys up there in the cemetery—they would never have known the difference—and have chosen the five hundred most attractive of your number, armed them with your own or your husbands' pocket flasks, two thousand dollars' worth of phonographs, orchestras, good cigars, cigarettes, candy, cake and ice cream, and sent them out there on a vamping party. I don't know what the result would be but I'll venture to prophesy that it would be worth mentioning in the papers.

"During the recent alleged war a good many of you sacrificed everything for our soldiers. It has been estimated that the women who fell outnumbered the men two to one. Our men were not so interesting then as they are now. Then they were callow youths fresh from the farm and factory. Now they are citizens of the world, they have traveled, have had adventures. And it would take less to make them supremely and unexpectedly happy than it did when you so freely offered your maidenly charms upon the——"

"Treason!"

Hubbard Kirk stumbled over the interruption and tried to see the lady who had thrown the verbal bomb. He even took off his glasses in order to get rid of the glare from the house lights, but he could not locate her.

"I wondered how long it would be before I would be stopped by the voice of convention."

"My name isn't convention, mister," came the same voice protestingly. "Nor is it Legion, American or Foreign. I just wanted to stop you before you ran out of things to say."

"Do you think that crisis was imminent?"

"Yes. I'm afraid that you've passed it. The high point in your speech was where you said you didn't know what you were talking about. I don't believe I have ever seen you out at the Soldiers' Home."

"Do you go there yourself?"

"Yes, sir—once every week—sometimes oftener if it rains."

"You mean if it doesn't rain, don't you?"

"No, I mean if it does rain. You've no idea how difficult it is to be an old soldier on rainy days."

A titter of amusement increasing to a gale of laughter interrupted whatever remark Kirk may have had nearly ready as a reply. At first he thought it was a belated appreciation of something he had said, but a slight twitching at his trouser leg caused him to look down and perceive a black cat clawing at his shin.

"Just a moment, ladies—another of your number has something to say."

He reached down and picked up the animal. Around its neck was a red ribbon tied on a card.

Kirk read it, first to himself and then out loud.

"Dear Sir: We've only rented the theater until six o'clock. Will you be any longer than that? Signed, 'The Actors.'"

Kirk considered a moment. "Cat," he said finally, "go back to the self-deceived egotists who sent you and tell them that I can take a hint. The stage is theirs. Ladies of the audience, including the Bolshevik, I thank you."

The applause which Kirk heard as he went out may have been caused by the raising of the curtain on the second act of the comedy. He never knew because he managed to find the stage door and make his escape to the street. If his luck was good and no one saw him who had authority to bring him back under arrest he was never going to know how that particular play came out.

IV

"I SAW your friend, Mr. Kirk at the benefit matinée this afternoon," Beverly told her fiancé that evening.

"Is that so? Squash isn't much to look at but he's a good scout at heart."

"He impressed me as being one of the super-people."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Well, super-people are most everything that the rest of us are not. They don't care what people think, they say out loud what they think themselves and in general get into a disturbance even if they have to create it out of nothing. Columbus was one, so was Alexander—all men who found the known world a little too small or too crowded and started out to fix it. There haven't been many women in that class. Catherine de Medici, perhaps, was one. A super-person is one who hates ruts and would rather have one good interesting enemy than a dozen friends."

"Who introduced Squash to you?"

"No one. I haven't met him yet."

"You must meet him."

"Oh, I expect to!"

"Good. I'll bring him around."

"Never mind. I'll run into him some rainy day."

V

THAT did not tally in the least with Hubbard Kirk's own expectations. He had no idea of visiting the Soldiers' Home at any time, much less during a rainstorm.

It just happened that the very next time there was a misty drizzle he had very little to do in the office and he ran out of cigarettes and his pipe needed cleaning and there was no book or magazine that he particularly wanted to look over.

Therefore his subconscious mind sorted over the shelves and began handing down interesting items for inspection.

"How about that woman who baited you at the benefit matinée the other day?" suggested the subconscious mind, which had thought about her a good deal in an irritated way ever since she had first scratched him.

"Oh, her!" Kirk acknowledged scornfully. "She's probably some smart Alec matron about forty-two, both as to age and chest measure, who minds everybody's business but her own."

"She seemed clever," reminded the s. m.

"So do lots of 'em, but they aren't."

"Hadn't you better find out? She might be young and attractive and everything."

"No such luck."

"Why not find out?"

"How, I ask you?"

"Humph! You know as well as I do. She goes to the Soldiers' Home on rainy days."

"Well?"

"It's raining today."

Kirk finally lost the argument and took a taxi out to the Home. He spent the entire afternoon there making the old soldiers grouchier than they would have been ordinarily.

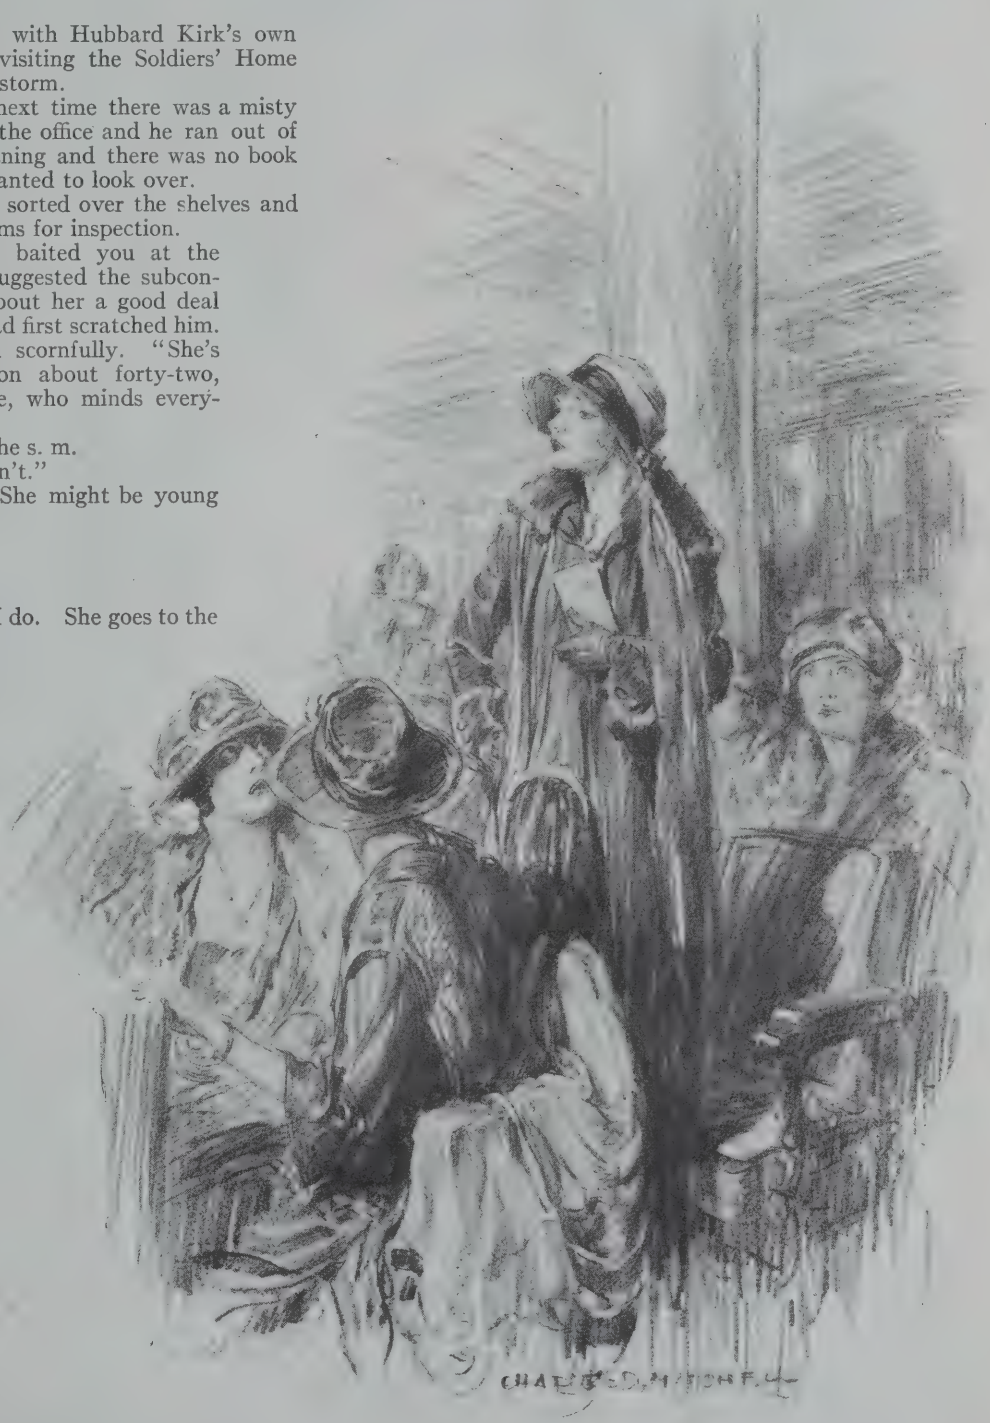
Because he was the only visitor. Another one did drive by the door as he was getting out of his taxi, but upon observing him she steered her roadster right on past with a grin and went home.

There would be other rainy days.

VI

KIRK swore he would never, never go out to the Soldiers' Home again. That woman had deceived him, had told him an out-and-out flagrant falsehood.

But the next time it rained he grew restless. She did have a pleasant voice even if she was impudent. Perhaps she had been sick the first rainy day—or there had been a death in the family or something. He found a hundred excuses for the absence of his irritator. He couldn't help wondering if she were out there now.



He wondered about it for an hour.

Then he went to see.

The veterans were pretty peevish. Aside from the fact that rain increased the voltage of each and every case of rheumatism in the institution and awakened reminiscent twinges in long-healed wounds there were two new, novel and original causes for complaint.

One of these was the fact that the government was issuing O. D. clothing instead of the traditional blue.

"I never reckoned Uncle Sam would want to make me look like a dodgasted nincompoop!" raged Elihu Fibblebender, the oldest relic of the Civil War group and consequently something of an autocrat. He held out a pair of sand-hued trousers at arm's length. They had just come into his unenthusiastic possession. "I fought the Rebs in blue and by God I want to be buried in my fighting clothes! Khaki may have been all right in the skirmishin' that was done in Europe but for the kind of fightin' we fit in the Wilderness you can't beat Union blue. A man was proud to die in that color."

"The high point in your speech," said the girl in the audience, "was where you said you didn't know what you were talking about."

The only reason there wasn't an argument then and there was because there were no Great War veterans present to overhear the statements belittling their campaigns by comparison with the battles of 'sixty-one. There were only a few of Pershing's men in the home anyway and they were all gathered in the south wing, which had received a new group of inmates just that morning.

That new group was the second irritation under the saddle blankets of the old-timers. They were all men who had been so badly burned by German mustard gas that their lungs were not much good any more and never would be. They had been discharged from the hospitals, not as cured, but as incurable. They had a certain short span of their lives yet to live and they had to be fed, clothed and sheltered until—well, until.

General Grant's followers felt that the government was confused about the nature of their institution, that it had violated what was almost a contract by sending men there who were essentially hospital cases. There was much growling and smothered indignation among the older boarders.

Elihu Fibblebender in a one-sided conversation with Hubbard Kirk divided his anathemas between the khaki pants and the interlopers. "After we've slaved most of our lives to make this home what it is, a retreat for gentlemen, now comes an order to wear these damned mud colored overalls; and not content with that, they saddle us with a passel of sick boys that will probably get all the best of everything there is from now on."

"What nice new trousers!" exclaimed a voice, approaching and pretending not to have heard the irritation in the veteran's tirade.

"They ain't blue," Elihu pointed out glumly.

"No, but the Army of the United States doesn't wear blue any more. You're still a part of the Army, aren't you? On the reserve list, of course, but if they needed you you'd still be able to fight, wouldn't you, Captain Fibblebender?"

The old soldier tried not to swallow this but it was no use. He liked it and ate it. He wasn't a captain, never had been anything but a corporal, and his fighting days had been over for forty years. But the music of a feminine voice raised in admiration of himself charmed him reluctantly from his grouch.

"Yes, I'll fight and—I'll show some of these younger fellows a lot about soldiering."

"I thought so. So did Uncle Sam. That's why you're being issued the O. D. service uniforms. So that you'll be ready when the time comes."

The aged veteran regarded the trousers with mixed emotions. He was too old to reason things out very clearly. Besides, the argument had been put by a very pretty young girl, a cherubic blonde of about high school age who was as vivid on that rainy day as a shaft of sunshine in a prison. It was hard for him to resist.

"Well, mebbe I'll wear the pants but I'll keep on my old blue coat. I can change that quick enough after the bugle sounds assembly and I'd feel better in it. That way I'll save my blue pants for Sundays and funerals. I like to look nice for funerals because we always aim to have a kind of military service, you know, a field gun carriage and a flag and reversed rifles and a volley with 'Taps.' Do you think it will be all right to wear the blue pants then, Miss Bingham?"

"I do for a fact. If there's any question about it I'll take the matter up with the commandant." That seemed to settle that. "Aren't you going to introduce your friend, Mr. Kirk?"

"He ain't no friend of mine," averred Mr. Fibblebender with a reversion to his best rainy day manner, "and this is the first I heard his name was Kirk. Is it, young man?"

"Yes," admitted Hubbard, "but I don't know how the young lady knew it."

"You made a speech on the stage at a matinée last week."

"Were you in the audience?"

"Don't you recognize me? I stood up while I was arguing with you."

"Oh, are you that one?"

"Why, yes. Are you fearfully disappointed?"

"What? Why should I be disappointed?"

"Well, after coming out here twice to see what I was like it must be kind of an anti-climax to find out I'm only me."

She had hit so near the truth, especially in her statement that this was his second trip, that Kirk became confused. For once in his lifetime which covered thirty years or so he lost his poise, became a conventional masculine creature with extra and exceedingly useless hands and feet.

The girl herself was not hampered in the least by embarrassment or lack of conversation. She went right on. "I try not to be disappointing but I can't get away from the fact that I am rather small for my age and that my face doesn't look as if I knew as much even as I really do. You'll admit, won't you, Mr. Kirk, that I'm all wrong?"

"Well, I did expect a brunette."

"A tall, starved looking one?"

"Yes, slightly sallow but interesting in an acid sort of way." Kirk was reviving. His steam pressure was going up.

But Elihu Fibblebender was not particularly amused. He had long since ceased trying to follow the conversation and had retired to try on the offending trousers.

"But," continued the precocious child, "you did actually come out to see what I was like?"

Kirk hesitated. "Yes," he admitted reluctantly.

"Good—I admire a man who doesn't lie when he sees it won't be any use. And you don't know who I am?"

"No." Mystified.

"Well, as I know all about you, the great problem of getting acquainted is greatly simplified. All we have to do is talk about me, which after all is one of my favorite diversions."

"Begin."

"I'm twenty-two and I'd dress that way only I look more foolish than in this robe d'une vierge. I've been through many prep schools and one university, actually getting a degree from the latter. I read your dramatic criticisms and disagree with them violently. I read your magazine fiction and it—it——"

"It makes you sick?"

"Well, I wasn't going to say that but your stories aren't like you."

"I put the happy endings on because the editors require them. The public, they say, demands that romance shall always eventuate in wedding bells, church aisles, lost wedding rings, rice and grinning Pullman porters. My personal opinion is that a broken heart is one of the very best companions for one's declining years, infinitely preferable to an ideal which has become a physical disappointment."

"Have you ever had a broken heart?"

"No."

"I wondered if you spoke from experience."

Talking, they had gone from the main section of the building to the south wing where the new arrivals were located.

As they entered someone shouted "Tenshun!" and in automatic response the conversation instantly ceased and the men froze into rigid position.

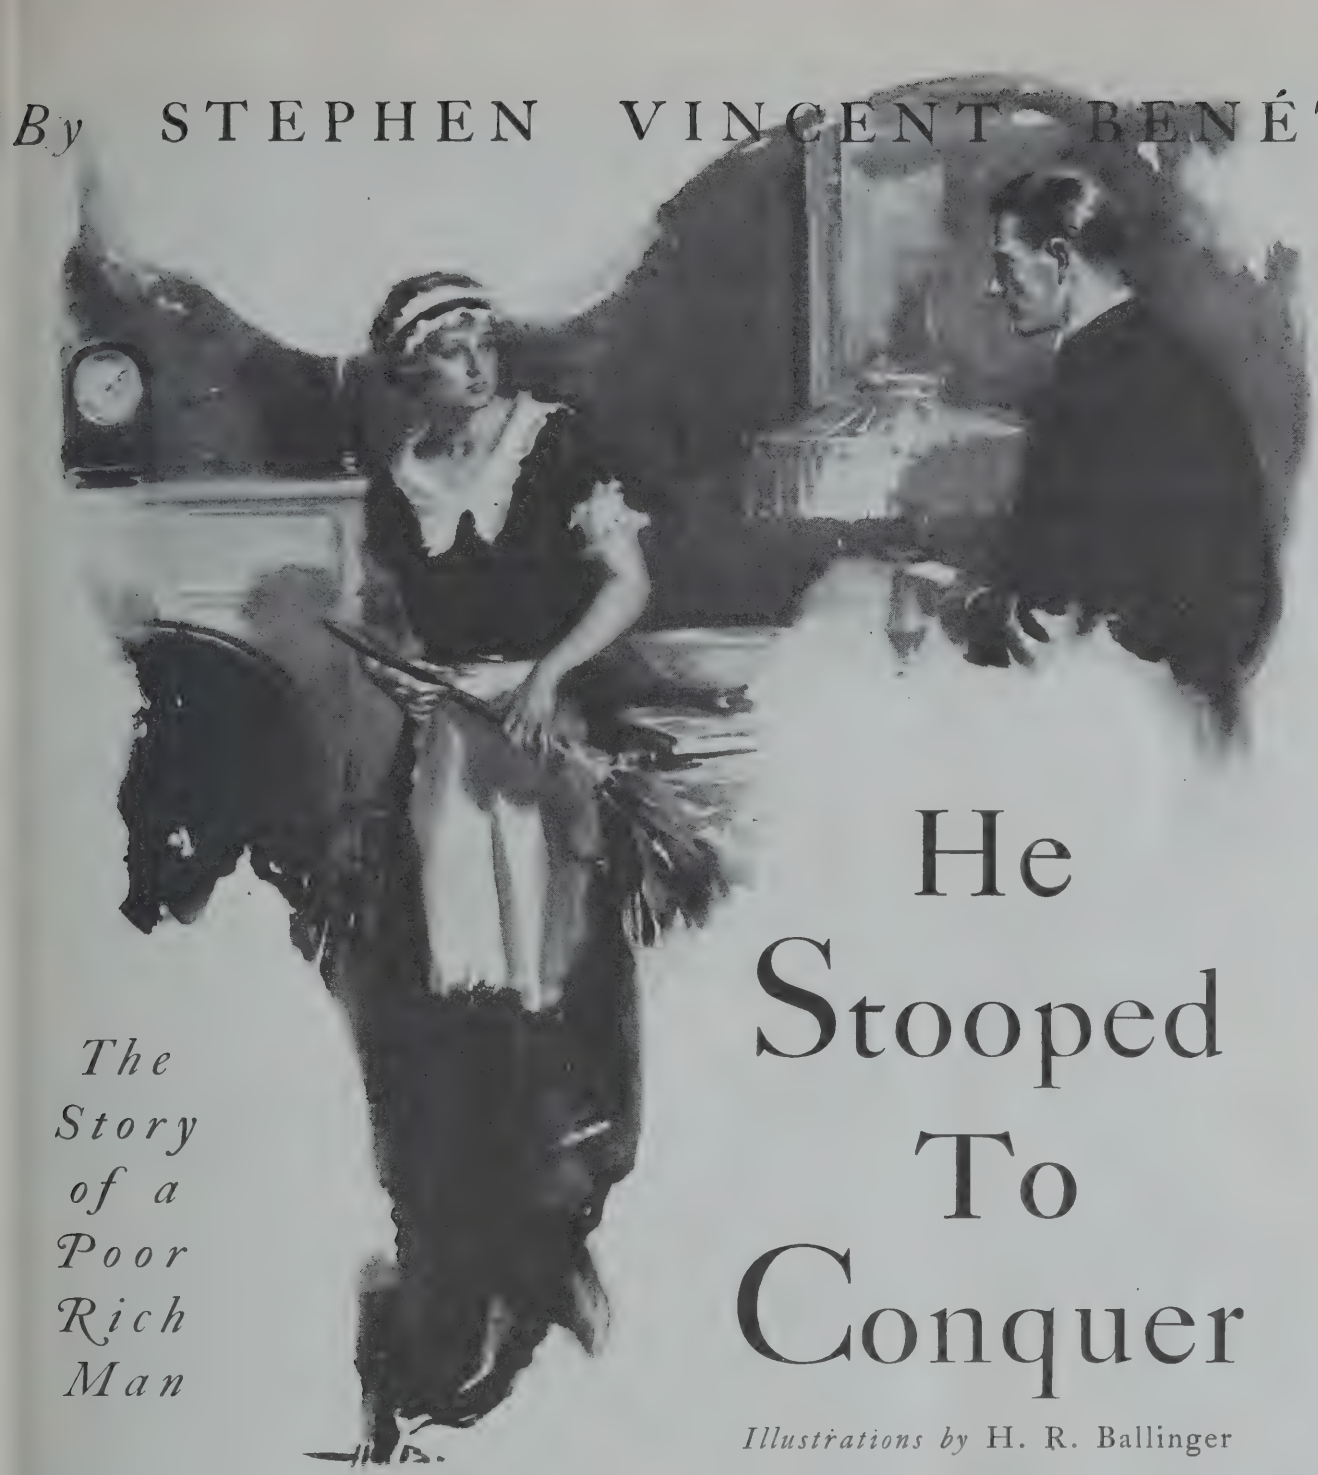
Also automatically, Hubbard Kirk said "Rest! As you were!" and then laughed. "Excuse me, men, I forgot. It's four years since I've had the right to say that."

The men laughed, too. Beverly regarded her companion curiously. No one had told her that he had been an officer. He didn't act like a soldier. His mind wasn't that kind either. He would have been a better conscientious objector.

Beverly had a way of making friends with a group of men like the one in that bare room that did away with formalities at express train speed. Kirk hung back and watched her work. Her secret seemed to be that she neither pretended to be another man nor did she assume any airs of superiority. She did not require deference but got it anyway and made her entire appeal on the basis of femininity. She flirted outrageously with everyone she spoke to and several others besides at the same time. And yet her size and generally innocent appearance robbed her tactics of any hint of boldness. No one knew quite how to take her. That in itself was a considerable factor in the interest she aroused.

"Anybody here got any requests to make?" she asked in an official manner. "Do you want anything foolish that isn't included in the regular unimaginative government line of supplies and amusements? I'll be your good fairy. If I can't grant your wishes at least I can listen to 'em."

Her proposition had a paralyzing effect on the vocal organs of most of her audience.



"Speak up, fellow voyagers," she urged. "If your desires are so violent that you can't express yourselves in the presence of a woman I will leave and you may speak freely to my secretary pro tem, Mr. Hubbard Kirk. Name your wish."

"I'll tell you what I wish," began one long, lanky soldier, mostly bones and a deep voice but topped off with rather pleasant eyes and mouth.

"Good."

"I'd like to be treated just once as if I was getting ready to live instead of preparing to die. We fellows know we've got to go and go pretty soon, but so have a lot of other people who aren't in Homes for one thing or another. (Continued on page 122)

He Stooped To Conquer

The Story of a Poor Rich Man

"TOOT!" said the horn again a little impatiently. "Too-oot." Mrs. Jabez came in from the kitchen at a running waddle. A floury forefinger sought and found the proper electric button, pressed it. Then she bounced to the door and stood there, beaming, dusting her hands on her apron. The big iron gates outside the gatekeeper's lodge swung slowly apart, letting in a sudden shaft of light from the headlights of the waiting car. Then the motor picked up again and, even as Mrs. Jabez ducked an elephantine curtsey, was slurring its way up the drive to the lights of the big house.

Not before the boy in the car had had time to smile and wave, however, in gay if somewhat hurried greeting. A hand raised, looking stiff as a wooden man's hand in the sudden moment of glare before darkness wiped out the road again, a smiling mouth in a face that seemed singularly, coldly mature for its youthfulness. No words, or if there had been any they were lost in the noise of the car.

"Well—that's that!" said Mrs. Jabez conclusively, shutting the door behind her. Her niece, new-come from the country, nodded wide-eyed.

"Honest?" She spoke with a slow pure accent that made her occasional faults in grammar seem personal eccentricities. "Why, he looks just like anybody else, Aunt Sally! Acts so, too. Why, Aunt Sally—the way he waved—I'd have thought he said something, too—just seeing him——"

"Oh, he's polite! Real polite." Mrs. Jabez's formidable visage smoothed a little as she closed the gates again. "Always makes as if he was speaking to me when he goes past and I speak to him, too, generally—makes it easier for him, I think——" What conversation might occur was evidently between equals by her tone.

"All the same," she resumed, turning back toward the kitchen, "all this—houses and gardens and ottymobiles and you and me and all that money—millions and millions, the paper said when his pa died—and there's the New York houses, too, and his yacht and his private car and his box at the opyra—all of it going to him and him a dummy—well——" She paused reflectively. "Gives me the creeps sometimes—the cold creeps in my back," she confessed. "Not this way—just passing the time. But sometimes he'll stop and ask questions—oh! very nice, and how is Jabez's poor back and does Martha like her teacher, as polite as can be and taking in everything I say just as easy as anybody else with that funny grin of his and having to write out everything he says on his little pad like as if he was one of them nosy reporters—it ain't right!" She grew broadly ungrammatical under the stress of emotion. "It ain't right no way at all," she repeated firmly. "No way at all! As you'll see!"

"But Aunt Sally"—with a poor attempt to hide hungry curiosity under apparent carelessness—"was he born that way? I mean, hasn't he ever talked at all? Not once?"

Mrs. Jabez nodded her head portentously.

"All as bright a youngster as ever was and all over the place till his pa sent him to college, thinking himself so clever. Talk? He could talk the ears straight out of your head! But there he went to athletics and that was the trouble. He caught cold in his chest and would go leading those cheers in spite of it. And then"—she sank her voice to a whisper, raised it triumphantly—"para*ly*sis!" she boomed. "Complete paralysis of the vocal cords. In-cur-able."

"I'd have cheered 'em!" she added with a sudden vindictiveness surprising in one so wholly plump.

"But didn't they have doctors?" said Charity Jabez timidly.

"Doctors!" said Mrs. Jabez, with abolishing scorn.

An accusatory smell drifted in from the direction of the kitchen—a smell of burning.

"Lord," cried Mrs. Jabez desolately, "them cakes!"

She made for the disaster at a flat-footed run, her tongue still busy.

"Burnt to a crisp, I'm bound! Oh, Charity Jabez! And after I'd told Mrs. Wift that you was so neat and careful and never gossiped and losing three currant pies along of your gabble!"

The rest was lost in a flurry of violent action. But when she had gingerly withdrawn the crisping pies from the oven, she turned her flushed face in Charity's direction, sharply. That tidy and helpful young person she had so proudly recommended to Mrs. Wift, the housekeeper, as the kind of girl they used to have before all these cluttery servants' agencies put bounce into the heads of all sorts of trash, was not helping her at all. Instead she was standing at the window like a poor stupid, gazing fixedly out at the road the car had taken a little while before.

"Charity!" said Mrs. Jabez thunderously.

The girl turned with a start as if her aunt's voice had wakened her from sleep. Her eyes looked sort of foolish, too, Mrs. Jabez thought; sort of stary and foolish.

"All the same he is nice looking if he is a dummy," she said, as if she were speaking to herself.

Mrs. Jabez shut the oven door with a clank.

"Now, Charity Jabez!" she began exasperatedly.

II

The Fetherholme gardens were really at their best, this first week in June—everybody said so, for everybody was there.

Everybody served tea and drank it from thin beautiful cups on the cool wide porch, twittering and laughing, dressed in light pleasant gowns whose colors were the colors of flower dust, of pastel dust. Everybody walked strongly, virilely, along the gravel paths, between the borders, decorously cutawayed, wearing sad colored ties but formally flirtatious behind green hedges. A dozen puffs of smoke rose into the air at once from everybody's cigarettes. Everybody's name would be in the papers tomorrow, guests at the Fetherholme garden party, Miss, Mrs. and Mr. Everybody, in order of importance, to everybody's usual wounded surprise at thus finding himself in print, to everybody's secret, gentle pleasure at thus being once more and very publicly recognized as the only everybody who was really somebody. But Rodney Fether, the Rodney Fether of next morning's paper, looking down from his own window at his own garden party in his own garden, for the moment had got away successfully from everybody.

He looked at his watch again. Five minutes since he had slid away. He would give himself five more minutes—five whole minutes of release from exceeding strain. That would be all. Must be. The Roman sort of crucifixion had been kindlier—it didn't require politeness from the victim of the public reception.

At that, though, what was the use of getting away from everybody? You couldn't get away from yourself—you dragged yourself around with you, a ventriloquist's doll that you had lost the trick of making talk out loud, even squeakily, that you could only waggle in people's faces like a waxwork. A waxwork that grinned and wrote on a pad whenever anybody spoke to it. Oh well, no use of going on like that! He looked out of the window again and smiled.

He had not been missed—that was one lucky thing anyway.

It was easier to be a host when you were dumb, in some ways. You didn't have to talk the same drivel over and over, like a phonograph gone wrong, to a processional line of imbeciles. You just smiled and bowed. Or sometimes you wrote on your pad. Not much, though—social small talk seemed more than usually idiotic, written down.

No, he would not be missed again, anywhere, that was almost certain. He had noticed, as he always noticed with excruciating clarity on the three or four occasions a year on which he threw Fetherholme open, the individual behavior of every guest in turn. Old friends were much the worst—the women especially. They thought they had to talk to you just as they used to, looking at your mouth as they talked as if they expected you to take an American flag, three eggs and a lady's garter from it, conjuring. Enunciating very dis-tinct-ly—they always did—their eyes always sliding away, hoping for somebody else to come along and release them——

And then, pity. Their terrible pity. You could feel them pitying you with every pore in their skins. And then after five remarks, or sometimes six, they started looking ashamed, as if they had been caught staring at something crippled. Then they went away.

He discovered that he had struck the window in front with the flat of his hand till the palm tingled all over. That was very silly, very. But sometimes things got a little hard to take.

Somehow it would help a little if people wouldn't raise their voices at you as if you were deaf as well as dumb. Natural, he supposed, like shouting at a foreigner. But hateful, pricklingly hateful. You heard things you weren't meant to, too. "Poor old Rodney!" carelessly regretful, from that fool Tom Williams. "He's certainly crocked for keeps!" Poor Rodney. Oh, damn poor Rodney! Better be dumb than a perfumed tame cat like Tom. Better be——

No, that wasn't true. His teeth clenched. Better be anything, anything, anything, than dumb. Better be poor and sick and old and blind than young and rich with a body that would last forty years yet if you took care of it, and everything else, the thing that made all life, buried alive in that body forever like prisoners bricked up in a fortress wall. Better be dead than a silent walking monster that never could talk love to a woman or of women with a man, that could never even say "Hello!" to a friend.

Friends. And love. And love.

There had never been anything acknowledged between himself and Janet. But if he hadn't caught cold—well, he very well knew. She knew too; she must have. That was why she saw so little of him these days. Must be. Very much wiser.

He looked at his watch again, then out of the window. They hadn't missed him—but still, he ought to get back.

Turning away, he glanced at the opposite window, the closed one. Before his accident he had never been able to appreciate the whim of his father's that placed his house and built his own jutting study so close to the nearest railroad tracks on the study side that the passing trains seemed almost under the window. Now he saw something in the old man's idea after all. The electric trains in their smooth mechanical swiftness, in the subdued but furious energy of their passage, stirred his mind like running horses. They were not human, or pitying, or pryingly curious; there was something cold and rapid and monstrous about them that made him calm. They could kill, but never in anger; they were personified singleness of purpose and wholly apart from any mortal emotion. That satisfied him—that was the only way to live—mechanical and swift and unconcerned as they. One passed at the moment—he watched it shrink out of sight with odd satisfaction. Then, "Oh!" said a voice behind him, with a little gasp.

He turned, his mouth opening involuntarily for speech before he could think. A gust of irritation blew over him—how pitifully futile to be that way, even now at any new face you saw, even a housemaid's! He reached for his pad—the new girl, Mrs. Jabez' niece—frightened pink, too, probably—never saw him before, and servants' gossip must decorate him with horns and a tail. Anyhow, frightened or not, she had no business in here; he'd given strict orders. Pad and pencil in his hand, he looked up at her again, the irritation plain on his face.

"I beg your pardon, sir."

Well, at any rate she didn't raise her voice to him like most people. Not a bad voice, either—neither nasal nor quacky though New Englandish enough in its preciseness.

"I didn't see you. I was going to tidy."

He scribbled on his pad.

"This room is never to be tidied. Mrs. Wift should have told you."

He thrust the pad almost under her nose for inspection. There. Now that he was close to her she'd look either pitying or scared, one of the two. And next morning Mrs. Wift would have to look out for another underhousemaid. What a nuisance!

"I'm sorry, sir. I was not told and so had no means of knowing."

She was looking at him quite steadily and there was neither pity nor fright in her eyes. Instead she was wholly composed—and wholly curious. Not cruelly, not coldly, but with the inhumanly perfect curiosity of a child seeing something unusual for the first time. There was mirth, too, in her eyes—she couldn't quite hide it all. He ached all over of a sudden, unbearably, as some wounds ache in rainy weather.

Rodney's hands reached at Charity again—and fell. Only their eyes fought, brutal and silent.

"Why are you laughing? At me?" he scrawled incoherently.

"No, sir."

"At what?"

A smile—irrepressible.

"Because the room was never to be tidied."

"What's your name?"

"Charity Jabez—sir."

"Where do you come from?"

"Litchville Corners, Vermont."

"Do you like being here instead?"

"Yes, sir."

"Why?"

"The work is easy. And I like—seeing new things."

The pencil hesitated, wrote finally:

"You like it better than home?"

"It's livelier. And I like being lively."

Rodney smiled. Then he was surprised to find himself smiling. Why was he? He remembered the garden party—the familiar blackness of spirit came back. Still, he hesitated—it might be amusing to question her further. Then his eyes, going past her, fell on an ironic relic of college—the tall megaphone with the staring white initial that had been his as a cheer leader. After his illness he had brought it back and hung it up on his wall, with some suitable cynic perversion of precisely the same sort of sentiment that leads prolific mothers to deck the wall of the parlor with a life-size crayon enlargement of Angel Willie (deceased, aged eighteen months). It served now, as often as a jog to a sensitive elbow.

"You may go," he wrote on his pad with careless haste.

The girl did not say "'k you, sir," as Mrs. Wift would have done—she went directly with a slight inclination of her capped head that was neither familiar nor subservient. When she had gone, Rodney stood smoothing his hair for a moment, puzzledly.

Nice hands, nice feet, small, slenderish. An astonishingly pretty mouth, some humor, a pleasant voice, clear eyes as gray as Connecticut sky in winter. A pretty girl—not too much the goddess type, yet to suggest State Capitol frescoes—and Heaven, how young! And she hadn't been afraid—or pitying—or anything but sheerly curious——

Hard lines came around the mouth that would never be able to put these thoughts or any others into speech. "I like to be lively." Light love might be very amusing for a summer when one of the protagonists was dumb.

III

"THANK you, Charity. You read very well indeed." But the writing on the pad was neither neat nor as fluent as usual. The story had been to blame, perhaps. He had picked out a volume of fables and opened it for her at random—"to find out if you will be able to read aloud to me a little in the afternoons." But he hadn't stopped her when the first fable ended, so she had gone on to the next. And the next was the one about Crœsus, King of Lydia, who had all the riches of the earth and one dumb son.

He didn't care for most voices. Not now, at least. Envy, probably. And he'd always hated people who slew amusing talk by saying firmly, "There's just one little thing here that I'd like to read you——" Her voice was different. It was a precise little brook of sound, flowing as evenly as water over grass. Limpid water, clear, without color. It healed his mind.

"Do you wish me to continue reading, sir?"

"No thank you, Charity."

She stood up. How straight she was and, defiantly, in the face of all slang, how fresh! No use of getting an attack of free verse emotion over a housemaid. But she was—he searched a vocabulary enforcedly enriched beyond those of his ancient fellows by the last three years—so uniquely New England. Like——

"I'm sorry I didn't read any better." No "sir," nothing but plain declarative statement. New England again.

"You read very well. I should like you to read to me tomorrow—the same time. Please tell Mrs. Wift."

"Very well, sir"—with steady, unobsequious eyes.

She turned to go. He tapped on the desk with his pencil.

"Yes?"

"Getting along all right?" in large, casual looking characters.

"Oh yes, sir! It is greatly pleasant—the work here, I mean. They have all been so kind—especially Mrs. Wift and Mr. Hawkins."

For a moment glow was in her eyes and softness like the first warm, lazy puff of wind that brings New England back her uncertain April, no less beloved because never overpraised.

"That's good. I want"—he hesitated; servants sounded theatric—"people to be contented," he ended, rather lamely.

"Oh, I am contented! And learning much." She was gone.

He couldn't help smiling. Priscilla Alden in a sort of twentieth century pocket-Versailles. What did she think of it all?

Then something jogged his mind like the touch of a finger. There was something familiar in the way she walked, familiar and yet odd. What was it? He mimicked her with two fingers along his desk. Step—step—and then suddenly grinned with laughter. She was walking like any of the other housemaids now, when she remembered, that was all. When she came at first she had stepped with a straight long Indian stride. Moreover, there were her stockings—chiffon silk. Being dumb made you notice little things. Priscilla was not only learning much, but fast.

IV

SHE had other and more vocal instructors than Rodney Fether, too. Witness a scene in the stately Fether garage, closed territory—supposedly—for housemaids, where second chauffeur George Hawkins is putting the finishing touches on a "manicure" of one of the cars.

Charity drifts in from somewhere with a fine apparent soap bubble ignorance of direction which hides completely her recently discovered certainty that Mrs. Wift is taking forty winks at the moment and the other superior servants indulging in a quiet little game of auction in the laundry. Second chauffeur George Hawkins—whose unremarkable though pleasantly youthful, typically American features caused a sentimental auntie to sob hysterically "They all look so clean and strong—our great hearted boys!" when George marched by in the Victory Parade—perceives her presence, apparently through the muscles of his back, for his back is turned. But he knows she is there and she knows he knows it and so along the progression to infinity.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Hawkins." Demure enough.

"Good afternoon, Miss Jabez." Ceremonious, this. How servants do copy our etiquette!

"I suppose that I am really not allowed here—Mrs. Wift said not. I suppose you will tell me to go away very soon." With the exercise of that priceless gift possessed by many very healthy young women—the gift of making themselves look frail at will.

"Why, Miss Jabez—well, I should say not—I mean, I should certainly suppose—well, not while I'm here, anyhow—say, is there anything you particularly wanta see? I'll——"

This running incoherency is the politeness of George, whose cool composure, in general, passes that of taxi drivers. But whenever Charity is near he feels funny, somehow. The nearer she is the funnier he feels. This problem in ratios may sometime lead to complications, for George is good at mathematics.

Charity waits cruelly until his speech has died into silence. Then she comes nearer the car, waves a tentative hand exploringly. She is really so interested, for the moment, that she forgets to look frail.

"I should like to know what that is for!" she says, with a jab of her finger at the speedometer.

In the next half-hour it is George who is educated, more than Charity. He discovers to his horror that she doesn't like the color of the upholstery, that nothing he can say about ignition will ever make up for that color——

He discovers that Charity's neck is white and straight and her hands white and slim, and that her fingers when they touch his accidentally have the power of making air brighter and blood more sparkling and thoughts light-footed——

Poor George! He begins to dilate upon the advantages of home life for a man, of marrying young, of moving West. Dry farming, California climate, the influence of woman as inspiration to great deeds, get mixed in his speech.

Charity has drifted away again somewhere. George is left to a lengthy, muttering argument with an oil can.

"I'll tell the world she's there!" is the burden of the argument. "I'll tell the world any goof could make good with a girl like that to work for! I'll tell the world——"

Charity drifts back to the big house, wondering.

V

BUT the reading went on in that third story study with the two tall windows that looked upon railway cut and garden respectively. Went on—and stretched like elastic till they took up most of the long summer afternoons. And Charity's education in ways that were not New England's went on also—and the stream of odd thoughts in Rodney Fether's mind.

She was more communicative now—he always tried to make her talk at the end of each reading. Shyly at first, in polite, quaint monosyllables, then more at length, showing always the instant, delicate reactions of a mind that seclusion had made as sensitive as a photographic plate to the contacts of a life luxurious beyond its furthest previous concepts. Accepting that life and its modernity with eager high spirits. Yet with queer fits of doubting, too—a Pilgrim's doubting of a land too pleasant to be anything but a rose-covered pitfall out of Bunyan—when Charity, for days, would revert to the original country Charity—hide her new clothes away under a reproving pile of winter underwear and refuse to laugh (Continued on page 164)

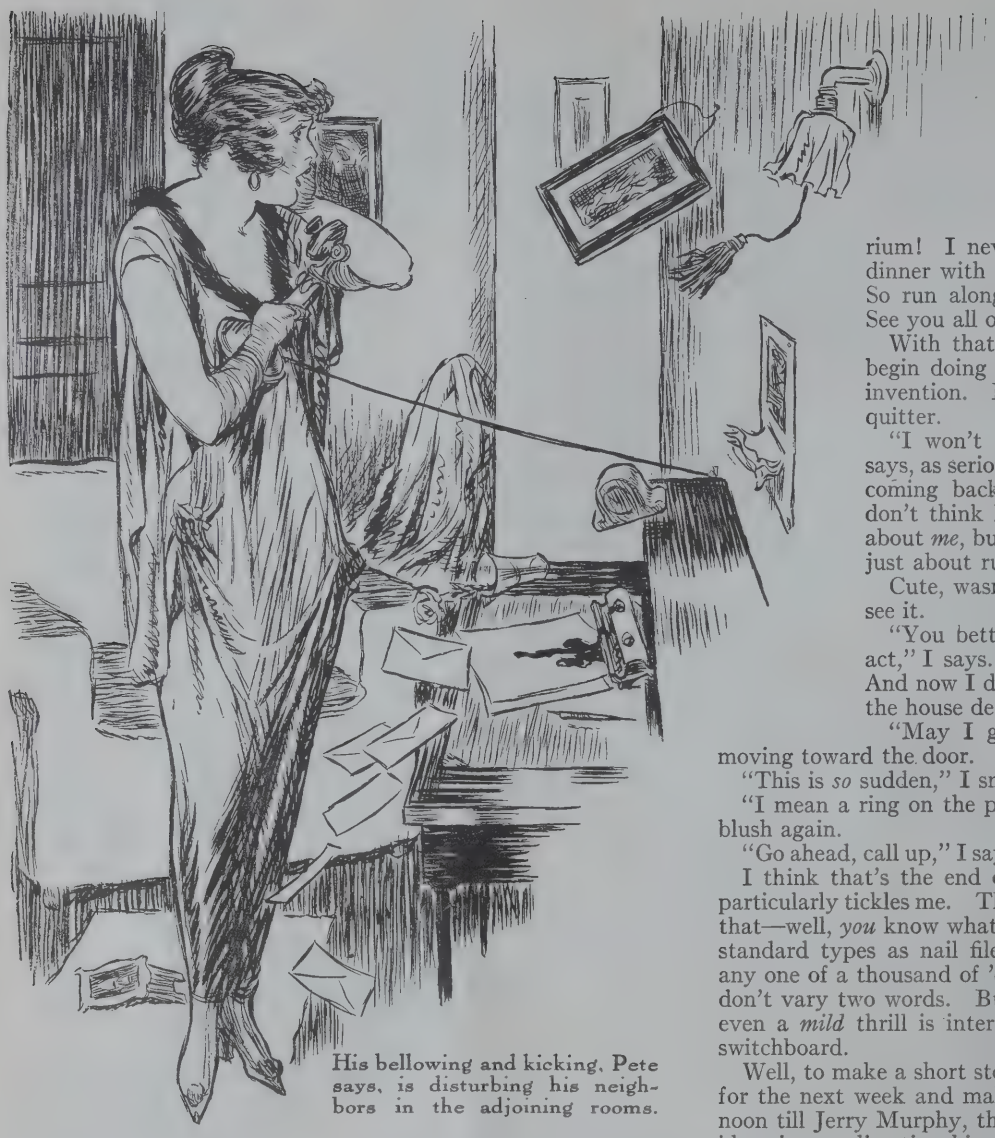
Julius Sees Her

Illustrations by J. W. McGurk

Tryin' to get rid of these "mashers" is like tryin' to get rid of double pneumonia.



YOU know really I feel like Eve must of felt when she opens her eyes in the Garden of Eden—I don't know where to begin. Julius De Haven, my boy friend, claims it was fate which changed him from a gentleman of the chorus to the star part in a Broadway show. Julius is a former graduate of Harvard's college so he ought to know what everything's all about, but I can't give him nothing on that explanation. It wasn't fate which put him across, it was Gladys Murgatroyd, viz, me. That's not my real name, but it's a good one, isn't it? I thought so, too, when I composed it. There's a whole lot more stuff to it than there is to Mary Johnson, the name I am made a present of on my first birthday. Picture stars, actors, prize fighters, authors and people who write books has nom de plumes, so why shouldn't a telephone operator have a nom de switchboard if she wants one?

Gladys Murgatroyd is the name I cook up for myself when I think I'm going to be another Gloria Swanson and goal 'em in the movies. That was after I win first, second and third prize in a beauty contest at my home town, Bountiful, Utah. As far as beauty contests is concerned, why, I figure I'd finish no worse than second in New York, if having the skin you love to touch and that school-girl complexion means anything. Anyways, being elected the best looker in Bountiful gets me a ticket to Los Angeles, but I fail to set the lake ablaze in the picture business. The best I can do for myself is $5 a day as one of the supers in the super-productions and that soon gets more monotonous than monotonous itself. Being one of Solomon's wives today and a dashing young waitress tomorrow gets me kind of dizzy and Hollywood Boulevard is Bunk Avenue to me.

Well, I always was crazy to go to New York, having heard the town so well spoken of by one and all, so as soon as I saved the fare—a mere year—I check out of the movies and set sail for Broadway. I would like to say that I immediately land in a musical comedy and I could say it for that matter but it's a hobby of mine to tell the truth on the slightest provocation. What actually happens is that I get a portfolio as telephone operator at the Hotel St. Moe and I been carrying on smartly and clicking off my hundred a month there for nearly two years. While I'm not one of the city's show places I'm getting attention and I bet I could step into the front row of the Follies without causing a laugh.

I guess you know that the telephone switchboard of a big hotel draws more Johns in a fiscal year than a park, a bathing beach, a stage door and a department store combined. These dumbbells has nerve enough to attempt selling celluloid collars in Hades and tryin' to get rid of 'em is like tryin' to get rid of double pneumonia. I been invited to take a ride in every make of auto we both ever heard tell of and I get more lunch invitations daily than the Prince of Wales got when he visited our noble country.

All this thrills me like a drink of water would thrill a drowning man. I'm fed up on what the newspapers leniently calls "mashers," no fooling! Traveling and stationary salesmen, college boys, actors, ball players, bootleggers, lawyers, judges, doctors and what not, ranging in ages from eighteen to eighty, hangs around the board all day trying to do themselves some good and as the result us girls takes cruel and unusual punishment in habit-forming quantities during the course of the day's labors. Some of these beady-eyed, leering clowns stands there and looks at you till you feel you're sitting there in your bathing suit and you'd like to murder 'em! They never get nowhere with me or with any girl which has a ounce of sense, because they hold these auto rides and lunches at too high a rate of exchange. Another thing, I'm still young enough to have dreams in the daytime and my idea has always been that some afternoon a duplicate of Valentino would come along with probably a million and a wild desire to make me his bride.

Well, one evening I am gaily handing out wrong numbers, "don't answer" and "busy" signals, when a swell looking, snappy dressed young fellow of about twenty-five springs bounds up to the board and asks for Whitehall 1483. When I get them, he says he would like to speak to Miss Fish.

"Be yourself, Harold!" I says, giving him a glance which would freeze two Eskimos, "Whitehall 1483 is the Aquarium. You want to speak to Miss Fish, eh? How do you get that way?"

Honest, his kid face grows as red as a throwing tomato and his Alice-blue eyes takes on the hurt look of a baby's when you refuse it a lollypop.

"Why—why—I beg your pardon," he stammers. "I didn't mean to be silly. I guess I've been kidded myself. You see, I met a young lady last night and she gave me that as her name and phone number." You can see from his face that he's telling the truth and I don't know why I feel sorry for him or sore that he should of met any young lady at all!

"Well, she gave you a pushing around," I says pleasantly. "Hereafter when you go out without your guardian don't pick up with every stranger that offers you candy—hundreds of children gets kidnaped that way in New York every day."

He grins and pulls a blush on a complexion that I could do no more than tie myself.

"I don't blame you for laughing at me," he says. "But I would like to speak to that young lady because——"

"Well, give me a good description of her," I butt in, "and I'll try and guess her phone number for you."

This time he laughs outright. Some giggle he's got, too—makes you warm right up to him whether you want to or not, if you know what I mean.

"Listen," he says, bending over real confidential, "I don't suppose you ever go out to dinner, do you?"

I only hear this about sixty times a day, so I get ready to put on the ice. You have to, no matter how nice they seem. The risk is too heavy. Believe me, I know!

"Listen yourself!" I says. "You may be a fast worker, but mere speed will get you nothing here. I am no Miss Fish from the Aquarium! I never under no circumstances go out to dinner with male kiddies which I have just met. So run along back to school, I'm fearful busy. See you all of a sudden!"

With that I turn back to the switchboard and begin doing my stuff with Mr. Bell's clever little invention. But the handsome city chap is no quitter.

"I won't bother you now if you're busy," he says, as serious as the Johnstown Flood. "But I'm coming back again with that dinner invitation, don't think I won't. I don't know how you feel about me, but I don't mind telling you that you've just about ruined my piece of mind!"

Cute, wasn't he? But of course I can't let him see it.

"You better get somebody to write you a new act," I says. "That stuff used to make Eve yawn. And now I don't wish to be rude, but—here comes the house detective."

"May I give you a ring tomorrow?" he asks, moving toward the door.

"This is so sudden," I smile. "And I don't even know you!"

"I mean a ring on the phone," he says, featuring that killing blush again.

"Go ahead, call up," I says. "I like a laugh as well as anyone."

I think that's the end of him and I can't say that thought particularly tickles me. There's something about this boy that—that—well, you know what I mean. Most of these boobs are as standard types as nail files. Close your eyes and it could be any one of a thousand of 'em trying to kid you—their approach don't vary two words. But this one gives me a mild thrill and even a mild thrill is interesting on a job as dreary as a hotel switchboard.

Well, to make a short story long, he phones me every morning for the next week and makes personal appearances every afternoon till Jerry Murphy, the house detective, who has some wild ideas in my direction himself, has him pegged for a pickpocket and would of collared him on his third appearance if I hadn't interfered. I won't get near as many flowers when I'm dead and gone as I do the following week from the mysterious stranger and candy flowed like water. He also gives me a book of near poetry called "The Ruby Yacht of Omar Kyam" which I think is a lot of apple sauce, but I tell him it's elegant as from the binding it must of cost plenty pennies.

Invitations to shows, auto rides, lunches, dinners, cabarets, ball games and requests to go to about everything else but murder trials is fairly showered on me by this dizzy youth and from the program he offered I could of gone out with him every day for the next ten years and never visited the same place twice. Still, I continue to plead a headache, as I am commencing to like this young daredevil and stalling is one way to keep their interest at fever heat. Then he makes all his other moves look reasonable in comparison by moving right into the Hotel St. Moe! Ain't we got fun?

With a room in the inn where I am one of the features of the telephone switchboard he is hard to laugh off, and finally one day I give up the one-sided battle and go to dinner with him. That's the start of the big romance and likewise the beginning of the young man's rise to fame and fortune. Funny, isn't it, how women can make fools out of men and men out of fools? I wouldn't exactly call this boy a fool, but he is a bit aggravating. He's got lots of stuff, but lacks the nerve to market his wares till I show him how!

After a week of bounding around with him I begin to feel lost without him. He was different and no mistake! His name in even figures is Julius De Haven and I learn about Cupid from him. When we're on a dance floor we look more like Maurice & Hughes than they do themselves. He sure shakes a relentless hoof and I'm not exactly at sea in a ballroom, either. Honest, he's brighter than Jackie Coogan and calling him a prince is a boost for royalty! Just a nice, clean boy, and as cute as he can be, no fooling. Another thing, he don't once call me "girlie" or "little girl" and that alone helps make him solid with me!

Well, naturally in talking over this and that the subject of what Julius does for his coffee and cakes is bound to come up sooner or later. It comes up sooner and Julius breaks down and confesses to being an actor. Now up to then I'd been actor-proof, but somehow the thought of Julius being one kind of interests me strangely. With that handsome face of his, those thrilling eyes, that soothing voice, wavy hair and moving picture manner, why, I think the least he can be is a leading man. Probably another Jack Barrymore. So when he asks me to come and see his show, "The Girl from Betelgeuse," it's almost more than I can do to wait.

But it's a couple of more weeks before I can arrange my hours at the Hotel St. Moe switchboard to get off and catch Julius De Haven's frolic, which by the way is one of the biggest musical comedy wows on Main Street, having entertained Broadway for better than a year. However, the big night finally arrives and I simply grab some Java and a club sandwich and rush home from the hotel, spending two hours in dolling up so's when my musical comedy star meets me after his labors that night he won't be ashamed of his girl friend. I haven't got a wardrobe like Princess Mary, but what little I have got is bonded stuff and when I'm set for the drama that night I figure I could go anywhere with Julius and not be no handicap to him, even if his friends was all from Wall Street.

The seat Julius stakes me to is so close to the stage that had it been a few inches farther towards the footlights I would of been given a horn or something like the rest of the orchestra. I'm so excited I don't know if I'm in New York or New Zealand and no wonder—I'm about to see my hero do his stuff! I flutter open that program like it was "The Sheik" and I'm reading it for the first time—I want to see Julius's name there and what he does and everything. But lo and behold, as the Peruvians says, there is not the slightest mention of Julius in the "Cast of Characters!" I think there must be some serious mistake and I go over that program till I could stand up and repeat it backwards at the drop of a hat.

Finally something catches my feverish eye that nearly sends me rolling off my seat out into the aisle in a faint! It was this in the back of the program: "Gentlemen Of The Chorus: Julius De Haven, Georgie——" But what difference does the names of the rest of them male chorus girls make? My Julius a chorus man! If that isn't the shark's elbow! You could of knocked me over with an aigrette and I must of made a couple of remarks to myself a little too loud, because out of the corner of my eyes I see the customers on each side of me gazing at me in alarm. But the curtain goes up just then and prevents me from being an opposition show myself.

I just sit there and cover my burning face with my hands. I don't wish to see that show or anything else and least of all do I crave to see Julius De Haven. Honest, I'm fit to be tied and I could of got a summons for what I am thinking about my boy friend right then! I have tossed away my heart to a thirty dollar a week chorus man, can you imagine that? And since I been on this job I've turned down whole coveys of millionaires—at least they said they was.

Well, you know they say curiosity is a girl and I guess that's a fact, because in a few minutes I simply got to look up and see what Julius is doing, although to me it's going to be like watching your grandfather hung or something, honest it is! So I peep through my fingers and my Gawd there he is prancing around with a lot of other young men which will never strike Dempsey and they're singing some rough longshoreman's chantey all about "Sweet June has arrived with all her graces!" Now I ask you, isn't that a swell way for a great, big, husky man to cheat the almshouse? I just keep ducking my head so Julius won't see me, because if he'd ever of waved to me I know I'd of died of shame right there in that theater!

Well, first I am going to rush right out and go home, but then I think it will be better to wait for Julius so's I can tell him just what I think of him for trying to make me love him when he's got a job like that. I not only want to warn him away from my switchboard, I want to warn him away from my life. So I sit through "The Girl from Betelgeuse," but, believe me, I couldn't tell you what it was all about if it was against the law not to know. All I can see or hear or think about is Julius De Haven.

He meets me in the lobby after the show and when I see him in citizen's clothes again and gaze on his thrilling features I nearly weaken and maybe I might of weakened, only he hums a couple of notes from one of the songs he sings in the chorus and that makes me merciless.

"Well, sweetness," he says, with that ruinous smile of his, "how did you like the show?"

The idea that he's trying to brazen things out gets me red-headed.

"I should think you'd be too ashamed to even speak to me!" I says, and every word is packed in ice. "Listen—I'm going to leave you flat right here in this lobby and I never wish to see you again! If you follow me out of here I'll call a cop and if you ever come near my switchboard I'll have the house detective step on your neck. I'm through with you! If it gives you any satisfaction, I'll admit you fooled me up till tonight, but it's different now. I'm claiming exemption. Good by and good luck!"

He gets first red and then white and then versa vice. His big blue eyes look at me as hurt and surprised as if I had slapped him in the face. Honest, I must admit I get a pain in my heart as I watch him. I like this big kid, there's no use saying I don't, and it murders me to think he should turn out to be a false alarm after all the hopes I had for—for both of us. Why, I can't understand him being a chorus man! He don't look like one, or act like one, or anything, know what I mean?

"Good heavens, Gladys, what have I done?" he gasps finally.

"Not a thing," I says coldly. "You're just a total loss, that's all! What do you mean by trying to promote yourself with me when you're a chorus man? There's about three million girls in this town, why pick on me?"

He studies me for a minute without saying a word and then that hurt look slowly leaves his eyes—for which I am thankful, as it's commencing to hurt me too. When he speaks again, his face is hard as the side of Pike's Peak.

"I see," he says slowly. "All women are alike. No sportsmanship, no sense of fair play! I am condemned utterly without a chance to speak a word in my defence. But what interests me more is how a woman with your knowledge of life and the world can be so narrow as to think all chorus men, or let us say, a man temporarily in the chorus, can be degraded by the mere position, as you intimate."

"I don't wish to argue with you," I says. "I merely wish to leave you. Good night!"

With that I turned on my heel—and nearly turned on my ankle, as Julius grabs my arm in a very manly grasp. Afterwards it was black and blue.

"For God's sake, Gladys, don't send me away!" he says, in a voice which sends a thrill all through me. "You represent perhaps the only sincere emotion I ever had in my life and if you go whatever chance I have of getting anywhere will go with you. I will be a total loss, as you've just called me. With you, I can make good. Maybe that's a confession of weakness that a real man would scorn to make, but it's also a statement of fact. Give me a chance to explain things to you—even a murderer gets a trial. You—you once said you loved me!"

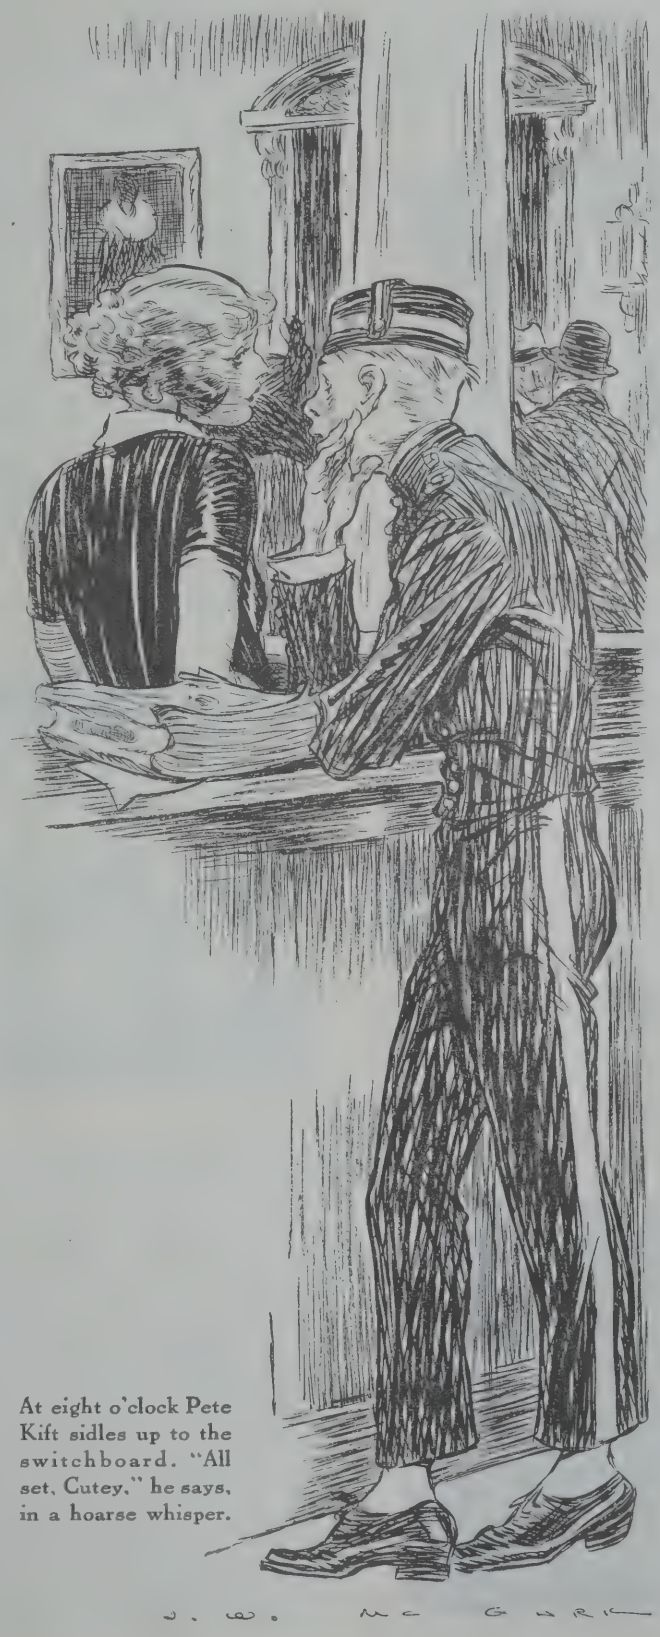
"And I once did," I says, looking away. "But those days are over, Julius."

"Good heavens!" he busts out. "Can you switch love off and on as you would an electric light?"

I look at him and I'm lost.

"Go on, do your stuff and I'll listen," I says. "But don't let that give you the idea that you're twisting me around your finger!"

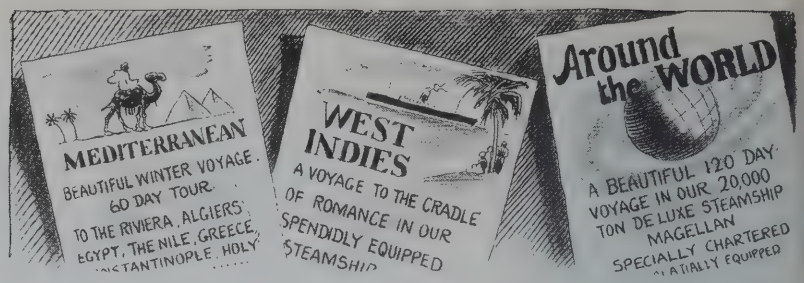
"The ideas I have about you, my dear, will never make you angry," he says, squeezing my arm. "Let's go some place where we can talk."



So we go to the Café Bordeaux where we can not only talk but eat, drink and be merry, as the saying is, and once we get a ringside table for the revue, Julius speaks his piece. It seems that after Julius gets sick and tired of Harvard he has his voice educated at home and abroad, being pointed by his parents for grand opera. He's also a bit fluent at acting. But breaking into grand opera is about as easy as breaking into the vaults of the mint, so while waiting for an opening in the Metropolitan, Julius decides he'll get a job as star in a musical comedy. He figures that once Broadway hears him sing all by himself, why, they'll just go crazy and roll off their seats and the noise will be heard by the opera directors and from then on $3,000 a night will be his minimum wage. However, eight months making the rounds along Broadway winds up Julius's bankroll and his parents' patience. The only way Julius can be starred is if he puts up the jack himself. That's asking the impossible, so he dives head first into the chorus of "The Girl from Betelgeuse," thinking his big chance will probably come sooner or later and he might as well be eating while waiting for it.

Well, they hear his voice while he's rehearsing with this frolic and they realize it's far from a jackal's wail, so they make him understudy to Charlemagne Rutledge, the leading man. This drives Julius wild with joy and why wouldn't it? Should any safes fall on the head of this big blah with the name like an apartment house and a collar, Julius will step into the leading part and knock Broadway silly. For one solid year he's been understudying Charlemagne and he's letter perfect in the part and musical numbers. Likewise, Julius is satisfied he's a better actor and a better tenor than Mister Leading Man. If he ever gets a chance to sink his teeth into this part just once—that's all he wants, just once—Julius swears he'll be the talk of New York. But Charlemagne Rutledge hasn't missed a single performance in the year the show has been on the Big Street, and as it closes in ten days, why, it looks like Julius is another one of these roses which is born to blush unseen. That's Julius—and I can take him or leave him.

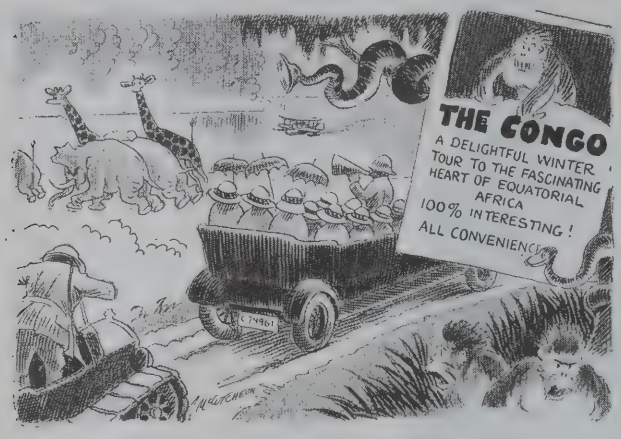
I take him!



We go back on a pre-war basis after that night and I find I just can't get that boy's plight out of my mind. I want to help him—in fact, I'm determined to help him—but the thing is, how? Then the next day out of the usual clear sky I get the big idea that puts Julius over and come near putting me in jail!

Among the various lobby hounds which hang around the switchboard always looking for the best of it is Hemingway Bryce, a five-minute egg which shares a suite on the tenth floor of the Hotel St. Moe with no less than Charlemagne Rutledge, my Julius's jinx. This Bryce is starring in "Coffee for Two" at the Rainier and he's just about pestered the life out of me trying to date me up ever since he parked himself at the hotel. I like him and arsenic the same way, and for all he knows the only English I speak is the adjective "No!" However, he's an actor and as this is a problem touching on the show business, I think maybe if I tell him about it, without using any names, he may make the one bright remark of his life and in that way I'll get the answer to the puzzle. So this day when he comes over to stall around I toss him a bright smile. That nearly knocks his hat off and the way he flounders over to (Continued on page 135)

At eight o'clock Pete Kift sidles up to the switchboard. "All set, Cutey," he says, in a hoarse whisper.



The Tourists

WHEN Mr. Gogo retired from business, at sixty-five, he made an important discovery. Leisure without occupation can be a terrible bore.

A man who has been an inveterate worker all his life can't suddenly quit working any more than an inveterate drinker or smoker can suddenly quit. He has to taper off or else replace his business activities with an interest of another kind.

It doesn't matter much what the new interest is—golf, stamp collecting, civic duties, remarriage, organized charity work or something; otherwise he has time to think of himself and it's surprising how many unsuspected symptoms develop after several days of self-contemplation.

Mr. Gogo realized that if he didn't find a new interest or hobby to keep his mind off himself he would soon be headed straight for the family lot in Graceland.

Already, a week after his retirement, he had begun dropping in at the office to see that everything was moving along all right. When he wasn't there he was at home developing into a one hundred percent nuisance.

"I must get a hobby," he announced to his wife, Mrs. Gogo the first, "or else I'll go crazy. Now, the question is, what shall I take up? Stamps, birds' eggs, butterflies, Whistler etchings, Japanese prints or what? I'm not interested in any of them."

"Well," said Mrs. Gogo, "how about travel? We've never seen anything but a fringe of our own country. I think with your efficiency you could travel very thoroughly."

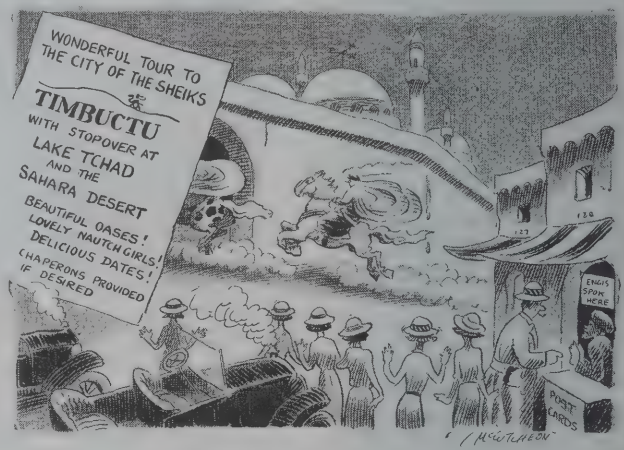
Mr. Gogo agreed that it was a good idea, even though not his own.

"I'd like very much to see the world," he mused, "or at least what is left of it. I want to see how the rest of civilization looks since it has been saved."

Ever since boyhood he had wanted to travel—to see the strange lands where tea, rubber, ivory, nuts and spices come from. Even a long life engaged in the intensive work of making money had not entirely extinguished the hardy hope that some day before he traveled hence he might do some traveling here. He was now in a position to gratify that hope. His bank account was one of the maximum kind.

While helping save civilization, he had managed to save considerable for himself. War is helpful, he reflected, slightly paraphrasing the late General Sherman.

"Yes, I'd like to travel," he repeated, the suggestion sinking in. "It's broadening and besides there's nothing to keep me home."



His first step was to secure a lot of prospectuses that tell you all about the beautiful places somewhere else, places that may be comfortably reached in the winter if you have the time and price, or rather, vice versa.

For their qualifying round, the Gogos selected a thirty day cruise in the West Indies. It sounded attractive. Deep blue skies, opalescent seas, trade winds crooning through the fronded palms, ancient strongholds reminiscent of the glamourous days of pirate and buccaneer Also "wet," although Mr. Gogo was not a drinking man. He could take it or leave it alone.

They did the cruise and returned laden with souvenirs and so changed that he didn't go near the office for nearly a week after he got back. He was a new man, even at sixty-five.

The effects of the regeneration first showed in the sumptuous home of the Gogos.

Various articles of domestic decoration—mid-Victorian hangovers from their early married life—were surprised to see some strangers appear amongst them. Certain heirlooms, long entrenched, found themselves eased up to the attic to make room for souvenirs and trophies of the Caribbean cruise.

A pleasant touch of the tropics was evident in the living room. Above the mantel appeared a beautiful swordfish—picked up in Martinique. Upon the dignified old grandfather's clock a porcupine fish, spiky and balloon-like in shape, imparted a slight maritime flavor. Over a picture of Gran'pa Gogo was draped a lovely Spanish mantilla, a souvenir of Havana.

This was only the beginning.

From now on the Gogos settled down in earnest to the business of seeing the world. In swift succession they did a North Cape cruise, a South American cruise, a motor trip along the battlefields, a comprehensive thirty-day jaunt to the wonder spots of North America and topped it off with a dizzy whirl around the world. All the time adding to their collection of trophies.

These were scattered about their house so that when visitors came it was natural to say, "Oh yes! that's a little thing we picked up in Benares." Or "That? Oh! that's just something I found in the bazaar at Biskra," thus leading the conversation easily around to their ruling passion.

Words and Pictures by John T. McCutcheon

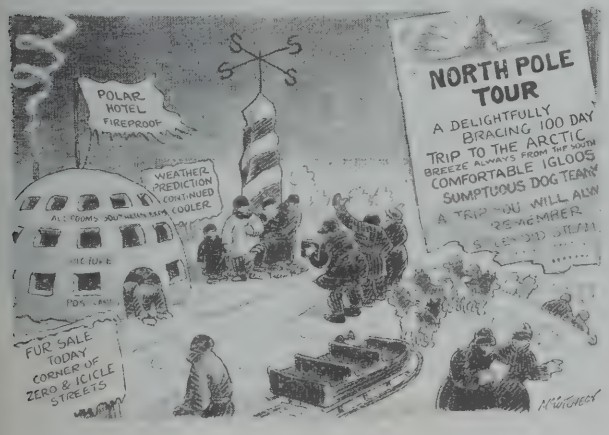
On rainy nights Mr. Gogo was accustomed to sit in his large easy chair—a rakish affair supported by Argentine steer horns, picked up in Buenos Aires, smoking his chibook—a trophy of the late Smyrna—and allow his eyes to travel approvingly from one object to another, each fragrant with memory of some phase of a bygone tour.

Here was the Egyptian mummy case, a reminder of the time the dragoman had short-changed him in Cairo; over there was the stuffed elephant's foot, a reminder of Singapore when their laundry failed to get back before the steamer sailed. And so on.

Their house became a scene of oriental and occidental elegance, a scrambled collection where a period piece of furniture shuddered beside a common piece of oriental junk.



Mr. Gogo would now go weeks at a time without showing up at the office. When he did appear everybody would tell him how young he was looking and then he would go away happy and not bother them any more for a long time.

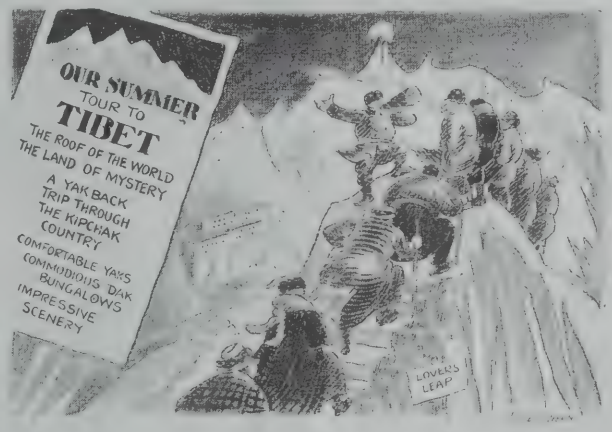
He had gotten so used to being out of range of a stock report that the market ceased to gladden or cloud his afternoons and evenings.

Alas, Mr. Gogo finally had done all the established cruises. Nothing remained to be seen in the comfortable, luxurious form of a special cruise.

His score of countries visited was over fifty, counting Monaco as one and the Philippines as two, being plural. As his score rose toward the hundred mark he thrilled with that keen elation felt by a fifty percent golfer who sees his score go under a hundred.

When Mrs. Gogo suggested, "Why not do the Mediterranean cruise again? You remember how much you loved it," Mr. Gogo would end the conversation with the crisp retort:

"I don't want to repeat. There are scores of wonderful countries we've never even seen or heard of. Let's do them before we talk of repeating."



"But we can't go to those countries," argued Mrs. Gogo. "There are no special cruises that reach those places and you know perfectly well you won't travel on steamers that have no bathrooms and modern plumbing."

Mr. Gogo's thoughts leaped forward to the day when the alert tourist agent, quick to sense and respond to the demands of a jaded public taste, would organize new cruises to lands hitherto untouched by picture post cards, camera supplies and travelers' checks. That day was bound to come. Airplanes, ships, motors, roads and railways have penetrated to the uttermost ends of the earth. There is little left for the explorer who even now is likely to find himself disturbed in the midst of his explorations by the joyous arrival of an eager eyed band of travelers de luxe with all modern conveniences.

Just as the cocktail used to follow the flag, when the constitution followed the flag, so the tourist is hot on the heels of the modern day explorer, only a lap or two behind.

Mr. Gogo's eyes closed in a pleasant doze. And suddenly beautiful visions began leaping up before him—wonderful travel prospectuses of fascinatingly remote cruises to lands whose names had hitherto been met with only in geographies.

"The Universal Steamship Company begs to announce its newest cruise, a winter tour to the Darkest Congo, with superb steamer and motor trips to the pygmy land and the mountains of the moon. Comfortable hotels and rest houses, picture post cards and camera supplies available at all points. Limited to 500 persons, prices for the ninety day cruise, $1295 and upwards."

Mr. Gogo stirred rapturously at the next announcement: "A delightful winter cruise to Madagascar, Mozambique and Mombasa, with a side trip from the last port into the big game country. Stopovers in Abyssinia and Somaliland."

And this one: "Visit Mecca and Medina, by special arrangement with the King of the Hedjaz. Tourists will be required to embrace the Mohammedan faith during the two weeks they are in the Kingdom of Hedjaz. Printed forms will facilitate the procedure, which is a mere technical requirement demanded by local customs and prejudices. Steamer artificially cooled during Red Sea trip. Motor roads in desert oiled and dustless."

Mr. Gogo wriggled ecstatically at a prospectus announcing a "tour to Timbuctu, the city of the Sheiks." That would be popular with the flappers!

But it remained for the Arcturus Steamship to cap the climax!

"Visit the North Pole. Comfortable steamer designed for icy seas, built on the principle of a thermos bottle. Commodious dog sledges. Enclosed electric heated passenger planes for water, ice and land. Photographs developed and laundry done. Four-month trip with two-day stay at the Polar Hotel. Southern exposure on all sides."

From this delightful dream he was awakened by his wife's voice.

"It's time to go to bed, Henry."

CYNTHIA STOCKLEY'S PON

Chapter XIX

IN THE dock next day Flavia looked, for all her male garments, what she was—a woman. The night of anguish had left its mark. Her face was the face of an exhausted traveler who has been on a long and fruitless journey through chill mists and dark valleys and has returned in vain. Her eyes were valiant still, but they were a woman's eyes heavy and shadowed—flowers that had been out in the rain. Only her bearing as she strode light of foot to her place was unchanged.

The court teemed with strangers. Journalists had arrived in shoals from both up country and down, and all sorts and types of men jostled each other in the limited space while some were obliged to be content with listening at the windows.

O'Byrne went over and whispered cheerfully to his client. She had uttered no reproach over night as to his delivery of her into the hands of Loochia, but he had not forgotten the bitter curl of her lips as she listened to his story of how the woman had deceived him with her pretended sympathy. He was thankful to be able now to relate that there were witnesses due who would retrieve the mistakes of yesterday. She had no time to question him further.

Everything about her was strange today, thought Druro.

The first witness, Mrs. Hope, with her sweet, lined face, soon put a spike through Loochia's insinuations and ripped them to ribbons.

"Did the dead man ever see or speak to the prisoner during the whole time she was in your hospital?"

"Never."

"Could he have done so without your knowledge?"

"No one can come to my hospital without my knowledge. The moment anyone stops at my gate I am instantly aware of it."

"A sort of dragon with seven heads and seventy eyes," Filgee murmured audibly, and gazed at her impertinently through his eyeglass.

"If I do not actually hear them come I am immediately informed by my servants," explained Mrs. Hope, looking at him with scorn.

"Did Lypiatt come to the hospital during the prisoner's stay there?" pursued O'Byrne.

"Yes. He came twice to inquire in a friendly way. On each occasion I saw him and told him how the patient was. He never asked to see her."

"So that to your full knowledge Lypiatt held no communication whatsoever with her between the day he brought her there and the day she left your hospital?"

"I am certain that he neither saw nor spoke to her during that period."

"And you are aware that Lypiatt had left for Bechuanaland during your patient's illness, did not return to Rhodesia until two days before the tragedy, when the prisoner as it happened was again staying with you?"

"That is so."

"Therefore the insinuations made by the witness, Mrs. Luff, yesterday to the effect that my client and Lypiatt were in some kind of intimacy after Lypiatt knew her secret are utterly groundless?"

"Absolutely groundless and utterly false and just like a jealous, catty woman," said Mrs. Hope cheerfully, and to the glee of all listeners. Even the Judge had to smile.

"I think you have got your point very clearly, Mr. O'Byrne," he said pleasantly. But Filgee could not let things rest there.

"You knew your patient was a woman?" he barked in cross-examination.

"Naturally. I am not a fool—only a nurse," said Mrs. Hope with a derisive smile.

"You did not think it your duty to report the matter to the authorities?"

"I never think it my duty to interfere with other people's private affairs. I leave that to lawyers."

"Ah! Very clever, very clever indeed!" sneered Filgee. But he let her alone after that. She smiled confidently at the prisoner as she left the box. Desmond returned it wanly, but the next moment her features stiffened into a haggard mask at the sight of the man dragging himself with unsteady steps toward the witness box—Lundi Druro, barely able to walk, leaning on the arm of Emma Guthrie! The Judge looked at him with friendly concern—he was so evidently ill.

"But your evidence was read yesterday, Mr. Druro . . . There was surely no need for you to leave your bed?"

"Mr. Druro is very kindly here to enlighten me on one or two points," explained O'Byrne suavely.

Druro's gaze fixed itself for a moment upon the occupant of the dock—a strange, burning gaze that she could not wholly read; it seemed to her there was amazement in it and pity and concern but nothing of hatred and disdain—and nothing that made her soul quail as it had quailed at its own thoughts last night in the quiet cell. All was well! She did not know what they had told him or whether he was one of those who knew that she was Flavia Tyrecastle; she never thought of that, and if she had it would not have come first; what flowed through her mind, warming and healing, was the surety that whatever had happened to Lundri Druro's memory all was well with his soul. Nothing in those steady eyes to shake her faith in the inherent decency of human nature. Sacrifice was justified; her own soul blossomed and bloomed within her once more; she sighed softly and sat back listening.

As a matter of course Druro had not had time to hear all the gossip; he knew nothing but the sheer fact that Desmond was a woman and that was so staggering he could hardly yet grasp it. It had burst on him from Guthrie's terse tongue like a bombshell with the news that Desmond was fighting for life in the High Court—dynamiting him out of bed and on the way to Wankelo as fast as six mules could pull him. He had not even got accustomed to the idea yet. Desmond looked the same to him, and it was hard to believe the strange tale. He kept referring to her as "he" and "young Desmond."

The Solicitor-General intimated that he was satisfied with the evidence taken in hospital and had no further questions to ask but O'Byrne became very busy. He elicited from Druro every detail of his actions the day of Lypiatt's death. How he had fetched Desmond from the hospital, and they had lunched together happily and frankly with no thought of Lypiatt or anything but the prospective success of the mine. How he had gone over the workings with Desmond, then instructed the latter to peg out the blocks and put up the notices, he himself going to Selukine to obtain and send them out by Qualimbo. It was at this point in the story that his memory began to fail. He could recollect nothing clearly after being helped on his horse by a friend and leaving Selukine.

"I suppose I was delirious then, anyway with a pretty high temperature, and I fancy I must have got a bad fall. I have a vague memory of climbing back on to my horse once I have thought too that the horse probably went straight into the stable with me on his back—and I struck the door with my head. But I've absolutely no recollection of arriving at the camp."

"You do know, however, that you had not invited Lypiatt to your place?"

"He was the last man in the world I'd ask there."

"He could not have been there for any just reason?"

"Absolutely no right or reason, and a very dangerous thing for him to do. I was liable to kill him myself if I had met him there."

Flavia trembled in her seat and a thrill of emotion passed through the court. Druro's friends thought it a foolhardy thing of him to say. But O'Byrne was delighted. What did he care who assumed the crime so long as his client was relieved of its burden?

"As far as you know, indeed, you may have killed him during that period—of which you have no recollection?"

"Certainly I may have," admitted Druro composedly. "It's far more probable than that young Desmond did."

Satisfaction beamed from O'Byrne, but Druro's intimates looked glum. They thought this was going a bit too far. As for Flavia, she had a sensation of drowning. Only by fixing her eyes on the golden flower which still nodded and smiled from the garden could she keep from being submerged by the heavy seas that were pressing her down . . . down . . .

"In your opinion, then, the prisoner was neither able nor likely to kill Lypiatt?"

"The idea is ridiculous. Young Desmond wouldn't kill a fly. Even in self-defense he wouldn't have had a chance against Lypiatt—who though small was an exceedingly powerful fellow and a skilled wrestler. The only possible solution is that in a struggle he fell and cracked his skull. In which case," said Druro, turning and addressing the jury with most unwarranted authority, "how on earth can you accuse the prisoner of murder or manslaughter or anything else? It was palpably an act of God and you can't——"

But naturally this could not be allowed, and he was sharply called to order by the Judge, yelled down by Filgee and glared at through the Solicitor-General's pince-nez all in the same instant. Only O'Byrne was a mass of smiles.

"Thank you, Mr. Druro," said he effusively and sat down, Filgee leaping instantly to the assault.

"You and Mr. Lypiatt were not on good terms?"

Druro regarded him carelessly.

"On the very worst of terms. I detested the fellow."

"Ah!" The lawyer looked significantly at the jury. "You admit that his death would not cause you pain?"

"Not the slightest," said Druro pleasantly, then pulled himself up—"except——"

"Ah! except . . . " rapped out Filgee ferociously. "There is an exception then to your content that this man you hated should meet a violent death in your camp?"

The witness remained imperturbable.

"Two exceptions. I regret the pain caused to his wi— to his relatives."

"Most feeling of you," snapped Filgee, bitterly sardonic. "I am one of them, and I thank you."

"And that my friend young Desmond should be involved. Otherwise I cannot pretend to any grief."

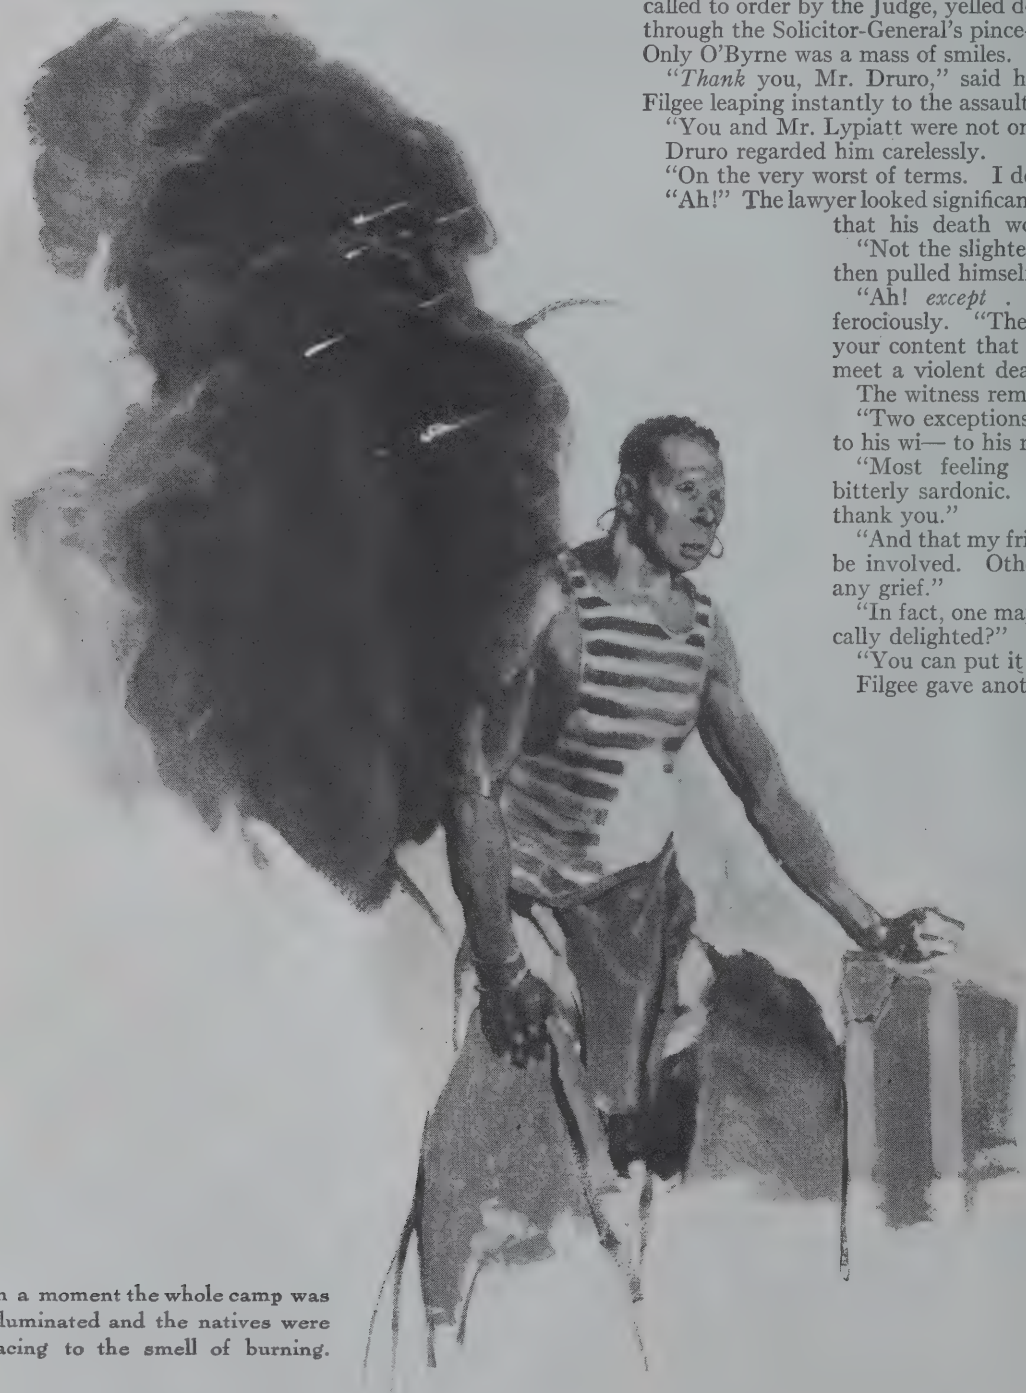
"In fact, one may put it that you are practically delighted?"

"You can put it any way you like."

Filgee gave another satisfied leer at the jury, then rounded suddenly on his victim.

"We hear a great deal from you about your friend 'young Desmond.' What do you mean by keeping up that pretense? You know the prisoner is a woman, don't you?"

Druro made no answer, only looked at him insolently.



"Answer me, sir!" he shouted. "Did you or did you not know all along that the prisoner was a woman masquerading in male attire?"

Druro turned his back on him and spoke to the Judge.

"I did not know, of course," he said quietly with the air of a man who makes an absolutely unnecessary statement.

Filgee revealed his teeth in a grin of pure savagery.

"You expect us to believe that?"

In a moment the whole camp was illuminated and the natives were racing to the smell of burning.

Lundi Druro, the sporting parson's son, unexpectedly quoted Scripture: "'When He hath tried me I shall come forth as gold!' As you have, my loved one—such gold as was never mined or milled by mortal hand!"

Druro looked at him with contempt. There was a deep silence in court. It was the first time such a question had been dragged in.

It was a bad moment for both the man and the woman concerned. But they bore themselves well. Desmond had flushed a deep red, then gone deadly pale. Her gallant figure seemed to quiver for a moment as a ship quivers when struck by a gale.

Then she held herself up straight. But she did not look at Druro. Her eyes kept their quiet, meditative gaze as at something far beyond the walls of that building.

But Filgee with his black poodle eyes darting glances back and forth from the jury to Druro pressed the poisoned dagger home.

"Answer me, sir. You expect the court—the gentlemen of the jury—you expect me to believe that?"

Druro threw him another look of loathing and contempt and took his time about it, giving him full measure. He meant everyone to read what he thought of the scurrilous beast. Then he turned and deliberately swept the faces of Judge and jury with a firm glance.

"I expect all men who have ever met young Desmond to believe it," he stated clearly—then flashing back at the lawyer: "As for you, sir, who do not know me and whom I do not wish to know—you are at liberty to further encumber your gross mind with any vile and vulgar illusion that pleases it."

A medley of sound surged up and broke. It was as though a whirlwind passed through the room. Druro left the box triumphant. Desmond's character so far as her life in Rhodesia was concerned had returned to its unassailability. The matter of whether or not she had caused the death of Lypiatt took second place for the time being. Those who thought about it at all were inclined to think Lypiatt had split his own skull for spite. That was the spirit Druro left behind him, and as he was the last witness it was the spirit the Solicitor-General had to deal with in his address to the jury.

He dealt with it very ably. He was himself of the true spirit of Rhodesia and knew very well the frame of mind of the public and sympathized with it and with that valiant figure in the dock. But he had not been speaking more than three minutes before the prisoner's friends realized that she still stood in an extremely precarious position. In grave and measured phrase Douglas pointed out that the charge of causing a fellow being's death had been laid at the prisoner's door and she had offered no serious repudiation of that charge. The evidence all pointed to her being the one person implicated in the tragedy, yet she proffered no frank statement of facts. The sad and remarkable history of the prisoner had become known. They were all moved by the story of that tragic and mysterious episode of the past. But the jury must not let pity and sympathy blind them to justice. He called upon them to have no hesitation whatsoever in bringing in a verdict of manslaughter against the prisoner unless they were entirely satisfied that Lypiatt's death was due to nothing but misadventure.

Immediately he had finished, up sprang Filgee and let loose a volume of snarls and fleers; jabbing, biting and sneering at the prisoner and everyone who had spoken a good word for her.

After a deadly enumeration of all the most damning points in the evidence, he flung himself into the opening Douglas had made by reference to Desmond's past, knowing that as the Judge had not pulled up the Solicitor-General he himself was bound to go unrebuked.

"Yes, we know of what my learned friend has described as the 'tragic' episode in the prisoner's past," he howled. "No one who has a memory could help recalling it. The prisoner appears to be endowed with a power to make men fall dead in her presence.

"She behaves like some sort of goddess—or is it a Messallina? Men are found dead about her in the intimate places of her dwelling, and she walks away leaving their bodies to be removed or pushed aside under a blanket—but let no one affront her by the question of how it was done—or why. The world must take her innocence, her non-complicity in the grim business for granted. Aha!

"Only that she does not happen to be a goddess—though she might possibly be a modern Messallina. And this happens to be just the common work-a-day world, and she just an ordinary good looking"—he would allow that—"a good looking but powerfully built, extremely strong and resolute woman. A woman, too, with a taste for drama, for adventure, for wild society. One might almost say a taste for blood.

"Evidence for the defense has been carefully directed to show that it is unlikely that the accused could have got the better of Lypiatt except by the intervention of an accident. In connection with this doubt I beg to call attention to the evidence of Francis Druro—a man who has told you boldly that he hated Lypiatt and was quite liable to kill him if he had met him at the camp. How do we know that these two 'bosom friends' did not lay a plan to decoy Lypiatt there, the man because he detested him and the woman because he knew her secret? Druro we know was ill and delirious the next day, but he might not have been too ill that night to assist in the foul work! How do we know what time he got back to camp and what transpired before he collapsed? I ask the gentlemen of the jury to use their profound intelligence in considering these points. In her masquerading garb the accused stands before you brazen and unashamed, and I say it is preposterous that you should be asked to judge her by the same standards as you would use for a decent woman—and that you should be invited by the Solicitor-General to consider her tragic story.

"Did you or did you not know that the prisoner was a woman?" Filgee shouted at Druro.

"Tragic? Yes, tragic indeed, but for whom? For the two men who mysteriously died three years ago? For Constant Lypiatt mysteriously dead too in the prime of his life? For his broken-hearted wife and sorrowing kinsfolk? No. Oh no! Their case, it seems, is not tragic. It is only this vagabond Countess, vagrant and disowned, this lawless female scallywag decked in men's trousers—whose position is tragic!

"And so I hope it may be gentlemen of the jury. I trust to your intelligence and integrity to make it so. I commend to your sagacity and fine sense the protection of the lives of your fellow men and the responsibility of seeing that this woman meets with a just fate."

The jury looked variously miserable and annoyed at having these fulsome epithets and unwelcome injunctions thrust upon them. The Russian-Jew boy cobbler, not understanding a word, started in deep embarrassment to scrape his boots on the floor. The Teutonic gardener gazed fixedly in front of him. His mind was made up—he would vote with the strongest party. The Greek merchant looked glum, almost stern, unforgiving, uncompromising, relentless. This is what he looked like. As a matter of fact the emotions causing his expression had nothing to do with the case but with another of the jurors—the H. A. P.—who owed him a good sized sum of money and had done so for a considerable time. Hence the relentless scowl that decorated his brow.

The foreman also wore a worried look, because he knew of this difference between two of his men and wondered what would happen when they went into retreat. Personalities on such occasions were not unknown. Sometimes the vital issues of the case were entirely lost sight of when enemies such as these two met over the table of deliberations.

O'Byrne's time having now come to mangle the feelings of those nine sad, patient men, he did it with a will. With harmonious phrase and penetrating and melodious voice, he outlined for them the position of his client.

"This beautiful and unfortunate lady, whose footsteps throughout life have been dogged by fateful things, whose destiny seems inextricably linked with drama the most poignant and profound. Tragedy has lain in wait for her, and sorrow taken her by the hand. Exiled, she sought in the wide silences of the veldt to lose the name and identity that had become so painful to her.

"How does she come to meet the charge of complicity in Constant Lypiatt's death? Does she come pleading your compassion as a woman whom life has ill treated? Has she resumed the subtle aids and accessories of femininity wherewith to beguile your judgment?

"No, gentlemen of the jury. She might have done so had she chosen; but she would not. Garbed and guised as you have known her she stands before you, prepared to take her chance of your justice, not on her sex nor her title nor her romantic history, but on the record of her life among you. Just 'young Desmond' whom you have all liked and respected; though my learned friend from the Cape, not being a Rhodesian, has done his best by taunt and innuendo to undermine that record of clean comradeship and fine, austere simplicity.

"She had come straight from hospital to take up her position as working partner on this mine discovered and started by Druro. On arrival they lunch, and Druro shows her over the place. He is feeling ill but determines to go into town and leaves her in charge. Though still shaky herself from illness, she immediately takes up her share of the work. Druro has explained to her that the claims protecting his find have not yet been pegged and some instinct tells her that it had better be done soon—that her friend's property is in danger. So the instant he has gone she sets to work. For her instinct was unerring. Another man had smelled out the richness of that find and determined to have a share in it. Like many mining men he had few scruples when it came to claim grabbing.

"Except for the greed of Constant Lypiatt we should not be engaged here today. That consummate greed drove him further than merely trying to benefit by another man's mistake in pegging. It drove him by what I am obliged to label as exceedingly foul means to try and make Druro's friend betray the ownership of those claims into his hands. You have heard how he did not disdain to slink and lie in hiding, waiting for darkness in which to go unheard and unwitnessed to Desmond's hut and make his base proposition. He had become possessed of her secret and meant to use it as a lever wherewith to coerce her to his uses. Who among you that has ever had acquaintance with my client can doubt what her answer was? Who cannot imagine the scornful words that passed rapidly into a violent quarrel? Perhaps in the heat and fury of his disappointment and goaded by the prisoner's scorn, Lypiatt forgot her sex. At any rate, in an insane manner he attacked the prisoner, caught her by the throat and terribly injured her. There was a struggle. Lypiatt falls with a crash. How it happened in the darkness my client cannot pretend to say, but she hears a sharp crack as of some brittle object on stone. It is the crack of Lypiatt's skull—extraordinarily brittle as the evidence proves—upon the ironlike floor. That was the end of a terrible and deplorable story—the end of a man's life! But for that end, I contend, my client was no more responsible than if a flash of lightning had streaked in and struck him down.

"Can you wonder that she was dazed and terrified into acting for a time in a strange manner? Prosecutor for the Crown, though fairness itself in his address, did in my opinion dwell too much upon her conduct at this time and upon what he called the crime of concealment. I contend that he forgot one thing—that in spite of her garb the prisoner is a woman, and that once the fierce events that had called for her courage and chivalry were past she was beset by all the panic fears that cluster to a woman's heart in the face of bloody happenings. She did not conceal. Merely in her stunned and horrified condition she delayed to act. Is delay a crime?

"Besides, there were her sick comrade's interests to protect. Gold was lying loose at this rich mine, and no one to mind it if she left but half a dozen natives. Druro's partner Guthrie was expected at any moment to come and take charge, and was it strange that she should delay action until he came? Suddenly she is stupefied by the arrival of a native policeman! When he asks if she has seen Lypiatt she says no. That is understandable. No one is going to confess their soul to a native policeman!

"But I put it to you, gentlemen of the jury, that when later she left the shaft and came to the hut to find the police there she was thankful, not sorry. For Guthrie was there too, and she was free to go. The police have described to you her air of frankness and relief as she came up to them. 'Quite right!' she said, and light heartedly rode away in their company. She was light hearted, gentlemen, in the security of her innocence; in the firm conviction that when the facts were known she would be absolved by all clear thinking and unbiased minds of any crime except delay; and in the sure assumption with which she stands before you—of the even scales of Rhodesian justice and the equity of her fellow men."

O'Byrne sat down. He had done his work and he knew it. No scraping of feet now from the Russian-Jew boy cobbler. The Greek merchant, though he still looked relentless, had forgotten his feud with the H. A. P. His was only one of nine relentless glances directed at Counsel for the Prosecution. Plainly the jury were in accordance upon one point at least—scorn for the opinions of the poodle-eyed Filgee.

There seemed little for the Judge to do. Nevertheless he went assiduously over the evidence, dwelling slightly upon the features favorable to Desmond but not evading the unfavorable ones. Every word was followed earnestly until the moment when the jury were sent off with directions to consider the alternative verdicts of, one, manslaughter; two, justifiable homicide.

They ambled briskly out, grateful for even this brief bodily exercise, and a deep silence remained behind. No one budged. A conviction prevailed that the waiting would not be long, and excitement was at white heat, but the appearance of the prisoner had a calming effect upon impatience. She seemed so very still and pale and unmoving. They could not tell how wildly her heart was throbbing—though not with fear, for it seemed to her a simple thing to die or disappear from the world for the sake of one you loved. She feared for her self-control. She knew that if she heard sympathy and sorrow in that kind voice, tears would flood her eyes and roll down her cheeks. She might even burst into weeping. What a disgrace in the eyes of the world! What would the kindly tribe of hairy armed ones think of one who having swaggered amongst them now burst into tears like a coward at the threat of punishment?

Suddenly there was a shuffle of feet and the opening of doors. The Judge, who had been leaning forward, face on hand and eyes fixed, sat erect. A breathlessness came into the big room. Not a sound was heard except the footsteps of the fatal nine filing to their seats. People gazed searchingly at them, but it is not easy to read the faces of nine solemnly marching men. All that could be definitely ascertained was an unmistakable air of resolution, and the public prepared itself for anything. It was not infrequent for a Rhodesian jury absolutely to stagger the Bench and all in court by the result of their deliberations.

At last they were in their places, and the suspense, now almost unbearable, could be gauged by the loud breathing plainly heard all over the court. Men sounded as if they had been running hard and women were crying. It seemed a year of time before the question was put and the answers boldly proclaimed by the foreman.

"Not guilty of manslaughter. Not guilty of justifiable homicide."

Moreover, in the opinion of the jury the prisoner was guilty of nothing more than having been most unfortunately present at the death by suicide of Constant Lypiatt.

It was said afterwards that the fantastic rider had been invented by the Russian-Jew boy cobbler, the Greek shopkeeper and the H. A. P., who combined so strongly to insist upon it that the others, foreseeing a long sitting without any ultimate difference, gave in.

Whether or not this story was true, no mistake could be made as to the popularity of the unprecedented, dynamic verdict. It had un succès fou. There was just one second of acute stillness, an astounded immobility that suggested wholesale paralysis; then with a roar of delirious glee that rose to the rafters and nearly blew the windows out, bedlam was let loose.

"I told you so. He did it for spite!" howled a joyous citizen who wore his shirt slit open to the waist, showing an enormous chest with a bronze beard sprouting from it. It took several hefty policemen to remove this gentleman, laughing like a maniac. Sherry, waving his false teeth and singing a hymn, was also deported. A really disgraceful scene! Judge Vernon had a right to be as angry as he seemed, and certainly no one else could have quelled the row as he so promptly did, standing upright and looking extremely handsome and stormy while he poured out godlike wrath on those who outraged the decorum of his court.

When penitence and a mock humility was sufficiently restored he turned and smote the jurymen. The rider to their verdict, he said, was fantastic, absurd and ridiculous; Lypiatt's death might well be ascribed to the accident of his fall, but suicide was beyond the bounds of probability and would never have been introduced except by a lot of dunderheads. The verdict itself, however, was in his opinion sound, just and in accordance with the evidence. The prisoner would therefore be acquitted and leave the court "without a stain on her character."

After that the storm broke loose again. The court was cleared by the Judge's orders and in the noise and confusion, O'Byrne got his client out of the dock and away to a carriage that waited at a side door in the dusk. Desmond, unable yet to bear the ordeal of meeting a world as eagerly curious as it was kind, begged to go back to Mrs. Brade; and she slept that night a free woman yet behind bars; while Rhodesians went up and down the town and backward and forward upon it seeking her in vain.

Is There A Danger Year in MARRIAGE?

Photographs by Alfred Cheney Johnston Specially posed by Doris Kenyon

IT WOULD seem that this kind of test is given to all married persons, but it would be impossible to fix the actual year because the conditions of each pair may differ. But speaking generally, I should think it might be the second year—because very frequently the first year is taken up with awaiting the arrival of a child, when everything is out of the ordinary routine.

But when that business is over and things between the pair seem normal again, then the dangerous period begins.

The young woman has been ill and physically unattractive, and although the young husband has made every allowance for her, it may have blunted the romance he had woven about her, or physically disillusioned him in some way, if he is particularly sensitive, and all this quite subconsciously and not with his will or because he is a brute.

If only women would realize that physical disillusion is the most dangerous foe they have to face, they would be much more careful, because it acts so insidiously. The woman becomes careless over one little thing and then another, and suddenly she discovers that however kind and affectionate her husband may be to her, he is no longer in love with her.

We will say that she gets past this abnormal year without blunting his emotion for her, and he also without blunting hers—because men disillusion women as well as women disillusion men, but not so often, for women are more tolerant. Then they are at the period when they must look out and not become casual, in either appearance or manners or character; and men should curb their selfishness, keeping in mind that if they establish a perfect understanding with their loved one in this first normal year, when the abnormal one is over their happiness is likely to go on for a very long time. No one should drift, but take stock of how the affair is going every week, and then curb this and accentuate that just as business people do about the goods they are going to trade with.

Women often begin to be jealous in the second year; in the first one they are too sure of their empire to trouble, but by the second year, if the man is at all flirtatious, he is quite likely to want to amuse himself. Or it may be the woman—she is still only a girl in age—who may want to play about. But if they are wise, since they are married and not contemplating eventual divorce, they should "watch their step" and not either irritate one another or break the tender tie which held them.

By the second year they have both eaten of the tree of knowledge, and in these days of change, when nothing seems to last for long, they may begin to feel that the double harness is galling a little.

Once these quarrels begin and a sense of resentment or bitterness is aroused in either, then one might say the game is up so far as real happiness is concerned, although it may seem more expedient to one or both to patch it up and not make a scandal.

The Second Year

Yes—I should say the second year is the critical one.

I was observing a young friend the other day whom I saw about eighteen months ago on her honeymoon in a state of radiant bliss—her bridegroom utterly devoted to her, so that she could have turned him in any direction she pleased. She was a girl who had had things entirely her own way at home and had been much admired in her first season. They were going to live in a set where a good deal of money is spent, and although they would have enough to live comfortably among their kind there would yet not be a great margin for extravagance.

Here, I thought, was a marriage which would turn out beautifully.

I saw them again twelve months afterwards. A little daughter had arrived. Mabel did not look nearly so pretty; she was thin and languid, and everything about the ordering of their charming home in Knightsbridge was a trouble to her. She was peevish—and the servants were leaving. Charlie had to attend to some business he had gone into on leaving his lancer regiment, and when he came home she was not the delightful companion she had been. She had begun to say things to him which contained a tacit reproach. She told me, however, that they loved with the same passion as ever. I felt uneasy.

I saw them again last week. Their second year was six months old. Charlie now could be quite interested in Mabel's friends when they danced in the evening, and had rather begun to call his wife "old dear." Mabel was bitter, and confided to me that she was now going to make interests for herself, Charlie being quite impossible.

I wonder where they will have drifted to when their third twelve months begin!

But on the other hand, if only the first signs of disillusion are observed by both the husband and wife, and both determine to avoid continuing doing that which causes this state of things, very soon a better understanding takes place, and they pass the dangerous period and settle down to real deep happiness.

It is commonsense which seems to be so lamentably wanting in so many cases. People seem like naughty children breaking up the fine works of a watch.

It is each one's own fault, or misfortune, if the other ceases to care; it is because the same magnetic attraction is not emanating from him or her. Love is a thing apart in life; it affects the brain and the senses like some powerful drug; it is the only intoxicating happiness on this earth; so how tragic to let it go in the second year, when with a little intelligence it could have stayed!

Look around among your friends—you who read—and see how many of them have weathered the second year successfully.

The thing for the young man to do, if he wants to retain his joy, is to examine himself and see whether he is doing everything he can to keep it or whether he is not growing selfish again as he was in his bachelor days.

All Englishmen are selfish, more or less, because for hundreds of years they have been trained to be by the fortunate conditions which obtain for men in England, and English mothers and sisters have helped to make sons and brothers selfish. So there is no use in bothering about it; much better accept the fact and make the best of it, since the thing is a question of numbers and in no nation where the males are in the minority can they be naturally unselfish.

Well—when he has examined himself the young husband can then pull up and take a little trouble—as much as he would if it were something to do with his sport, let us say.

And the young wife, too, had better take a survey and decide if their love is going on, or if it is growing less—and if the latter, why?—and then she, too, can use her intelligence.

But if people just drift without self-examination they are more than likely to turn happiness into a commonplace humdrum existence. And the first step in this is when either disillusions the other's senses. For never forget: loving has mainly to do with emotions of the spirit—but being in love is chiefly concerned with the senses, and glamour cannot stay with a cold-creamed nose and hair in curling pins.

The Revolt of Camposanto

ambitious and worldly-wise.

THE public were not very well acquainted with old Mr. Camposanto's good qualities. His daughters, considering that upon the occasion of their weddings he had made over only two-thirds of his property to them and still piggishly held on to the remaining third for his own use, had forgotten them. He was therefore an unappreciated and misunderstood man.

There was hardly room enough for him in his own house. The daughters, Mrs. O'Ryan and Mrs. Kelley, together with their husbands, children and grandchildren, filled it to overflowing. And this says much for the fertility of the Spanish and Irish cross, for the old Camposanto house is by all odds the biggest adobe in Monterey. The walls it is true are four feet thick and themselves take up a lot of space but there are eighteen perfectly good rooms, and old Mr. Camposanto ought not to have been picked on as the particular individual who made it seem crowded.

It was really the daughters who took up the most room, and always had, from the time, in their late teens, when they had begun to have children of their own. Because of their short, straight noses, short upper lips, gleaming teeth and the regal way in which they carried their heads, the "Camposanto girls" were still rather splendid to look at, and their hands and feet were astoundingly small and shapely; but they were huge women, circularly, and had strong dominant characters which made them seem all the huger.

Circularly, old Mr. Camposanto himself didn't amount to much; he was almost spectacularly thin. But in the waste places above the tops of a crowd's head, his own fine old head, with its shock of white hair and its dark, aquiline face, showed to advantage. At that he had lost the lance-like carriage of his younger and bolder days. He was the victim of a long series of domestic defeats. Excepting that he had managed to retain control of one-third of his property he had been beaten at every turn. He had been driven from his fine airy bedroom, on the second floor front, to a room no bigger than a monk's cell on the ground floor rear. The control of the big garden with its high wall had been wrested from him, and he had seen the garden spoiled and modernized. His truly wonderful collection of Monterey sea shells had been thrown out of the two large cabinets they had entertainingly filled in the drawing room, and had followed him into the monk's cell where he slept, read, smoked, dreamed and kept himself to himself as much as was possible.

Adobes don't have cellars; but there was a chalk rock outhouse in a corner of the garden which served the purpose. The keys of this had been taken away from him, and when the old man wanted a glass of wine with his dinner he had to humble himself to get it.

In short it looked as if there was nothing much for him to look forward to but the gradual failing of his faculties, mental and physical degeneration, and death.

Already he had put up with so much, and had rebelled so little, the daughters began to hint that he was no longer capable of managing his own affairs. And with their husbands they were already beginning to discuss the advisability of taking the matter into court. They were rich women it is true; but they were ambitious, grasping and worldly-wise. And control of Camposanto's holdings would make each of them half again as rich as she was already. Also, for the daughters were clear headed business women, it was obvious that the property could be more advantageously managed as a whole by two persons acting as one than by three persons acting as individuals, especially when one of them was largely controlled by unworldliness and sentiment. There was the ranch to the southward, for instance; the great headland that thrusts out into the Pacific, and is so vast and varied that it can supply half a dozen different climates at once; a hotel company had offered Camposanto a million dollars for this promontory, and he had merely smiled in his quiet, gentle way, and said that he liked it in much the same way that he liked the Book of Job and that it was not for sale.

This victory of sentiment over commonsense had greatly infuriated the Camposanto girls. And they had fought a battle royal with their father on the subject. And they had so scolded and abused him in swift, cutting Spanish that he had actually turned on them and fought back.

"Why do I want the Camposanto ranch?" he cried. "For the Camposantos, of course. I'm not too old to marry and have a son. And if you don't give me a little peace that's just what I'll do."

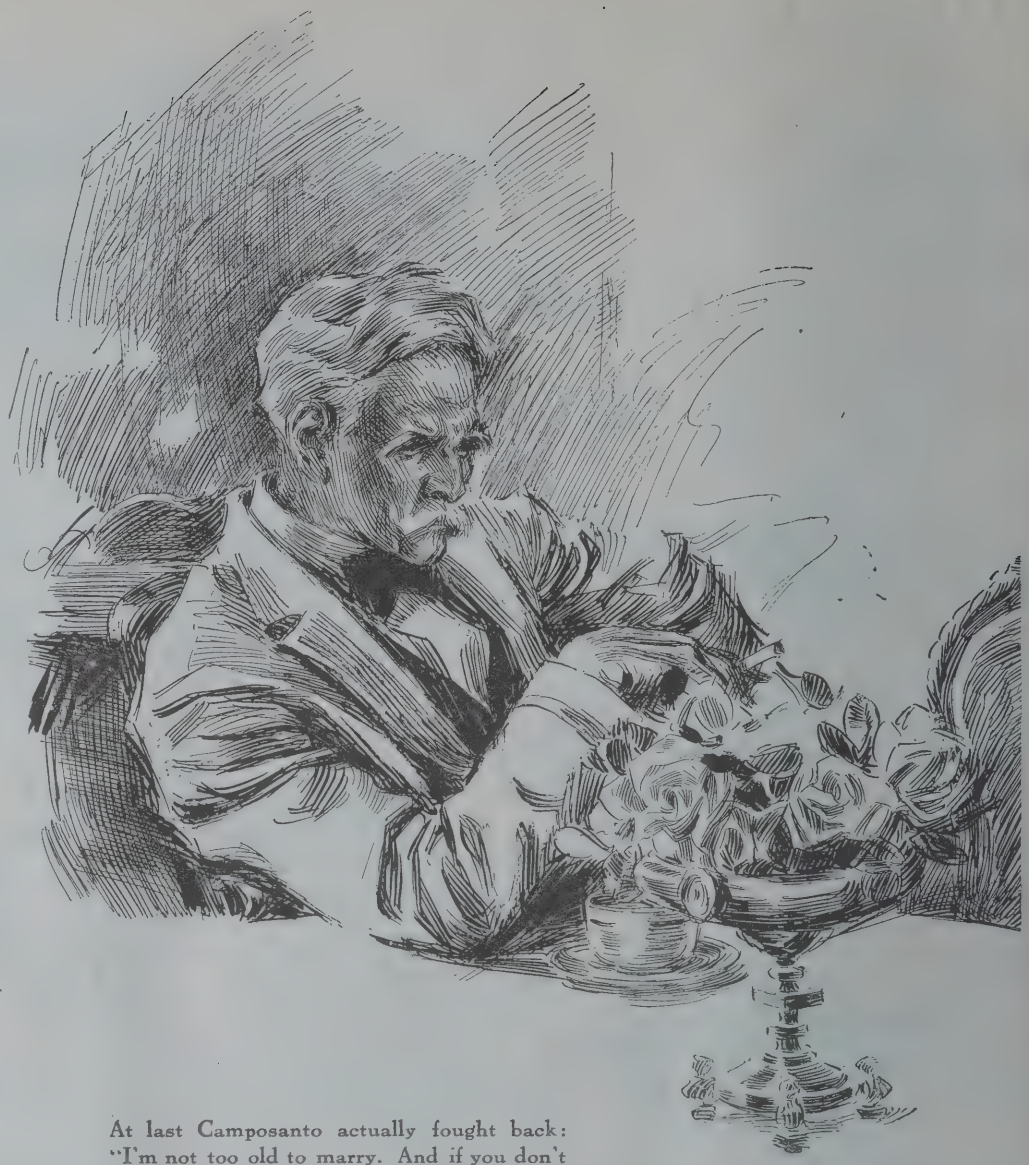
MORRIS

A Story of Romance at Seventy

Señorita Felicia—
"I have been keeping this," she said, "for a great occasion."

Thereupon he had darted into his little monk's cell room with his books and his sea shells and slammed the door.

"In the old days," Mrs. O'Ryan commented, "when father would threaten to marry again and cheat us out of our heritage I used to worry and lie awake nights. And there was a time when he was really smitten. But the Diaz girl is forty if she's a day, and I doubt if he has set eyes on her for years and years."



"I think," laughed Mrs. Kelley, "that you are still worrying. I used to worry too. But that which used to be a threat possible of fulfillment is no longer anything but the boasting of a senile old man. Father's seventy if he's a day."

As a matter of fact old Camposanto was extremely fond of his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, even if none of them bore the name of Camposanto, and had no intentions of doing them out of anything which was rightfully theirs. After his death the ranch to the southward would be sold and desecrated. And he was quite reconciled to that. But he preferred to die first and to take his own good time, or as much as the good Lord would vouchsafe him, in doing it. In the meanwhile it was very silly for two fat women who had plenty to be hankering after more and to be hinting that the brain which had managed to hold on to so much, and even to increase it, had ceased to function properly.

Small as his present quarters were old Camposanto had become attached to them, and it was with grave misgivings that he heard his daughters beginning to hint that sleeping on the ground floor of an adobe was bad for his rheumatism, or would be bad for his rheumatism in the event of his having any. The fact was that the Camposanto girls visited with a lady who had recently turned a small bare ground floor room into a very charming and feminine boudoir in which to receive her intimates, and the Camposanto girls were ambitious to emulate her example. Their father they agreed would really be better off in the attic than on the ground floor and the more he trotted up and down the stairs the better it would be for his old legs. And so they hinted and hinted, but the old man refused to move and the ladies finally made up their minds that it would be necessary to invent a stratagem.

They seized upon the occasion of the next prizefights to be held in the auditorium.

At last Camposanto actually fought back: "I'm not too old to marry. And if you don't give me a little peace that's just what I'll do."

The Monterey prizefights are spirited bouts between youths to whom a little money means a lot and a few raps on the nose mean nothing at all. A good natured audience with a sprinkling of amused women is always in attendance, and the tall and lean Mr. Camposanto invariably occupied a ringside seat.

The youth and energy of the combatants refreshed him. He always returned home from the auditorium with a lighter pair of feet and a more buoyant carriage than he had taken with him. And he did not too poignantly mourn for the old lost days of bull fighting and cock fighting.

Four bouts of four rounds each were fought and decided.

A fifth bout, tame and vaguely scientific, was called a draw, and the announcer announced that the Pride of Castroville would not fight the Watsonville Terror as had been arranged, but a gentleman who had very kindly volunteered to take the Terror's place—Ed Smith of Salinas.

This announcement was not received with cheers. The Pride of Castroville was a good man and so was the Watsonville Terror, and a bout between them was always entertaining. But nobody had ever heard of Ed Smith and nobody had any confidence in his ability to create anything in the nature of a Roman holiday.

He took his corner amid a profound silence and proved to be a half-breed Indian, no longer very young. He had a fine aquiline face with an expression at once gentle, dignified and patient. He was well muscled but too thick through the waist, at once showing his age and his lack of training, and the knowing ones believed that he would be very quickly beaten to a jelly and knocked out. But the Indian is an enduring strain and patience is a great virtue. And while it is true that for two rounds Ed Smith of Salinas took a tornado of blows on his head and thickened waist, it is also true that he came out of his corner at the beginning of the third still placid and undamaged.

His foot work was bad; he had no defense; the Pride of Castroville, full of youth and speed if not of science, hit him when he pleased and where he pleased. A knock-out seemed only a question of time. The Pride of Castroville had many friends in the audience, and during the first half of the third round their cheering was unbroken.

Camposanto began to feel sorry for the Indian. He had a good deal of sympathy with Indians anyway. The California of the Spaniard and the Indian, he felt, had been a more comfortable and saner California than the California of the polyglot present. He began to dislike the excessively blond and white Pride of Castroville. His old muscles began to tingle and twitch. He would like to hand that Castroville boy one himself. The Castroville boy fought wide open. Anybody could have hit him, but that half-breed had no science—didn't know an opening when he saw it. Camposanto sat with his head up, his fists clenched and his eyes shining. Oh to be twenty and to strike one good blow!

Ed Smith of Salinas, staggered by a right to the jaw, crouched low to avoid another and suddenly hit upward, all the way upward from the floor.

The first part of the Castroville Pride to strike the said floor was the back of his head. It was as if a mule had kicked him. When the referee had counted ten, Ed Smith of Salinas picked up the unconscious youth in his arms and carried him to his corner. Then, still with a resigned, patient and gentle expression he returned to his own.

By the time the Pride of Castroville had come to his senses the auditorium was empty and old Camposanto was on his way home. Thrice, however, while passing through a dark and deserted alley, he stopped, crouched, doubled his right fist and brought it upward, all the way upward from the "floor," in a close imitation of the blow which had stopped the Castroville boy in the midst of his triumphant career.

"And all the old fellow had in him was one punch," murmured Camposanto, "only the one punch; but it was a good one. It did the business."

Highly pleased with the evening's entertainment he let himself into the old Camposanto adobe and went at once to his room. But the door was locked.

He turned the knob this way and that and shook the door. But his intuitions were very keen and almost instantly he began to have a suspicion of what had happened.

He looked up the stair. At the top he beheld the vast bewrappered figure of Mrs. Kelley. She was smiling and doing her best to appear calm and matter of fact; but the curious, set look in her father's face made her nervous.

"It's all right, father," she said. "You won't be put to any trouble at all. We've moved every one of your things and you'll be ever so much more comfortable upstairs."

"Up two flights of stairs," said Camposanto.

There was a silence.

"There's only one more thing," said Mrs. Kelley, still more nervously. "The children helped move you and I'm afraid that poor little Manuel dropped a box of shells and one or two may have broken."

"May have broken," said Camposanto.

He climbed the flight of stairs stolidly enough, passed his daughter without a word and moved like one in a dream through the corridor that led to the attic stairs. When he had reached them he turned and said:

"Please wait a minute. I want to speak to you." Then he ascended the attic stairs to his new room.

His intuition had already told him that among the shells which had been broken he would find his specimen of Chrysodomus Tabulatus. There are only a few in the world.

But he had to be sure.

He found that the spire of this choicest shell had been broken into three pieces and the body whorl into five.

His eyes moistened and he wiped them with the backs of his hands. Then, amid the new and strange surroundings, he began to hunt for old and familiar things—his carpet bag, his linen, his pepper and salt suit. Having located these, he packed the pepper and salt suit and some of the linen into the carpet bag.

Meanwhile Mrs. Kelley had grown impatient. But she was alarmed too. So she followed her father upstairs and pushed open the door of his new room. He was in the act of closing the carpet bag.

"What are you doing?" she said.

"Come in and I will tell you."

When she had entered the room and closed the door behind her, the old man said:

"I am going away. I am going where you will never find me. You will never get another penny of my money. I have stood all the abuse and humiliation from you and your sister that I am going to stand."

Mrs. Kelley tried to temporize.

"You can't rush off like this in the middle of the night," she said.

"I am not going to rush off," he said. "I am going in the flivver. I shall leave the two big cars for you."

"You must be crazy," she exclaimed.

"To leave the best of everything—as always—for my daughters?"

He shrugged his shoulders and started to pick up the carpet bag.

"You are out of your mind," she exclaimed. "I shall prevent you by force."

"No," said Camposanto, "you will not prevent me by force."

The reaching down for the carpet bag had given him the thought. He clenched his fist and brought it upward, all the way upward from the floor, and with all his force.

It was a fine blow, well struck. The bewrappered Mrs. Kelley, knocked cuckoo, knocked cold, lay flat on her back, in such a state of stupor that a referee could have kept on counting her out till he was tired.

It was the first time in his life that Camposanto had ever struck a woman. He felt no remorse whatever. A man's life is his own and if he must strike a blow for liberty, let it be a good blow and let the recipient be any kind, or sex, of a tyrant!

He picked up the carpet bag, put on his hat and at the door of the room turned and remarked to the unconscious hippopotamus on the floor:

"Let's see how you like to sleep in the attic."

Presently the serenity of the soft Monterey night was disturbed by the ambitious roaring of a flivver. To one listener the roaring said one thing, to another it said something else. But it is very doubtful if anybody heard the true message—that it is never too late to resist tyranny or to fly from oppression.

"Give us liberty," roared the flivver, "or give us death."

With old Camposanto driving, a short term of liberty seemed apt to be followed by a very long and sudden term of the other thing; but presently his brain cleared and then lamp-posts, curbs and buttons at the intersections of streets stopped missing him and he began to miss them.

He and the car climbed Franklin Street almost to the top. Then they turned to the right and lurched and bumped for several blocks along one of those typical Monterey thoroughfares upon which no money had been spent since the days of the Spaniards. A half moon sailed in the heavens. The air smelled of heliotrope and roses.

The flivver paused, to take breath as it were, and Camposanto descended at a little white gate in an untrimmed hedge of thorny acacias. The very little white house to which the gate belonged was altogether hidden from the road. And even after the hedge had been passed there was disclosed at the end of a straight and narrow path between mature shrubberies, only a front door between two white posts of a veranda, and a flight of steps.

There was no light showing and the little house looked pearly in the moonlight. It was the retreat in which a pretty girl, defying the conventions, had nursed a breaking heart, learned gardening and grown middle-aged.

Camposanto knocked in a peculiar way. And heard almost instantly a flustered hurrying of approaching footsteps.

There was nothing the matter with the Señorita Diaz's lungs. The distance between the kitchen, in which she had been pouring over the adventures of a certain Don Quixote de la Mancha, and the front door was not great. Nevertheless when she had reached the latter and flung it open she was all out of breath. Camposanto himself was breathing quickly.

His head, however, seemed to have recovered the alert grace of his youth, and in the moonlight he no longer looked like an old man.

"Señorita Felicia," he said, "you once told me that if ever I were in trouble to come to you."

"Señor Felix," she announced, "the years must have dealt kindly with you. For very many have passed since we spoke of possible trouble coming to you."

"The years," he said, "have dealt more than kindly with me. But my daughters for whom I sacrificed your happiness and my own have not. Tonight the persecution to which they have steadily subjected me became intolerable and I have left the house in which I was born, for ever and a day."

"But come in, Señor Felix, and rest yourself."

He hesitated.

"At our age!" she exclaimed. "Who would gossip about us?"

"Truly, you are right. It is many years—too many—since the world and his wife had our names on their tongues. I will come in, then, since you are so gracious as to invite me."

He followed her into the kitchen and she told him that he was in his own house and that he might smoke if he wished. While he rolled a cigarette, she got out a bottle of very old wine.

"I have been keeping this," she said, "for a great occasion."

Camposanto's vision was unimpaired and he studied her comely and tranquil face. He tasted the wine which she had poured for him and pronounced it delicious.

"In the old days," he said, "they had the secret of capturing sunshine and the spirit of spring and the color of rubies and imprisoning them in bottles."

He lifted his glass and clinked it against hers and added:

"For the strengthening of hearts!"

The tone of his voice touched some old reservoir of feeling and, when she had drunk the toast, tears gleamed in the corners of her eyes. She laughed them away.

"Men of my blood," he said presently, "sometimes live to be a hundred. I have preserved a third of my fortune for my own use, and I am on my way to Camposanto to begin life all over again. If I were to plant acorns tomorrow I might still live to see good sized trees. Hidden in one of the little valleys of Camposanto there is a little adobe of four rooms. The ancient roof of red tiles is intact. There I intend to make my home."

"But who will cook for you and take care of your clothes?"

"Even in these degenerate days it is possible to hire servants. But just at first, when the weather is so lovely, I had the thought of doing my own work. I am very strong still. I feel"—he said this with a reminiscent smile—"as if I could fell an ox with a blow of my fist."

"But after you have settled at Camposanto you will not often be seen in Monterey."

"Never," he said.

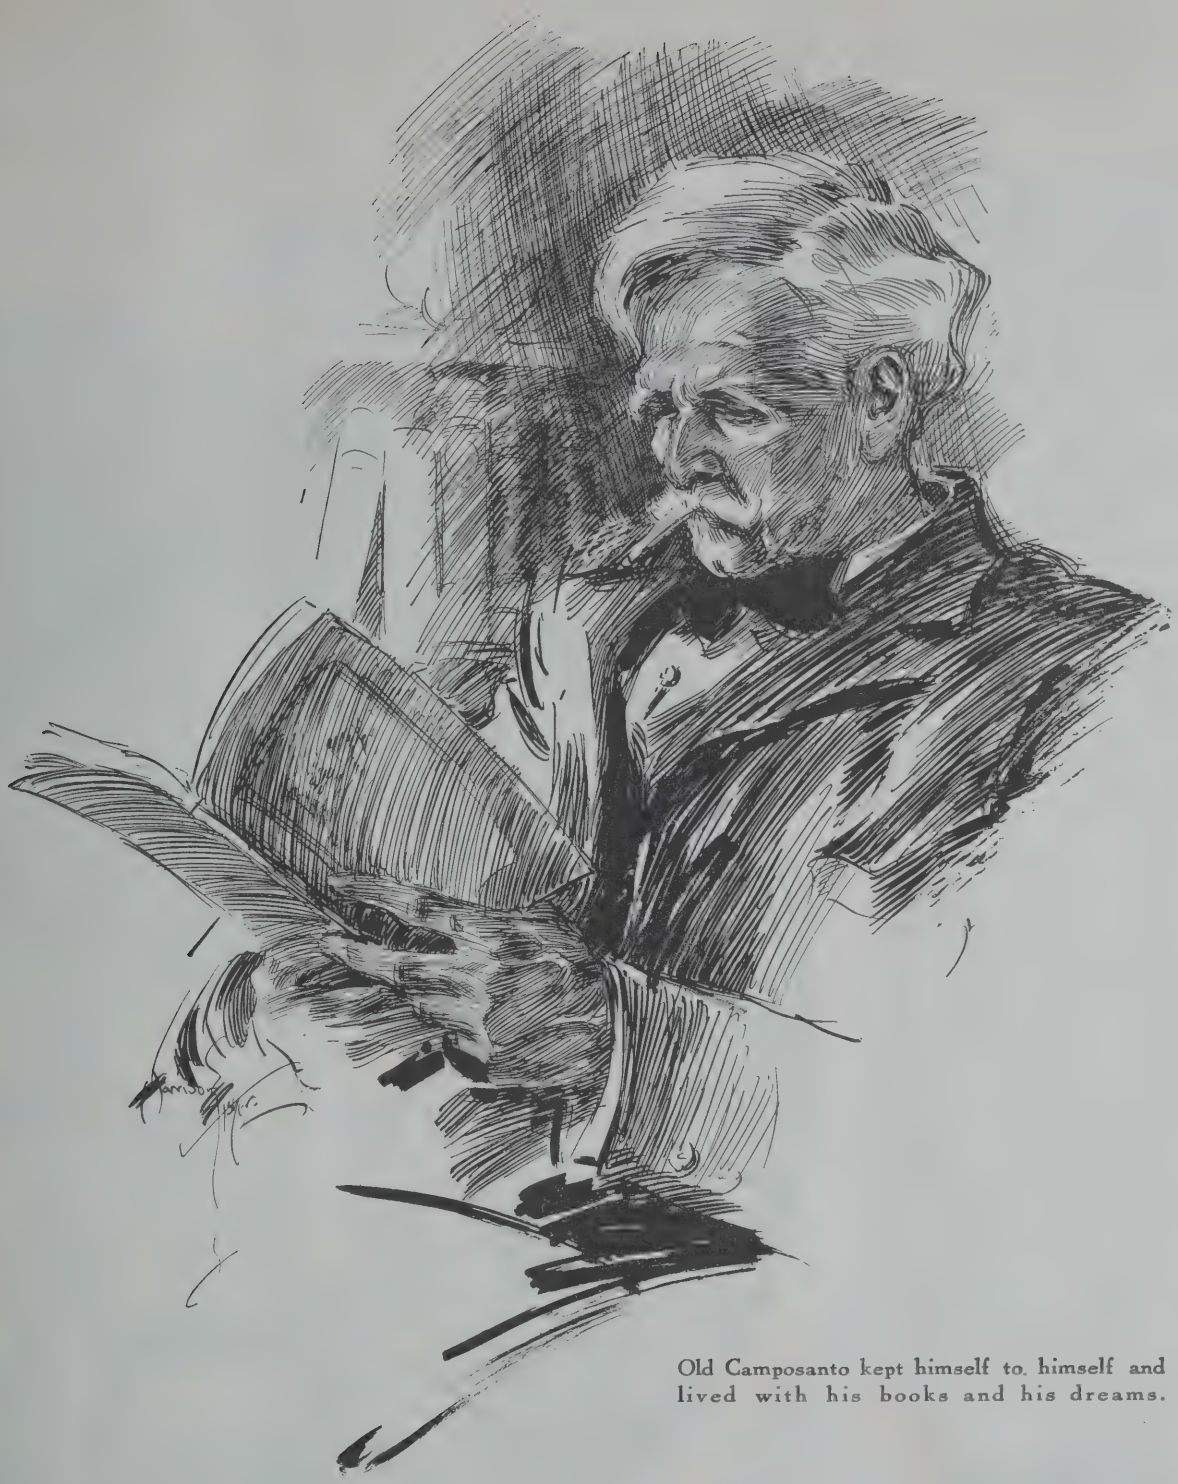
"Never?" She paled a little.

"No man can begin a new life until he has altogether broken with the old."

"But your children and——"

"My grandchildren?" He smiled. "Yes. And my great-grandchildren? They will get along very nicely without me."

"The thought that you are no longer in Monterey will be very painful to some people," said Señorita Diaz.



"To you?"

"Of course."

"Pour me another glass of wine, I beg you."

She did so. He drank it at one gulp and put down the glass in a decisive and determined way.

"There was a time," he said, "when you loved me. I was persuaded that it was my duty to abandon the loving thoughts and plans that I had for you. I was thereby false to you and false to myself. It is this which hurts me, for my feelings toward you have not changed in any way."

Old Camposanto kept himself to himself and lived with his books and his dreams.

"Neither," she said, "have my feelings changed toward you."

"Then you will come to Camposanto with me, stopping only at Carmel to be married by the priest?"

"When?" she asked.

"Tonight. Now."

"I could hardly get ready before dawn."

"Let us start then at dawn."

"I must write some letters," she said, "leaving directions with certain neighbors about my doves and chickens and the disposal of such things as I cannot take with me. Meanwhile you could be comfortable on the sofa in the parlor. Tomorrow will be a long and hard day."

"We shall drive as far as Pfeiffers. Beyond, the road is impassable and we shall proceed on horseback. But it wouldn't be proper for me to spend the night in the house of my affianced bride. Lend me a pair of blankets. I will make shift to sleep a little in the car. But I shall not sleep very much because of the peace that is in my heart and the happiness."

He did not sleep at all. He saw the moon set and the dawn break. He enjoyed all the romantic feelings of a young man. For after all the "Diaz girl" was only forty, and she would always be beautiful and he had always loved her.

"And as for me," he thought, "I am not nearly as old as I ought to be."

And he recalled with infinite satisfaction the tremendous blow which he had landed on the point of Mrs. Kelley's jaw.

The door opened just as he was about to knock. The bride was ready, and so were her two suitcases, her letters and a package of sandwiches and another bottle of the old wine.

"The dispute between you and the dawn," said Camposanto, "as to which of you is the lovelier and the rosier would be fast and furious if either of you were in the least quarrelsome."

For a moment she laid her cheek against his shoulder. He was thrilled through and through.

"At my age," she said, "a woman thinks only of peace and contentment; but she doesn't feel too badly if a little romance is thrown in."

Camposanto broke a full blown rose from the vine that covered the porch and scattered the petals for her to walk on. Just then the sun peeped up over the rim of the mountains and it is possible that he winked at them.

During the night the self-starter with which the car was equipped had fallen to pieces and it was necessary to turn the engine over by hand. (Continued on page 135)

Bringing Up Children

Illustrations by

THERE is probably no subject in the world in regards to which people is worse informed than in regards to bringing up children and this in spite of the fact that pretty near everybody who has got a fountain pen has wrote a book of advice to both young and feeble-minded parents. You go in the book dept. of practally any store and the shelfs fairly reeks with $5.00 volumes by alleged infantile specialists adviceing you what to do with the kiddies from the time they are born till they join the Rotary Club. And these volumes outsells pretty near everything except writers like Sinclair Lewis and W. L. George because the minute the word gets around that somebody has got a new baby, why all their friends say to themselfs she is too much of a dumbbell to take care of it so we would better buy her a book. The trouble is that the books was mostly wrote by unmarried men and women doctors of both sexes that never roomed with a baby personly and can't even talk baby talk.

That is the worst trouble and the editors of this publication realizes it as well as I do and has asked me to write a article on the kiddies and how to handle them as I am in a position to know what I am talking about haveing broughten up what might be termed a bevy of babies and all of them a howling success. The article may not be as long as some of my admires might wisht but that is because I get paid by the mo. and not by the wd.

It is not my intentions to go into details in regards to the raiseing of each of my own little ones but rather to give a gen. outline or set of rules that will fit the average, subnormal, unhealthy child. I may bring in a few incidence out of my personal family experiences to illustrate this or that pt. but will try and not put nobody to sleep with same.

For the 1st. day or 2 after a baby is born they ain't hardly no trouble because they are too excited to want to eat. When they finely do get hungry it is my advice to give them the regular dinner instead of leaveing them order a la carte as they are libel to go too strong on meats and sweets and not get enough vegetables.

Practally all the text books is agreed on one pt. namely that a new baby should not be picked up every time they cry. My crede is to pick them up the minute they let out the 1st. squawk and then keep picking them up and dropping them, a little harder each time, till they get it through their head that you mean business.

One of the earliest bad habits which a baby gets into is biteing their thumbs. A great many doctors contends that the best way to cure them from this evil is to soak the thumbs in iodine or wooden alcohol or similar delicacy that they may not like the taste of, but I have knew babies that fooled everybody by acquireing a genuine passion for these kind of liquors and the next thing you know they are going around ½ the time with a fair size bun. The way I cured several of my kiddies from the thumb chewing episode was to hang them up by their thumbs till these digits was so sore that nobody would think of nibbling on them.

When the baby is from 4 to 8 mos. old they begin to cut their teeth which is the next thing you have got to stop, as teeth was never meant to be cut, only hair. In the 2d. place it looks to me like the higth of foolishness to encourage a baby in haveing their first set of teeth as they no sooner get to know how to handle them when they all fall out and a entire new set comes in which is a whole lot bigger and has got to be mastered with a different technique. These big teeth generally always crops out along about the age of 8 to 10 yrs. old and if a baby can't get on for that lenth of time without teeth, they are a mighty poor fish. Before I got to be a expert on babies I use to let these 1st. little teeth grow and wile they was growing the kids was all kinds of trouble, sometimes even breaking down and crying a specially at night. The books will tell you that this is natural and you should ought to let them cry and not walk the floor with them, but the babies I did have that cried over their teeth, I not only walked the floor with them but I mopped the floor with them till they got over the crying habit.

In this connection I might relate one little incidence which shows how quick a baby can think when they are scared. The baby referred to was my 12th. born who I named Clumsy after practally all his relatives. Well one night when Clumsy was about 8 and ½ mos. old he set up a terrific howl and I jumped out of bed and right after him like a wolf.

"What is it, Clumsy?" I said. "Cutting teeth?"

"Yes," he sobbed.

"Well," I said, "you know what that means; it means a good licking."

But just as I was about to grab him the little fellow suddenly stopped crying, smiled and then began to sing:

"Teething, teething, I was only teething you."

In the general gale of laughter that followed I forgot all about the threatened punishment and Clumsy was allowed to remain in his upper, unscathed.

When the baby is from 3 to 4 yrs. of age you have got to begin thinking about sending them to school unless they are going to be a cartoonist or a chorus gal. Personly I use to be strong for private schools till I got so many children that even if I sent ⅓ of them to one school it would half to be called public. However what kind of a school you send them to depends of course on if they are a boy or a girl and what subjects they seem to take the most interest in them. The majority of mine is too young so far for a person to tell exactly where I am going to send them with the possible exception of 2 boys who seems to be pointing themselfs for Leavenworth.

I believe in every child male and female learning some profession or trade and in the case of a girl that don't show no special talents in any special direction, why I would certainly send her to some good barber college as lady barbers is one of the highest paid and most neglected profession in the world. Then even if she marries well enough so as to not half to support herself, think what a helpmate she will be to her husband. The way it is now, how few men can look you in the eye and say "My wife shaves me"? Two at the outside.

In regards to gen. culture I think it is O. K. for kiddies of either sex to have a smatter of good and bad language and enough reading so as they can go to the picture shows alone and laugh themselfs sick over the sub-titles.

In my own family all the children has been obliged to study French so that if they are in the draft age dureing the next war they can go as interpreters. And I might add that I am the originer of a scheme which has proved very effective as a aid to their mastery of la belle France's tongue. The last time I was on the other side, as I have nicknamed Europe, I bought me a French chien gendarme, or police dog. Dureing meals the kiddies is compelled to converse only in français and Rover sits at the table in a regular chair, just like people. The instant he hears one of the children mispronounce a wd. or use one wrong, he reaches over and bites the culprit's cheek. As this is all the meal he gets you can bet that le petit chien keeps his ears and mouth open for mistakes.

Those is just a few of my idears in regards to bringing up children and as far as results is conserned, why we don't hardly ever half to call in a doctor more than once a wk. and the veterinary not that often.

The disease that seems to appeal to them the most is getting bored to death and in that case we call up the post office and have them send over the roulette wheel and let the little ones indulge themselfs in gambling. But my children is never allowed to play more than $50.00 on a single number. No checks cashed.

Maggie Qunanne

IT IS an accepted fact in Hollywood, which is necessarily a paradise of pretty women, that there are more beautiful girls to the square inch on the Savage lot than any other place on earth.

When you come to think of it, they are probably right.

Nor is it strange.

For Aaron Savage collects girls for his bathing beauties as a connoisseur collects pearls for his favorite string.

He has scoured the world to find gems of feminine loveliness that might set all men mad with desire and all women mad with envy.

More or less, he has succeeded.

And so high has been his standard, so keen his artistic vision, that at last his name has become a synonym for the beauty of woman.

Each year, as one or another steps from the ranks of the Savage beauties—steps up to motion picture stardom, to millionaire marriage, or down into a mire of dissipation that stains and ravages her face and body beyond redemption—each year he searches the highways and byways of the world anew, to reset his necklace.

From the boulevards of Paris. From the candy shops of Iowa. From the docks of Limehouse and the prairies of Canada. From the sands of Newport and the golf links of del Monte, he gathers girls as a naturalist treads deadly swamps and poisonous valleys for rare orchids.

Adrienne Latour, slim, impertinent, restless, her long black eyes set like the eyes of an Egyptian mummy, and her fluttering, white, butterfly hands never still. Speaking with the lure of the Parisian pavements that bred her.

Stately, placid Lucy Haverton, whose beauty was the beauty of an Italian lake at sunset and whose hair fell below her knees, spraying about her like a waterfall of pale gold fire. Hair that photographically occupied more space yearly than Congress.

Bobby Brown, with her turned-up nose and her bee-stung, scarlet lips parted over too perfect teeth, and her pugnacious gamin grin of a pretty baby boy. Her daring, audacious grace. Her impish bobbed curls.

Ethelyn Wells, all tenderly colored in rose and ivory, small and sweet and helpless. Ankles a man's two fingers overspanned. Eyes of a lovely nun. Smooth, silken, shining hair.

Patsy O'Brien, whose figure outrivaled that of the famous Venus of Milo. And who proved it by a series of comparisons that thrilled the newspaper reading public for several Sundays in succession.

Shrewd, cool, tantalizing, olive-skinned Maria Camarillo, round bosomed, sensuous throated, who could do things with a mantilla across her melting brown eyes that ought to be forbidden by the police.

Jill Manton, and Betty Adair, and Polly Forsythe, and Lillian Loring, just pretty—pretty.

About them, too, because of hard outdoor work and intense competition and the fact that they could depend so little upon clothes for their effects, a freshness that usually withers swiftly beneath the Cooper-Hewitts. Yet, after a time, all bearing a sort of family resemblance to each other.

It is almost too obvious, the things that are bound to happen on or in any place like the Savage lot.

The voltage of charm is too high. Normalcy cannot exist there. Disaster will come sometimes. Ambition will be smothered by the age-old call of mating. Or it will call to its aid every weapon that the rules of the game forbid. Passion and jealousy and hate and love—love in every guise, in every degree—all these are bound to stalk unleashed where beauty runs thus rampant.

It is a honey pot—a honey pot.

It is like an eternal springtime, where thoughts are dragged helpless and unwilling victims to love.

The Story of a Woman the whole World Loved but who was the Loneliest Woman in the World

Illustrations by Wallace Morgan

"No gutter pup like her," said Bobbie, "can make fun of our Maggie."

For the bathing girls were the picked beauties of a world.

And they had made Aaron Savage rich and famous and a power in the land of motion pictures.

The bathing beauties—and Maggie Qunanne.

Maggie Qunanne sat in her dressing room reading a book and eating large and very sticky chocolates from a big brown box.

It was a pretty dressing room, done tastefully in pale yellow chintz. A becushioned chaise longue. A beribboned rocking chair. A wicker fern stand. An expensive Persian rug.

Nevertheless Maggie sat upright on the dressing stool, one foot crooked through the rungs, her elbows planted on the littered dressing table.

Maggie nearly always sat on the stool. The truth of the matter, which she never explained, was that because she was so tall and so thin the chaise longue and the chairs and the davenport all hit her in exactly the wrong places and made her very uncomfortable.

It was cool and quiet in Maggie's dressing room. In reality, it was a specially constructed bungalow, built upon a bit of open space and boasting all the conveniences that should be given a woman who gets $2500 a week and is worth more.

Outside the latticed window a voice suddenly sang violently: "Hi, Maggie. Maggie! They're ready for you. Hurry up, 'cause it's late and the girls are getting cold on that open stage."

Reluctantly Maggie Qunanne put down her book.

She had never before stumbled across Mrs. Browning's sonnets.

Somehow her heart was pounding and throbbing and she felt the hot flow of a sweet, nameless loveliness rushing into her very temples.

That one:

> How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
> I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
> My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
> For the ends of Being and ideal Grace.
> I love thee to the level of everyday's
> Most quiet need, by sun and candlelight.
> I love thee freely, as men strive for Right;
> I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise.
> I love thee with the passion put to use
> In my old griefs, and with my childhood's faith.
> I love thee with a love I seemed to lose
> With my lost saints—I love thee with the breath,
> Smiles, tears, of all my life!—and, if God choose,
> I shall but love thee better after death.

Yes, women loved—were loved—like that. Why, all around her, every day, though they couldn't put it into words that sang and painted pictures, love existed that way. If she ever loved——

Her eyes fell on her image in the mirror, the triple, all-revealing mirror, circled round and round with glaring, high powered lights.

Then she grinned. Maggie's own famous, heart-warming, irresistible grin.

But her eyes were wet and she said impatiently: "Doggone, I'll have to fix that mascara again. Ain't I a fool? Well, any time an Irish old maid like me reads Portuguese sonnets, there's bound to be international complications."

The voice outside, very close, said: "Say, Maggie, you asleep? Didn't you hear me?"

Maggie Qunanne flamed instantly. "Doggone, Jimmy, get out from under my window before I pour dishwater on you. What'd you want me to do when you come round, burst into tears? You trying to bawl me out or show me a good time, which? I'm getting ready. I been sitting around here all day with my make-up on not turning a wheel, and then because you get ready you expect me to come leaping out of here like a young tuna. Go tell Derck I'll be on the set in a couple of minutes."

Jimmy O'Flaherty chuckled.

"All right. Don't wear yourself out, old girl."

But he said it lovingly and the chuckle ran through his words like a golden thread. Everybody on the lot spoke like that when they spoke to Maggie Qunanne, with a golden thread in their words. Not only to her, but of her.

Maggie now regarded herself with businesslike attention.

She was wearing a wide-striped dress of black and white, and after squinting a moment she pulled it about so that it swept the floor in back and hung almost to her knees in front, revealing the famous shoes and the dangling, tangled shoe laces. On her head was a hat that was the pride of Maggie's life, because she had actually found it in an ash can down on Los Angeles Street, and she lovingly regarded its bedraggled feathers and the stiff braids of her red hair.

One long, bony arm swung up with the inimitable gesture, and Maggie tilted the hat to exactly the right angle.

"Ain't that a feature?" said Maggie, openly tickled.

Swiftly she rearranged the mascara about her small, twinkling gray eyes. Added a line of lip rouge to the big up-quirk of her mouth. A last coating of powder to the pug nose that sat so impudently, so absurdly, in the wide expanse of her round face.

She looked at herself again and laughed.

She was right.

Just to look at Maggie was always a laugh.

As she went down the little steps of her dressing bungalow, quite unconsciously she stumbled over her dangling shoe laces—just as she stumbled over them on the screen and brought roars and deluges of laughter from the audiences that loved her so.

Their Maggie Qunanne!

Nobody knew, except perhaps dark, quiet Rosa—who had been with Maggie since the very beginning of things—that there was a time when that famous stumble and those marvelous dangling shoe laces had been very far from funny. When Maggie Qunanne had been cuffed and shaken and sent supperless to her narrow hard bed in the cold dormitory of the orphan asylum for entering the refectory just that way.

The beauties were all on the set. Attired in bathing suits constructed of a piece of black lace, a red, red rose and a Spanish comb.

"All of them put together wouldn't make me a respectable lamp shade, you shameless hussies," said Maggie as she came on the set.

With delighted laughter they swarmed about her. For above everything in the whole world the bathing beauties loved Maggie Qunanne.

And not only the bathing beauties.

Maggie was godmother to every child, cat and cockroach on the Savage lot.

She earned her twenty-five hundred a week and the rest of the studio borrowed it.

She had been maid of honor at every wedding the Savage lot ever had anything to do with. From the gorgeous spectacle that made little Eloise Hart the wife of young Jacky Van Alystyne and mistress of more millions than Maggie cared to count, to the small ceremony in the O'Flaherty's parlor, when Jimmy married the telephone operator and Maggie kissed the priest by mistake.

It was characteristic of Maggie that she sent exactly the same present to both weddings.

There were eight children named after her already and Maggie herself had held the slim, trembling hands of at least two young things and joked with them and laughed at them while life and death all but joined hands across their beds.

"Glory be," she said to Rosa afterwards, "but every pang should be dear to them, to think they're bringing a child into the world. What is a woman that's never had a child? The same as a ship that's never been to sea, I say."

Partly for these things the bathing beauties loved Maggie and went to her with tales that the world would have given much to hear. But it was mostly because Maggie always laughed. And when she laughed, you laughed. Maggie Qunanne was just as funny off the screen as she was on.

The scene for which Maggie had been called progressed famously.

It was a simple scene, and played by anybody but Maggie Qunanne it would have been only a trifle funny and more than a trifle vulgar.

A neglected wife strays into a brilliant, hectic cabaret in search of an erring husband, and once there by accident drinks more champagne than is good for her.

First, Maggie reduced the entire troop to such hysterics that it delayed getting the scene by an hour.

And yet, somehow, as she sat there in the gorgeous set, with the stupendous beauty of the bathing girls about her, with her funny old ash can hat on one side of her head and her shoe laces dangling and that impudent, bewildered smile on her face—somehow you got a picture of the heartache and the loneliness and the tortured bravery of every neglected wife everywhere. And you laughed through hot tears that you never intended to shed. And sobbed a bit in the midst of laughter that rocked you.

That was Maggie Qunanne's genius.

Back in her dressing room, Maggie tied a towel about her braids and began to take off her make-up, whistling softly.

She had almost covered her face with grease from a rubber brush when the door banged open.

No one ever knocked at Maggie's door.

"It's a good thing I'm virtuous," Maggie had once remarked, "because I get about as much privacy around this lot as a street car conductor in the Chicago Loop."

Bobby Brown perched like a pretty humming bird on the yellow chaise longue. Her scarlet underlip shot out. Her exquisite, slender body still revealed by the lace bathing suit.

"Hell," she said briefly, "I wish all the men in the world were at the bottom of the ocean!"

"Ye-uh?" said Maggie, intent on the cold creaming process. "That's an expensive and idle wish, Bobs, because you'd go buy yourself one of them deep sea diving suits in about six days."

Bobby shook her small dark head, her face aflame.

"You think I would—you're crazy. Men are the cat's whiskers. More than that, they're all alike. You think you've got one that's different, and what a sap you turn out to be. They're about as different as a lot of hen's eggs. Some are rotten and some are fresh, and that's all the difference. When you know one of 'em, you know 'em all. I'll tell the world."

"You and Warren had a row?" asked Maggie calmly.

"You can call it a row if you want to, but I'm going to call it a war. Why, that big spark plug misses me a couple of minutes at Henriette's party last night and—well, see for yourself."

She rubbed the heavy layers of powder from a slim firm arm and a dull purple spot glared up like a blind eye.

"You're lucky you haven't got any men hanging around you, Maggie," said Bobby Brown, with the suggestion of a whimper.

Beneath Maggie's freckles, where the cream had left her face soft and bare of make-up, a slow flood of dull crimson welled. Painfully, as though every throb tore loose a heartstring. And in Maggie Qunanne's gray eyes grew a look of fascinated, embarrassed anguish as they gazed down on that ugly dark spot that seemed to shriek aloud of primitive, elemental love of a man for a woman.

"Well—I don't know, Bobby," she said slowly. "A woman's a woman, and if she's a real woman she needs a man. A woman can't ever know what life is all about until she's known love. I'm—I'm only twenty-five, you know."

Bobby's brain was as shallow as a teaspoon and her heart as fickle as a bee in a flower garden, but she did adore Maggie.

"You don't mean—why, but——" she stammered, startled by the look that for the first time in all the months she had known her had now swamped the twinkle in Maggie's eyes; the look of a small and ugly and hungry child who stands daily amid beautiful toys she may not touch.

Maggie grinned. "Say, I tell you, Bobby, I think you're as much in love with Warren as you'll ever be. He's a nice boy. He'd make any girl a good, clean, decent husband. You ain't much good, you know, Bobs. You're an awful little darn fool. But you're so pretty you'll always be getting in trouble, with men falling in love with you. Funny, ain't it—you and me? Well, if you had even one brain cell working, you'd quit chasing around with morons like Eddie Welch and marry Warren, if he'll have you. He beat you up—don't lie to me, darlin'—because you were probably in some mischief. I know you. But it gives me respect for the lad, and he might make you behave yourself. But I don't suppose you will. Doggone, a home and a man that loves you and a baby"—violins came through her voice then, as violins creep through the brass of a Wagner overture—"that sounds more like my idea of Heaven than a tin harp and feathers. If I had——"

Maggie tilted the hat to exactly the right angle. "Ain't that a feature?" she said, openly tickled.

A boy's head, clean-cut, with the faintest scent of hair tonic and tobacco, poked itself through the half open window.

"Hello, Maggie," said the boy briefly. "Bobby, you coming home with me?"

Bobby, a little pale, her eyes unaccustomedly wet, nodded. Went out.

Maggie Qunanne put on her plain, expensively tailored brown suit. Adjusted her crush hat over the heavy, stiff red hair. Wrapped a luxurious fur about her throat.

In her shoes, Maggie's garments had cost her almost a week's salary.

And she was just as funny in them as she had been in the ash can hat.

Just exactly.

The gate of the unpainted, dilapidated, dirty old Savage studio at five-thirty is not unlike the stage door of a fashionable musical show at eleven-thirty.

Maggie saw Warren tuck Bobby Brown in the front seat of his stripped lizzie.

Saw Lucy Haverton, who was married to a young real estate dealer, run into his arms.

Saw Adrienne climb into Aaron Savage's twenty thousand dollar touring car.

Of course, she was Maggie Qunanne.

A nation loved her for the laughter she gave them.

Yet in all her life no man had ever looked at her as that boy looked down at Bobby Brown.

It beat all about her like the spiced scent of poppies. Like the throb of cellos. The thing in her own heart that created—created laughter and tears for a whole world—cried in a sudden ache of loneliness. Bled a little with desire to know the thing that creates life.

"You're such a wonder to me, Maggie," came Al's voice, softly. "And I'm cuckoo about you. You know I am."

Patsy O'Brien stopped her. "Say, you going to the preview of de Gamut's new picture out at the Beverly Hills Hotel? I hear it's going to be quite an affair, with supper and dancing afterwards. If you like, Porky and I'll stop for you."

Maggie patted her arm. The girls were so sweet to her. For that matter, everybody wanted Maggie Qunanne on a party. She was the wit, the soul, the life of it. And after all she was Maggie Qunanne.

But today she shook her head.

"You needn't mind, Patsy darlin'," she said, and this time the color came in a smooth, even flow. "I'm—I'm going with someone else."

Patsy shot her a surprised and delighted glance. "Why, Maggie Qunanne, you—you going with a beau? Have you got a beau?"

The woman who had so blessed the world with laughter walked to the expensive limousine that stood at the curb. The liveried chauffeur flung open the door for her as though she were a queen he loved to serve.

"Patsy, my child," said Maggie, "you're getting too fresh. I'll bet the first thing you know you'll be telling all the reporters I'm engaged or married or something. And then everybody'll laugh themselves to death. I may be a great comedian, but me in a wedding veil'd be the funniest scene I ever did in my life."

But as the big limousine sped over the crowded boulevard the great comedienne bowed her head against the purple velour cushions and cried as only a child can cry who has never had a mother.

The de Gamut preview was the first time the world ever saw Maggie Qunanne and Al Cassidy together.

II

Nobody on the Savage lot had ever paid any particular attention to Aloysius Cassidy.

He was the assistant manager of the local Savage exchange, from which the films were distributed, and now and then he came out to the studio for a consultation with the publicity and advertising departments or with Savage himself.

That was how he met Maggie Qunanne.

He seemed a nice enough fellow. Rather short and fat, with big blue eyes perpetually smiling and dimples that showed surprisingly in a smooth, tanned face.

Aside from a really nice smile there wasn't anything to notice about him, on the surface.

"But he certainly isn't good enough for Maggie," said Ethelyn Wells one night, when even her friends had begun to wonder if there was anything serious between them.

She and Bobby Brown had gone to bed and lay side by side in the darkness of their bungalow bedroom, speaking softly.

"W-well," said Bobby slowly, "if you come to that, Lyn, nobody's good enough for Maggie. But—she talked to me once, and I think Maggie's just crazy to get married and have kids. And you know what men are, Lyn. No use you and me kidding each other. Maggie's the greatest in this world but she's as homely as mud—and funny. That's what men think about mostly. Did Maggie ever have a beau before? And you and me have had thousands."

Ethelyn curled her knees up under her chin preparatory to sleep and murmured: "Al isn't a bad guy, at that."

"No, he ain't a bad guy at all," said Bobby sleepily, "and I don't care what that eel-nosed wife of Derck's says, I think he's crazy about Maggie."

"She's the kind of a woman somebody ought to put ground glass in her mashed potatoes, that Mrs. Derck," said Ethelyn. "I think he is, too."

He was.

"And he's got a mudder and a daddy," Maggie gurgled. "He's always going to have 'em, too."

The truth of the matter was that Al Cassidy loved with his sense of humor.

It has happened now and then.

Al didn't know it himself, but he would have hung his grandmother up by her toes for a good laugh. And he was very fond of his grandmother.

Never in the whole course of his easy-going, enjoyable, adventurous young life had he been able to take anything quite seriously. Even himself.

He played the piano better than well, he was full of ideas about how to exploit pictures, some of them good, and when he got a bad bumping at poker he usually had to dash down to the bank early next morning to cover the check.

He adored Maggie Qunanne with the breathless and delighted admiration an archæologist bestows upon a perfect discovery.

All his life he had wanted to know somebody that was always funny, but he had about given up hope when he met Maggie.

He loved her so much for being funny that he failed to realize her lack of many things which, as a young and hot-blooded Irishman, he had always assumed would belong to any woman he could love.

If, also, he thought occasionally, in unintentional flashes, of all her wealth and fame and the position she occupied in the film company for which he worked, it was only as a side issue. He had no objection to taking the good things of this world if he didn't have to go to jail for it, and life had always been beautiful and entertaining and comparatively easy for him so far.

But it was because he wanted to live with Maggie and be near her that he wanted to marry her.

Maggie's big gray shingle house hung on a hillside, and from the open porch the splendid tapestry of velvet blackness and spangled lights that was Hollywood flung itself at their feet.

Just the slimmest slice of a moon hung in the sky, and a soft backlight, from the shaded lamps in the big drawing room, shone luminously on Maggie's braided hair.

The perfume of the magnolia trees from the hillside below fairly beat in their faces, and the night about them was full of hill noises, the throbbing song of trees and crickets and sleepy toads. Faintly, from another house across the little gully, came the thrum of a banjo.

Maggie sat in one corner of the big swinging seat, the shining folds of a satin cloak about her.

And young Aloysius Cassidy smoked placidly in the other.

"'Tis a wonderful night," he said at last, under the spell of it all. "A night made for lovers, is it not, Maggie?"

Maggie chuckled. "And how should I know that? Did your mother bring you up to ask such questions of an unmarried young lady, now?"

"But in the dark, Maggie?"

"So much the worse, since you can't see my blushes. I dare say it's nights like this fill the divorce courts as well as the marriage license bureau."

"You're not very romantic, Miss Qunanne," he said, turning to smile at her.

"Is that so? Much you know about it. Because I'd not wear my heart on my sleeve for a bait the way some girls do nowadays."

"Well, all women are born actresses, so 'tis hard to tell," he sighed at her.

"Then there are some on our lot that aren't," said Maggie with a giggle.

Al moved instantly across the seat and leaned softly, pleasantly against the expensively perfumed silk of Maggie's shoulder.

And he felt the vast breath that shook her at the touch of him and at the little scent of tobacco and hair tonic and clean shaven skin that mingled suddenly with the magnolias.

"If—if you and I should be romantic tonight, Maggie darlin', d'you think you'd regret it in the morning?" he asked, a furry note in his voice.

"I'm willing to try any drink once, I guess," said Maggie shakily.

"Maggie—d'you mean that? Don't kid with me now, Maggie. I'm—I'm deadly serious."

"You don't know the meaning of the word, nor how to spell it. But a woman that won't believe a man on a night like this has no business sitting in a hammock with him. Go on, dear."

"Ah, but I am serious. You're such a wonder to me—and I'm cuckoo about you, Maggie. You know I am. I'm a fairly worthless sort of pup, but if you've got no other plans that would interfere and you've got no constitutional aversion to marrying—I'd like to try it, Maggie."

It was well that it was dark on the porch. For the tears suddenly flowed over Maggie's smile and a wave of gorgeous, uplifting, primeval passion took her by the throat and almost sent her to her knees before him.

Instead, softly, she said: "Well, we'll both be taking a terrible chance, I doubt not, Aloysius. You marrying a nameless waif out of an orphan asylum, and me marrying an Irishman, whom God knows make the best soldiers and the worst husbands on earth. But I have took the short end of worse bets in my life—and you'd never believe me if (Continued on page 126)

Stories That Have

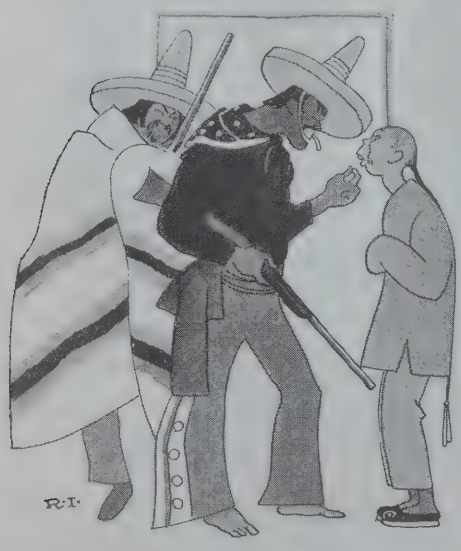
MR. DAUGHERTY by his recent opinion has given fresh impetus to the output of Prohibition anecdotes. People are now telling about the American Shipping Board vessel which encountered a heavy storm, and as a reward for the plucky way in which the crew worked the pumps all night the captain served them each an extra tot of vanilla ice cream soda. On another voyage, a U. S. Shipping Board vessel was fog-bound off the Grand Banks and as the lookout finished his turn in the crow's nest the poor, half frozen fellow was immediately restored to warmth and comfort by being given a Volstead Act prescription calling for one pint of rye whisky to be filled at the nearest registered pharmacy some 2,200 miles away.

In thus pitying the poor sailor at sea "on such a night as this," Mr. Thomas Maitland Cleland, the well known decorative artist, told me the following story:

Two men were discussing the untimely demise of a friend.

"I understand he died of lumbago," one of them said.

"He did not die of lumbago," the other insisted. "He had lumbago, but he didn't die of it. He died of an accident."



"An accident?"

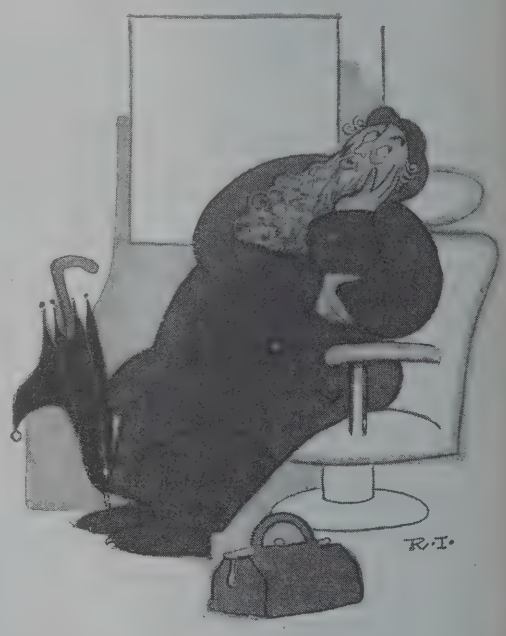
"Sure!" said the man who had the straight of it. "He had lumbago, and they rubbed his back with alcohol."

"And did it poison him?"

"It did not," the man who knew the correct version replied. "They rubbed his back with alcohol, see? And he tried to lick it off, see? And he died of a broken neck."

DURING the fairly recent revolutionary disturbances in Mexico, marauding bands of Carranzistas and Huertistas wandered around the villages of the Mexican mining country south of the Arizona border. Whenever one of these bands entered a village they immediately entered the first store they came to and asked the proprietor, "Who are you for—Carranza or Huerta?"

It was then up to him to do some quick guessing. If he shouted "Viva Huerta!" and the band happened to be Carranzistas, they cleaned out the store and beat up the proprietor.



One Chinaman who kept a store in a little village in the State of Sonora was raided by a band of Huertistas. He was a poor guesser, for when they asked him who he was for he shouted "Viva Carranza!" and immediately suffered the penalty. Leaving him half dead, they next entered the only other store in the village, kept by a man called Finkelstein. Mr. Finkelstein had heard his neighbor shout "Viva Carranza!" and had witnessed the consequence. When the leader of the band, therefore, asked him who he was for, he at once shouted "Viva Huerta!" and escaped scot free.

The following week another band of marauders entered the village and once more the Chinaman's store was visited. He was no better guesser than before. This time the raiders were Carranzistas and after the Chinaman had shouted "Viva Huerta!" there was absolutely nothing left of his store and very little of the Chinaman himself. Again, however, Mr. Finkelstein profited by the Chinaman's hard luck and also got rid of an active business competitor, for the Chinaman, now thoroughly discouraged, abandoned the wreck of his store and decided to smuggle himself into the United States.

Just one week later a third band of revolutionaries entered the village, and on this occasion Mr. Finkelstein had nothing to guide him in his choice of sides. The leader brought in a vile looking Chulo who spoke Tia Juana English.

"What you going say?" the interpreter asked the storekeeper. "Viva Carranza or viva Huerta?"

Mr. Finkelstein patted the interpreter's shoulder affectionately. "My friend," he said with an ingratiating smile, "you viva first, and then I'll viva."

THE low railroad rates to the Pacific coast last summer caused a number of people to travel on transcontinental trains who had never traveled before. One of these, says Mrs. Leroy Scott, was an old man with a long white beard. He sat in a Pullman seat as the Overland Limited sped through the State of Illinois on the first night out of Chicago, and every few minutes the old man beat his chest as mournfully as the Wedding Guest in the "Rime of the Ancient Mariner," without, however, the bassoon obligato. He supplemented this by exclaiming at intervals: "Oy!" and sometimes: "Oy! Weh ist mir!"

A fellow traveler across the aisle was much interested in this exhibition of grief, but during the first night he respected the old man's private sorrow and said nothing. Nor did he out of a mistaken sense of delicacy try to find out what was the matter with the old man on the second day out when, as the train passed through the States of Iowa and Nebraska, the old gentleman continued to present a picture of great woe, beating his breast and exclaiming: "Oy!" and once in a while: "Oy! Tzuris!"

On the third day, however, while the train was passing through the desert, the sight of the old man's misery became too much for his fellow traveler. All day long the bearded gentleman had groaned and beat his chest, and finally his sympathetic neighbor came over and sat next to him.

"My friend," he began, "you seem to be in serious trouble. Maybe I can help you out."

The old gentleman shook his head and groaned some more. Also he beat his chest and said "Oy!" a couple of times.

"Now come," his neighbor said, putting his arm around the old man's shoulders. "Tell me what the trouble is."

"Oy, Weh ist mir!" the old man said. "Three days already I am on the wrong train."

EX-BARTENDERS have been forced by Prohibition into many industries so foreign to their late calling that one is not at all surprised to hear about Ed Callahan, formerly of a well known San Francisco bar, who obtained a job as a shepherd. Ed knew nothing whatever about sheep except that they had rib chops and loin chops which he had usually seen on a plate with potatoes and vegetables flanked by a large schooner of steam beer. Nevertheless, when Ed was offered the position of shepherd on a lonely ranch in Northern California by an old patron of his late bar, he gladly embraced the opportunity. Ed figured that as long as there were no more bars to tend, he might just as well tend sheep. His boss took Ed up to the ranch and left him there as shepherd for about six weeks. At the end of that time the boss returned and Ed met him at the nearest railroad station with a couple of horses.

"Boss," Ed said as they rode toward the ranch some twenty miles away, "have you come up here to tell me you don't want me to be shepherd no more?"

"Why no, Ed," the boss said. "I'm satisfied if you are."

"I'm satisfied all right," Ed said.

"Then you like the job of being shepherd?"

"Like it first rate," Ed replied. "The only thing is, are you sure you want me to stay on as shepherd?"

"Why certainly," the boss replied.

"Then if you want me to stay on as shepherd, boss, you'll have to get some new sheep," Ed said. "All them old ones has lit out on you."

MR. CHARLES DILLINGHAM, the theatrical manager, said the other day that in one of his musical comedies the ladies of the chorus were taking off their make-up when the stage doorkeeper stuck his head in the door.

"Miss Katie," he said to one of the veteran performers,

"there's a lady outside says she's a friend of yours. Shall I show her in?"

"What's her name?" Katie asked.

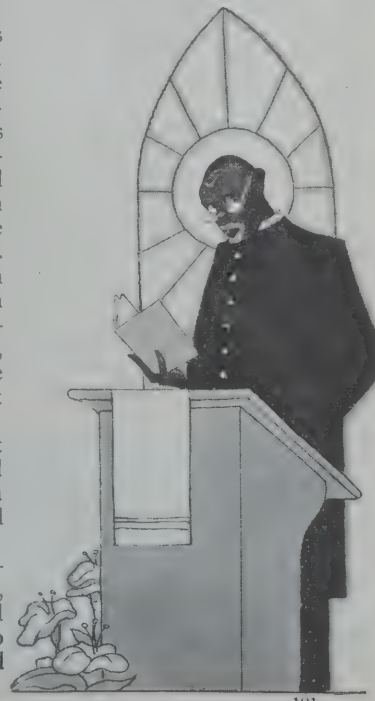
"Johnson," the stage doorkeeper replied.

"I don't know no Johnsons," Katie said. "Tell her I ain't in."

A few minutes later the stage doorkeeper returned.

"She says you do know her, Miss Katie," he said. "She says Johnson's her married name. She used to be a Miss Anderson and she says she went to school with you."

"She went to school with me, did she?" Katie said. "All right, show her in."



One of the youngest and prettiest members of the chorus turned to the stage doorkeeper and said: "Wait a minute, Bill. Did you say this lady went to school with Katie?"

"That's what she said," Bill replied.

"Then don't show her in," the young thing said. "Wheel her in."

A COLORED preacher in a small Southern town was standing in his pulpit one day when a most unfortunate incident occurred; that is to say, unfortunate for him. He had led a blameless life for forty-odd years except for one term of five years in the San Quentin penitentiary, and the unfortunate incident was the presence in the congregation upon that particular Sunday of a fellow convict. No other member of the congregation knew of its pastor's early fall from grace, since San Quentin was some two thousand miles away. All along he had felt quite certain that the dead past had buried its dead, when this jet-black bolt from the blue arrived plumb into the front row of his church.

However, the pastor was quite equal to the occasion. He glanced sternly over the congregation, and then taking the Good Book in his hand he emitted a loud impressive cough and thumbed over the pages as though seeking for an appropriate text. At last he found it.

"Brethren," he said in rich, unctuous tones, "Ah will take mah text this mawnin' from the eighth chapter, the thirty-first verse of the apostle George, whar' it say . . ."

Here he cleared his throat in saintly fashion and fixed his former associate in San Quentin with a meaningful glance.

"Whar' it say," he continued: "Dem what see me, and reckernize me, and don't say nuffin about it to nobody, yea verily, dem will I see afterwards."

ring that had begun to form, and away from the curb, where the grumbling chauffeur was settling into place behind his wheel, and where Lanyard had been preparing to beckon in the first vacant cab.

"But you want another taxi——"

"Not I, monsieur. It is but a step, where I am going. As for this rain, it is nothing"—she held out a hand—"already it has ceased. And surely I can count upon your gallantry . . ."

He consented with entire good nature—"As ever, irresistible, Liane!"—and found himself with the woman on his arm rounding the corner and moving toward Sixth Avenue. "New York, by what appears, has the honor of entertaining you once again . . ."

"Again? But still, if you please!"

"Proving the weakness of deductive reasoning," he observed. "When one saw you in a hired cab, one inferred you were merely a bird of passage."

"But I have never been away, monsieur; never since that luckless voyage which landed us here last spring. I find it amusing, this great town; as Paris is no more, alas! Thanks to the war and the poor health of the franc . . . As for that infamous taxicab, I ask you: what is one to do when one's own car is, as these quaint Americans put it, laid out?"

"Laid up."

"Laid out or laid up—it is all the same."

"I believe you," Lanyard chuckled—"at my age Liane."

He was aware, but seemed not to be, of sidelong scrutiny, keenly inquisitive.

"Is it that you begin to find yourself bored with this America, Michael?"

"Ah!" he replied, "I must not complain."

"The old life calls, eh?" (So she construed that equivoque as confirming her surmise; which argued an anxiety to do so. But why?) "You miss something, my friend, in this land where more things are verboten than in Germany before the war?"

"I miss my youth," Lanyard admitted, with a rueful sigh—"those misspent years!"

"You would have them back?" she demanded inquisitively. "What for? To misspend them all over again?" He smiled illegibly; she laughed in impish glee. "I felt sure of it when I thought of you today, Michael. I said to myself: By this time he will be well weary of this country of atrocious cookery, ice water and virtue with the indigestion."

"You, then, knew I was still here?"

"One was so informed."

"One has, it seems, friends of whose kind interest one was unaware."

"It was a little bird that told me."

"An idle little bird, if it finds no better gossip to twitter than the tale of my dull days."

"It is truly as I said!" She squeezed his arm. "You are bored. So, then! a little patience and you will call it, as do I, a happy chance that threw me in your way tonight."

"Impossible that one should esteem it otherwise."

Lanyard smiled down at the woman, openly taking advantage of the illumination of a street lamp to study her.

In her day reputed the most beautiful demi-mondaine in Paris and the most dangerous, the old allure of her charms, by this tricky light at least, seemed unimpaired; while that she was still dangerous one had memories of events by no means stale to prove. And now what diablerie was she fostering behind that mask of fair, seductive flesh? What mischief had she in mind that required his cooperation?

An innate flair for anything in the nature of an intrigue stirred in its sleep, lifted its head, sniffed the wind with eager nostrils . . .

They arrived at Sixth Avenue; the hand under his arm gently led him south again in the shadow of the elevated.

"It is a long step to this rendezvous of yours, Liane."

"Patience—we are nearly there. Or is it that your soul has grown so deeply ennuied even I——"

"To the contrary, as you see, I am coming along quite peaceably. I have but one regret."

"And that?"

"It desolates me to know we must part so soon."

"This way, incorrigible." Guiding him across the avenue, the woman held on toward Broadway. "What hour is it, do you know?"

"A quarter to one," Lanyard reported on the advice of his watch.

"Then I am fifteen minutes beforehand——"

"That is to say, practically unsexed."

"Furthermore, my friends are never on time. Why not keep me company while I wait, and enjoy a little raking over of old scandals?"

"It would be a pleasure, Liane; but are you sure——"

"We are arrived."

The woman was diverging toward a dwelling which wore an aspect of too much decorum; a modest establishment with just two windows on the street level diffusing a benign domestic glow through heavy draperies behind stout bars of iron, and a tight-lipped look about the solid door at the back of its mildly lighted vestibule.

Coupling the atmosphere of its environment, which was both tawdry and rowdy, with certain rumors that had come to his attention, the reticent expression of the house with the rank of private cars that lined the curb before it, Lanyard hazarded with an accent of distaste: "The Clique Club, eh?"

"You are acquainted?"

"Only with its reputation. One hears that the percentage of mortality resulting from indulgence in its bootliquor is unusually low."

"Do you suspect me of luring you here to poison you, Michael?"

"Not while you remain incontestably the mistress of weapons so much more deadly than mere lawless moonshine. Moreover, it is written in my horoscope, curiosity will be the death of me."

Liane giggled, planting a finger on a push button which, Lanyard remarked she located without looking. By way of response a horizontal slit opened in the upper half of the door and through this a pair of anonymous eyes looked them over. Lanyard without favor, but otherwise in respect of the woman. Then with an impressive clanking and thumping of chains and bolts, the door swung wide, disclosing an entry, the habitat of a good actor in the make-up of a movie gangster, functioning as Cerberus to this institution of post-Prohibition New York. And passing through a second and less formidable door, Lanyard and the woman entered a reception hall of voluptuous embellishment and devilishly subtle illumination.

Here, in a chair before an ardent grate, a youthful odalisque was lounging with crossed knees, a waspy young blood of the town was holding a pose of elegance with elbow on the mantel, and both were engaging in conversation an overmannered person distinguished by ornate evening dress and the beak and bald head of a bird of prey: a scene that might readily have passed for one in a private home but for wild squalls of jazz drifting down the broad staircase and the vibration of the floor above with the rhythmical shuffle and stamp of many feet.

At sight of the newcomers the hairless animal with a perfect bow excused himself to his gossips and glided forward, smirking, shaping deferential shoulders, giving his bleached talons a good air-wash.

"Mademoiselle Delorme!" he uttered in accents of intense gratification.

"Good evening, Theodore," Liane gave him in French, with friendly nonchalance. "Monsieur Morphew is here so soon, no?"

"Not yet, mademoiselle. But before long, beyond doubt . . ."

"The usual room? We will go up and wait . . . But I believe you do not know Monsieur Lanyard, Theodore."

"The Clique Club is so unfortunate," Theodore deplored, saluting Lanyard profoundly, "as not to number monsieur among its members."

"And very stupid of it, if you ask me," Liane retorted. "See that he gets a card, will you?"

"You are much too gracious, Liane; I shall have so little use for a guest card——"

"What are you talking about, Michael? Guest card! I should say not. I am proposing you for membership. It costs nothing when one is properly introduced. Eh, Theodore?"

"As mademoiselle says . . . If Monsieur Lanyard will be so kind as to let me have his full name and address . . ."

With a shrug, Lanyard gave in. After all, it didn't matter . . . And when he had duly been entered in the club register, Theodore escorted the newly fledged member to the foot of the stairs, upon which Liane Delorme was picturesquely waiting and there turned both over to the guidance of a highly polished subaltern.

Wide doorways on the first landing disclosed a chain of rooms dedicated to the rights of jazz—liquid, instrumental, terpsichorean. Calculated to remind a crusading clergyman of Belshazzar's feast, they reminded Lanyard of almost any Broadway restaurant at midnight.

On the second landing, however, a break in the dance music below made audible the heartless laughter of an ivory ball coquetting with a roulette wheel behind one closed door, while a waiter emerging from another room permitted a glimpse of a private supper party at the peak of its load an interior tolerably Hogarthian.

Lanyard exchanged amused glances with Liane. "Busy little club," he commented, "but wants rechristening—Clique's far too conservative—should be known as the Liberal."

At the rear end of the hall another door admitted to a prettily furnished supper room, where a table was being laid and, in coolers on a side table, several bottles of champagne were enjoying their last rest. Requesting the waiter in attendance to open one of these, Liane shrugged out of her wrap—which Lanyard took, though he kept his overcoat on by way of pointing an intention to stop for a few minutes only—and having made himself at ease upon the club fender of an open fire, clinked her glass to Lanyard's.

"To you, my too long lost friend, and to me—to a friendship that has known too many interruptions and must henceforth know fewer."

He toasted with cool ambiguity: "To a rapport more complete."

And when with professional ease the waiter had faded from their knowledge, the woman dimpled bewitchingly and patted the broad seat of the fender.

"Come, sit by my side, Michael; let us talk."

"With all the pleasure in life," he assented, placing himself at a discreeter distance than she had designated. "On one condition, my dear Liane—none of your artfulness."

"Michael!" she reproached, delighted. "You don't trust me?"

"Really, you read one's mind."

"Don't be alarmed, my old one." She made a face to match her tone of mocking reassurance. "I was mad about you once, I don't deny, but that was long ago. Besides, you little know me if you think it likely I would lay myself open to be scorned another time."

"I little know you," Lanyard conceded, "whatever I may think; and I've got the quaintest notion, Liane, that the less I learn about you the more likely I am to enjoy ordinary peace of mind. Be a good child, now; treat me as you would a father, not as you might a prospective papa. Tell me: what the deuce is your little game?"

"Game?" she repeated, petulant. "Michael, my dear—your manners aren't as good as they were when your morals were worse."

"Admit that you didn't ask me up here to amuse yourself with innocent flirtation."

"That is true."

"Admit, then, I am pardonably curious."

"Well! if you will have the truth . . . When I got over being foolish about you, Michael . . . How long ago it seems!"

"A good half-year."

"I found I was still fond of you. When all's said about that sad affair, you know, it was I who was rather a devil, and you who were rather a dear. I owe you for more than one good turn I never did anything to deserve."

"I wish I might think your associates in that adventure had come out of it as well disposed."

"That absurd Monk, that clown Phinuit! Why bother your head about such canaille?"

"And what has become of the precious pair?"

Plump but pretty shoulders described a graphic gesture of indifference. "I know nothing of them since that day when last you saw us all together. I was out of patience with them then—as I think you guessed. When you dismissed us, I sent them packing. And you?" Lanyard, smiling, shook his head, and the woman cheerfully consigned reminiscence to the grave of those dead yesterdays where it belonged. "Tell me now about yourself."

"What is there to tell?"

"Much, monsieur. You are a mystery."

"I am flattered . . ."

"That's all blague," the woman scoffed. "You know I'm interested in all you do. I've just told you so, and why." She endured his quizzical scrutiny with an open and friendly countenance, more entertained than irritated by his mistrust. "Surely, my dear, you've not been misbehaving so badly you need hesitate to confide in me."

"But a little while ago you were telling me my life was dull."

"You don't find it so?"

"But you might the tale of it. Tastes differ."

"One is to infer your conduct has been good?"

"Irreproachable—by certain standards."

"Mine?"—Liane twinkled—"or yours?"

"Yours, certainly, since I hesitate to bore you."

The woman gave a moment of playful impatience. "But you are provoking! And not at all polite!" Lanyard looked apologetic and said nothing. "Very well, then! If you won't answer when I ask you prettily, I presume I shall have to tell you all I know about yourself."

Lanyard pricked up his ears. "The little bird again?" he hazarded.

She nodded solemnly. "It is industrious; every day it brings me news of this and that."

"And it tells you what of this?"

"Enough to make you what I styled you just a moment ago—a mystery."

"Is it permitted to ask, how a mystery?"

"Assuredly. To begin with: It is now six months since you settled down, apparently to vegetate in this dry climate."

"You distrust appearances?"

"Always when so far out of character. It is not like Michael Lanyard to become static all at once. But here you live quietly, in the cheapest decent lodgings, you have no callers, you write few letters, you see no friends—but one—and spend no money on yourself; only when you are seen in public with Madame de Montalais you seem indifferent to expense. You see?"

"I see one thing plainly: that it were well to put salt on the tail of that little bird and wring its damned neck."

"But do you not see that this is, in one of your history, questionable conduct? It is too much like reversion to your old days, when you lived solitary and worked alone, making the name of the Lone Wolf famous in Europe by following out your theory that a thief to be successful should have no friends to betray him."

"But today!" Lanyard remonstrated. "The source of this astonishingly detailed and accurate information about my modest habits can hardly have failed to assure itself that they are all well within the law."

"On the surface. As were those of Michael Lanyard, the famous Parisian connoisseur of art, before the war. But the cunning that made it possible for the Lone Wolf to maintain that disguise, unsuspected by the keenest criminal investigators of the Continent, has not necessarily failed with years. To the contrary—what you did once you should be able to do again, with even greater success, since you are now older, less hotheaded, more astute. Let me tell you, my dear friend," the woman concluded with an unmistakable note of earnestness, "they have great respect for your abilities, those who are interested in you today."

"It seems, then," said Lanyard, after a thoughtful pause, "I have to thank you for a warning."

"I would be an ungrateful wretch did I fail to give it, who owe you my life twice over at least."

"I think we may call that debt canceled if you'll answer one question."

"No questions!" A jeweled hand flashed a sign of refusal. "I have said more than was wise as it is."

He persisted: "You won't tell me?"

"Ask me nothing, my friend," Liane Delorme begged. "But use your wits; they will tell you more than I dare, perhaps—fond as I am of you, Michael; they are more to be trusted. Remember, with women like me self-interest is ever at work. Perhaps it may be that the pleasure of seeing you tonight has made me for once self-forgetful; another time may find me less indiscreet."

"I will be careful," Lanyard said gravely, "not to expect too much . . ."

With equal gravity she responded, "Then you will be wise."

"And now," he concluded, rising, "your friends can't be much longer; I mustn't put them to the trouble of kicking me out."

Liane put out a hand and caught his, detaining him. "But I wish you to stay. I promise you will be welcome. My friends will be delighted. And one of them in especial I am anxious that you should know. You will find him well worth your while, one of the most interesting men in New York, quite a social power in his way."

"In his way?"

"A quiet way, my friend, but a very real one."

There was more meaning in her eyes than in her words. Lanyard faltered in doubt. Impossible to misread the sincerity of her desire to have him stay on. But her motive?

He had delayed too long. Voices sounded in the hallway, the gay accents of a woman predominating. Then the door opened, five people entered.

CHAPTER III

The first was a pretty young thing, darkly piquant and petite, with glowing face and merry eyes, at sight of whom Lanyard felt warranted in breathing an invocation to his prophetic soul. For now, it seemed, chance or predestination was making good that presentiment to which he had confessed during supper at the Ritz.

This brilliant little shape of life framed in the dark rectangle of the doorway had been conspicuously one of that party whose forbidding host had excited the aversion of Eve de Montalais and, in himself, half formed forebodings. The man at whom she was so gayly gurgling over her shoulder, who wore both topper and grin at the doggish slant which becomes the author of an amusingly improper wheeze, was the little chap of the weazened wise mask whom Lanyard privately reckoned court jester to the Sultan of Loot. The latter in very person bulked in the shadowy background provided by the corridor, a presence vast but vague, betrayed by the baleful burning of fire opals much as a thunderhead on a summer's night may remain more sensed than seen till a glimmer of lightning lends definition to its loom. Behind lurked a fourth, a figure still more indefinite. And in the rear a gleam picked out the hairless poll of Theodore, inclined at a servile angle.

Discovering Liane Delorme all at once, the lady on the threshold registered rapture, then ran to her with glad hands extended, her slight little body bearing an extravagant wrap of Russian sables with a grace as dainty as a fay's. Lips that didn't need paint to point their pretty contours bubbling joyously—"Darling Liane! You luscious thing! How we've missed you!"—she precipitated herself into Liane's arms and printed inconsiderate kisses upon that studiously composed complexion. When she permitted Liane to disengage and present Lanyard, he received an almost disconcertingly cordial smile and a tiny hand on which blazed in insolent beauty what he rated at first glance the most exquisite emeralds he had ever seen, who in his day had been somewhat an amateur of emeralds.

"Mr. Lanyard!"—Liane's introduction had been effected in English—"I am so glad to know you! It seems to me Liane knows all the interesting people—and nobody else!"

"One trusts very truly you will not tonight find need to revise that recommendation," Lanyard returned, bowing low over the little hand. He added with an inquiring inflection, because he wasn't sure of having caught the name aright: "Mrs. McFee . . ."

"Mrs. Folliott McFee," Liane supplied, with an accent on the Folliott that supplemented something to this sense: Surely you must know that magic name!

All the same, Lanyard didn't . . .

"Folly for short," laughed Mrs. McFee. "Folly to my friends." Then she gave a small make-believe shriek because the sable robe was being lifted from her shoulders by the gentleman of the carven countenance. "Peter Pagan! how you startled me . . . You know Peter Pagan, of course, Mr. Lanyard; everybody does."

"Business of initiating you to the inner circle of certified somebodies, Mr. Lanyard," quoth Mr. Pagan solemnly, shaking hands and leaving Lanyard with a feeling that no man had a right to look like that if he couldn't extemporize more tellingly.

But Liane had dropped a hand upon his sleeve and was drawing him aside to be made known to the Sultan of Loot.

"Mr. Morphew—Mr. Lanyard . . . You must become good friends, you two who are both such good friends of mine."

This impressive figure of the immobile and livid face and the hooded eyes, this Mr. Hugh Morphew, met Lanyard with a manner subtly allusive beneath a show of noncommittal courtesy. His smile was grave, reticent and fugitive, a solitary cat's-paw flawing the surface of plumbless deeps; his few words were carefully chosen and cast in polished periods by an orotund voice: he was honored to make the acquaintance of Mr. Lanyard and hoped that he, as a friend of Mademoiselle Delorme, would be so very good as to become one of their number for the remainder of the evening . . . But in the cast of his eye, the clasp of his hand, in an undertone his accents had as he pronounced these perfunctory phrases, there was meaning intended to be seized by Lanyard only, and which the latter interpreted much to this effect: We have been waiting a long time for this meeting, you and I. But patience; all in good time we will come to understand each other perfectly . . .

To this finesse Lanyard returned no acknowledgment of any sort. Indeed, he contrived to appear unconscious of it, to interpose an amiable and modest manner between a nature anything but easy to impress and the scrutiny of those inquisitive but illegible eyes. He had lived so long in this world, in the course of a busy life had had so much to do with pretentiousness, that, secretly and the innuendoes of Liane Delorme to the contrary notwithstanding, he inclined to suspect Mr. Morphew of being a pompous fraud, a character of the utmost commonplaceness skulking behind the consequential false front of a jerry-built personality. He might be mistaken; but for the present the best he was disposed to grant Mr. Morphew was suspended judgment.

Moreover, at the moment, Folly McFee was demanding his attention on behalf of one Mr. Mallison, another whom Lanyard remembered having noticed at the Ritz.

This final introduction was transacted without casualties but without eliciting expressions of ecstasy from either party. Mr. Mallison, indeed, was unaffectedly offhand in his attitude; he didn't care a damn who knew that, to him, Mr. Lanyard was an interloper, an upstart, nobody in particular. A gesture for which Lanyard was grateful since it enabled him to reciprocate the sentiment that shaped it without feeling remiss in the matter of everyday urbanity.

Tall and gracefully made, Mr. Mallison aired evening clothes and hair of a luster seldom to be observed this side of the cinema screen. His speech had the tune of the educated English, or something nearly resembling it; his manners were silky and sulky; he practiced a furtive smile down his nose as if he knew something but wouldn't tell; he had mastered a killing trick or two of the eyes for use in talking to women. And when it transpired, on the word of Folly McFee, that Mally tangoed quite too divinely, one felt that one needed to know no more . . . A person of importance, if you asked Lanyard, solely as he might upon occasion shine with incandescence borrowed from the genius of Mr. Morphew, upon whom Mallison was assiduous to fawn in season and out.

Having offered the apology for his intrusion which custom prescribed and accepted the equally conventional assurance that all hands were ravished to have the privilege of welcoming one so well sponsored, Lanyard settled down to use his wits, as Liane had recommended, and find out for himself what this party was all about; if, indeed, it was "about" anything more unusual than mankind's native predisposition to make light of whatever laws there be.

Certainly, if its members had foregathered at the Clique Club for any purpose other than the desire to drink forbidden wine upon premises of unholy repute, it wasn't at first blush apparent. Nobody was hungry, every soul present having sat through a supper elsewhere and earlier. On the other hand, everybody was famously thirsty with the exception of Mr. Morphew, who was alleged never to drink, and Lanyard who, having sampled it, didn't care a great deal for the Clique cellar. But all of a sudden Folly McFee, in whom artificial exhilaration was mounting apace, announced that she craved sure enough excitement. Whereupon, at a sign from Morphew, the cloth was whisked away and the green baize of a card table disclosed; whose top manipulation of a hidden catch reversed, bringing to light a small layout for roulette, complete but for chips and the metal wheel to fit in the wooden bowl. These being supplied by Theodore, Mr. Morphew announced that he would take first turn as banker and croupier in one, and that white chips would cost one dollar apiece and the sky would be the limit; Mrs. McFee produced an impressive roll of bills from a jeweled mesh bag and bought chips with a free hand; while Liane Delorme, Mallison and Pagan purchased more conservatively but still eagerly.

But Lanyard, when Morphew's heavy lidded eyes turned his way, shook his head: "Thanks; but if you don't mind I'll just look on."

"Oh, Mr. Lanyard!" Folly McFee remonstrated—"and you look like such a good sport."

"You see how deceitful I am," Lanyard pointed out. "Let this be a lesson to Folly, not to trust appearances."

"But really, my friend!" Liane observed reproachfully, "you are no longer the man you were."

"I have always made it a rule not to gamble without money in pocket."

"But I will let you have any amount you want . . ."

"You are too good, Liane. Another rule I have all my life observed is never to gamble with borrowed money."

"Your credit is good, Mr. Lanyard," Morphew put in tersely.

"Rule number three: Never play on credit . . . I am deeply sensible of your courtesy, Mr. Morphew, but really I will be most grateful if you will permit me merely to sit by and look on. The novelty of seeing myself in such a rôle at a roulette table will be compensation enough for such self-denial."

"As you prefer . . ." Morphew gave in politely. But before long he made occasion to exchange with Liane a look dark with meaning, which Lanyard wasn't supposed to see and which, so far as anybody else knew, he didn't, who was busy just then obliging Folly McFee by refilling her glass and making amused response to the coquetry with which the flushed and laughing face turned up to his was instinct.

All the same, Lanyard was missing precious little that went on; life had too well trained his faculties to overlook nothing that fell within their range and to be wary of dismissing as necessarily

Why the skin of your face is especially sensitive

It is a well-known scientific fact that the nerves which control the blood supply are more sensitive in the skin of your face than elsewhere—and that consequently the skin of your face is more liable to disturbances.

For this reason the soap which you use daily on your face should be of the best quality obtainable.

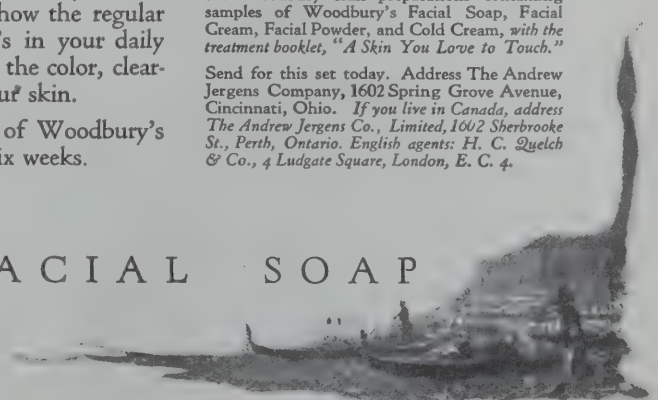
Get a cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap today. See how the regular use of Woodbury's in your daily toilet will improve the color, clearness, texture of your skin.

A 25-cent cake of Woodbury's lasts a month or six weeks.

The right treatment for a skin that is subject to blemishes

Just before you go to bed, wash in your usual way with warm water and Woodbury's Facial Soap, finishing with a dash of cold water. Then dip the tips of your fingers in warm water and rub them on the cake of Woodbury's until they are covered with a heavy cream-like lather. Cover each blemish with a thick coat of this and leave it on for ten minutes. Then rinse very carefully, first with clear hot water, then with cold.

Use this treatment for a skin that is too oily



First cleanse your skin by washing in your usual way with Woodbury's Facial Soap and luke-warm water. Wipe off the surplus moisture, but leave the skin slightly damp. Now with warm water work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap in your hands. Apply it to your face and rub it into the pores thoroughly—always with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with warm water, then with cold. If possible rub your face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

negligible the most minor and incidental details of any affair. He was beginning now to experience glimmerings, to perceive that this curious post-midnight party was "about" something after all. Even before intercepting that mute consultation of eyes he had felt tolerably satisfied that a community of interests existed between at least three of those present; that Liane, Morphew and Pagan were playing prearranged parts in complete mutual sympathy. It was just possible that Mallison, too, was privy to their confidence; but one rather doubted that—Mallison impressed one as more likely to prove a tool, a pawn, a wage-loyal henchman, than a peer of this interesting confederation.

The arguments he had adduced in his endeavor to make Eve understand that he was not a man of the sort she ought to marry began to seem inspired.

Liane had never brought him here simply to gratify a vagrant whim. Neither had her half veiled hints been idly uttered, concerning those nameless acquaintances of hers who were taking such a profound if gratuitous interest in Lanyard, and the one whom she most wanted him to meet—either Pagan or Morphew unquestionably—and who was "quite a social power . . . in a quiet way." Because the woman was well disposed for old sake's sake she had chosen to warn him, if in a characteristically oblique fashion, to be on his guard with those two in whose minds, Lanyard hadn't any manner of doubt, the project for some time had been forming of inveigling him into some shady form of association with them, for purposes of their own in the last degree questionable.

Undoubtedly they had taken a good deal of pains to inform themselves as to Lanyard's circumstances. How they expected to be repaid for their trouble remained for him to find out. Hardly out of his pocket; knowing as much as Liane had revealed, they probably knew more, even that the debacle of his unregenerate days had left him without present resources other than the half-pay attaching to an extended leave of absence from the British Secret Service, and that the not inconsiderable cost of squiring about New York a woman of fashion had brought him to a pass wherein he might no longer refuse to face the prospect of being unable to pursue that sweet association for sheer inability to finance it—he who had been accustomed to waste money away as freely as in more spacious times he had been wont to appropriate it! A plight the more painful in that it was one he couldn't possibly confess to the woman he loved. He had gone tonight as far in that direction as pride would let him . . .

Since, then, it was manifestly not pence that they wanted of him, this precious pair, this Morphew and this Pagan, it followed that they wanted something less tangible but probably in the upshot more profitable, something which they might have found themselves in a position to require of him if he could have been induced to play roulette on credit and had lost—as he made no doubt he would have lost. Setting aside all question of the honesty of the wheel which Morphew's huge hands were manipulating with notable deftness, the observation and experience of this inveterate gambler of other days had convinced Lanyard that luck seldom or never favors him to whom its smile is a matter of life or death.

Not that he conceived the game to have been planned with any idea of inducing him to play and lose; his attendance had come about too fortuitously. To believe that was to believe Liane had foreseen he would be marching down Fifth Avenue at half an hour after midnight and had deliberately arranged to have her cab skid and land her on the curb a dozen paces ahead of him.

No—by every sign acceptable to a fairly sophisticated intelligence tonight's affair had been plotted for the sole if highly problematic benefit of Mrs. Folliott McFee. Not in all likelihood for the purpose of fleecing her at a friendly little game, though she was punting with feverish imprudence, broadcasting her bets and losing very considerable sums without perceptible care. Lanyard was prepared to credit Messrs. Morphew and Pagan with capacity for any degree of knavery; but their evident affluence and their association with Liane Delorme inclined him to believe that they were in this instance up to some mischief at least a cut above crooked gambling. Liane, thorough-paced rip that she was, had in the course of a highly chromatic career feathered her nest too softly and warmly to be reduced to the rôle of tout to a brace of common sharpers.

What, then, could their purpose be with this engaging and indiscreet young person? If only one knew a little more about Mrs. Folliott McFee—Liane's stressing of that name had implied there was much worth the knowing—it might be easier to guess . . .

In the absence of such specific information, a study of her as she was tonight would do no harm, might quite possibly prove rewarding.

Indisputably a fascinating creature. Divested of her sables, disclosed partially in but largely out of a flimsy piece of impudence which the cynical rue de la Paix had fashioned to serve as an evening gown, she cut a figure the most sprightly and sightly heart could wish—an animated miniature of extreme loveliness, abandoning herself to the spirit of play with the heedless vivacity of a charming child; drinking a bit more than she should, perhaps, while she watched her stakes unfailingly fall to the lot of the croupier's rake, but plaguing Mallison with a lightly malicious wit that struck him speechless and left him more than ever sulky, bartering pungent banter with Mr. Peter Pagan, cheeking the taciturn Morphew till he smiled perforce his rare, begrudged smiles, and never for an instant forgetting that Lanyard was likewise an unattached and personable male; and all with a delicate air that robbed her most flagrant audacities of any suggestion of poor taste and made her seem strangely out of place in that ring of hard and selfish faces, in that overheated private room of an establishment whose every purpose was illicit, in that demoralizing atmosphere drenched with perfume of wine and scent of perfumed flesh . . . Strangely out of place, appealingly helpless for all her bravado—a child among thieves and worse . . .

But it were a thankless job to waste solicitude upon her; if Folly couldn't take care of herself, nothing was more certain than that the way to earn her abiding dislike was to try to take care of her. In New York as every elsewhere in the haunts of men of means beyond their needs or native ability to spend with good grace, no novelty at all inheres in the spectacle of such flighty young women, amusement-mad and gifted with too much freedom from responsibility, going devious ways with dubious guides. And the worst of it is, as a general rule, it's nobody's business but their own . . .

Now, in course of time, when a waiter entered with yet another cooler wherein two more bottles were luxuriously cuddled in cracked ice, the open door admitted stimulating strains of the orchestra downstairs; and forthwith Folly McFee concluded she'd had enough of roulette, at least temporarily.

"Perfectly damn rotten luck!" she declared, pushing back her chair and jumping up. "I'm for a dance—maybe that will change it. Who wants to take me down for this tango? Mally——"

"You can't have Mally," Liane Delorme informed her with serene decision. "You've had him all evening at the Ritz. It's my turn now. Take Peter Pagan; he's a better match for you, dear."

"Pick on somebody your own size," Pagan paraphrased, leaving his place with an alacrity that forestalled Lanyard's intended response to the glint of invitation in the eyes which Folly promptly had turned his way. "If you refuse me, Folly, you doom me to dance with Liane; and that always makes me feel like an enterprising tug waltzing the Mauretania round the North River."

Liane retorted with one of those characterizations so dear to the Parisian heart, a deadly insult but absolutely meaningless when rendered into English; and Pagan proved a certain lack of finish in his cosmopolitan education by merely looking blank as mentally he translated her remarks. After which he bowed cheerfully to the traducer of his lineage and ambled off with Folly's hand under his arm; while Liane rose and playfully tweaked Mallison out of chair by an ear, to his indignation, for he had been winning and naturally wanted to go on playing as long as his luck lasted.

"It isn't that I really want to dance," she explained coolly to Morphew and Lanyard as she haled Mallison to the door, "but simply to give you two time to get acquainted . . ."

Morphew lumbered heavily after her and set the spring lock by way of providing against interruption. "Intelligent woman, Liane," he approved, unsmiling, as he returned to his chair.

"As to that, monsieur, one is entirely of your mind."

Lanyard helped himself to a cigarette and looked civilly receptive under the weight of Morphew's direct and thoughtful stare.

"Odd," that one considered, "we never happened to meet before this, Mr. Lanyard."

"You think so?"

"I've noticed you about town often enough."

"But does not the fact that our paths have sometimes crossed prove that we travel widely different courses?"

"I'm not so sure . . ."

"Not?" Lanyard murmured, lifting the brows of polite surprise.

"I've got a notion, if the whole truth

For a thorough cleansing, the cream with just the right amount of oil

Every normal skin needs two creams

Every day dust and fine particles of dirt bore deep into the pores of the skin. Ordinary washing will not reach this deepest dirt—and yet if it is allowed to stay your skin will lose its lovely clear transparent look and become dull looking.

To give your skin a thorough cleansing and one that is actually stimulating you need a cold cream made especially for the purpose. A cream made with oil—just enough to work into the pores and loosen every particle of dirt and of that particular light consistency that will not overload the pores or stretch them.

The cream that is made in just this way is Pond's Cold Cream. Smooth it in with your finger tips every night before retiring. After you have let it stay a minute wipe it off with a soft cloth. The grime on the cloth will convince you how thorough a cleansing the cream gives. The soft refreshed feeling it leaves will tell you how supple and fresh its nightly use will keep your skin.

For day and evening, as a base for powder, you need an entirely different cream—one that the skin will absorb instantly.

The kind of cream to hold the powder

Instead of oil (which will come out in a shine), an entirely different ingredient is used—one famous for its softening and soothing effect, yet absolutely free from grease. It results in a cream so delicate that it can be worn all day without danger of clogging the pores.

The cream known all over the world as having been made especially for this purpose is Pond's Vanishing Cream. Always smooth it on before you powder. Absorbed instantly it makes your skin feel and look softer and smoother at once. Powder put on over the smooth velvety surface this cream gives your skin goes on evenly and clings for hours.

Together these two creams meet every need of the skin. Use them both every day. Both are so delicate in texture they cannot clog the pores. Neither contains anything that can promote the growth of hair. The Pond's Extract Company, New York.

They accused him of cleaning his pipe

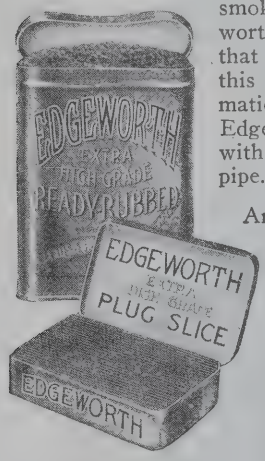
But he pleaded not guilty; he had merely filled it with Edgeworth

There is an old story about the youngster who washed his face and hands before going to school and none of his boy friends recognized him.

There is another about—but as this one comes in the form of a letter, we're going to give it to you that way.

1551 Portsmouth Ave.
Portland, Oregon

LARUS & BROTHER CO.,
Richmond, Va.
Gentlemen:



A short while ago you were kind enough to send me generous samples of both kinds of Edgeworth, and I enjoyed every grain of them.

When I lit the old pipe, several remarked on the fragrance of the tobacco and actually accused me of giving my pipe a scouring. But I had to disillusion them and tell them it was the tobacco and not the pipe.

So if I continue to woo Lady Nicotine, my best bet (and her best) will be Edgeworth.

Thanking you, I remain
Very gratefully yours,
(Signed) Apton A. Brown.

This letter gave us a genuine surprise. Although we have often been assured by smokers that Edgeworth has a fragrance that can't be beaten, this is the first intimation that smoking Edgeworth does away with cleaning your pipe.

And of course we don't admit that it does.

Edgeworth smokers may not find it necessary to scour their pipes often, but any pipe should be cleaned now and then—for sentiment if for nothing else.

If you haven't tried Edgeworth, write your name and address down on a postal and send it off to us. We will send you immediately generous samples both of Edgeworth Plug Slice and Ready-Rubbed.

For the free samples address Larus & Brother Company, 61 South 21st Street, Richmond, Va. If you will also add the name of the dealer to whom you will go if you should like Edgeworth, we would appreciate that courtesy on your part.

To Retail Tobacco Merchants: If your jobber cannot supply you with Edgeworth, Larus & Brother Company will gladly send you prepaid by parcel post a one- or two-dozen carton of any size of Edgeworth Plug Slice or Ready-Rubbed for the same price you would pay the jobber were known, you and I would find we were traveling in much the same direction . . . in the dark."

"Monsieur does much traveling in the dark?"

"I guess you know what I mean." Morphew's gravity was lightened by a twinkle of genial cunning. "When I say 'in the dark,' I mean, of course, the side of our lives we like to keep covered up."

"This is most interesting," Lanyard protested with animation. "You are going to tell me about that side of your life which you like to keep covered up?"

"No fear." The twinkle broadened into a grin. "Guess I'll let you guess at that, same as I have to guess at yours."

"I hope very truly monsieur does not so waste his time. I can assure him, if his guesswork were to flood with light every corner and byway of my life, what he would see would not amuse him."

The lines running from Morphew's nostrils to the corners of his mouth took on a sardonic set. "I doubt that, Mr. Lanyard."

"My ways of life are very quiet."

"I believe you. Still, I doubt I'd be bored."

"Possibly not," Lanyard conceded. "One is able to judge only by what one has seen of you in public, monsieur; which leads one to believe your interests center by choice in light hearted young people, not sober sided, steady paced elderlies like myself."

"Oh! as to that, I take folks as I find them," Morphew alleged. "And I find them all interesting, one way or another. Now yourself . . ."

"But I do assure you I am not at all interesting."

"Point of view," Morphew contended. "I'll say you've had an interesting life."

"It is true, one has found it so."

"And still finds it so, eh?"

Lanyard gave a good natured shrug. "After all, it is the only life I have . . . But monsieur, I am sure"—his manner grew moderately pointed—"would find it tiresome."

"I don't," Morphew countered bluntly.

"Then I am honored—I presume—to learn you have concerned yourself in respect of my modest self."

"I know a lot about you," Morphew admitted, "past and present."

"And yet you tell me you think my present mode of life intriguing!"

"Intensely."

Lanyard laughed. "Monsieur will pardon my suggesting that his sources of information, however busy, are unreliable if they have led him to believe my small affairs worthy of his attention."

"Point of view again." Morphew dismissed argument with a flirt of a massive hand. "But be that as it may: I've been anxious to meet you to ask you to help me answer a certain question."

"Indeed?"

"Perhaps it would be more nearly right to call it a problem in psychology."

"I am all attention."

"Well, it's like this . . ." Morphew had resumed his customary guise of profound solemnity. "What I want your expert opinion on, Mr. Lanyard, is the question of whether it's possible for a man—say he's a friend I'm taking a personal interest in—a man who built up a pretty warm criminal reputation for himself when he was younger and then hit the sawdust trail apparently for keeps . . . Whether it's possible for such a man to keep going straight in the face of every possible incentive to set up shop again as a master crook."

"Such incentives as——?" Lanyard inquired with every symptom of intelligent interest in an hypothetical instance.

"Well—let's suppose this man I've got in mind, this friend of mine, has fallen for a woman who's got everything, social position, any amount of coin, all that sort of thing. Say she's in love with him, too, and they want to get married. But my friend is broke, or next thing to it; and he's got a touchy sense of honor—sometimes reformed crooks have, you know—so he can't marry the woman because that would make him look like a fortune hunter if she ever found out he hadn't a red cent; and he can't let on to her he's stoney, because then she'd insist on marrying him to support him, and he'd feel like a yellow pup; and he can't do a quiet fade-out, either, because then she'd think he hadn't been on the level with her, and that would break her heart. That leaves him where?

"He's got to have coin to go on with, and the only way to get it is for him to remember some of the thing's he's been trying to forget. He's living in a city where there's more money and loot lying round loose to be picked up for the taking than any place else in the world, and where police protection against burglary and highway robbery is a positive joke, where a good fat safe is cracked or a holdup pulled off every other day, and ninety-nine times out of a hundred the crook's never caught. So you see our friend has just what I said he had—every temptation to come back strong in the house-breaking line and practically nothing to fear—except maybe that the woman he's crazy about may tumble sometime to how he's getting his dough. And that's the problem that's been puzzling me, Mr. Lanyard! What's our friend going to do? . . . What would you do?"

Lanyard thoughtfully ground out the fire of his cigarette in an ash tray and got up. "I imagine," he said quietly, "your anonymous friend would do precisely what I mean to do, Mr. Morphew. He would get well weary of tedious beating about the bush, but at the same time would remind himself that the obligations which devolve upon a guest constrain him to overlook for the present, a piece of damnable impertinence. He would for that reason take his hat and coat and stick—as you see me taking mine—and finally his departure—as I shall take mine, monsieur, pausing only to warn you . . ."

Lanyard stood over Morphew, plunging the stare of eyes ugly with anger into the apathetic and unreadable eyes of his host. "At the first sign, Mr. Morphew," he said, "of any disposition on your part to meddle further in my affairs, either in person or through an agent, I will seek you out, wherever you may try to hide, and break this stick, or a stouter one, over your contemptible back. Be advised—hands off!"

He waited an instant to hear what Morphew might have to say to this defiance; but since the man said nothing, made no sign of any sort, his huge body betraying his mind by not so much as the stir of a finger or the wince of an eye, Lanyard at

5,285 INSPECTIONS PER CAR

The faithfulness of performance so universally remarked in Dodge Brothers Motor Cars, is due, in no small part, to the thoroughness with which each unit is inspected during the process of manufacture and assembly.

A trained staff of 1100 experts is employed in this work alone, and approximately 5,285 inspections are made on each car.

So exacting and rigid are the standards applied to these inspections that the slightest variation either in workmanship or material is sufficient cause for immediate rejection.

Dodge Brothers are almost over-scrupulous in their constant aim to make each car as sound and perfect as is humanly possible.

length wheeled on a heel and went to the door. Only then, as his hand closed upon the knob, Morphew spoke, employing the same conversational tone he had all along employed.

"One moment more, Mr. Lanyard. It may interest you to know I own this joint. When I got up to shut that door awhile ago, I gave Theodore the high sign. Ever since then four of our waiters, the toughest roughnecks on the pay roll, have been stationed in the hall. If you try to leave without my say so, you'll be badly manhandled; and if you should be tempted to try any rough stuff in here, my finger's on the push button that will call them in . . . I am not done talking with you yet, my friend. So now, if you'll attend to me and keep your temper in hand, I'll show you just where you stand."

He rested, watching Lanyard with no perceptible emotion in his bleak, pale eyes; and when, after momentary consideration, Lanyard turned back from the door, the man resumed with the same minatory composure, leaning forward with an arm on the table and rapping out his points with a heavy forefinger.

"Whether you've gone back to thieving or not, Lanyard, I don't know yet. I suspect you have. If you haven't, you've thought of doing so. Whether or not, you've got to come to me. I've got you"—Morphew turned his hand palm up and closed the fingers slowly into a tremendous fist—"there! You can marry your Mrs. de Montalais as soon as you like, but only with my consent; and you won't get that for nothing. If you're back at your old game, you'll come across to me, fifty-fifty. If you marry the woman for her money, my share will be half what you squeeze out of her."

"And"—Lanyard's fingers were itching to bury themselves in that fat throat and shake the beast till he cried for mercy—"and if I refuse?"

"I'll advertise you to all New York—or anywhere else you try to live with your wife—as the Lone Wolf back at his old dodges. I'll prove you committed every burglary of any size this town has known in the last three months; and if that isn't enough, I'll plant others on you. You'll come across to me, my dear sir, or go up the River for life."

"Such being the case," said Lanyard, shortening his grip on his stick, "I think I would as willingly go up for manslaughter—if killing a blackmailer comes under that head!"

But even as he spoke the door was thrown open, a vast din of angry and excited voices seethed up from below, and Theodore appeared on the threshold, chattering and wringing his talons in antic terror.

"Monsieur!" he stuttered between clashing teeth, "Monsieur Morphew—the police! A raid! A raid!"

Next month you will follow the Lone Wolf through an amazing escape—and into another trap of Morphew's setting.

The Thirteenth Degree

the start. Now, one of 'em just naturally has to be the right party. It's a cinch, but which one——"

"Hold on," said Crisp, "you're only telling me what I know and what everybody else knows, for that matter. Come down to date. You've had these suspects on the griddle, of course? Been third degreeing 'em, no doubt, and all that sort of thing?"

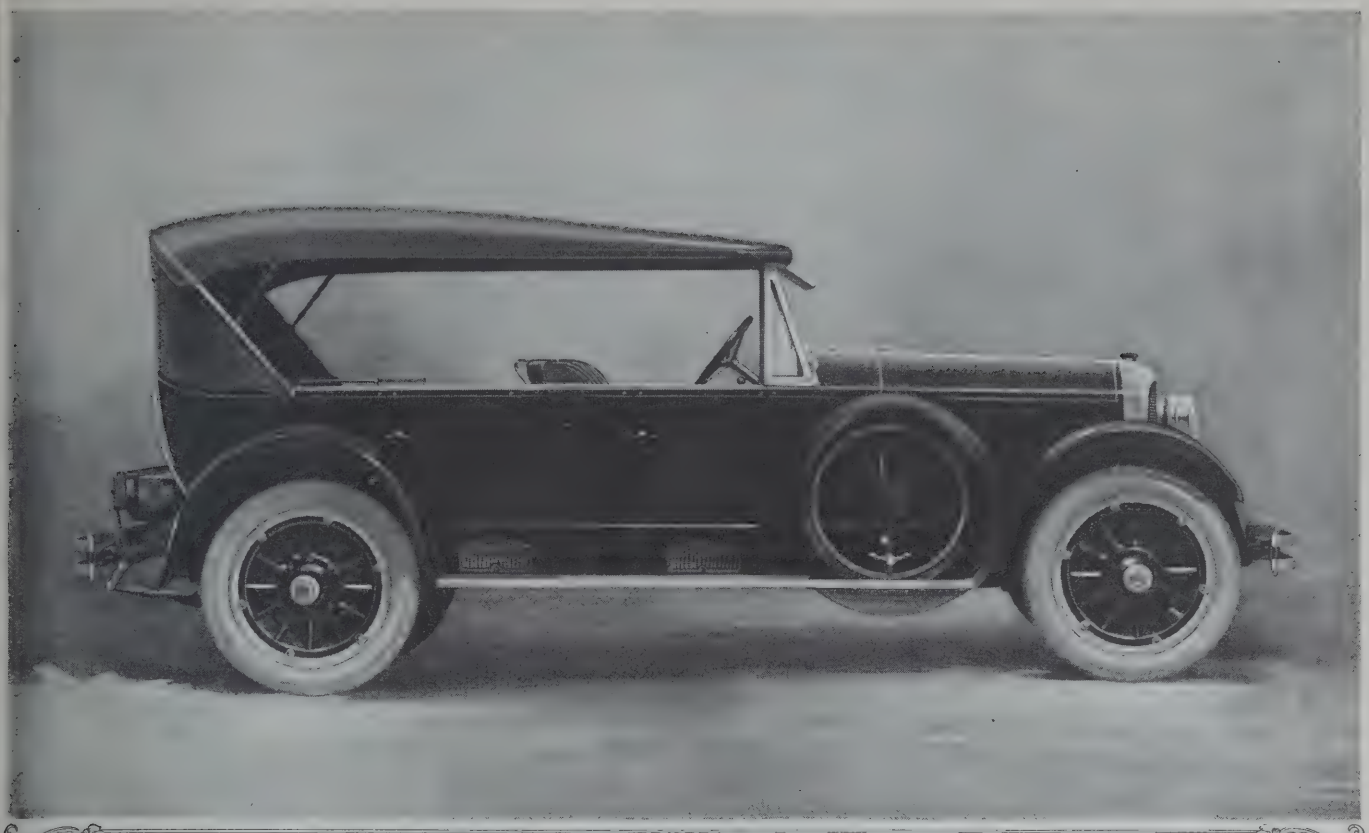
"The whole works. I've tried every trick in the box on 'em—nothing doing!"

"All right then. But if, on what you've got on 'em, you had to go to the Grand Jury tonight, what name would you want written on the indictment?"

"Blessed if I know. Sometimes I say it must be the woman—if I'm any judge, she's mean as a snake and money crazy besides. And she's plenty smart enough in her way. Then again, I take a swing around in my mind and I put it on this party, Rusk. For one thing, he's got more brains, even, than she's got—anyway, he's got more imagination. He's one of these excitable, high strung ones, but at that you can't trip him up. Being stowed away where he can't hit up the booze hasn't helped his nerves any but he's still there with the nerve—get what I mean? There's one place, though, where he's weak—the alibi he's offered is not any too good, seems to me."

"What does that get you? It's not up to him to prove where he wasn't that night—it's up to you to prove where he was."

"Yes, that's right too," conceded Bryce ruefully. "Then there's this third party, Melody. There're times again when I'm almost sure he must have done it. Get him in a corner and I'll say he's dangerous and liable to do anything. He's a pretty average low grade animal, taking him one way and another. Outside of the dope peddling trade, all he seems to know is hitting the red eye and following the big league teams. He's one of these box score fans—got the averages of every professional ball player that ever lived in the back part of his head. You know those nuts!"



"I certainly do," said Crisp crisply This scrap of superfluous information seemed to have quickened his interest. "So that's his fad, eh? Good!" He bent across the table, sharpening his voice. "Danny, if, going home tonight, you should see a mishap of some sort or a curious happening—in fact, almost anything imaginable that's slightly out of the ordinary—what's the first thing that you are going to turn to when you open your morning paper at breakfast tomorrow?"

"Why, I suppose I'll be looking for the write-up of the thing I saw myself going home tonight." Bryce plainly was puzzled by this sudden switching of subjects.

"Right! And why?"

"Oh, well"—he fumbled for the words—"well, because I just naturally would. Force of habit, I suppose you'd call it."

"Force of habit be blowed! Danny, I'm ashamed of you. I might forgive you for so far forgetting your early education as to call a story a 'case.' I can even stand for your present-tensing everything you say, cop-fashion; but you've no excuse to be thinking like a harness bull. You were a pretty wise youngster once, and you had good training. What could 'force of habit' have to do with it? Human nature—that's the answer. Hand any man a newspaper and watch him skip the important stories in order to get at the story of some comparatively trivial thing—an accident, say, or a street row or a scene in court or anything else of which he has actual knowledge and in which he has a personal interest, either because he figured in it as a spectator or actual participant, or else because somebody close to him figured in it. If there are two stories in the same paper which appeal to him in this way he'll invariably turn first to the one which interests him the most. And then he'll probably go rummaging round for copies of all the other papers to see whether any of them agrees with his version of it. Watch him—that's all. And the same thing applies to a woman or a boy or a child—applies to anybody that can read. They're all merely obeying a law of human nature—and that's a law with no exceptions to it that I know of.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL CAR IN AMERICA

"And Danny, my boy, listen to me: These suspects of yours—that's the law we're going to try them by. Between us, we've got two pretty powerful agencies to fall back on. You've got the machinery of the police department. I've got a newspaper shop with its facilities and appliances behind me. We'll use them both. Since we're partners on the deal, I'll be fair with you. I'm not going to pretend that the idea has just now jumped at me out of a clear sky. I've been carrying it in my mind for years, meaning to make a demonstration of my theory sometime or other when a suitable opportunity came; but what you just said about this chap Melody brought it up again in my mind. To me this looks like a bully chance to test it out. You say that trying on the third degree hasn't got you anywhere. Well, this thing will be the Third Degree Plus.

"As I understand it, you're holding all three of your prisoners in the House of Detention? All right, then. Tomorrow morning, on some pretext or other, you bring 'em down to Headquarters and stick 'em in separate cells, see? Keep them there all day without letting them see their lawyers or anybody else and without letting any of them get a peep at a newspaper—that's specially important. Just leave them where they are, as though you had forgotten them. Then along toward evening drop by one of the cells—say the one where you've got the woman locked up—and jolly her along a bit and tell her she'll have a good hot supper presently, and generally act friendly. Then, as if you'd just remembered it, you haul a copy of the Star out of your pocket and tell her there's something in it she possibly might want to read, and pass it in to her through the grating.

"Then watch her, Danny—watch her out of the corner of your eye without letting her know she's being watched, and see what she reads first. After that you go to Melody's cell and then to Rush's and do exactly the same thing with them that you've just done with the woman."

"Boss," said the young captain, "it must be I'm thick in the head tonight. I'm trying to follow your trail but I swear I don't get you yet."

"Don't you? Well, you will in just a minute . . . Oh, here comes our steak! Smells good, too, even at this distance."

"Damn the steak! It'll wait. Let Heiney slip a cover over it and keep it warm. What's the big idea behind this paper reading stunt, Boss?"

"Simple enough," said Crisp, "and yet not so dad-blamed simple, at that. We've got this in our faver to start on—that each one of these three has, or should have, a vital interest in a certain definite subject. With Melody, so you tell me, it's baseball. The woman, as we both know, used to be a fake spiritualist and give bogus séances. It's been in print half a dozen times this past week how she learned her trade under that old crook, Ellen Prime, who's now doing a six year bit up at Auburn for extortion. Which likewise is lucky for us, as I see it—circumstances playing right into our hands. And Rusk, you remember, has lately been blowing his money—or his customers' money—on the races." In moments of stress or enthusiasm Crisp had a trick of thinking in headlines and speaking in them, too. Unconsciously he quoted one now: "'Evidence Just Unearthed Shows Caspar's Nephew Fell for Ponies along with Burlesque Beauty's Charms—Wine, Women, Song and the Gee-Gees!'"

"But still it's not clear to me," protested Bryce. "I don't see——"

"You will. Listen, Danny: Tomorrow morning I'll get busy on a special edition of the Daily Star. It'll be a limited edition—restricted to exactly four copies. One copy I'll keep as a souvenir; the other three I'll shoot up to you by messenger for distribution among your cage pets. I'll take the regular home edition and make it over for our purposes. First I'll lift the running Caspar story and, whatever length it may be, I'll cut it down to half a column or so and stick it away somewhere on one of the inside pages under a single column head. Then, right across the front page I'll smear three stories—all of 'em absolutely imaginary but written so as to sound plausible and authentic.

"I'll detail the swiftest rewrite man I've got on my staff to turn 'em out for me first thing in the morning. He'll do the whole job in an hour and a half. The first one will be a fiction yarn about Bingo Driscoll, star left-hander of the Giants, having broken three of his ribs so he can't pitch in the crucial series with the Chicago Cubs that's starting day after tomorrow at the Polo Grounds. That little joker will be for Melody's express benefit.

"The second one will purport to be a dispatch from our Auburn correspondent saying that old Ellen Prime, under the preachings of the prison chaplain, has got religion and is now writing a book of confessions in which she exposes all the secrets of the trance-medium game, including her own. And the third one will be a double-leaded story playing up a purely supposititious crusade that's to be started against the hand-bookmakers and the pool rooms. We'll have the District Attorney announcing that he's going to clean up the tracks and drive all the talent out of town on the next train; we'll pile on the customary buncombe of threats and promises knee deep. You know the sort of thing: 'Startling Revelations of Graft and Police Collusion Impending—Protection for Gangsters Imperiled—Official Probe to Sink Deep.'"

Again the listener almost could see the headline gashing the white news print with its black-faced capitals, as Crisp mechanically ticked off his swinging phrases, letter by letter, on his fingers. He fell back into the explanatory tone: "And that one—that last one—is the identical fairy tale that ought to nail Rusk's eye—unless he's more deeply concerned with something else."

A grin of understanding was widening Captain Bryce's lower face.

"I begin to get you at last, Boss," he said, almost reverently.

"I thought you would—eventually. Well, how does it strike you? If from any cause the stunt fails we'll only be out a little trouble. It won't cost the Star fifty dollars to turn out that trick extra of ours—and I'd be willing to stand that much loss out of my own pocket just to test out the scheme. If it works—if one of the three instead of starting in right off to read the thing that's displayed on the front page should merely glance at it and then begin digging through the paper to find the Caspar story where it'll be tucked away in some corner—why, in that case it's a sign to you that here is the particular suspect you want to concentrate on for a while. Following along this line may not clear up the killing but at least it'll give you a definite lead. Instead of ranging about at random the way you're doing now, you'll be able to focus, and while you're focusing we'll be trying, between us, to cook up something else in the way of experiments . . . Say, how about tackling that sirloin of ours?"

Next day's sporting extra off his hands and sent away, Crisp, instead of locking his desk and departing, lingered on in the cluttered city room, deserted now except for the four-hand crew of the late shift. At five-thirty came a copy boy: "Call fur you on the telephone, Mr. Crisp. Police Headquarters speakin'. Says it's poisonal."

He lifted the receiver off his private desk instrument.

"All right, Danny," he said. "This is Crisp—shoot."

"Boss," came back the answer, "it's worked—just like you figured it would." Over the wire he could catch the jubilant quaver in his voice—a professional detective stirred out of the studied professional calm. "Yes sir, your little patent invention worked as slick as grease. I follows the plan just like you mapped it out. I takes 'em the papers you sent me—one by one. Two of 'em takes a flash at those phoney spreads and falls for 'em regardless of everything else. But the third one only gives the front page the quick once-over and then begins digging through to find the cut down murder story and reads it all through twice before turning back to look for anything else. Guess which one that was?"

"I only want one guess, I think," said Crisp dryly. "Rusk."

"You're a wonder," answered Bryce. "That's just exactly who it was, by gollies! How'd you dope it?"

"I had him picked as my favorite entry from the beginning," said Crisp. "Privately, I've been playing him clear across the board all the time. All right then, so far so good. Now then, if you're willing to go on with the next step, this is it—turn your man loose!"

The Mark of Quality

The Spirit of Leadership

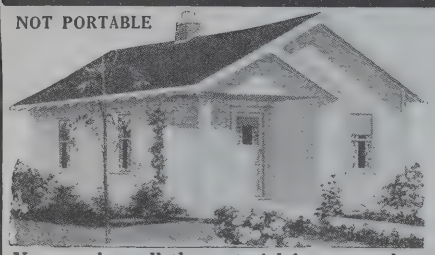
NOWHERE has the characteristic spirit of leadership in American industry shown itself more strikingly than in the development of automotive transportation

Only the invincible determination of American manufacturers could have brought the automobile and the motor truck to their present high point of utility in so brief a time, and could have provided tires of corresponding excellence.

Imbued with this spirit from the beginning, Firestone set the pace in fine tire building by pledging car owners the Most Miles per Dollar.

The Firestone Gum-Dipped Cord today is carrying on this high standard of worth and raising it to a level never before attained.

Into this tire's building has gone the full cumulative force of twenty-two years' experience and the efforts of an organization numbering thousands of workers.



The great and ever-widening popularity of Firestone Cords—their adoption for America's leading cars, is a gratifying and inspiring reward to the men who have made Most Miles per Dollar the objective of their life work.

He could almost hear Bryce's jaw dropping.

"Turn him loose when, according to your own calculations, he's the right party? Why, say——"

"Danny, have sense!" Crisp sunk his voice, making sure that Whitby, at the copy desk twenty feet away, could by no chance overhear. "Merely because a certain individual shows a preference for a certain sample of the Star's literary productions doesn't justify you in swearing out a murder warrant—does it, now?"

"But it's only last night at Mallory's you says to me——"

"Last night was last night. This is a new day and there's to be some different strategy; the old plan of campaign is all switched around. Danny, after I left you down by the Bridge and started uptown I dropped into Keefe's theater. I always try to go to a vaudeville show when I've got any hard thinking to do—usually nothing happens on the stage to distract my attention. But this time something did happen. I saw a thing that gave me a whale of a hunch, and if you'll only be reasonable we'll play it. If you don't trail with me, why that partnership agreement of ours is off right now." It was the masterful star reporter of two decades back speaking to an adoring copy kid. "I'm not going to tell you the notion over the telephone—it'll keep for a few hours; but if the thing we've just pulled was the sublimated third degree you can bet this one is going to be the thirteenth. At that it's a long shot. But then, I like long chances. Now, here's what I want you to do:

"Hold all three of your prisoners right where they are, say, two days more, or anyhow until day after tomorrow; there's one phase of my scheme that calls for a leeway of time. Then you go to Rusk and you beg his pardon for having kept him locked up so long on a false supposition. Make him believe, if you can, that you're fully convinced now you haven't got an earthly thing on him. Then, through arrangement with your District Attorney's office up there in the Bronx, have him let out."

"But suppose he beats it?"

"Behave yourself—you're letting your eagerness run away with your judgment. If he did the thing—and of that I'm surer than ever—he did it with one purpose in mind—to get the old man's money. If he had nerve enough for cold blooded murder and if he's had nerve enough through eight days to give you the laugh whenever you were grilling him, he's got too much nerve to dish his prospects by running away now when he thinks all he'll have to do is to stick round and wait for the courts to turn over the property to him. Anyway, your men will be shadowing him, won't they? If they're any good he'll never get out of their sight. And if our new stunt fails they can rearrest him any minute that suits 'em. You're not really giving him his freedom—you're only giving him a little rope. And rope, Danny, is what men hang themselves with.

"You have him turned free, just as I'm telling you to do. But before that you give out a statement for publication saying that, as a result of important developments, Mr. Jared Rusk has been entirely eliminated from suspicion. In the interview you can throw out hints about sensational clues pointing to another quarter. Be mysterious about it—the reporters will do the rest. They'll help your plant along without ever dreaming that they're helping it. To make the bluff still stronger, you must act as though all of a sudden you'd got something definite on Melody and the Cabanne woman. Fuss over them as though they were too valuable to lose. Detail about four men in uniform to take 'em back to the House of Detention. Better still, handcuff 'em together and lead 'em past the door of Rusk's cell just a few minutes before you let him loose. For his benefit make the play as convincing as you possibly can.

"That's day after tomorrow's program. Tonight there'll be some preliminary tactics afoot. For one thing, I want you to meet me at Keefe's at nine-fifteen—in time for the second act on the bill. After you've seen it, I'm going to take you round back stage to meet a certain person—I saw him last night and he'll be expecting us. In the meanwhile here's a private job for you to tackle and when you see me you'll understand that this is the most important part of all—the success or failure of the whole scheme practically depends on it.

"I'm assuming that after the coroner's physicians got through with their autopsy the body was embalmed and sent to the morgue . . . Good! Then of course it's still there. Well then, you get busy right away and arrange matters so that anybody you may bring or send over there tomorrow morning will have the run of the place all day with nobody snooping about keeping tabs on him and maybe tipping your hand by loose talk. That part of it can be fixed easily enough, can't it? . . . Fine! I figured it could . . . How's that? . . . I'm keeping you in the dark? You bet I am, sonny; I'm taking no chances on some outsider listening in on this wire. You'll get the whole layout tonight. But, oh Danny, you take it from me this is going to be one jim-dandy of a smash if only we can pull it off!"

Even though he held his voice at subdued pitch Crisp was fairly singing his words—a huntsman's song, really, it was. A man chase with a human life for the stake is the most exciting sport in the world and Crisp belonged to a predatory breed: he was a newspaperman; not a journalist, for that's a very different matter, but a newspaperman, and made after the proper model of his kind—tireless in the pursuit and with a beagle's nose for an obscured scent. He finished with an authoritative snap: "Remember Keefe's at nine-fifteen. 'By!"

The first thing Jared Rusk did after he walked out of Sessions was to go to the nearest saloon. There he drank raw spirits greedily. For more than a week his denied and tormented fibers had been crying for their customary alcohol; with the whisky stowed in him, this inner screeching subsided to a soothing purr. And the second thing he did was to betake himself to his bachelor's suite in west Fortieth Street. Arrived there, and locked in, with the telephone receiver off its hook as a bar against interruptions, he proceeded to invoice his present situation.

He now was stimulated by a great exultation; but even so, he promised himself he was not going to let confidence merge into carelessness—no sir, not for a minute. From the outset he had held himself warily in hand, bearing himself in all situations as one unjustly suspected; disdaining even to canvass for a possible bondsman. His pose throughout had been that of an innocent man having no concern for the outcome other than the hope of seeing justice done and the real assassin apprehended and punished. He would continue to hold this pose. If only he sat tight and made no false moves—if only he didn't rock the boat, as the saying went—the big prize for which he had played would be dropping into his lap like a ripe pear from a bough.

Things were shaping beautifully. It would do neither Melody nor the Morgan woman any hurt to bide in a cell awhile longer. Indeed, he rather approved the prospect of their continued imprisonment. They were in no actual peril—not that he specially cared whether they were or not. It was not humanly possible that either of them ultimately would be punished for an act in which neither had a hand. Nobody would be convicted—probably nobody ever would be brought to trial. Sooner or later the authorities, tacitly confessing failure, would turn these two loose and there would be an end to the whole pother. Merely another entry would be added to an already abundantly long list of New York's unreadable homicides.

All along the police had been so consistently idiotic. At thought of their blundering idiocy figuratively he shook hands with himself. At every turn they had confirmed his prior belief in their stupidity; and today's gorgeous joke—well, that surely was the capsheaf to all that had gone before. But the stupidest of the lot had been this self-sufficient, pouter-breasted Bryce—first with his cocksureness, his blatant belief in his own ability as a detective, his clumsy and shelf-worn artifices for extorting a confession or an incriminating admission; and now, by contrast, this forenoon he had been so crestfallen, so shrunken in port and manner.

Comforting himself from a bottle of whisky, Rusk rehearsed the day's outstanding events. The scene in court had been a perfunctory scene, one without drama to it; the Assistant District Attorney, in moving for the release from further detention of one of the three individuals at present in custody, had borne himself almost listlessly, as though he had lost interest in the proceedings. And, before that, in their private conversation down at Headquarters, Captain Bryce had been downright apologetic. He recreated the picture of the diminished Bryce as that person had said:

"Of course, Mr. Rusk"—it was "Mr. Rusk" now, instead of the rough "Say, you" of the station house back room—"of course, Mr. Rusk, you'll understand I've only been doing my duty in holding you and putting you to all this inconvenience. It's up to me not to overlook any bets; but when I've made a mistake, like I have in your case, I'm the first one to admit it. So now, if you're willing to let bygones be bygones we'll shake hands, friendly. How about it?"

And Rusk, outwardly indifferent but inwardly rejoiceful, had said he was willing to let bygones be bygones. And then, still in that new placating tone, Bryce had gone on:

"Naturally I'll have to ask you to keep in touch with me, sort of. It's likely from time to time there'll be things coming up in connection with these other parties that I'll want to ask you about—you knowing more than anybody else about your uncle's personal habits and all—get what I mean? I'll bother you just as little as I can . . . Oh, yes! come to think about it, there is one small detail where I'll have to have your help. I'll have to ask you to meet me up there at your uncle's house—or rather, I should say, it's practically the same as your house now—this evening at eight-thirty. Try to be there on time, won't you? I'm going to have a lot of other things to do tonight. I won't keep you more than a few minutes.

"For one thing, I want to turn the premises back over to you, officially, so to speak. And for another thing, while just the two of us are there on the spot by ourselves, I want you to go with me over the diagrams and photographs that we've been making of the room where—where it happened—so as to be sure we've got the layout all properly charted and marked. But the most important thing of all is for me to have you see for yourself that the furnishings and all are in the right places so the men I've had on duty there will be clear in case anything should turn up missing afterwards. Of course, coming up there may not be the pleasantest job in the world for you, considering everything, but believe me, Mr. Rusk, it's absolutely necessary or I wouldn't be pressing it."

Rusk had consented readily enough. Wanting that thing known as a moral sense, he had no remorse and, by the same token, not the slightest repugnance to revisiting the spot where the thing had been done. Besides, wasn't his proper rôle that of a willing aide to the police in their fumbling endeavors? And all the time, secretly, he would be laughing to himself over the gorgeous farce comedy of it all. It was almost too good to be true: these poor, deluded limbs of the law—these broken legs of the law—asking his help, humbly invoking cooperation from him, of all men! Certainly he would go.

He went, slightly befuddled. An empty bottle in his rooms might testify, though, that it had taken the full strength of a commercial quart to produce this result. The stuff hummed pleasantly in him as he came out into the street, bound for the Bronx. His nerves had needed a plentiful lacing of whisky before they warmed and relaxed; all day, until the liquor took hold on them, they had been nagging at him. A conscience he lacked, or even the rudiments of one, but he did have nerves; otherwise this Jared Rusk might have made a perfect type of killer.

The subway carried him to a station within three blocks of his destination. He came up the exit steps and out of the kiosk into a district of lights and movement, there being tall new apartment houses about him and smart new shops on the lowermost floors of all of these. But as he swung eastward and rounded the second turning to the north he passed very quickly out of this hiving congeries into a neighborhood most entirely unlike. Here the darkness of a moonless night contended with the inadequate efforts of street lights spaced widely apart, and old-fashioned detached dwellings reared themselves well back from the pavement lines, each with its complement of spindly shade trees which already had begun to drop their yellowed leaves so that, in places, lacings of bare limbs showed dimly against the skyline.

The third house from the corner was his house, a formless clump in the enveloping blackness excepting for three squares of toned brightness which, set in the ground floor to the right of the porched doorway, marked the curtained windows of the limbs room.

Abruptly this place, familiar as it was to him, took on a forbidding and formidable look. Never before had it worn for him this daunting aspect. All at once he began to regret that he had come by night to it; surely daytime would have served as well.

In this sudden frame of regret and almost of indecision, he hesitated, fumbling with the latch of the iron gate in the tall fence of rusted iron pickets. But the metal snicked sharply under his touch and the form of a man materialized where a sprayed clump of shrubbery rose just inside the fence.

"That you, Mr. Rusk? Well, I've been sort of waitin' for you."

The voice he recognized as that of a plainclothes man of Bryce's staff with whom in the past week he had had forced dealings. But the two stood tonight on a different footing; the man's next words, by their cordiality, gave proof of the changed status of things. No longer was it the hectoring truculent detective matching his will and his wits against the wits and will of a prisoner under suspicion. Now it was the good natured policeman showing proper deference to a potentially wealthy citizen:

"I just wanted to catch you when you showed up—wanted to say to you that I hope you ain't got any ill feelin's on account of any little thing that come up while you was under arrest. Well, sir, the captain's waitin' for you . . . He's alone inside there. Just walk right on in, sir." He fell into step by Rusk as the latter went up the bricked path which crosscut the lawn fronting the house. "Purty dark out here, ain't it? But then, I guess you know the way here better'n I do, at that."

With a manner that was ingratiating, the other accompanied him into the wide, dusty smelling hall; then, still in the rôle of usher, opened the first door to the right of the entrance and, becoming suddenly official, made the announcement: "Mr. Rusk to see you, Captain."

As Rusk passed through the opening the man closed the door behind the visitor and stood in the hall with the knob of the door held in both his hands and his body pressed into the angle of the door jamb.

Bryce was bending over a flat-topped desk which stood against the farther wall of the living room. He half turned his head. "How are you by now, Mr. Rusk?" he said pleasantly. "Be at your service in half a minute—just going over these diagrams again."

But Rusk scarcely was aware of him, and the concluding words of the young captain's casual speech had fallen upon ears that did not hear them. For Jared Rusk was seeing something. With eyes popped and riveted, he was seeing something which it was not good for any human in normal case to see, much less one whose nerves had lately been on strain.

There, in that armchair at the farther end of the center table, lolled a slumped figure in soiled dressing gown and worn bedroom slippers. Indubitably it was a solid and tangible shape having flesh and bones and members. And yet it was the shape of his uncle, Watkins Caspar, in posture and dress just as he had seen it there nine nights before—with the great red fresh stains spreading over the bosom of the rumpled, collarless shirt, with the high bald forehead turned waxen white, exactly as he, watching his victim, had seen it turn, with the nostrils pinching in, with the lower jaw dropped so that the teeth showed between the colorless lips—his uncle, dead by all rights, dead by all looks, except for two bright blazing eyes that stared now out of that corpse face and held his fascinated gaze. And now it was moving. It shifted and swayed between the cushioned arm rests, and wriggled its head as though its neck pained it. And now, next, very slowly and stiffly, it was getting on its feet. It shuffled toward him, taking one step—two steps—a third——

With his shuddering body flat on the floor and his face in the carpet and his fingers clutched about Bryce's ankles the murderer made his confession. He made it all the while sensing that The Thing stood very near him, and in his agony hideously fearing that It would put hands on him unless very quickly he told all there was to be told. A dozen times, never lifting his head, though, he broke into his confession to beg Bryce to keep It away from him, not to let It touch him, please to make It go away and stay away until he was through.

After Crisp's death, here a couple of years or so ago, two of his late associates went through his personal belongings, making a sort of unofficial inventory. There were things among the effects which, being lumped together, gave them a better understanding of the man than ever they had had while he was alive; things which enabled them to figure out a creature most curiously complex, a compound of elements seemingly insoluble yet herein shrewdly blended.

For the time, the search took on rather the aspect of a post mortem appraisal of character. By the evidence brought forth from filing cases and table drawers and by certain further evidence which was contained in scrap books and clipping files, they established a case for and against the contrasting facets of a curious mentality, matching paradox with paradox, balancing an incredible professional callousness on a shy, well concealed instinct of charity, finding here abundant testimony to a vast egotism, and there proofs of a cloaked and unsuspected sensitiveness.

There was one item, though, or rather a brace of items, which puzzled them. These two objects seemed to have no connection with any revealed episode of Crisp's private life nor yet any bearing upon any one or another of his journalistic coups.

Upon an upper shelf of a locked cabinet one of the searchers came upon a wooden box that was like a casket in shape, measuring a foot across and perhaps eighteen inches lengthwise. On a slip of paper pasted to the cover was set down in Crisp's handwriting the cryptic legend: "Third Degree — Thirteenth Degree."

There were two articles in the box. One was a copy of the Daily Star bearing a date of late September of the year 1907; with age it had begun to turn yellowish and brittle. The other was a false face, but a false face raised to the nth enlargement of a graphic and flexible realism; with a wig attached for added disguising and so elaborated as to enclose whoever wore it, from the nape of his neck behind to the base of his throat in front. Skull, ears, throat, all would be covered. Plainly, the face of some elderly person had served as its model; the hair was gray and coarse and frayed, and it fringed away to a baldness on the frontlet of the enveloping scalp piece. Somehow the finder of it knew that here he beheld a copy that was faithful, in contour and likeness and expression, to the original.

"Well, by Jove," he said as he drew it forth from its keeping place, "I never knew he went in for masquerade parties. See here, Foster, give this cheery little exhibit a look, will you? Why on earth would anybody treasure such a ghastly, uncanny, awful looking proposition as this?"

"I don't know what he wanted to keep it for," said the other man, who was the Daily Star's dramatic critic, taking the thing in his hands. "There were a lot of curious angles, it seems, to old Ben Alibi's nature—maybe he had his morbid side, too. But I know where it came from, or rather, I know who made it. I recognize the handiwork—there never was but one man who could turn out such a job as this. Don't you remember that foreigner, Borgo, who came over here a good long while back—oh, it must be all of twelve or fourteen years!—and broke into vaudeville with that wonderful act of his that he called 'The Dance of the Masques' and made such a hit that one of the roof shows signed him up for a long contract? I was subbing on dramatics for the Trib then and got to know him well—nice, friendly chap he was, and a real artist. But I'd say this must have been one of his masterpieces." He slid the wig part up over his forehead, pressing the shell in to fit snugly. "Life-like, eh?"

"Yes, all of that—but death-like, too! It was gruesome enough before, like a death mask vivified in some unhealthy, devilish sort of way. By Jove, I believe that's exactly what it is, or was to start with—a death mask! But now, with your eyes shining through those openings, it turns you into a corpse that walks—you're just a corpse with a lost and tormented soul held prisoner inside you—ugh! One look at you, standing there now, would give anybody the horrors. Here, give me the damned thing and let me stick it back in its—its coffin—where it belongs!"

"The Eminent Doctor Deeves" is a powerful Irvin Cobb story that no lover of Mr. Cobb's rich human fiction will want to miss—in COSMOPOLITAN for March.

Super-People

The trouble about us is that we're labeled. Women come to the hospitals and places like this and cry over us. It's nice of them of course but it doesn't cheer us up particularly. We never see anybody who doesn't know what we are and who would figure on having a good time with us. We've got a lot of good times left in us, too. But what fun is it for us to be entertained by a lot of married dames who dress up like a million dollars and dance with us because they think it's their duty and bring us the wrong kind of cigarettes and call us brave boys?

"Hell, we're just ordinary men who happened to get hurt in a great industrial accident and we'd like to meet a lot of ordinary girls, not necessarily very pretty ones, who dress about the way the girls did that we used to know, who would flatter us by thinking that we are bold bad men who have to be handled carefully and not wrecks to be pitied. I'd trade all the society dolls who ever came out to the hospitals with presents for a talk and a walk in the moonlight with one good live shop girl who was slightly afraid I wouldn't like her, or that, if I did, I might shock her by my awful behavior."

"Hear! Hear!" applauded Beverly, clapping her hands. Then turning to Kirk: "This gentleman belongs to our club—he's another Little Ray of Moonshine in an otherwise orderly but gloomy world. Welcome Mr.—er——"

"Post, Sylvester Post."

"It's a curious idea, Mr. Post, that no one ever before thought that you fellows might like to meet up with some just ordinary girls who have no particular claims to social distinction, who wouldn't scare you with their culture and gowns, but who would look up to you with the unreasoning admiration which the male of the species has, in some illogical way, come to regard as his due. I think that between yourself and Mr. Kirk here there has been worked out the idea for a new Salvation Army. How would this sort of a scheme go?"

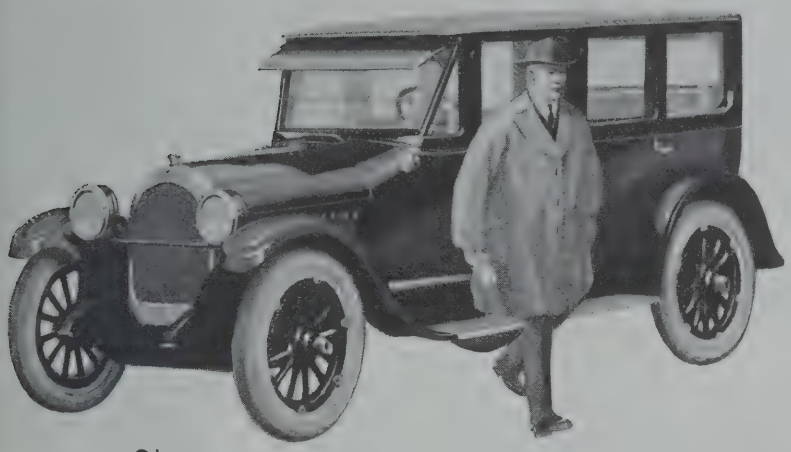
She launched into a rapid fire of planning with suggestions here and there from her masculine aides, threshing out details, bolstering up the plot, rejecting parts and replacing discarded ideas with brand new fresh ones.

They were so busy and were having such a genuinely good time that no one noticed it was getting dark until mess call sounded.

"We'll have to go," Beverly announced to Kirk. "Even if they do invite us to stay I know that unexpected guests are not generally welcome." To the boys she said, "Good by. We'll be back."

Outside it was still raining.

"How are you going to get home?" Beverly asked her companion as he handed her into her little gray roadster.



"Oh, I'll find a taxi somewhere!"

"Perhaps, but you'll be wet through to your innermost soul before you do. Get in and I'll drive you wherever you're going. That is, if you're not afraid."

For answer Kirk demonstrated his bravery by taking the other seat in her car.

The sides of the roadster were high, sort of like the cockpit of an aeroplane, the top sat low and there was a stubby little windshield in front. Altogether it was a very cozy wren's nest. The rain pounding on the top and windshield cut it off absolutely from the rest of the world.

"It is comfortable, isn't it?" the driver asked corroboratively, interpreting his thoughts. "Let's run a little way toward the foothills. I don't want to forget those poor boys back there but I'd like to get a little perspective on them before my heart gets all bruised up from wanting to cry but not being allowed to."

"I thought it was agreed that they were not 'poor boys.'"

"It is, when we're talking to them, but we all know we're just bluffing, don't we? If they thought I really was as calloused as I seem to be they'd hate me. But they know, too, we're all sitting in our own dark corners whistling for the sake of companionship and to keep each other's courage up. All that ministers are is just especially good whistlers. Hubbard Kirk, do you believe in immortality?"

"Why, no."

"I thought not. Only those who are very much in need of it really cling to the idea of existence after death. I wonder if the theory is not just an anæsthetic drug, invented by some especially ingenious coward, that enables us to face the last of life without shameful panic. I don't think I believe in it either now but I'm afraid I might if I had nothing else to look forward to."

They had left even the suburban traffic behind. The road was their own and the fog-shrouded mountains were just ahead, dim, majestic, with here and there a cheerful twinkling homestead light looking very much as if some of the stars of a fairer night had fallen flambant to be a necklace upon the bosom of the hills.

"I get a new thrill out of them every time," the girl said in a hushed voice, and as she spoke her hand touched his to call his attention to the view.

There was at first a little shocked flutter of withdrawal as if the contact had been different from her expectations. Then she held her fingers almost rigidly still as if fearful that he might notice.

Something unusual was happening to two people who had not hitherto been swept off their feet by a surge of emotions. Galvanic lightnings played between them for a moment. Then Hubbard Kirk, the cynical spectator at the drama of life, drew her closer and closer until his lips touched the mist-damp coolness of her cheek and then, irresistibly, found the softness of her mouth which was not cool at all.

After a moment she pushed away from him with a little shudder.

He sensed the repulsion without knowing why and released her and sat dumbly asking an explanation.

She gave it. "I've always felt superior to other people and now I find that I am much less honorable than they."

"There is nothing dishonorable in the fact that I have just kissed you. It is not an ordinary afternoon pastime of mine and, although it would sound incredible to anyone who did not know how adorable you are, I have fallen hopelessly in love with you. It began the day our voices crossed at the theater and has been growing ever since until now I can't laugh at it the way I always thought I should if I ever showed any symptoms of dementia amoris. You don't doubt me, do you?"

Beverly laughed a little herself, but brokenly. "That's just the trouble. I don't doubt you in the least. I don't want to doubt because, strange as it may seem, I've never been in love with anyone myself—ever—until this beautiful rainy day. But"—as he made a movement as if to gather her once more into his arms—"I am engaged."

"Engaged?"

"Yes, to Horace Smith. Surely he told you."

"He told me he was engaged but I forgot the name of the girl. I've a rotten memory. Oh Lord, isn't it a mess?"

"We must never see each other again."

"Never?" He looked sidewise at her. It was still light enough to distinguish the outline of her profile. Her lip was trembling. He had forgotten for a moment how little and how young she was. This idea of having adult emotions over a child was absurd. And yet he remembered—"Of course I'm not going to see you again," he declared harshly. "The principal reason why I'm not going to is because I want to dreadfully. Let's go home."

Silently she turned the car around. The patter of the rain on the fabric top was no longer cheerful and the spattered mist on the windshield was a gloomy veil against the world. The pavement was slippery.

VII

THE driver of the truck which struck them at the street intersection downtown was not to blame. It was a case of neither party seeing the other until it was too late for brakes to be any use on wet asphalt.

The truck was a heavy one and the roadster was pretty well smashed up. It turned completely over once after it was thrown against the curb.

Hubbard Kirk was not hurt much. He was quite able to stand. Therefore he was the one who carried the limp body of his driver to the ambulance when it came. On the way to the hospital she opened her eyes once and smiled at him. "I'm beginning to believe a little in immortality now, Hubbard Kirk," she whispered.

VIII

OF COURSE it was only an incident in a man's life and the world had to go on just the same; still, it was very hard for Hubbard Kirk to settle down to work the next day. Advice from the hospital in the morning had been to the effect that the patient was doing as well as could be expected and that the hopes of her recovery depended entirely upon the extent of her internal injuries.

It was none of Kirk's affair, really. He was not to blame for the accident in any way and could not be held responsible. But his conscience slugged him every second, kept hammering at his nerves until he wanted to cry out. What a fitting example of dramatic irony that a blight should have fallen upon the first girl he had let his emotions dwell upon—well, in years!

He sat at his desk for a while, then got up and paced the office floor for a similar period, lighted pipes, cigarettes and cigars and discarded them, then began the routine all over a score of times. He wanted to be at the hospital with her—the other part of him, even if they had been living lives that had not touched until yesterday; but, conventionally, he was an outsider. Besides, Horace Amboy Smith, her fiancé and his friend, was there. His presence automatically blocked Kirk from every avenue of contact.

At four o'clock Horace came in.

"Doing anything important?" he asked.

"Nothing but trying to figure out a happy ending for a tragic story that an editor fired back at me with the request to finish it with a kiss instead of a killing."

"That ought to be easy enough."

"If you think so you ought to try it sometime. There isn't anything so very happy about the way things turn out in real life—nothing for Pollyannalists to use as a model."

"Oh, I don't know!" Horace doubted. "Nearly everything turns out for the best as far as I'm concerned."

Kirk surveyed his friend with amazed incomprehension. "Oh, it does? Where can you get the cheery note out of having your fiancée in the hospital with probably fatal internal injuries?"

"That's one of the really lucky things I was going to mention in point. Where it turns out so well for me is that we weren't married. If we had been, why, my life would probably have been wrecked. As it is I can readjust and go on much as before. Beverly has been an awful good sport about it all. When she found out that the doctors only give her a short time to live she sent for me and told me the facts and offered to release me from the engagement. She even suggested that I go and call on another girl to sort of relieve my mind of the depression caused by being with her."

"Well, for the love of Heaven why don't you do it, then?" demanded Kirk exasperated and almost showing it.

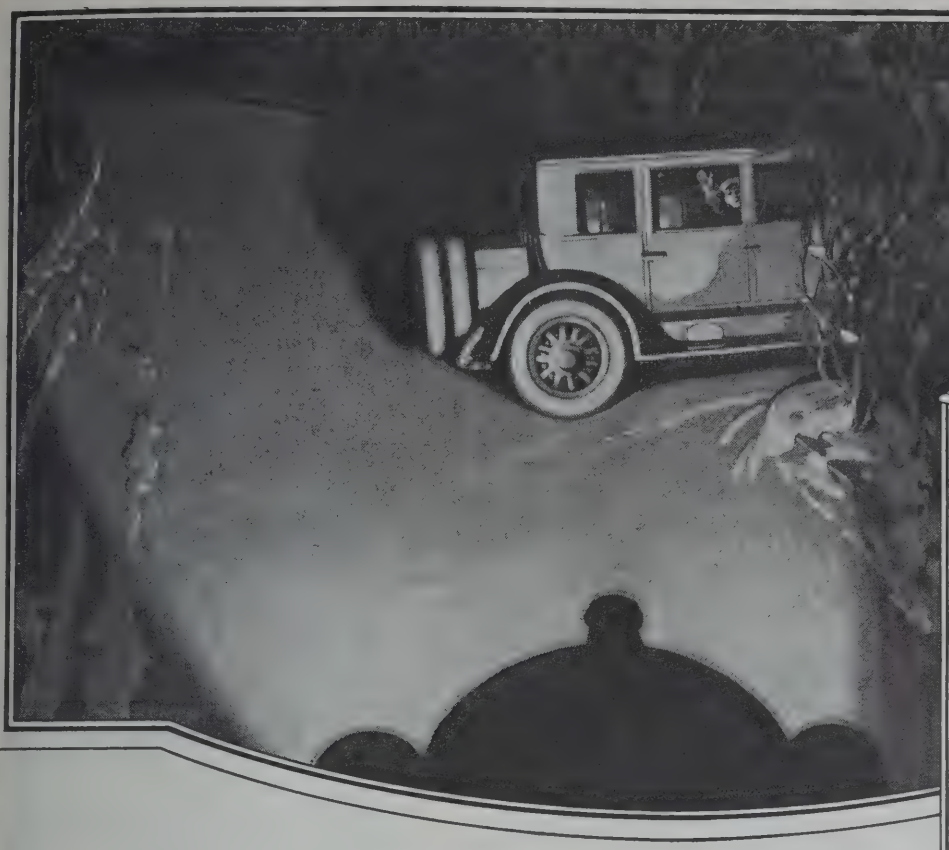
"I'm going to, my dear Squash. Don't get hectic about it. I just stopped in on my way to tell you the news. That was Beverly's idea, too. She's awfully thoughtful that way. And a darn pretty girl, too. It's a shame she has to go this way. Well, I've done my errand here. So long, Squash. I wish you luck with your happy ending."

IX

HUBBARD KIRK gave his friend just time enough to get out of the building before he started himself. A taxicab took him to a florist's, a confectioner's and a toy shop en route to the hospital.

He had so many bundles that they nearly sent him around to the service entrance. But finally he got in.

Beverly Bingham did not seem especially surprised to see him. Perhaps she was too wan and listless to have emotions of any sort. She was propped up pretty high in bed, though, and aside from the fact that there was a good deal of adhesive tape showing she seemed to be all there.



"Why didn't you come to see me until after I sent for you?" she asked imperiously.

"Because you said I must never see you again and——"

"You didn't think I meant that?"

"You said it."

"Girls always have to say things like that to save their faces with their consciences. We can't be blamed for what men do if we protest, can we? You know the story about 'Heaven knows I asked for fish.' Didn't you want to see me?"

"With every fiber of my being," Kirk averred with eyes that said more than that, "and now that I have the right I've come to offer you all of my devotion for as long as we both shall live."

"You still love me even if I'm a physical wreck? Wouldn't you like to be released from your unspoken obligation just as I released Horace from his plighted one?"

"Don't be silly! You know I'm crazy about you and that we were probably made for each other. Anything that may happen or may have happened to either of us doesn't make any difference. How long do the doctors give you? I'd like to know so I can crowd all of my lifetime into that period, even if it's only a week. Tell me the truth and then we won't mention it again. Horace said it was only a short time but I didn't ask him how long. Tell me how long?"

Beverly pondered. "Do you think you could lift me up gently in your arms?"

"I could."

"Then do it."

He did, bedclothes and all.

"Now, if you've got any strength left, kiss me just once."

He did.

"You're right, Hubbard Kirk, we were made for each other. And the answer to your question is that I'm going to live as long as you remember to love me."

"But Horace said——" Kirk began stubbornly.

"Just what I told him. After the last painful examination this afternoon the surgeons told me there was nothing wrong inside and that I'd be over my external injuries in a couple of weeks."

"Then why did you lie to Horace?"

"To see how both of you would act. Do you like liars?"

"I adore them."

"All right. I'll make you a present of one just as soon as I get these bandages off. I think we're going to be rather poor because you're too nice ever to be a money-maker and I haven't very much either, but let's be married at the Old Soldiers' Home and have a dance afterward with all the shop girls in town as guests and oodles of punch with an awful kick in it, shall we?"

"All right, Boss."

"Are you being sarcastic?"

"No, I'm merely acknowledging a condition. Order me to do anything you wish."

She did and he did.

X

THAT night, after they had forcibly put him out of the hospital, he went right to his office and wrote the final paragraph of his story.

"As her slim dearness rested in his arms he made a promise not only to her, but also to God, never to falter in his trust and to love her and cherish her a little more each day that he was allowed the blessing of her companionship."

After he had written it he read it through carefully, picked up a blue pencil and wrote across the face of the paragraph "Mush."

Then he sat and thought for a moment, visualizing a girl who, in spite of bandages and everything, was the prettiest, gentlest, cleverest girl he had ever known. He sighed and slowly erased the pencil marks.

"Perhaps," he thought, "there are a lot of people who have been in the same boat. Let it stand."

"The Luck That Failed" which Frank R. Adams writes for March COSMOPOLITAN, is a story you can't read and retain an ill feeling in the world.

Maggie Qunanne

I said no to you, being a man, so—I say yes to you—and God bless us both, dear."

So her head slipped to his shoulder and her lips met his, coolly, virginally, awkwardly.

"My first kiss," she said, "and the blessed saints themselves can see it's a lot of practice I need."

"Maggie," said her future husband, laughing breathlessly in the dark, "you're a fool."

"I know it," said Maggie happily.

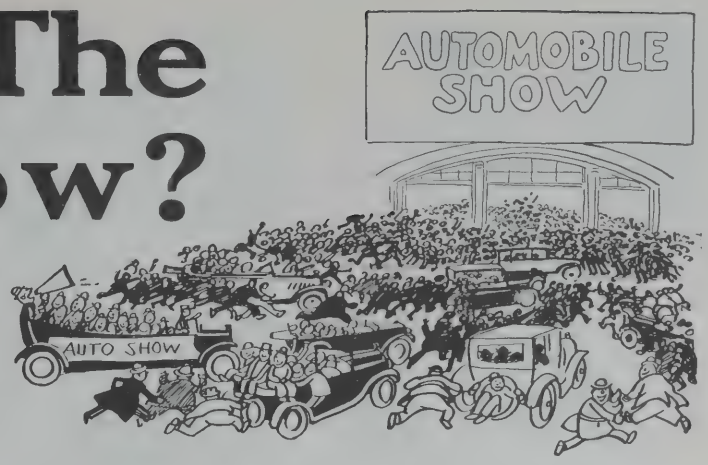
III

"GEE, he's getting awful big, ain't he, Maggie?" asked Bobby Brown, kneeling there on the clean, polished floor.

The long low room, all pale blue and cream. The exquisite, creamy walls. The golden nursery rhymes. The impudent Peter Rabbits painted at exactly the right height for tiny hands. The waddling, fat blue ducklings about the white crib. It was all sweetly still in the late sunshine.

The baby, quite naked and very pink, lay between them on a big blue quilt, his fat little legs waving aimlessly in the air and his round eyes solemnly occupied with a sunbeam that danced about his toes.

Maggie regarded the young god blissfully. "Yep. He gained a whole pound this week. Bobs, there never was such a baby. It ain't just that he's mine and Al's. Because I'm not such a sap I can't see my own baby like I'd see any other baby. But, glory, he's only four months old and look at him. And he's got a mudder and a daddy, this baby has. He's always going to have 'em, too."



She rolled the baby over and over to the edge of the quilt and he crowed delighted appreciation.

"Hear him? And Bobs, don't he look exactly like Al? Did you ever see anything like it? Look at his blue, blue eyes, just like the sky on a summer morning. And their pretty little smile and their sweetness. And those dimples. Look at 'em when I poke my finger under his chin. See? Aren't they exactly like Al's? Look now. Look. When I turn him over on his stomach he's got a fat little roll at the back of his neck, so sweet. Like nothing in this world is sweet. That's his kiss spot. His mudder's very own sweet kiss spot. And—it's silly, but Al's got a place just like that at the back of his neck."

The great comédienne bent to kiss him.

"He's an awful clean baby, Maggie,"

Going To The Auto Show?

What Auto Show? Why any of them of course.

We are right in the midst of the show season. The biggest one of all, the New York show, is going on right now at the Grand Central Palace.

The Chicago show opens January 27th and there will be hundreds of others, all over the country between now and the first of April.

Every motorist or prospective motorist owes it to himself to visit some of these shows, and see what manufacturers are offering this season. For one thing, he'll find that it's possible to buy more automobile for the money than ever before in the history of the industry.

Many improvements are to be seen this year. The following cars are announcing either mechanical or body improvements, or both. Look for them at the shows, or write this department for particulars.

said Bobby Brown, touching him gingerly. "He smells so good. And say, you look great yourself, old gal. After such a hard time as you had——"

Maggie blinked at her blankly, her small, absurd nose wrinkled inquisitively. "Hard time? You mean with the baby? Doggone, it's funny but I'd forgotten all about that. Don't amount to anything. Not for one of those fat, curly pink toes—you little doodlebug. You're a buzzard, that's what you are. You're a pink worm."

But her gray eyes grew dreamy and she sat in silence, remembering the heavenly agony of those moments. When nobody in all that big white hospital could understand the smile that never left her gray lips and the smooth sweetness of her brow where the sweat lay like the tears of a god.

Once, when Al bent frantically to kiss one of the stiff red braids that hung down beside her, she actually laughed naturally. "Don't you worry, darling," she said, through a throat that pain gripped like a claw, "don't you worry. Remember I'm a comedian and don't try to make me do any glycerine stuff. I'm too tough an old bird for a little thing like this to bother me. You run outside and buy yourself a smoke. Why, I'm all right."

"I have seen game women," the doctor said quietly to the head nurse, "but this one's got something I don't understand."

He was right.

For happiness like Maggie's heart knew then is an anodyne above medical science.

It had been like that, even before the baby came. From the instant that she stood—still Maggie Qunanne of the twinkling eyes in spite of the stately beauty of Parisian robes—at the altar, before a multitude of the greatest celebrities in filmdom, who laughed and wept with her, it had been like that.

It is not easy to describe the joy that flooded all of Maggie Qunanne.

You see, she loved Al not only for the glory of the present but for all the empty longings of the past.

From those dark nights in the cold, silent dormitory when little Maggie lay burrowing her head into a dingy pillow, trying, with eyes screwed tight shut, to imagine it was a mother's nice, warm shoulder.

From the stifling, soul-twisting, body-pinching days in the basement of the big department store, where the gangling awkwardness of her was target for every abuse.

From all the lonely, loveless years of childhood and girlhood and womanhood, with nothing but laughter to warm and brighten them.

From the hard won, hard worked, grinning days of her fame, when even those who loved her saw her as something breathless, sexless, unloved.

From all these things Maggie Qunanne walked into a glory of love-light that blinded her eyes. Her heart sang so that she could not have heard the call of an angel nor the threat of a devil.

Because Maggie Qunanne could only know love greatly.

Love to her could never be the flame of a skyrocket against a midnight sky. Nor the rose glow of a boudoir lamp. Nor even the silver sheen of moonlight on a lake.

Love was the sunlight, magnificent, life-giving, warming every breath, every drop of blood, every smallest thought and dream.

And so that was the love Maggie Qunanne, of the famous smile and the dangling shoe laces, gave her husband.

The hot tears sometimes stung Bobby Brown's wise eyelids when she saw them together, or when, in the tremendous pride of her wifehood, Maggie stumbled, still laughing, into pitiful, glorious confidences.

Bobby knew men.

There were no rose and gold glasses before her eyes when she looked at Al Cassidy.

She liked Al.

He was not a bad guy.

But she knew, and her heart ached sometimes under the knowledge, that he was not the man-god Maggie Qunanne worshiped.

There weren't any men like that. Who should know if she didn't?

She knew Al brought to this marriage no such love—was capable of no such love in his most exalted moments—as Maggie poured out as freely as the sunshine pours itself into the chalice of a flower.

Thus Bobby made of her beautiful and soiled young breast a confessional on which Maggie might pour those dear and needful confidences of a young wife.

Sometimes Bobby even tried to warn her, to teach her, to tell her some of the things life had taught her about men.

But it was like telling a baby on Christmas Eve that there is no Santa Claus.

So once, at the studio, when Adrienne Latour, shrugging restless cynical shoulders, made fun of something Maggie had said, Bobby with tight rolled little fists drove her into a corner and then slapped her until she screamed for mercy.

"Quit it, Bobby," said Lucy Haverton, "you'll hurt her."

"Then make her leave Maggie alone," said Bobby viciously.

They were all in the enormous cement dressing hall, with its ten windows and full length mirrors and great wardrobe presses, where the bathing beauties dressed.

"I don't give a damn what else she does with herself, but no gutter pup like that can make fun of Maggie."

"That's right," said Jill Manton impressively.

"But I do not make fun of her," said Adrienne sullenly. "Bobby here is of a too great silliness. What I say is that some of the things she have said here I do not believe. Nor does Bobby herself. I have say only that yesterday she come here and when Lucy she tell how her husband have combed out her hair for her last night, Maggie she say when she go home last night, Al have kneeled down and taken off her funny shoes for her. I for myself adore Maggie as much as does Bobby, but that I theenk is a bit thick. And she tie to him all the time the clever thing she say herself, to make us believe he is so witty. And she tell how he make so much more of her money by the investing of it."

"Oh you damn fool frog!" said Bobby, beginning to take off her clothes. "Can't you see? Maggie's Irish. She dreams a lot of things and they seem true to her. She wants her love affair to be just as romantic and grand as she thinks ours are. She gets the biggest kick in the world out of talking with us instead of listening like she used to. See?"

"Do you think Al gave her that diamond bracelet, or did she buy it herself?" asked Ethelyn, from the shower bath.

"No other woman is half so lovely"

"You're as pretty now as the day I met you!"

AT the beginning of Jack's and Sally's engagement, all their friends rejoiced, while the envious others wondered, "How long will it last?" For Jack was a man of rare magnetism, whom all women liked.

Tonight they had been married five years, and his every glance, his every thought, was for her alone.

"There's no one like you, Sally," he said. "You're as pretty now as the day I met you!" She only smiled at him out of tender eyes, while he watched a little dimple deepen.

"No other woman is half so lovely," he thought. "It's her complexion that is her greatest charm. And she belongs to me!"

Quite true, she was his; but then, too, you see, he still belonged to her.

The way to make mere prettiness bloom into beauty

The Pompeian Instant Beauty Trio, consisting of Pompeian Day Cream, Beauty Powder, and Bloom, gives the magic touch.

The Day Cream is truly a vanishing cream; it does not reappear after application in the form of tiny beads. It gives a perfect foundation for powder.

The Beauty Powder has the property of adhering to the skin despite the perspiration attendant upon mild exercise, such as dancing. It makes frequent disappearances for repowdering unnecessary.

The Bloom is a rouge that will not break nor crumble, and is absolutely harmless to the skin, no matter how often used. In all needed shades, the medium being wonderfully popular.

Use these three Pompeian preparations—Day Cream, Beauty Powder, and Bloom—together, for Instant Beauty. The effect is better if they are used in combination—not indiscriminately mixed with preparations of other brands—for great care has been taken that all Pompeian preparations blend perfectly, to give the most natural effect.

Using Rouge Rightly

By Mme. Jeannette

The correct use of rouge is not so generally understood as it should be. Rouge, like perfume, is something to be employed with restraint and moderation, lest it defeat its own ends.

Judicious tinting of the skin with rouge delicately heightens the color and imparts sparkle to the eyes.

Blend the rouge outward with chamois or the tips of the fingers. This fine shading prevents the abrupt line which is often the only way that tinting can be detected. So applied, and well blended with powder, it produces a soft, natural flush.

Pompeian Bloom is a rouge for gentlewomen. The medium shade, especially, is very popular with girls and young matrons of daintiness and refinement.

The lip stick, like rouge, must be used with discrimination. It should be applied to the inside of the lip and then worked out with the tip of the tongue to the natural lip-edge. Pompeian Lip Stick is harmless, prevents chapping, and gives a most realistic effect when correctly applied.

—:—

Each night cleanse the pores by bathing the face in warm water with a baby sponge or softest possible wash cloth, and dry with an unstarched towel. Then a coat of Pompeian Night Cream (a cold cream) patted on delicately with the tips of the fingers, just enough so that the pores, opened by the warm water, may be thoroughly cleansed. Do not rub. Just cover the face with the cream and remove with absorbent cotton.

Rinse the face again with warm water to take away all traces of the cream; then bathe with cold water to close the pores, using gentle strokes with the same fine sponge. It is very important not to roughen or irritate the skin by hard rubbing.

—:—

If your skin is of the oily type, you should not use a greasy cream by day, confining your use of such preparation to retiring time.

In the daytime use Pompeian Day Cream, a vanishing cream, almost greaseless. This will serve to counteract the excess of oil in your skin and to prevent shine, giving a perfect foundation for powder.

"He bought it for her," said Bobby briefly.

"Al's not such a bad little guy," said Patsy, her face darkened with the pain of her understanding, "but he's not good enough for Maggie."

"Well, he's got it pretty soft now," said Maria Camarillo, without taking her cigarette from her mouth. "Managing her and getting a big salary for it. Imagine, managing Maggie Qunanne, that's pretty near the biggest box office attraction in America. And she made Savage put him in charge of exploiting all her pictures. Yah, it's hard to put over pictures like 'Miss Tessie' and 'The School Ma'am', I don't think. But at that I think he's mighty fond of her."

"Of course he's fond of her," said Bobby, slipping herself into a one piece bathing suit of black silk, "but no man can be in love the way Maggie thinks he is. I can't explain it very good, but Maggie sees him with her heart. She's kidded herself so much she believes it. Well, like this—she dreamed a home and a husband and a baby. And she got 'em and matched 'em up to the dream.

"We're such a lot of wise crackers—sometimes I wonder if I wouldn't rather be the kind of a fool Maggie is."

To Maggie there was no flaw in her love life.

When Al, smiling but indifferent, came casually through the Savage studio, ignoring the beauty of the girls in his path, came to her, her gratitude was so deep that she could have kissed his shoes.

He was the first thing in the world that had ever been hers.

Hers alone.

Even the rag doll she had once made at the orphanage she had shared with Rosa.

If ever a man had a perfect wife, it was Al Cassidy.

She hung on his every word. Believed in his lightest judgment. Applauded his wildest ideas. Lived only to make him happy. Surrounded him with famous and interesting people. Kept a home that was beautiful and orderly as magic. Never quarreled with him, yet helped him to see more clearly.

Sometimes he was a little stunned by it all. Over his head. Had to rally all his native conceit and joy of life to meet it.

The longer they lived together the better he liked Maggie. And the funnier he thought her.

They could laugh and romp like a pair of children.

Sometimes they would literally shriek and roll on the floor with laughter over some fool gag Maggie pulled.

But he had trouble sometimes in recognizing himself as the man Maggie exalted so high.

Also, as the time slipped by, he had come to realize that Maggie lacked many things which, as a young and hot-blooded Irishman, he had always assumed would belong to the woman he loved. She had no beauty, no allure, no physical charm. She was downright homely.

Still, it was not altogether Al's fault that Selma Larsen came from a little town in Michigan just then to join the bathing beauties.

Selma. Eyes like blue and burning lakes. Dimples so deep a man might put the tip of his finger in them. Corn colored hair that had the fragrance of new-mown hay. A slim, white, budding young body that no man could look upon unmoved.

Nor that the other girls, uniting in a swift dislike and distrust of her, should send her in a cold and furious Swedish rage to smash anything that might show them her prowess.

Maggie Qunanne was a great star.

And she was the idol of the bathing girls and of all Hollywood—bathing girls and Hollywood that had turned upon her a cold and unflattering shoulder of distrustful disdain.

Al was Maggie Qunanne's husband.

IV

MAGGIE QUNANNE came slowly down the stairs into the stately beauty of the drawing room.

She looked even taller than usual, because she had on a much washed gingham dress and her brick red hair was piled, for comfort, on top of her head, as she sometimes wore it on the screen.

Her smile was a bit perfunctory because, just somehow—she had never cared an awful lot for Mrs. Derck. Moreover, she had been blissfully cleaning Al's dressing room and closets and drawers and desk, and she loved it and hated to be disturbed.

She'd be starting a new production in a few days, and she loved passionately the time between pictures when she could stay at home. With Al and the baby.

Though, unfortunately, Al had gone to San Francisco to put over the opening up there of "The School Ma'am." He had to go. It was only too bad it came during her vacation time and she couldn't leave the baby.

He wasn't back yet.

Mrs. Derck was a rather pretty woman. In her youth, hers had been the delicate coloring of a pink and white sea shell, and her features were still finely drawn and aristocratic. She was little, too, and had pretty hands and feet. But Maggie Qunanne just couldn't warm to her.

Still, Maggie had always been, would always be, grateful to Bill Derck for what he had done for her. Of course he had risen with her; just the same, if he hadn't seen her in that department store basement she might be there now.

"Hello," she said amiably. "I'm glad to see you, Mrs. Derck. The baby's asleep but the nurse will bring him down as soon as he wakes up. He's gained another pound. I think he's going to be a prize-fighter or a policeman. How are you, Mrs. Derck, and how are your family? And has Bill been having a good rest so we can get right into this new story and finish it up in a hurry? You'll have to excuse the way I look. I'm a housewife these days."

"Bill's well," said Mrs. Derck, and when she spoke her voice was pleasant and friendly enough. "He's fishing. You're looking mighty well yourself, Maggie."

Maggie wrinkled her absurd excuse for a nose and grinned. "I look about as I always do, Mrs. Derck," she said, "and that's no better nor no worse than the Lord made me. Nobody ever accused me of being a beauty, but beauty is not everything in this world, glory be."

A pause fell.

And in it, like a distant bugle call, Maggie's heart heard a faint note of warning.

Once, when she had been tramping the Hollywood hills with Rosa on a picnic, she

That's not only possible—it's true, as thousands upon thousands of happy owners of Gas Ranges equipped with the Lorain Oven Heat Regulator can testify. And that's not half the story.

In the oven of a Lorain-equipped Gas Range you can cook a complete luncheon, dinner or supper, at one time—and without watching. You can roast meats, boil vegetables, bake desserts, and can fruits and vegetables without ever a failure.

Wherever gas is available there are dealers who will be glad to explain and demonstrate one of the six famous makes of gas ranges equipped with the Lorain Oven Heat Regulator. That you may learn the many distinct advantages of these wonderful stoves, call on the nearest dealer.

had felt like that. A tightening of her eyelids. A prickling of her scalp. Turning, she had seen a rattler, just awakening from sleep.

Now as the silence lay deadly and Nina Derck's smile did not waver, Maggie felt the tips of her fingers grow cold.

"Did you want to see me about anything in particular?" she asked bluntly.

Another woman than Nina Derck might have hesitated before those clear and candid eyes, with their merry twinkle never quite hidden. Before the sweetness of that wide, ugly mouth that had taught the world to smile. Might, indeed, have remembered the orphans of the world, and the wounded soldiers so many had forgotten, who owed so much to Maggie Qunanne.

But in Nina Derck's heart lay that serpent of malice that nothing can check. She had hated Maggie Qunanne for five years, because Maggie Qunanne was the woman to whom her husband owed his success. Because her husband had said that Maggie Qunanne was the finest woman in the world.

"Maggie, you're a married woman now," she said, a little sadly, "and you have not very many married women friends."

"Well, now, maybe that's true. The girls are pretty good friends to me, God bless and care for them always, but they're not married, some of them, 'tis a fact. Still——"

"Older married women sometimes understand things that you young wives don't, that's all. We've learned by experience and sometimes we can help you. If you know how a thing is, you can handle the situation so much better. You mustn't be left in the dark, Maggie, that's what I've said to myself. I'd want a friend to do as much for me."

Maggie's eyes showed tiny points of steel in their grayness. Her lips were firm and quiet.

"You're driving at something I don't understand, Mrs. Derck," she said. "Will you please to come to the point and not beat around the bush, which I can't stand?"

"Then I feel, Maggie, that it will help you to know how to act if you're warned ahead that your husband is behaving very badly with that little Selma Larsen. In fact, I happen to know that he took her to San Francisco with him in his car. Now it's nothing to be serious about, Maggie. She's not the sort of girl that could hold a man, but she is pretty. I said to myself, Maggie is sure to find this out, and she mustn't take it too seriously or let her pride trick her into doing something desperate. He'll come back to you, dear, and everything will be all right. Only be firm with him. Take him away for a little while. That's always been my method. But I certainly felt you should know."

Maggie Qunanne did not move.

Her big, strong hands, that could hold a baby so firmly and so tenderly, lay quite still in her lap.

And she sat there so long without moving that Mrs. Derck began foolishly to cry.

But Maggie did not seem to hear her.

Only once her lips moved softly. "My husband," she said.

She had not even lost her color.

But the eyes of Mary, the Mother, must have been like that as they looked up at the cross. Like Maggie Qunanne's little twinkling, merry gray eyes that now held every drop of suffering woman has ever known, until you could see right through them into the great heart of her breaking—breaking.

Then, as the other woman watched her with tears streaming down her silly, pretty, middle-aged face, a miracle was slowly born.

The terrible thing that had stood like a crucifix within her eyes melted away, and a light came into them so that you could no longer tell what color they were, nor what expression they held. Only a light.

Quite naturally Maggie Qunanne smiled her famous, heart-warming, irresistible smile.

Quite naturally she got up from her chair and steadily walked across to the other woman.

"I don't believe you," said Maggie Qunanne simply. "Nothing could make me believe you. Because, you see, I believe in God—and God just couldn't let that happen to me—and my baby—now."

And the other woman, trembling before her, knew that she spoke the truth.

She did not believe her.

V

It was Bobby Brown who met Al at the Exchange office when he came in from San Francisco and told him of Mrs. Derck's visit.

"I didn't know in time to stop her," said Bobby coldly, the venom of her hate spitting at him like a vicious kitten. "What she told Maggie I don't know. But for God's sake do your best to protect her, you filthy little beast."

Into Al Cassidy's heart came a fear that hurt.

Shame came to him, too, like a shower of boiling oil.

Poor old Maggie.

Oh God, what a rotten trick to play on Maggie!

He thought of the girl who only a few hours before had lain so maddeningly in his arms. The beauty. The grace. The mass of her hair. Her thick, creamy eyelids.

That was what had lured him. That beauty of hers.

Maggie was Maggie. He loved her. She was the best old thing in the world.

But he had been hungry for the young beauty of woman.

Yet now the thought of the girl's wet, sweet lips nauseated him.

He longed inexpressibly for the cool, clean decency of Maggie Qunanne.

His wife.

What shook him was the horrible thought that if he had been tempted once like this he might be again.

The hideous thought that he might never measure up.

Was it only satiety that made him loathe himself so utterly now?

As he walked up the red brick steps of the house on the hill he could not raise his eyes to the window where Maggie usually waited for him.

To himself, it seemed that he slunk.

Poor old Maggie. It wasn't that she wouldn't forgive. But—to tear down, wantonly to shatter, her dreams.

She was there waiting for him, in the doorway. Tall and terribly dear.

It came to him in a moment that there was only one thing to do. To throw himself at her feet and tell her the whole rotten truth and beg her forgiveness. To show her that he loved her and that the other had been only the beast within. Get the burden of his guilt from his shoulders to hers by confession and repentance.

But the serenity of her face checked him.

"Hello, darlin'," she said.

He could not wait until it was out and over. It choked him.

"Has Mrs. Derck been here?" he asked.

Maggie stepped into the wide, cool hall and closed the door.

Upstairs he heard the baby crying lustily.

"Yes," she said.

"Did she tell you some story about me and Selma Larsen?"

"Yes," said Maggie Qunanne, "but of course I didn't believe her."

The man looked into the clear, happy sweetness of her soul, through her little, twinkling gray eyes and knew, as Nina Derck had known, that she spoke the truth.

Suddenly he could not look at her, as a man cannot look straight into the gorgeous pathway of the evening sun upon the water.

His eyes were blind, and he did not know why.

Only he found himself on his knees at her feet, his face buried in the crisp white of her dress. It seemed to Al Cassidy that the tears he shed—the first man tears he had ever known—washed a mist from before his eyes. So that he saw this woman for the lovely thing she was. That he felt the touch of her faith, healing him.

And he knew that never, though his desire tore his flesh to ribbons and ground his bones to ashes, could he again betray that faith that shone upon him. Knew that somehow, in the magic of that light from her eyes, he had become somewhat nearer the man she saw in her heart.

With a cry Maggie knelt beside him, holding him, and her face was so beautiful to him that he even dared to look up—up into the face of the sun.

But then, you remember, the Stranger of Galilee told us many centuries ago that faith, as a grain of mustard seed, will remove mountains.

How to keep your hair soft and silky, full of life and lustre, bright and fresh-looking

© THE R.L.W. CO.

Why proper shampooing makes your hair beautiful

ANYONE can have beautiful hair, if it is cared for properly.

Shampooing is the most important thing.

Proper shampooing is what brings out all the real life and lustre, the natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

Proper shampooing, however, means more than just washing your hair—it means thorough cleansing.

The hair and scalp are constantly secreting oily, gummy substances. These substances catch the dust and dirt, and the hair becomes coated with this.

This coating, when it becomes excessive, naturally dulls the hair and destroys its gloss and lustre. It covers up and prevents the natural color and beauty of the hair from showing. It also causes scales and dandruff.

How to prevent this coating

To have beautiful hair, you must prevent this coating from accumulating.

This cannot be done with ordinary soaps not adapted for the purpose. Besides, the hair cannot stand the harsh effect of free alkali which is common in ordinary soaps. The free alkali soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo is not only especially adapted to cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly, but it cannot possibly injure. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

The quick, easy way

Two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water is all that is required.

Simply pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out quickly and easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it really is. It keeps the scalp soft and healthy, the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Splendid for children—Fine for men.

When She Grows Up

She will be beautiful, of course, in the rosy future pictured by a mother's dreams. But—this future beauty will not be left to chance, for modern mothers know how to make their dreams come true.

Her first concern will be care of the little daughter's complexion, to protect its smooth, fresh, childish texture from injury through careless treatment. Proper cleansing is the secret, and use of the proper cleanser. The skin must not be robbed of its own natural, beautifying oil, yet it must be kept thoroughly clean.

Only soap and water used daily will keep the skin properly clean, so the problem lies in the choice of soap. You want the mildest, most soothing and lotion-like soap which can be made. Such soap is yours in Palmolive.

Soap and cosmetic combined

Palmolive is the modern development of an ancient beauty secret, discovered by the Egyptians 3,000 years ago. They learned that palm and olive oils were wonderful beautifiers. Crudely blended, they were used as cleansers as well as to keep the skin smooth and soft.

These rare oils, scientifically blended in Palmolive, produce far more than mere soap. It permits thorough, beautifying cleansing without danger of drying the skin. It soothes, refreshes and stimulates, resulting in becoming natural bloom and glow.

Such cleansing, every day, results in a clear, healthy skin and is the basis of complexion beauty.

Clogging the greatest danger

Fear of thorough cleansing, or indifference to its importance, is the original cause of skin trouble. The daily accumulation of dirt, excess oil and perspiration combine with cold cream and powder to clog the tiny pores. Disfiguring coarseness from their enlargement is the first result.

The accumulated dirt produces blackheads, with the danger of infection, which causes blotches. Such a complexion is fatal to personal charm.

What to do

Once every day, preferably at bedtime, wash your face thoroughly with Palmolive Soap. Work up a lather with your two hands and massage it thoroughly into the skin. Then rinse thoroughly. Use a fine, soft towel for drying.

If your skin is very dry, apply a little cold cream and wipe off what isn't quickly absorbed. If your skin is normally oily you won't need it.

All can afford it

The world-wide popularity which keeps the Palmolive factories busy day and night enables us to maintain the 10-cent price. Thousands can afford the benefit and luxury of this finest and mildest soap.

The Revolt of Camposanto

Feeling that the eyes of his chosen and appointed woman were on him, Camposanto was not only able to turn the engine over but to spin it with a kind of smooth fury.

Presently a spark flashed, a charge of gas ignited, and the car began to roar as if it were defying an enemy and to shake all over as if it had the palsy.

When Camposanto had taken his place, Señorita Diaz felt of his upper arm. And he, complacently doubling the arm, caused the biceps muscle to swell and harden.

"How strong you are!" she said.

He couldn't help boasting a little.

"I wouldn't be afraid to put on the gloves with any man of my age on the Pacific Coast," he said.

"Imagine!" exclaimed the Señorita Diaz.

And presently they went lunging and bumping out of the little city in which they had suffered so much and for so long and, at a very slow speed, climbed the long hill that leads to the lovely Mission of Carmel and beyond.

Machinery improves, religions rise and fall and points of view change, but human nature remains always the same. And any bully, whether man, woman or child, is always the better for a good sound thrashing.

Mrs. Kelley said nothing about the blow which she had stopped with the point of her jaw. She merely said that her father had insisted on going away in the middle of the night and that he had put his case to her in such a way that she could not find it in her heart to blame him. As for going into court and attempting to prove that the old gentleman was no longer able to take care of himself—that was buncombe and she would have nothing to do with it.

"After all," said her sister, "we won't have long to wait. Father's seventy."

"True," said Mrs. Kelley with a faint smile, "but if I'm any judge of condition he's very likely to be going strong at a hundred."

And she stroked her chin in a reflective and reminiscent way.

"We had better," she said, "manage to exist on what we've got. We've about a million apiece pretty well invested, and plenty of people in this world manage to struggle along on less."

"I suppose so," sighed Mrs. O'Ryan, "but it would be lovely to be rich."

Even when it was learned that the Diaz girl had gone away with Camposanto and that the pair had been married by the priest at Carmel, Mrs. Kelley stood up for her father.

"Felicia," she said, "is an excellent housekeeper. She will make him an excellent wife; they were once in love with each other and undoubtedly they still feel a certain attachment."

"He will leave his money to her," objected Mrs. O'Ryan in a plaintive voice.

"Not all of it," Mrs. Kelley assured her. "He will provide for her of course; but it has always been father's religion that the Camposanto money should go with the Camposanto blood."

"It's lucky for us," said Mrs. O'Ryan, "that father never had a son. Primogeniture and entailed estates were always a hobby of his."

"Father," said Mrs. Kelley confidently, "will never leave Camposanto out of the family. And when the Coast Boulevard is built and all the country to the southward becomes accessible, Camposanto will cut up for millions and millions and millions of dollars."

"And they will all belong to us and ours," said Mrs. O'Ryan with a brighter expression.

Since the revolt against tyranny and the flight of Felix Camposanto some ten months had passed when one fine day a telegram was delivered at the door of the old Camposanto adobe in Monterey. It was very brief and contained only the words:

"Boys. All well."

After a long time of wonderment and silence, Mrs. O'Ryan said in a faint voice, "I'm so surprised you could knock me down with a feather."

"Surprised!" said Mrs. Kelley presently. "Are you?" Then she stroked her chin in a reminiscent and reflective way and smiled suddenly and said:

"Well, I'm not nearly as surprised as I might be!"

Julius Sees Her

my side of the switchboard was comical to see.

"Well, girlie," he gushes—the big clown!—"when are we going to have that dinner together?"

I felt like saying, "When Niagara Falls starts running the other way!" But I want to straighten out Julius, so I throw the smile into high.

"I'll let you know later," I says. "I want to ask you something first."

"Anything!" he says, with his hand on his heart. He's one of these fellows which simply can't stop acting, on and off. "Anything I possess is yours, if——"

"What could be sweeter than that?" I cut him off, still smiling. "But I just want to ask you a question. What would you do if you were an understudy and knew you were greater than the star, but couldn't get a chance to play the part and dumbfound the world?"

He looks a bit surprised and then he pretends to be giving the matter the same attention the U. S. Supreme Court gives a trust tangle, standing there with his chin in his hand and a frown puckering his noble forehead.

"Why," says this master mind finally, "why, I'd have the star kidnaped for one performance and take my chances."

And he laughs. A little bit later he was like the laughing hyena which died. He didn't have nothing to laugh at!

Well, I manage to get rid of Hemingway Bryce a few minutes afterwards and I can hardly keep from yelling with joy, because I've got Julius all set. I know just what I'm going to do and just what he's going to do—that's if he wants to keep his little girl friend. So when we go to dinner that night I put all my cards on the table, face up.

"Julius," I says, "after some years of watching you boys perform and in that way getting a good line on the male sex, I made up my mind if I ever fell I'd fall for a great man. Being a shipping clerk's darling or a head bookkeeper's bride never has appealed to me and it don't now. The man I gamble my future with has got to mean something. He's got to either get his name in the electric lights or invent something brighter!"

Julius is looking at me like a drowning man would look at you if you threw him an anvil.

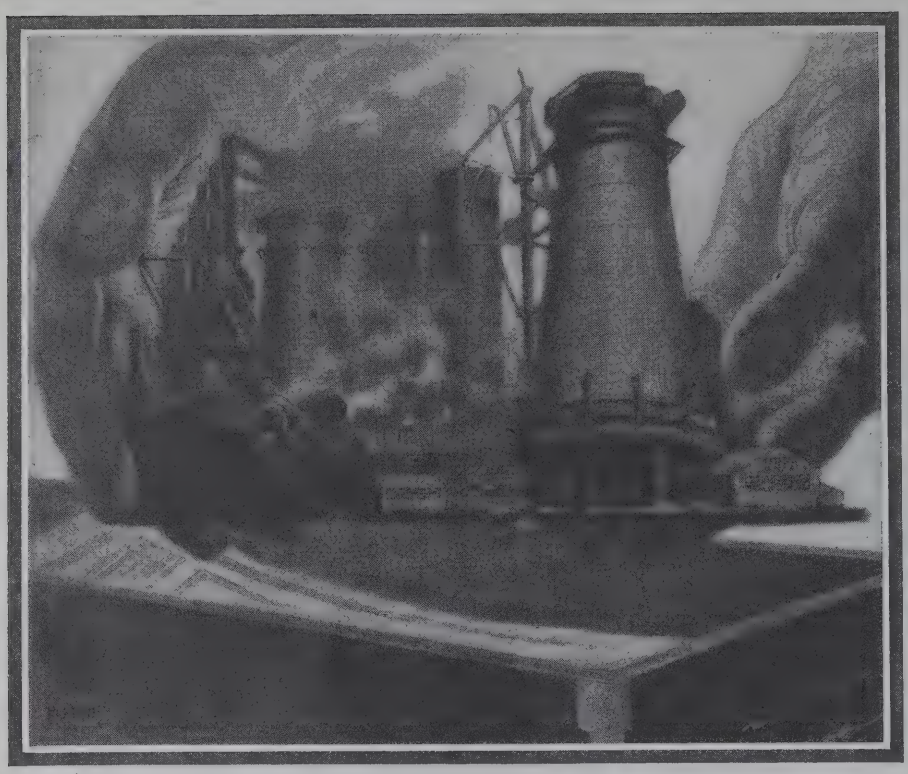
"But I thought we settled all——" he begins.

"Don't interrupt teacher!" I shut him off. "As I was saying before you spoke out of turn, I always craved the affection of a really great man and swore I'd fall for no other. Unfortunately, Julius, you came along and you're far from great, but I fell for you nevertheless. There's no question about that part of it. Therefore I am going to make you famous, whether you want to be famous or not!"

"I'm afraid I don't understand," says Julius—and looks it.

"You want a chance to play the star part in 'The Girl from Betelgeuse' and show Broadway what you can do, don't you?" I says.

"Do I?" says Julius, grabbing my hands while his face lights up like a cathedral. "Why, say, sweetheart, if I ever get a crack at that part——"



"Well, don't cry," I butt in. "You're going to get a crack at it tomorrow night!"

"What do you mean?" gasps Julius, trying to read my face. He can't and he sinks back in his chair. "Don't jest about that, Gladys, it's too near my heart," he says, kind of reproachful.

"If you think I'm kidding, you're crazy!" I smiles. "If Charlemagne Rutledge fails to appear tomorrow night you go on and play the lead, don't you?"

"Of course," says Julius. "But that's nonsense. He hasn't missed a performance since the infernal show opened a year ago."

"Well, he'll miss tomorrow night," I says, still smiling, "because we're going to kidnap him."

Julius laughs and pats my hand. "You angel," he says, "I really believe you would do that for me! But——"

"But nothing," I interrupt, the smile gone. "Kidnaping the leading man is the only way you'll ever get your chance. Well, we're going to do it. If you don't go through with this, I'm through with you!"

This time he must of read my face correctly.

"Good heavens, you can't be serious!" he exclaims. "Why the thing's unthinkable! I—why——"

"I never was more serious in my life," I shut him off. "I've even laid out the details. Keep quiet a minute and I'll tell you how we'll work it."

"Why—why—Gladys—I—we'll be arrested! We——" Julius is at the stuttering stage, as pale as a couple of ghosts.

"Suppose we do get arrested," I says. "Look what we're shooting at! If my scheme goes through you'll be a star, won't you?"

"But—but——" He's all but speechless.

"Listen," I says, "cut out the buts. I'll be the goat in this little trifling matter and if you don't do your part you're canceled with me as sure as there's a Frenchman in Paris! Of course, if you're afraid you'll fall down if you do get the chance to play the lead, why——"

"Fall down?" he butts in, banging the table with his fist. "Why, it will put me over!"

"Then let's go!" I says, banging the table myself. "It's all fun!"

When we part Julius weighs about ten pounds less than he did when we come in the restaurant, but he's agreed to my little kidnaping scheme. About all he touched of the dinner was the check.

The next night I get busy on my own little movie, written and produced by myself and called "The Kidnaped Leading Man." I know I'm never going to get away with this without something happening that won't do me a bit of good, but had I knew just exactly what was going to happen I almost think I would of allowed Julius to make good in his own way. Before things was over I felt like I had called for a drink of water and got hit by a tidal wave.

My first imitation is to interview Pete Kift, captain of the merry bellhops and a young man who claims he would take great pleasure in diving off the top of the city hall into a silk hat if I asked him to. Well, I don't ask Pete to do that difficult feat, I simply ask him to lock Charlemagne Rutledge in his room that night, so that by no chance can Charlemagne get out till it's too late for him to get to the theater where "The Girl from Betelgeuse" is playing. The fire escape is two doors farther down the hall, as both Charlemagne and Hemingway Bryce, who rooms with him, had kicked against having a suite that opened out into one, claiming it poisoned the view from the windows. So if Charlemagne wants to jump, good for him—it's only ten stories to the pavement and that last story would have a most unhappy ending, now wouldn't it? I then arrange at the switchboard that no calls from that suite are to be answered. That prevents my captive from calling the desk or anybody else which might be weak-kneed enough to release him and deprive my Julius of his chance to play the lead in "The Girl from Betelgeuse." I know I am crazy to do this, as the fellow remarked before slapping the lion in the face, but then you want to remember I am also in love!

At eight o'clock Pete Kift sidles up to the switchboard as mysterious as a Cuckoo Klan meeting. He looks to the right and left and then he bends over to me.

"All set, Cutey!" he says, in a hoarse whisper.

"You're sure he's locked tight—he can't get out?" I whisper back, and gee, I'm nervous!

"Say," says my noble Pete, "'at bozo couldn't get out of 'at room if his name was Houdini!" So that was all settled.

Well, I'll never forget the night I put in at that board if I live to the ripe old age of a million. Phew! I got nothing to do but think of what will happen to me when Charlemagne Rutledge gets out of that room and realizes he has missed his show. I think and think and think and then every time I get about froze stiff with pure fright, why, the thought comes to me that Julius is out on that stage singing and acting his way to a roaring success. That thought kind of evens matters, for it fills me with a warm glow of pride and satisfaction. Anybody which got a right number from me that night got it by dumb luck and nothing else.

As the witching hour of midnight approaches and I am thanking Heaven that I'm about to go off duty, Pete Kift again slinks up to the board and this time he's got the word "panic" wrote all over his face. He's as nervous as a frightened rabbit and a bit pale and sickly looking. What a swell villian he'd be, I think, but then it's the men which always weakens, isn't it?

"Cutey," whispers Pete, "I have got to let 'at baby out of his cell upstairs, I do for a fact. He's bellerin' and meowin' and kickin' on the door and he's went to work and busted a window on me! He's jazzed around up there so much he's got the people in the adjoinin' rooms all stirred up, and the neighbors' children and the like outside lookin' up at the windows, and you know what 'at will lead to. I'd like to go up and cuff some brains into him, but I got to let him out, kid, or the reserves'll be here!"

Well, I'm ready to faint because the grand finale is about to break, but I tell Pete to go up and unlock the door. It's twelve o'clock now and by this time Julius must be the talk of Broadway. That being the case, I'm ready to take my medicine, because naturally enough I can't let poor Pete Kift be the goat for a frame-up I planned myself. Anyways, Pete springs for the elevator and is shot up to the tenth floor like a bullet. I'm pinning on my hat when the same elevator door opens and out of it almost falls—not Charlemagne Rutledge, leading man in "The Girl from Betelgeuse," but Hemingway Bryce, his roommate and star in another play!

Heavens above, I have kidnaped the wrong leading man, ruined a perfectus good show and in no way helped my Julily to fame and fortune!

All this comes to me like a blow between the eyes with a mallet and I sink back against the switchboard just about ready for the undertaker. Hemingway Bryce comes rushing up to murder somebody for not answering his wild calls and one look at me seems to be enough for him.

"By the eternal!" he roars. "I see it all now! You asked me what I would do to give an understudy a chance to play the star's part. Oh, fool that I was! The irony of it. I told you I'd kidnap the leading man, little thinking I was that leading man myself! So you and my understudy did this damnable thing, did you? Well——"

"Mr. Bryce—please!" I butt in faintly. "Please listen. You must listen! It has all been a terrible mistake. I—we—I didn't mean to kidnap you at all. It was——"

"Not a word!" howls this dumbbell, prancing around. "I'll have you arrested! I'll sue this hotel for a million dollars damages and I'll collect, too! My reputation is gone forever. Boy, call an officer!"

At this critical minute the revolving doors revolve and in rushes the cause of it all—Mr. Julius De Haven. He pushes the foaming Bryce aside and bounces over to me like there's nobody in the hotel, or in New York for that matter, but me and him.

"Oh, you wonderful girl!" he hollers. "I owe everything to you! Your blessed scheme succeeded beyond our wildest dreams. I played Prince Danilo in 'The Girl from Betelgeuse' tonight as he has never been played before. Why, sweetness, I got an ovation! I was forced to take a dozen curtain calls after my first act alone and—oh, it's too much to tell you all at once! Seligman came to my dressing room and offered me a starring contract for next season and—why, darling, what's the matter?"

The matter was that I had simply passed out! Things were coming entirely too fast for little Gladys. Here I have living raving evidence before me that I have kidnaped the wrong man, yet Julius says the scheme went through! Then who in—eh—then who in the name of Kansas City kidnaped the right leading man?

I come to with Julius fanning me and trying to force me to drink water. I will not be forced to drink water, so I straighten up in time to see Charlemagne Rutledge bust into the crowd around me and throw his arms about his dear old roommate Hemingway Bryce.

"Thank God you are safe!" bawls Charlemagne.

"Safe?" yells Hemingway. "I'm ruined. This woman had me locked in my room tonight and I missed my performance!"

"Then she has saved your life!" says Charlemagne Rutledge. "Haven't you heard! They're crying the extras now. The roof of your theater collapsed, man, and hundreds were killed! The streets were closed by the police for blocks around. I couldn't get through their infernal fire lines until eleven o'clock and I missed my own performance. I don't know how my understudy got through with the part and——"

"Ha ha!" butts in Julius joyfully. "You'll know when you see the morning papers, old dear!"

Hemingway Bryce has turned triple pale when he hears of his narrow escape. He's worse shook up than I am and that's a fact!

"I—I—forgive me," he stammers to me. "I—I owe you my life. I could kiss you!"

"Try it!" says Julius, the ex-gentle chorus man, "and I'll murder you!" And he slides his arm around me.

But, honest, I had nothing to do with the roof of that theater falling in. That was somebody else's idea, no fooling!

The Man Afraid of His Job

Scott, who indeed had had his first job under Billy's supervision.

"I remember him, a red-faced boor," said Maryland. "He was there in my father's time."

"I don't know where he's been or why the old man is entertaining him—he's married, I know that. Maybe he married money," said Scott. "Anyway he and his wife are going to be at the club, and you can imagine how much Mrs. Iverson will have in common with them. The only one reason I really would like to go is to oblige the old man. He asked me again today if we were coming."

"H'm," Maryland said thoughtfully. Old C. P. had acted disgracefully in the matter of the mail department position, but it was decent of him to care whether they came to his luncheon or not. "I'd just as soon go," she conceded suddenly.

"I told him that on account of your health——" Scott began.

"I could wear my crêpe de Chine," mused Maryland. The crêpe de Chine was deliciously roomy and soft, it fell in exquisite folds. And then there was the broad brimmed hat with the feathers curling on her shoulder. Not but what all the women there would be in gowns that made any gown of hers look simple! Still——

"It would be sort of fun to see the club and to eat a luncheon I didn't cook!" she said. And her heart, and Scott's heart, warmed again toward the old firm; Scott should tell C. P. tomorrow that they could come, and Maryland would make her prettiest effort on Sunday to please Mrs. Floyd and amuse the obnoxious Billy Brooks.

This decided, they fluctuated again. It meant an enormous amount of effort after all. Scott's best suit must be pressed and the old suit mended so that the other could be spared, and the Warners, who were coming to supper and the usual bridge game Sunday night, must be put off until Monday because Maryland would be so tired, and a hundred other details must be adjusted to meet the unusual circumstances. They were to take the eleven twenty-two to Locust Valley; Scott and Maryland were unused to taking trains they speculated as to the cost of tickets and the time of the subway trip.

The April day broke untimely hot and enervating; Maryland awakened at half-past five and could not get to sleep again. She felt ill; if this had been any ordinary day she would have remained in bed. But this was the day of the Beachways luncheon.

She tossed, composed herself, got up and shut out the light. No use, there never had been such a thing as sleep. Her mind went over and over the plan: the subway, the tickets, the Locust Valley train. "How do you do, Mrs. Iverson? You were very sweet to think of Scott and me—how do you do, Bella!"

The crêpe-de-Chine—the feathery hat. "How do you do, Mr. Iverson! No, I never have seen the Beachways Club before . . . Scott does, but I never have tried golf."

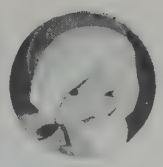
She dozed, started up in terror. Suppose they missed the train! Imagine trying to locate Floyd Iverson—probably having him summoned from the links. "Mr. Iverson, this is Scott Waterman—we seem to have missed the eleven-twenty!" It was merely a social engagement, after all, it was supposedly a pleasurable occasion. But Floyd Iverson was not the man ever to forgive the breaking of any engagement. System, efficiency, capability—these were his creed.

Pleasure! Maryland could have wept at the mere thought, when at last she could get up and when she sat at the side of the bed, dizzy and sick. The shimmering spring heat, the odors of the clean little shabby kitchen, the first hot breath of boiling coffee went over her like a wave of anguish.

A dozen times, slowly and shakily dressing, she wanted to say to Scott, "I cannot!" And a dozen times she bit the words back and struggled on.

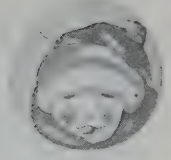
The kitchen speckless, shaded, deserted; the beds scrupulously made; the bathroom ordered. The crêpe-de-Chine lifted at last in her indifferent hands, the shady hat, and a last touch of powder upon her colorless face.

"I look like a ghost!" she said with a forlorn smile.



They were out in the morning heat of the streets; people were coming and going with bewildering vigor. They were in the station, with twenty-five minutes to wait. They were in the warm, crowded train, off at last for their day at the famous Beachways Club.

The rest of the day became for Maryland simply a blur, shot with a single necessity. She must have some hot, thin tea.



She was thinking of it when they got out at Locust Valley; she was hoping that luncheon would be early, and that there would be tea—the very first thing.

The Iversons' car; closed, lined in fawn color and embellished with an equipment in violet leather and gold. A dazzle of other handsome cars, wheeling and stirring in the bright glancing sunlight; Scott's fingers firm on her elbow to help her in. And here were the Ivers boys, going in another car somewhere, tall, gawky, friendly lads, evidently instructed to welcome the Watermans and see that they were started in the right direction.

The country roads, lined by bare trees, and with here and there the first tender yellow green of a willow showing in a timid waterfall of flowing streamers, rolled by them as they went. Maryland nervously are sensitive as a baby's skin

Their little woolens

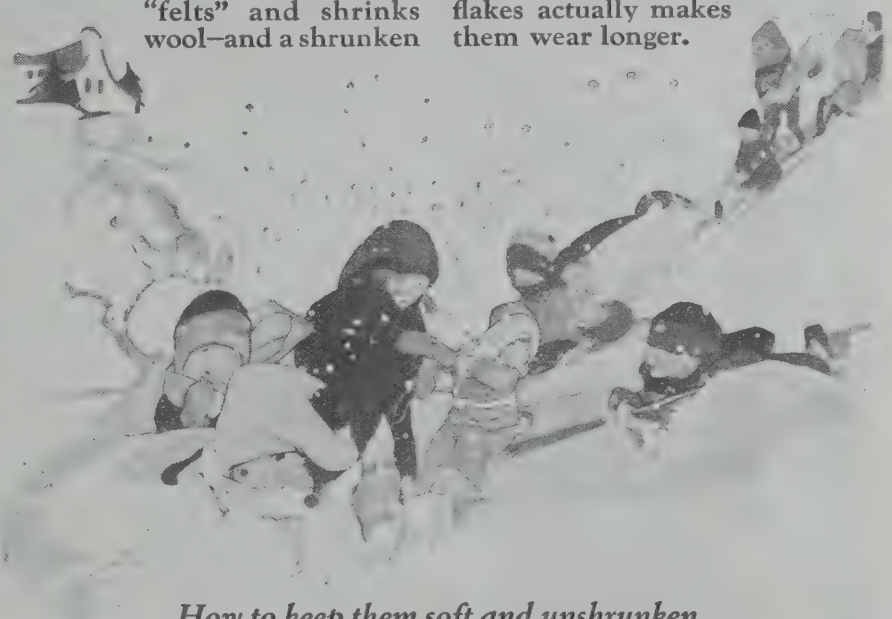
WOOLENS must be washed as carefully as their small owner's rosy cheeks. Strong soap shrinks and coarsens woolens, just as it coarsens and chaps a child's soft skin.



Toss Lux into your basin or wash tub—turn on the hot water—now watch the rich Lux lather bubble up. Souse the little garments up and down, press the cleansing suds through them. The rubbing so ruinous to woolens is not necessary with Lux. A harsh soap "felts" and shrinks wool—and a shrunken woolen is an old woolen, scratchy, uncomfortable, its charm all gone.

Won't shrink woolens

Lux contains no harmful ingredients to attack the sensitive fibres. Anything that water alone will not harm is safe in Lux.

Keep all their little woolens, their sweaters and scarfs, their stockings and underwoolens, always soft and fluffy with Lux.

Washing them in these pure flakes actually makes them wear longer.

How to keep them soft and unshrunken —sweaters, stockings, flannels—anything made of wool

These manufacturers recommend Lux for woolens

Ascher's Knit Goods
Carter's Knit Underwear
Fleisher Yarns
Jaeger's Woolens
North Star Blankets

Whisk two tablespoonfuls of Lux into a thick lather in half a washbowl of very hot water. Add cold water until lukewarm. Dip garment up and down, pressing suds repeatedly through soiled spots. Do not rub. Rinse in three lukewarm waters. Squeeze water out—do not wring.

For colored woolens make suds and rinsing waters almost cool. Wash very quickly. Lux won't cause any color to run not affected by pure water alone. Dry woolens in an even, moderate temperature.

commented upon a country mansion here and there. Heavens! what a big place to live in, and what an adorable lodge. Maryland would much rather have the lodge than the house.

"Why is it that girls on horseback always make it a point to look so haughty?" she mused as riders galloped by, their mounts flinging up great clods of the dark, soft earth.

Scott was silent, nervous. Maryland felt her face blazing and her hands chilly; she wished the ordeal would commence. She thought her headache would clear and her nerves grow steady if she could have a cup of thin, hot tea.

The beautiful club house, a sort of glorified Dutch Colonial mansion with green shutters and spreading wings, stood upon a smooth rise of green turf and was surrounded by magnificent trees whose bare branches threw pleasant filigrees of shadow upon the wide porches. Motorcars were coming and going, women filtered up and down the broad steps, and on the greens brightly clad golfers shouted and strode valiantly.

Mrs. Floyd Iverson met the Watermans with a pleasant indifference to their arrival that made both Scott and Maryland, although neither betrayed it, feel oddly flat. It was as if Mrs. Floyd felt that their mere presence at the club was enough; she gilded the lily with no personal graciousness. They were privileged now to see the roaring wood fire in the famous white Dutch tiles, and the girls and men who were riding, and the golfers and tennis players, and young Rennie Brevoort in his extraordinary car. They could study the English hunting prints on the walls and the beautiful flowered English chintzes at the windows, and they could share the merriment, laughter, chatter and excitement of what was the real opening of the season.

She had other guests, a rather heterogeneous collection, Maryland thought. Maryland thought, with some little resentment, that she and Scott had obviously been asked in a group that didn't much matter, a sort of bunching of several obligations, and sweeping of the social boards. Certainly had Maryland Waterman known that the McGavins, of "the firm," were to be included, she would have stayed in her comfortable bed during this dreadful day. She disliked Edna McGavin, who was a sycophant, a toadying little eager, stupid creature who imitated the very accents of Mrs. Floyd's voice. To have Edna here today seemed to put Maryland in Edna's class, the class Scott inelegantly described as bootlickers. Bert McGavin was undeniably that; Maryland could see that Scott was as annoyed as she was to find the McGavins here, and that his brow was dark.

It was half-past twelve; no talk of luncheon. Maryland and Bert McGavin were in neighboring chairs on the big porch, making conversation. The day was very hot; Maryland tried to smile and seem at ease, but she was conscious only of physical weakness and fatigue.

Bella Iverson came up, with her prospective husband. Bella was noisy, unsmiling, rude, bobbed of hair, utterly at ease. Maryland looked keenly, scrutinizingly, at Phil Knox, a red-faced, laughing, too well dressed young man who looked ten rather than five years younger than Scott.

And presently gentle, faded little Mrs. Buckney Ivers, thirty-five, the mother of two little girls, the heiress to a great fortune, came pleasantly up and talked sweetly to Maryland. They murmured about the coming baby, and Mrs. Ivers's eyes watered; she had lost a little boy.

"You must keep a trained nurse for at least the first three months," she told Maryland kindly. Maryland was in too cross-grained a mood to be receptive. Mrs. Ivers was just being polite because she thought it was the thing to be with the firm's trusted underlings, she thought. Maryland wished she had never come—she wished she was dead—she wished passionately for some thin, hot tea.

Half-past one. It appeared that there was to be a special "hunt breakfast" today; they were to have English bacon and kidneys and rashers and deep fruit tart; there were to be favors, and music. But for some reason there was a delay.

"However, we should have to wait for the Brookses anyway," said Mrs. Floyd serenely. The Brookses were motoring down in their own car. Floyd Iverson, clean and slick of grizzled hair, after his golf, asked Scott if he remembered Billy Brooks.

"Very fine fellow, extraordinary fellow," said Floyd. Scott listened respectfully but in secret surprise. Some extremely unkind things had been said of Billy Brooks when he left the firm eight years ago. Billy had been a stockholder; he had sold out with an indifference and briskness felt to be somewhat insulting. The word that had drifted about the offices of Iverson and Ivers then, Scott remembered, had been that he was a fool, that he had been crazy, that he had "blown up," and that he had taken the bit in his teeth.

Billy Brooks, appearing at five minutes of two in a car almost as large as the Watermans' flat, was instantly recognizable. Florid, square, laughing readily and constantly, and yet with an iron clamp of a heavy jaw, dressed correctly in tweeds and green plaid stockings, pulling his cap from his rebellious gray-red curls, Scott felt as if he had seen Billy Brooks only yesterday. Mrs. Brooks was timid, pretty, wearing real pearls over a ready-made silk, glad to be taken under Maryland's charitable wing.

Two o'clock. Half-past two, and still they were sitting here in the basket chairs, and there was no sign of luncheon except an occasional appetizing odor. At quarter to three stewards began to filter through the expectant groups, and certain ones went in to the dining room. But the Iverson party waited.

Floyd, and the octogenarian Ivers, who had joined them, paid a special if somewhat casual and easy attention to Billy Brooks. Scott talked to Mrs. Floyd, who stifled yawns and admitted the pangs of hunger. Maryland murmured to Mrs. Brooks; they had both lived in Plainfield; they even found mutual friends there. The McGavins sat in utter silence, looking about them as if absorbed.

The sun shone down on the awnings; fresh players scattered on the links. Maryland was past all hunger now; she merely felt dazed. She experienced a terrifying vertigo when at last a bowing waiter came; they could have the table now, Mr. Iverson, sir. Yes, sir, but there being twelve,

"Good-Bye—I'm Very Glad to Have Met You"

But he isn't glad. He is smiling to hide his confusion. He would have given anything to avoid the embarrassment, the discomfort he has just experienced. Every day people who are not used to good society make the mistake that he is making. Do you know what it is? Can you point it out?

HE couldn't know, of course, that he was going to meet his sister's best chum—and that she was going to introduce him to one of the most charming young women he had ever seen. If he had known, he could have been prepared. Instead of being ill at ease and embarrassed, he could have been entirely calm and well poised. Instead of blustering and blundering for all the world as though he had never spoken to a woman before, he could have had a delightful little chat.

And now, while they are turning to go, he realizes what a clumsy boor he must seem to be—how ill-bred they must think him. How annoying these little unexpected problems can be! How aggravating to be taken off one's guard! It must be a wonderful feeling to know exactly what to do and say at all times, under all circumstances.

"Good-bye, I'm very glad to have met you," he says in an effort to cover up his other blunders. Another blunder, though he doesn't realize it! Any well-bred person knows that he made a mistake, that he committed a social error. It is just such little blunders as these that rob us of our poise and dignity—and at moments when we need this poise and dignity more than ever.

What Was His Blunder?

Do you know what his blunder was? Do you know why it was incorrect for him to say "Good-bye, I'm very glad to have met you"?

What would you say if you had been introduced to a woman and were leaving her? What would you do if you encountered her again the next day? Would you offer your hand in greeting—or would you wait until she gave the first sign of recognition?

Many of us who do not know exactly what the correct thing is to do, say, write and wear on all occasions, are being constantly confronted by puzzling little problems of conduct. In the dining-room we wonder whether celery may be taken up in the fingers or not, how asparagus should be eaten, the correct way to use the finger bowl. In the ballroom we are ill at ease when the music ceases and we do not know what to say to our partner. At the theatre we are uncertain whether or not a woman may be left alone during intermission, which seat the man should take and which the woman, who precedes when walking down the aisle.

Wherever we go some little problem of conduct is sure to arise. If we know exactly what to do or say, the problem vanishes. But if we do not know what to do or say, we hesitate—and blunder. Often it is very embarrassing—especially when we realize just a moment too late that we have done or said something that is not correct.

Are You Sure of Yourself?

If you received an invitation to a very important formal function today, what would you do? Would you sit right down and acknowledge it with thanks or regrets, or would you wait a few days? Would you know exactly what is correct to wear to a formal evening function? Would you be absolutely sure of avoiding embarrassment in the dining-room, the drawing-room, when arriving and when leaving?

Everyone knows that good manners make "good mixers." If you always know the right thing to do and say, no social door will be barred to you, you will never feel out of place no matter where or with whom you happen to be. Many people make up in grace and ease of manner what they lack in wealth or position. People instinctively respect the well-bred, well-mannered man and woman. They are eager to invite them to their homes, to entertain them, to introduce them to their friends.

Do you feel "alone" at a social gathering, or do you know how to make yourself an integral part of the function—how to create conversation and keep it flowing smoothly, how to make and acknowledge introductions, how to ask for a dance if you are a man, how to accept it if you are a woman?

sir, the steward had gotten it a little confused——

Glitter. Plates. Glasses. Stiff, enormous napkins. Hard French rolls; Maryland gnawed at her's without an instant's delay. Crab cocktail. She dared not touch it. It seemed an odd thing for a hunt breakfast.

"We aren't having the hunt breakfast—someone has blundered," Scott whispered from the third seat away, as they all settled.

"But I wonder if I might have some tea?" said Maryland to Buck Ivers, on her right. She offered Bert McGavin, on her left, her cocktail; he changed glasses.

"Indeed you can have tea!" Buckney said heartily. "Waiter," he said, to a pale and perspiring man who inclined his ear dutifully yet who let his distressed eyes rove continually on about the circle as he listened, "tea—right away——" said Buckney.

"And lots of hot water!" Maryland said fervently.

The waiter nodded, deeply impressed. And instantly he said in a tense undertone to a younger and also perspiring and pale man: "Get that table from under the stairs—three—mark it reserved—here's the name, and let me know!" and went upon his jostled, overloaded way.

Fish, very rich in oiled paper. Maryland turned greenish white. She sipped ice water gallantly. She gave Bert McGavin, who was a coarse and hearty man, her fish.

Presently the spattered cuff and oily hand of a waiter came into her vision with a cup of cool very strong coffee. The mere odor made her feel very ill, and for five terrible minutes she was fighting the active terror of a scene. She looked away, she sipped water, she gnawed salted bread.

Ah—better! The coffee had stopped smelling and the fish was gone. Chicken Maryland — corn fritters — waffles — she messed them all conscientiously without raising her fork.

If she could have some hot, thin toast, and some hot, thin tea! But there was trouble enough afoot without further burdening the poor waiters. Everyone was angry, every table was a whirlpool of protest. The five dollar a plate hunt breakfast was not a success; the stewards were deep in agonized explanation. Two deliveries from the city had gone astray—the club really was not in running order yet——

Maryland nibbled hard little cookies; there were two plates of rich little cakes on the table and only two hard, plain little cookies in each assortment. She managed to get all four. She and the Brookses and the McGavins said that it had been a wonderful luncheon. Members of the club, they said, might have noted something amiss, but to them it had been charming!

"It was disgraceful," said Mrs. Floyd. "And now shall we stroll about—would you like to see the polo field and the courts?" she said. "Or would you like just to sit here—it's rather nice to see the golfers come in on the last hole. Mr. Iverson and I hope you won't have to take an earlier train than the six-two. But there is a train at five-seventeen if you must get back!"

"Oh goodness, we must take the five-seventeen!" cried Maryland. To her amazement it was after four now; the dreadful day was almost over. But Scott had been persuaded to play one rubber on the porch, and it was an endless rubber.

"Maybe there'll be tea," thought Maryland desperately. But the club's culinary forces had either been too thoroughly demoralized by the hunt breakfast or there had been a general feeling that so late a luncheon made tea superfluous. Anyway there was no mention of tea.

At just six o'clock the Billy Brookses drove the Scott Watermans into town. Maryland was by this time pale with exhaustion.

"I despise it!" she said bitterly in an undertone to Scott as he helped her into the luxurious limousine. Scott looked tired too, and he had lost six dollars and ten cents at bridge; not serious, of course, but so different from winning six dollars and ten cents! He wondered why he had wasted a couple of dollars upon return tickets this morning; he might have known then that someone would be coming in.

"Why, darling?" he asked in anxious surprise. "Haven't you had a nice day?"

"Oh——" But she was going to cry and she had to stop short. "We're just bootlickers!" she said painfully. "They—they treat you unfairly—and then they think they can—they think that with just a casual luncheon party they can——"

"Sh-h-h!" he warned her. Maryland, ashamed of herself, got in, and Edna McGavin wedged in beside her, and Mrs. Brooks, who was small, next to Edna. Bert took one of the adjustable seats and Scott was on the front seat with Billy Brooks, who was driving. They all reiterated that they were absolutely comfortable—lots of room.

Bumpity—bump—bump. Edna McGavin was enthusiastic about Beachways; had they seen the photographer snapping the women as they came down the steps? Fun! She had never been the Iversons' guest before. But they certainly were wonderful to their people.

Mrs. Brooks talked clothes; she wanted to get the right clothes for her little girl in boarding school. Maryland found her attention caught in this subject in spite of herself. Four plain school dresses at eighty-five dollars, and a coat at one hundred and thirty. The Brookses must be prosperous at least——

Good night, and so many thanks. Good night, Mrs. McGavin. Yes, Maryland would, Mrs. Brooks, she would try to come in tomorrow—Tuesday anyway, and they could shop. Good night. And thank you so much! Thank you. Good night.

A-h-h! the stairs at last. Wearily up and up; Scott, agonized with sympathy, seized her gloves, took the hat that weighted her aching head. The doorway—the key—in through the close, warm, smelling rooms to the kitchen, the spurt of a match in the twilight gloom.

And then her room—the crêpe-de-Chine off—the shoes off—everything cramping and hot off—and her cool, thin silk kimono at last—and the rocker in the kitchen at last!

Oh, delicious, delicious—the smell of the thin, hot toast, the delicate drifting aroma of thin, hot orange pekoe! She hardly breathed, she hardly spoke until the first fragrant cupful, and the pitcher of hot water, and the crisp buttered brownness of the toast were a fact accomplished.

Scott flew about in a misery of sympathy. "Oh, you darling—you darling——" she whispered, kissing the brown hand so busy near her. "Oh, Scotty! this is bliss," she breathed, drinking deep, panting in the first great flood of physical relief from hunger and fatigue, looking out gratefully into the twilight spring beauty of the city streets.

He had heated a great bowl of pink macaroni; the toast was a mountain big enough even for the famished pair. He sat at the end of the kitchen table and ate from his bowl. Sardines, macaroni, toast and tea—it was a feast.

"This is food, honey girl!"

"Oh, food!" She poured the steaming water. "They—they can h-have their English hunt breakfasts!" she half laughed, half sobbed.

"Lord," said Scott simply, "what swill!"

"Oh, Scotty, don't—or I shall have hysterics!"

"You ought to be dead," he said concernedly, "but you look gorgeous!"

Maryland put up her feet upon a chair rung, rocked easily, considered.

"I've turned the corner," she said thoughtfully. "It's over, the sick part. I feel it. I'm going to be gorgeous from now on."

"I believe it. You were—before," Scott said, struck. He pushed back his chair, lighted a cigarette. "Say, listen, I've got something to tell you," he said.

Maryland had heard the tone before; it always meant something unexpected. The raise three years ago he had announced in just that tone, and later the first suspicion—groundless enough, but pleasant to dream about—that when Baker retired, he, Scotty, might have the mail order department.

"You had a talk with Floyd?" she hazarded.

"Nope," he said. "But do you know why they had Billy Brooks down there?" he began.

"Why? No," Maryland said definitely, interested eyes on Scott's face.

Scott stretched his long body luxuriously.

"Old C.P. wants to borrow money from him—that's the long and short of it!" he said.

"Wants——" Maryland's face was bewildered. "Who wants to borrow from who?" she demanded amazedly.

"Iverson and Ivers—from Brooks," Scott said, in satisfaction.

"But—but has Billy Brooks money?"

"You bet your life he has money—he's coining money. And old Ivers gets on to it and wants to get his fingers in," said Scott.

"But—does the firm need money?"

"Brooks says it does—he and I had a long talk, driving in. He says they're up against a panic," Scott elucidated.

"I don't believe it!" Maryland said, stupefied. Scott smoked in silence, his eyes narrowed to thoughtful slits. "But what a chance for little Billy Brooks!" she said in awe. "He can buy right back into the firm—after all the things they said about him! Scott," she added in alarm, "you don't suppose there's any question of Iverson and Ivers surviving the panic, do you? What on earth would we do——"

"Oh, they'll not crash!" Scott said, unruffled. "But maybe they'll take Phil out of the mail orders after a while, and I

Has brought prettier teeth to millions

The prettier teeth you see everywhere now probably came in this way.

The owners accepted this ten-day test. They found a way to combat film on teeth. Now, as long as they live, they may enjoy whiter, cleaner, safer teeth.

The same way is open to you, and your dentist will urge you to take it.

The war on film

Dentists, the world over, have declared a war on film. That is the cause of dingy teeth—the cause of most tooth troubles.

A viscous film clings to the teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Old brushing methods left much of it intact. Then it formed the basis of thin cloudy coats, including tartar. Most people's teeth lost luster in that way.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Very few people have escaped these troubles caused by film.

Ways to combat it

Dental science, after long research, has found two ways to combat that film. Able authorities have amply proved their efficiency. So leading dentists the world over now advise their daily use.

A new-type tooth paste has been created, avoiding old mistakes. The name is Pepsodent. It does what modern science seeks. These two great film combatants are embodied in it.

Aids nature's fight

Pepsodent also multiplies Nature's great tooth-protecting agents in the mouth. One is the starch digestant in saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which cling to teeth. In fermenting they form acid.

It also multiplies the alkalinity of saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids—the cause of tooth decay.

Thus Pepsodent gives to both these factors a manifold effect.

Show them the way

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

One week will convince you that Pepsodent brings a new era in tooth protection. Then show the results to your children. Teach them this way. Modern dentists advise that children use Pepsodent from the time the first tooth appears.

This is important to you and yours. Cut out the coupon now.

suppose they'll do a lot of squealing and cutting down. I don't know—it kind of got me today," continued Scott musingly, "Mrs. Floyd and the old man making such a fuss about Billy because he's made good and they can use him, and you and I and the McGavins standing round and admiring—and taking what was left——"

"Yes, I know," Maryland said quickly, with hot cheeks, as he paused.

"You and your poor little cup of tea," Scott added. "Well, it wasn't much, and perhaps it was nobody's fault. But my father worked for them, and your father, and you and I have. I saw you ask for the tea—and a while later I spoke of it. And you didn't get it. But Billy Brooks—who sold out—who threw them down hard eight years ago, you bet your life Billy couldn't ask for anything and not get it. Floyd has put him up at all his clubs——"

"Yes, I know. Well, I suppose that is just life!" Maryland interpolated again in an uncomfortable silence.

"Well, it's not my life!" Scott said in a low growl.

"And so Billy Brooks comes back into the firm?" Maryland mused.

Her husband roused suddenly from deep thought.

"No, that's what I wanted to speak to you about. No, Brooks wouldn't touch 'em with a ten foot pole!"

Maryland looked at him steadily and her cheeks grew red.

"Billy Brooks wouldn't invest in Iverson and Ivers?" she asked incredulously.

"He said it wasn't worth his while to bother—he never liked Floyd much anyway!"

"Scott Waterman, is he losing his mind?"

"Well, that's what he said."

"But—Iverson and Ivers! Why—why, they're among the richest men in the country. Why—father used to say——"

"Oh, now, hold on, dear! They're prosperous and all that. But there's a thousand firms that make them look pretty small. A turnover of half a million a year sounds big——"

"Half a million! I should say it does——"

"But as Brooks says there are two big families in it, girls in college and all that—and younger Ivers's widow drawing down a big fat check every month, and about six establishments going—he says they'll have to trim their sails a little bit this year. Things aren't the way they used to be."

Maryland, sipping tea, was silent, her eyes astonished, thoughtful, not at all displeased.

"Isn't that astonishing, Scott? The Iversons!" she said softly, after a while.

"You bet your life it's astonishing." Scott drew a deep breath of content and vigor. "Got to look out for letting a business run down," he said.

"Scott, what would you do if you ever had to go—somewhere else?" Maryland asked fearfully.

"Do? Hundreds of things. World's full of things I could do," Scott said hardily. "Brooks told Floyd that he wanted me today," he added. "I thought he was joking—he told me tonight he wasn't joking at all!"

"I hope Floyd Iverson knew he wasn't joking!" cried Maryland anxiously.

"I don't know whether he did or not. Anyway I told Floyd that after October first Phil could run the mail order department alone," Scott said boldly.

Maryland half opened her mouth, stared, blinked, tossed her head.

"Good—good for you!" she said breathlessly.

"Brooks tells me that Iverson and Ivers always let their good men go," Scott said, leaning back and hooking his fingers in his vest armholes. "Brooks wants to know if you and I would consider the South American office. I told him——"

"Scott Waterman! But what would the Iversons say? Scott—but you're not considering it? South America—my aunt lives there! But Scott—but Scott——" She came to a breathless pause, her eyes shining. "You mean—after the baby comes—we might really go on to a big ship—no more city apartment—no—no more Iversons, Scott?"

"I mean—when we come back we'll be the big fish at Beachways, Dixieland!"

"Wouldn't it be—wouldn't it be—just too glorious if we could manage it, Scotty! But—but you'd never get another promotion from Floyd Iverson—if we had to come back and beg for the old job!"

"Before I do that," Scott said quietly, "I'll scuttle a ship in the West Indies and go in for piracy on the high seas!"

"Before I do that," said Maryland, bright tears in her eyes, "I'll open a boarding house, American style, in Buenos Aires and our little b-boys and girls can p-pick up kindling—or whatever they burn—in the streets."

"I'm going to Floyd first thing in the morning," Scott said, "and tell him that it's all right about Phil, and that it's all right about Bostwick getting a raise, and Cutter getting a raise, and his putting me off by telling me that I was one of their own boys—had to be patient. But—that on account of my wife and family I'm going to take up Mr. Brooks's offer——"

"Ah, doesn't he sound sweet! 'Family'!" said Maryland in an aside.

"And then I'm going to see Brooks," pursued Scott, "and tell him that I'm out of a job, and that my wife expects a baby——"

"Scott, isn't it fun!" It was a Maryland he had never seen before; a Maryland with dancing eyes and pink cheeks. "You're—you're pretty sure he's in earnest?" she asked.

"Sure? Why, here's the way he began. He said, 'Waterman, I need a new man—not too old, not too young, about your age. Where can I get him? The nearer you make him like you, the more I'll pay!'"

"But Scotty—suppose it was more than fifty-two-fifty a week?"

"Suppose! It'll be darn near five thousand—don't you fool yourself! And traveling expenses, too."

"A big, soft, woolly coat, and lots of thin things—Mrs. Brooks was talking to me about it today!" said Maryland in a tranced voice.

"You bet your life!" He had his big arm about her; she was kissing him between phrases as he knelt beside the old rocker.

"Ah, Scotty—not to have to go to the firm parties any more, and to luncheons like today! Isn't it wonderful—the baby

Betty's mother knew why

IT was Betty's first dip into social activity since she returned from boarding school.

Naturally, she was thrilled when the invitation came; and even more thrilled when she discovered in a roundabout way that Howard was coming back from school for the week-end to attend the same party.

Betty and Howard had been just a little more than mere good friends during their high-school days at good old Ellsworth.

Indeed, lots of folks thought they were much more than good friends. You know how a small town will jump at conclusions.

But after graduation when both went away to school—and not to the same school—things sort of changed. They wrote to each other for a while—maybe three or four letters. Then somehow or other the correspondence died off.

Howard never looked more charming than he did that evening

Betty was the last one to write, too. She never really got over that—in fact, she never really succeeded in putting him quite out of her mind. * * *

Howard never looked more gorgeous than he did that evening. And Betty found herself more fond of him than ever. The whole party quickly focused itself around her anticipation of the first dance with him.

They did dance—but only once.

And all the rest of the evening Howard devoted to girls who were really much less charming than she.

Betty could actually feel people commenting on Howard's strange lack of attention to her. She knew what they were saying even without hearing their remarks.

Betty went home broken-hearted. She might never have known the reason but her mother, quick to perceive, and courageous enough to talk frankly with her daughter. knew why and told her.

That's the insidious thing about halitosis (unpleasant breath). You, yourself, rarely know when you have it. And even your closest friends won't tell you.

Sometimes, of course, halitosis comes from some deep-seated organic disorder that requires professional advice. But usually—and fortunately—halitosis is only a local condition that yields to the regular use of Listerine as a mouth-wash and gargle.

It halts food fermentation in the mouth and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean. So the systematic use of Listerine this way puts you on the safe and polite side. You know your breath is right. Fastidious people everywhere are making it a regular part of their daily toilet routine. Your druggist will supply you with Listerine. He sells lots of it. It has dozens of different uses as a safe antiseptic and has been trusted as such for half a century. coming, and this change, and all his little things for the trip—and being young—and loving each other——"

Scotty kissed the top of her soft hair proudly, belligerently.

"I never would have taken Brooks up in joke that way, and if I hadn't he never would have opened up on the trip in that way, if it hadn't been for your little old cup of tea!" he growled. "I would have stuck to the firm forever, I suppose; I would have scared off any proposition from Brooks, never seeing the drift of it. But my wife is going to be able to have a cup of tea at the Beachways Country Club or any other gol darned club in the world if she wants it! Bella Iverson and Mrs. Floyd and Buck's wife aren't going to have anything on me! You looked so tired and so sweet sitting there, darling," he added tenderly, "and you asked for tea twice in your polite little voice. And just because they were so busy making up to the Brookses—who have all the money now—my darling, white-faced, spirited little old girl goes hungry! By golly, I'm as big a man as any of them. And I'm free. I'm throwing up my job, I've got a lot of responsibilities coming, and tomorrow I'm going to tell Iverson and Ivers they can go to—they can go plumb to——" He stopped, scowling, flushed, smiling at her.

"Hell!" said Maryland sweetly, softly, dreamily, in the silence. And she kissed him.

The Desert Healer

"We quarreled. I left him," she repeated monotonously.

"Did he marry you?"

"No. I—I told you. We quarreled." There was a touch of asperity in her fretful voice.

"Did he want to marry you? Was the rupture your fault or his?"

For a long time there was no answer; then a whispered "Mine" came to him almost inaudibly.

"And the Count Sach?"

"There is no Count Sach."

He turned away with a shrug of hopeless perplexity. He had learned all he cared to know. By no argument or reasoning was she entitled to his further bounty. In no sense was he responsible for her. In no sense? With his black brows drawn together in the heavy scowl that was so characteristic, he paced from end to end of the long room, wrestling with himself.

And on the sofa where she sat immovable the woman watched the passing and repassing of the tall, stately figure with glittering eyes that were hard with doubt and fear. What would he do? And gradually the thought came to her that if she could ever have loved anyone she might have loved this man.

He came to her at last and she stumbled to her feet to meet him. He spoke swiftly, in a voice that was hoarse and strained. He would settle nothing on her, but because she had been his wife, because of the child she had borne him, he would make her an allowance to be paid quarterly through his solicitors.

With averted head and tightly compressed lips she listened to him in silence and when he finished speaking she made no comment and she gave him no thanks. And no further word was spoken between them until she left the villa in his carriage, driven by Hosein, whose silent tongue could be depended upon.

As the sound of the wheels died away Carew went back into the house. His face was drawn and gray and his usually elastic step dragged as he passed slowly through the empty halls and across the moonlit courtyard to his own rooms at the back of the house and from there out on to the veranda. For an instant he stood, his haggard eyes upraised to the starry brilliance of the sky; then with a groan that seemed almost to burst his heart he dropped into a chair and buried his face in his hands.

CHAPTER IX

THE first pale streaks of dawn were stealing across the sky before Carew stirred from the chair into which he had dropped two hours before to face the knowledge that had come to him in that tense moment of self-understanding in the little winter garden at the Palace. Stunned by the realization of his own feelings, racked by the painful scene following his return to the villa, at first concrete thought had been impossible. His whole ability to will and do, his whole mental and physical being seemed crushed under a weight of sorrow that for the time was paralyzing. He felt numbed, conscious only of the suffering that, clogging his brain, reacted on his body, leaving him inert and lifeless.

But gradually his mind cleared and he was able to think more calmly. He loved. For the second time in his life he loved. But the greater, deeper, more wonderful emotion he had only just realized was as the dust of ashes in his mouth. There was no joy, no hope in this new love. There was only the pain of renunciation and the bitter knowledge that he had brought sorrow to her for whose sake he would gladly die rather than that even a shadow should cross her path.

For that she also loved him he knew beyond all doubt. He had read it in her eyes, he had heard it in the anguished tones of her voice when the thought of his peril had driven her to self-betrayal as she listened to his story of the finish of Abdul el Dhib. The pain that was his was hers also. The thought was torment. Had she not already enough to bear without this additional burden of a love that could never be satisfied?

He wanted her, above his very hope of Heaven he wanted her. The barriers of defense he had raised about himself were torn away at last. The dead heart that had lain cold and lifeless within him was alive once more. Passion-swept, and seething with jealousy, he made no effort to stem the elemental impulses that seemed suddenly let loose, and for a time only the primitive man in him existed, urging his desperate need until even murder seemed justifiable to obtain her—the murder of the one who stood between him and what he wanted. Geradine! What was the life of such a brute compared with her happiness and well-being! Was it murder to rid the earth of such scum, to free her from the tyranny that was killing her, body and soul?

But was there no easier way to follow? Was there not the way that others had taken—the way that would free her from a life of bondage, that would give him his heart's desire? What was scruple to stand between them! They had only one life to live—and she loved him. She would come to him—if he made her. And for her own sake he would make her . . .

A shudder passed over him and something seemed to snap suddenly in his brain, dispelling the madness of the last few moments and leaving him aghast at the horror of his own thoughts. Conscience-smitten, he saw himself as he was, fallen from his high estate, crashed from his pinnacle of self-righteous exaltation . . .

It was long before he stirred to move slowly with cramped limbs and aching head to the edge of the veranda, where he leaned wearily against the pillar that supported the green tiled roof, staring with haggard eyes across the garden at the brightening dawn—a dawn that for once gave him no pleasure.

It was over and done with—the wonderful glimpse of happiness that could never be. There was only one road to follow, the lonely road that had been his for so many years, but lonelier, more desolate now than it had ever been. For her sake and for the sake of what honor was left to him he must go, and go at once.

And yet how could he go, how could he leave her knowing what her life would be, knowing what she must still endure and suffer at the hands of the drunken bully who possessed her? Was he to leave her at the mercy of such a man? Even that he must do. She was not his—she was Geradine's wife. Geradine's wife—God help her! And his daily, hourly torment would be to know her so.

The sky was aflame, the garden resounding with the early songs of birds when he at last regained his self-control. He was going back to the camp near Blidah; to go farther was impossible while Sanois's arrangements were still incomplete. There was no other course for him to take, no other way by which he could effectually prevent any further meeting between them. With a little shiver he turned and went heavily into the house.

As he entered the bedroom the door on the farther side opened and Hosein came in with his usual noiseless tread. He offered no explanation for his appearance at an unusual hour and Carew asked for none; but knowing the man, he was positive that the big Arab had spent the night watching and waiting for his master's coming. Though he said nothing, his mere presence was a relief, and the customary stolidity with which he received his unexpected orders made the giving of them easier. Only a quicker service, a gentler handling of the garments tossed to him denoted an understanding that was more profound than Carew even guessed at. Patently pleased to be preparing for the road again, he was packing suitcases and holdalls with methodical deftness when Carew came back from his bath.

But later, the actual moment of departure came, when his escort leaped to their horses while he himself mounted with less haste and lingered a few moments to give some final directions to Hosein, who was to stay behind for a time, Carew would have given all he possessed to be able to remain in the town he had been longing for weeks to leave. It took all his resolution to persevere in the course he had determined upon and give his followers the signal for which they were waiting.

At the head of his little troupe he rode away with unaccustomed slowness and with a feeling of reluctance that grew momentarily greater as each stride of the big bay carried him farther from the villa.

Was it strength or weakness that was driving him from her? Again he wrestled with the temptation of a few hours ago, a temptation that was fiercer, more gripping even than it had been before. Her pitiful helplessness seemed to make his flight the act of a craven. Of what use were the physical powers with which he was endowed if his strength could not save her from the life of misery to which she was condemned?

The road he was following led past de Granier's villa. A sudden impulse came to him to look on the house that held the woman he loved—an impulse that was a species of subtle self-torture which even to himself seemed incomprehensible and to which he yielded with a feeling of contempt. Pulling Suliman up sharply, he swung to the ground and flinging the reins to the Arab he beckoned forward, bade his escort ride on and wait for him beyond the villa. Standing where he had dismounted he watched them pass, and the last couple were some distance from him before he turned to the hillside where a tiny path wound upward between the close growing trees.

A few minutes' stiff climb and the path curved abruptly to the left, whence it extended more or less level in the same direction as the road that lay some fifty or sixty feet below. His pace slackened as he neared the cross track that led down to the garden entrance of the Villa des Ombres, and in a revulsion of feeling he cursed the weakness that had brought him there. But having come thus far he was unwilling to retrace his steps, and jerking his shoulders back with a characteristic gesture of impatience he moved slowly forward with noiseless tread along the winding path that curved and twisted round the boles of the big trees.

As he rounded the trunk of an exceptionally large tree, the jutting roots of which made necessary a more than usually wide detour, he came to a sudden halt with a quick intake of breath that was almost a groan. With clenching hands and madly racing heart he stared at the girlish figure lying huddled amongst the undergrowth almost at his feet. Her face was hidden and she lay very still; so still that a terrible thought came to him, parching his mouth and blanching his face under the deep tan. He tried to whisper her name but no sound issued from his stiff lips; and unable to speak, unable to move, time was a thing forgotten while he struggled with the paralyzing fear that held him motionless.

He never knew how long it was before she stirred, before the faint echo of a smothered sob allayed the dread that had taken hold of him and lessened the strangling grip that seemed clutching at his throat. Not trusting himself to touch her, he waited with an almost bursting heart for her to realize his presence.

And as once before in the opera house, so now did she seem gradually to become aware of the steady stare fixed on her. With a shuddering sigh she sat up slowly. Then stumbling to her feet, she stood before him, swaying, struggling to regain her composure, striving to formulate the conventional greeting her trembling lips could scarcely utter.

"Sir Gervas——"

He guessed rather than heard the fluttering whisper. But before he could answer, before he could wrench his gaze from the pain-filled eyes that were wavering under his, he saw her stiffen suddenly and shrink from him with a backward glance of apprehension.

"What—who——" she muttered hoarsely.

And, listening, he too heard the sound that had startled her—the deep murmur of men's voices raised in heated altercation that came echoing up the hillside from the roadway beneath them. The voices of his own men, as he knew. But what did she think? And the anger and hatred that was seething within him flamed anew as he watched her leaning white-lipped and shivering against the trunk of the giant cork tree and wondered how long it would be before that delicate organism and highly strung nervous system finally succumbed to the brutal treatment that was slowly but steadily reducing her to a physical and mental wreck. Forcing his voice to naturalness, he answered her reassuringly.

"It's only my men—arguing as usual, the noisy devils."

She looked at him strangely.

"Your men——" she repeated dully.

Pulling herself erect she turned abruptly and walked unsteadily to the edge of the steep descent. Through the intervening trees she could see them clustered at the foot of the hill. What did this unusual following portend? In Algiers—for she had seen him many more times than he knew—he always rode alone. Was this the end at last, the time she had looked forward to with dread—the time when he would ride out of her life forever?

She turned and went slowly back to him. A cigarette between his lips, he was leaning against the tree where she had leaned, his face an impassive mask that baffled her. Was the fleeting glimpse of a totally different expression she had seemed to see in his eyes a few minutes ago only the effect of her own over-strained imagination? Was she such a fool that she could have thought for one moment of wild sweet happiness that her love and longing could have begotten his love?

The restraint she imposed on herself made her voice cold and hard as she uttered the question she nerved herself to ask.

"You are going away?"

"Yes."

"IT is my belief," says Dr. Charles W. Eliot, referring to the Five-Foot Shelf, "that the faithful and considerate reading of these books will give any man the essentials of a liberal education."

One year married and all talked out

HERE are two young married people. For a year they have been spending their evenings together—and now, as the second year of their married life begins, they are all talked out.

He sits in moody silence under the lamp. The click of her needles is the only sound that breaks the veil of depression in the room.

Is there anything that would brighten their evenings?

How can they get more things to talk about; how can they turn their silent, lonely hours into real human companionship?

The answer to this question—and to the question of thousands of married couples like them—is contained in a free book that you may have for the asking. It is called "Fifteen Minutes a Day," and in a vivid, stimulating way tells how every man and woman can gain the knowledge of life and literature, the culture, the broad viewpoint that will turn lonely evenings into fine comradeship.

Think of it. You know in advance what most people are going to say. No new ideas, nothing that stimulates you, or makes you think: "My, I'd like to see those people again." But a few people get more interesting every year; they have always a new subject, new interests. Instead of growing mentally fat for lack of exercise, they keep their minds fit and healthy by exercising them—fifteen minutes a day!

Despite herself she winced at the brief syllable.

"Back to the desert?"

"Yes."

"For good?"

"For good," he answered firmly.

She turned from him quickly to hide the tears that blinded her. But a sob she had not the strength to restrain betrayed her. Almost inaudible it was, but he heard it.

"Marny!"

The cry was wrung from him. And the next moment she was in his arms, clinging to him despairingly, weeping as he had not believed it possible for a woman to weep. Unmanned by her sudden breakdown, aghast at the terrible sobs that seemed to be tearing the slender little body to pieces, he strained her to him with passionate strength. "Marny, Marny, for God's sake—don't cry like that! Your tears are torturing me."

But conscious only of the shelter of his arms, too weak to struggle against the feelings she had so long suppressed, she was powerless to check the storm of emotion that overwhelmed her. Lying inert against him, her face hidden in his robes, she sobbed her heart out on his until the violence of her grief terrified him and he caught her closer, bending his tall head till his cheek was resting on her tumbled hair, whispering words of love and entreaty.

"Have pity on me, child, you are breaking my heart. Do you think I can bear to see you weep? Marny, my love, my love."

Her arm slid up and round his neck.

"Oh, let me cry!" she moaned. "For five years I've had to be a thing of stone. If I don't cry now I shall go mad."

A spasm swept across his face and his own eyes were dim as he ceased to urge her, waiting patiently till the tempest of her tears should pass. And gradually the tearing sobs ceased and she regained control of herself.

Still holding her, he raised her head with gentle force. Her eyes were closed, the thick, dark lashes lying wet on her tear-stained cheek, and the hungry longing to touch them with his lips was almost more than he could withstand.

"Won't you look at me, Marny? Am I never to see your dear eyes again?" he murmured huskily.

A tremor passed through her and for a moment she did not respond. Then the dusky lashes fluttered faintly, and slowly the heavy lids unclosed. For long they looked, staring as though into each other's souls, and against her tender breasts she felt the violent beating of his heart.

A quivering sigh escaped her. "Gervas—oh, Gervas, Gervas!" she whispered, and lifted her face to his. The sadness in his eyes deepened into anguish and his firm mouth trembled as he shook his head.

"I mustn't kiss you, dear. Your lips are his—not mine, God help me! I haven't even the right to touch you. I'm a cur to hold you in my arms like this, but I can't let you go—not yet, not yet, my darling."

His voice broke, and insensibly his arm tightened round her, crushing her to him with a force of which he was unaware. She turned her head with a little sob.

"How could we know that this would come to us—how could we know that we would care?" she cried. "I never thought you loved me. I thought it was only I who—who——" She clenched her teeth on her lips, fighting the sobs that were rising in her throat. "Oh, why was it you that came that night near Blidah!" she burst out passionately. "What did my life matter? And I—I who would die for you, I've brought you unhappiness. Gervas, why don't you hate me?"

"I thought I did—once," he answered with a twisted smile, and brushed the shining hair tenderly from off her forehead.

Physical pain had been forgotten in the mental agony that swamped her; but now, remembering, too late she tried to stop him and he had seen the ugly wound on her white brow before her flying hand reached his. A sharp exclamation broke from him.

"What have you done to yourself? My God, has he dared——" His face was ghastly and the look in his blazing eyes terrified her. Fearful of the consequences of his anger, fearful of she knew not what, she lied to shield the husband who had struck her.

"No—no——" she panted. "I slipped—I slipped in my room last night."

Love and intuition told him that she was lying and he put her from him with a groan of helpless misery. And free of his supporting arm she slid to the ground, for her limbs were trembling under her. He sat down near her, staring gloomily before him.

Her hand stole out timidly and touched his. "What are we going to do?" She waited long for his answer, so long that she wondered if he had heard the faint whisper, and her trembling fingers tightened on his arm. "Gervas, speak to me," she entreated.

"What is there for me to say," he answered, and his voice was harsh with the effort speech cost him. "There is nothing to do but the one hard thing that is left to us. We have got to forget that this morning has ever been. We have got to forget everything but the fact that you are bound, that you are not free to come to me. If there were some other way, if I could have taken you——" He tore his eyes from her face and leaped to his feet. "But there is no other way," he cried with sudden violence. "I can't take you. You've got to forget, and forgive me—if you can."

She buried her face in her hands.

"Forget!" she wailed. "Will you forget?"

"Not in this life nor in the life to come," he whispered swiftly.

With a sob that wrung his heart she flung out her arms appealingly. "I can't bear it, Gervas, I can't live without you!"

He caught the outstretched hands in his and drew her to her feet.

"Don't make it harder for me, dear. God knows it's hard enough," he said unsteadily. "I love you. I want you—more than anything in Heaven and earth I want you—but I've got to leave you. Help me to do the right thing, Marny. Help me to go now, while I have the strength."

But with a broken little cry she clung to him, her eyes beseeching.

"I can't, I can't! I'm not strong like you. I can't let you go yet—not altogether—not back to the desert. Stay—only stay till we leave," she pleaded. "It won't be long, only a few weeks——"

"My dear, what help will it be if I do stay?" he said wearily. "It will only make it harder for both of us."

But frantically she urged him. "Please, please," she entreated. "Oh, I can't explain—I don't know what I feel myself—but there seems to be something awful coming nearer and nearer to me and I'm frightened—I'm frightened! If I could know you were in Algiers it would make it easier—I shouldn't feel so—alone. Gervas, if you love me, stay till we go."

"If it will help you," he said gently, "if my being in Algiers will make it easier for you, I will stay until you go. But more I cannot do. This has got to be the end, Marny. We've got to say good by to each other. I mustn't see you again—I daren't see you again."

A deadly faintness came over her. Numbly she felt him take her hands and hold them crushed against his face. And through the surging in her ears she heard his voice, far off and muffled as though coming from some great distance.

"My dear, my dear—God keep you, now and always."

And then she knew that he was gone and a merciful blackness came over her.

There followed a week that for Carew was a period of uninterrupted suffering, suffering that seemed to grow more acute, more unbearable with each succeeding day. With nothing to look forward to, with no hope to ease the burden of his loneliness and longing, with the bitter knowledge burning into him that barely half a mile away in her prison house of misery she too was suffering, he struggled through days that seemed endless and nights that were torment.

Seeking for distraction, for anything that would occupy his enforced leisure and turn the trend of his thoughts, he offered his services to Morel and toiled in the scientist's laboratory from early morning till late in the evening, endeavoring by hard work to deaden the pain that never left him.

Then came a day when a telephone message from Morel, who had received an urgent summons to Paris, put a stop to the work at the laboratory and left him to face inactivity he viewed with dismay.

The day seemed interminable. The solitary dinner he thought would never end. Afterwards, ordering coffee to be brought to him, he strolled through the silent halls and empty rooms to the veranda.

The night was singularly dark but the darkness agreed with his own gloomy thoughts and after he had finished his coffee he extinguished the reading lamp on the table near him and sat for a long time staring fixedly into the blackness.

Inaction became at last impossible. He had sat for two hours and his limbs were cramped and his head throbbing for need of physical exercise. Two more hours and he would be ready to blow his brains out, he reflected with a dreary laugh. Going to his bedroom he changed quickly into Arab dress and left the house unseen.

Beyond the door in the wall he hesitated. Then with a shrug and a muttered oath he turned in the direction of de Granier's villa. To torture himself by gazing on the house was not to see her, he argued. By no reasoning could he be said to be breaking the resolution he had made. The road was free to him as to any other. And what chance was there of seeing her at this time of night? Jerking his heavy cloak back, he stopped to light a cigarette and then strode on with the slow step to which flowing robes had accustomed him.

For a time it appeared as if no other

"Did I Marry a Man —or a Business?"

AS he stood before the altar with Fay Gilman, George Judson devoutly sought to realize the minister's words that God had made himself and Fay into one in that hour. ¶ But a man and woman are two individuals and when Fay's home and George's business came into conflict Fay was unable to keep from crying: "Did I marry George or did I marry his Business?"

The Very Soul of America Is in this Great Novel

MAN'S COUNTRY

By Peter Clark Macfarlane

Illustrated by Charles D. Mitchell

He Was a Self-made Man—George Judson was brought up in humble surroundings. At fourteen he was supporting his family; at twenty-six he was the great financial wizard of the automobile industry. Business was his inspiration —his god. It came first, always—

She Was a Cultured Woman—Fay Gilman had beauty and brains. As a sweetheart she had found Judson a delightful playfellow. But as a husband he did not seem to understand her needs. So on the day when he needed her comfort and sympathy—when his business was on the verge of failure—she was having tea at a Country Club.

"Man's Country"* is a novel that is a challenge to every ambitious man and a challenge too, to every woman who holds home dear. It is YOUR story put into a novel. Read it today.

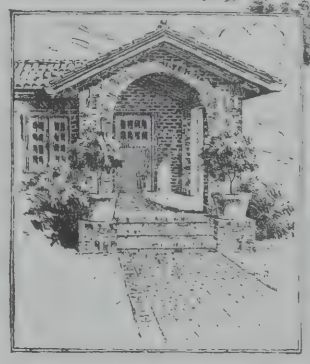
midnight wanderers were abroad, but as he neared the high enclosing wall of the Villa des Ombres his quick ears caught the sound of hurrying, stumbling feet and the raucous intonations of a voice he recognized. Instinctively he shrank into the deeper shadow of the wall as Tanner, the English groom, reeled past him with words that seemed to turn the blood in his veins to ice.

"The swine, the swine—the blasted swine! 'E'll do 'er in, by Gawd, 'e will! 'Ow she screamed—and the damned door locked so as I couldn't get in! And 'im mad drunk—the beast! My Gawd, my Gawd, what'll I do? I'll 'ear them screams till I die!" And sobbing and blaspheming in impotent rage the little man tore on and vanished into the night.

But towards the house from which the groom had fled Carew was racing with a deadly fear knocking at his heart. The gates were open and, panic-driven, he dashed along the carriage drive and up the steps of the villa, hurling himself against the door which, unbarred, gave way before him. In the dimly lighted entrance hall he stumbled and almost fell headlong over the prostrate figure of an Arab who moaned and writhed on the marble floor. Callous to everything but the one ghastly fear that gripped him, Carew kicked his feet clear of the man's robes and shook him roughly.

But the fiercely uttered question died on his lips as a piercing shriek rang through the silent house. A shriek that was followed by others so terrible, so frenzied, that for a moment he reeled under the horror of them. And with the agonizing screams was mingled the sound of a man's raving and other more pregnant sounds that drove Carew to the verge of madness.

With a groan he leaped to the door of the room where was the woman he loved; but locked from within, it resisted his furious onslaught. As well acquainted with the villa as he was with his own, he knew that to force it was impossible. Desperately he wrenched at the handle; then a sudden thought came that sent him flying down the corridor. There was another door leading into the drawing room, a secret door that, flush with the wall and hidden by curtains, was possibly unknown to the tenants who had rented the house. Reaching the anteroom with which it communicated and tearing aside the embroidered hangings, he flung his whole weight against the fragile panels, crashing through into the room beyond.



One sweeping glance sufficed him. Dragging his eyes from the battered little body stretched almost at his feet, he crouched for an instant, stiffening like a wild beast preparing to spring, his face the face of a madman.

And startled by his sudden appearance, too blind with passion to recognize the man who had gone through the sandstorm with him, Geradine saw in the tall robed figure facing him only an unknown Arab who had dared to force a violent entrance into his house and he flung forward with a savage snarl, brandishing the heavy hunting crop with which he had flogged his wife into insensibility.

"You damned nigger!" he bellowed. "What the hell——"

But with the sound of his voice Carew sprang, his clenched fist driving straight at the other's mouth. For a second Geradine staggered; then with a roar of mingled pain and fury he slashed with the crop at Carew's face. But the blow fell short and the next moment two powerful arms closed round him. Though strong above the average, his life of intemperance had unfitted him for any protracted struggle; and tonight, wearied already by his outburst of savagery and not sober enough to use with advantage what strength he had, he was helpless in the grip of the muscular hands that seemed to be crushing the life out of him. Choked with the strangling hold on his throat, he was almost unconscious when the clutching fingers slid suddenly to his arm and he was forced to his knees.

And with the whip that was still wet with her blood Carew avenged the woman who lay so deathly still beside him. Maddened with the thought of her suffering, he wielded the heavy weapon till Geradine's coat and shirt were torn to ribbons, crimson stained and sticky, till his moans became fainter and finally died away, till his own arm grew tired with the punishment he inflicted. Only then did he fling the whip from him. Scarcely glancing at the inert figure sprawled face downwards on the floor, indifferent whether he had killed him or not, he turned slowly to that other pitiful little figure and, hardly conscious of what he did, tore the burnous from his shoulders and wrapping it round her lifted her into his arms and carried her away.

The hall was empty as he passed through it. But he was oblivious of the apparently deserted house, oblivious of everything but the slight burden he held. As if in a dream, his mind almost a blank, he followed mechanically the road by which he had come half an hour before. And not until he had reached his own villa, until, led by instinct rather than definite reasoning, he found himself in his own bedroom, did the dream-like feeling pass and he awoke to realize what he had done. But that could wait. At the moment only she mattered.

Laying her on the bed he stripped the blood-wet silken rags from her lacerated shoulders, wincing in agony as they clung to the delicate broken flesh his trembling lips covered with passionate kisses. But he was doctor as well as lover, and forcing his shaking fingers to steadiness he bathed the cruel wounds with tender skill, doing all that was possible for her comfort before he dropped to his knees to wait till she should regain consciousness. And when at last she stirred it was some time before recognition dawned in the dazed eyes that were gazing blankly into his. But the sudden joy that filled them faded swiftly into a look of terrible fear.

With a cry that grayed his face she flung herself into his arms.

"Don't let him get me! Don't—let—him—get me!" she shrieked again and again, till the horror of it was more than he could bear and he crushed her face against him to stifle the sounds he knew would ring in his ears while life lasted.

"Hush, hush!" he whispered almost fiercely. "It's done—it's finished. He will never touch you again. You need never see him again. Lie still and rest. There's not a soul who knows where you are but me."

Even in the extremity of her terror his voice had power to soothe her and she relaxed in his arms with a shuddering sob. For a long time he held her silently, fighting the biggest battle of his life, striving to subdue self, to think only for her. But her nearness made thought impossible and at last, in despair, he sought to rise. She clung to him then with a murmur of entreaty.

"Let me go, dear," he muttered. "I've got to think—I've got to think what is best to do." And tenderly he put aside her trembling hands.

Fear fled back into her eyes as she watched him cross the room to the open window, and slipping from the bed she waited for what seemed an eternity, shaking with weakness, afraid to question him, even afraid for the moment of the man himself.

When at length he spoke, in a voice that was almost unrecognizable, he did not look at her.

"I can get you out of Algiers—that is easy. But to whom shall I take you? Where are your people?"

For a moment she stared in dazed unbelief; then with a pitiful sob she staggered nearer to him.

"Gervas, don't you love me—don't you want me?"

His face was anguished as he flung towards her.

"Want you? My God!" he groaned. "But it's not what I want that matters. It is you I am thinking of. You are Geradine's wife—I can't take you. I can't dishonor you. I can't drag you through the mud——"

"Mud!" she echoed with a terrible laugh. "What mud could you drag me through that would be worse than the mud that has choked me for five ghastly years? Gervas, Gervas, I've come to the end. I can't fight any more. I can't bear any more. I've no one to turn to—no people—no friends. There's nobody in all the world who can help me—but you. If you won't save me I will kill myself. I swear it. Oh, Gervas, have pity! Take me away. I'm safe only with you. I'll be your servant—your slave—anything you will—only save me, save me! If I see him again I shall go mad—mad——"

She was at his feet, clasping his knees, her upturned face wild and distorted with terror. And as he swept her up into his arms with a gasp of horrified protest and looked into her frenzied eyes he knew that she was very near to madness now. But still he hesitated.

"You know what it will mean if I take you with me into the desert?"

"I know, I know," she sobbed. "It will mean Heaven and rest and joy unspeakable. And I—who have lived in Hell! Oh, Gervas, give me the chance of happiness!"

It was not what he meant, but he saw that she was past understanding. Only by keeping her could he avert the mental breakdown which was imminent. To save her reason he must do that for which his heart was clamoring, that which he had determined never to do.

And in the light that leaped involuntarily into his eyes she read his answer even before he stooped his lips to her trembling mouth.

Powerful as "The Desert Healer" has been, you will not get its full thrill until the end—in the next—the March COSMOPOLITAN.

CHAPTER XX

THERE was one thing still to do before she left a country that had made her so happy yet added the last drop of gall to her cup. She must complete the wheel of events that would make Druro secure from the danger of suffering for a tragedy he was not responsible for, and which she herself had precipitated. A fortunate coincidence had enabled her to do this so far as the law was concerned. But she still feared Druro himself if his memory of that night's doings should return as suddenly as it had gone. She knew him well enough to be sure that if he remembered his part in the tragedy, the whole court business would be to do over again. He would never let her rest under the shadow of his fault. But that horrible resurgence must be avoided at all costs. It could do no good and would only cause infinite pain and trouble, with no great difference to the ultimate issue—for there was not the smallest doubt that Druro must come out of it as scot free as she herself—except the world's knowledge that he had on his hands, though only by accident, the blood of Gaynor Lypiatt's husband!

The world should never know it, nor Druro himself suffer the knowledge if she could help it. Not much could be done to circumvent the chance, but at least it was wise to remove any object liable to provoke in his mind a remembrance of that fateful night; and the object most distinctly liable to do this existed at the Jubilate Deo in the form of that hut where the fight occurred. She felt certain that, if he went into that hut, a vision of the whole scene would rise up to his eyes just as it would to hers when she saw again those rough dagga walls, the packing case table and the polished red floor of the old mortuary!

Her plan, then, was to destroy the hut by fire; an easy matter with that thatched roof—but it must be done soon. There was no time to waste, for though she had ascertained that Druro had been taken straight back to hospital after his appearance in court, she knew that he would not delay a moment longer than he could help but get back to his mine and all its wondrous promises for the future.

It did not bear lingering on too much, the thought of that wondrous future of his. Enough that she knew what his intentions were—given the money to carry them out. He had made no secret of them that day at Sombwelo ranch. He was going to wrench the woman he loved from the arms of his enemy and take her for his own, far away—Ho-la-lè-la! And now all the money he could want was his for the seeking at the Jubilate Deo, while the need for "wrenching" had been laid aside forever.

True, Gay was going to have a child—he did not know that yet, and when he did it might well dash with wormwood the sweetness of the draught at his lips. It was a barrier, but not an insurmountable one. As for that old grief and pain of Gay's, which had separated them before and over which she still brooded—it must cease to exist, for they were not children any longer, trembling at a ghost in the dark. Both knew the enemy now for the beast it was and were buckled against it.

They would not even need to fight, for, looked at with fearless eye of happiness, it must slink forever out of sight.

A first step toward execution of her plan was to reach Selukine, and Mrs. Brade procured her a car for this and was fervid to accompany her. But Desmond for this occasion preferred to be a cat that prowled alone. Incendiary operations are best carried out without witnesses! Mrs. Hope was a safe port in a storm, and one she intended to make for as soon as the coup at the Jubilate had been pulled off. Druro would still be in hospital of course. But there was little risk in that, for patients and visitors never met at Mrs. Hope's without special assignation.

"She may be full up and not able to take me in," mused Desmond as her car ate up the twenty-five miles that lay between Selukine and Wankelo. "But if there's nowhere else I can always sleep in the hospital mortuary."

Poor Desmond! Her irony had lost a little of its lightness in police courts and prisons; and her lips were forgetting to smile. Although she had been touched to the depths by the kindness and affection of Rhodesians, her heart held an unceasing ache, for the fact remained that some among them had spied her out and dragged her forth and stripped her to the public gaze; had broken and smashed her great adventure; had robbed her of riches and cast her forth empty.

Never, never again might she adventure as a man. That joy was finished and over, life on the veldt was vanished and ended; if anyone wanted a proof thereof they had only to look in her suitcase and they would see lying there, packed in its tissue wrappings with other soft and filmy garments, the pearl-gray gown of Shantung silk that O'Byrne had caused to be made and sent from Cape Town.

It had come to that with her!

But there was still the task at the Jubilate to accomplish, and she looked forward to it even though when she set a light to that hut it would be, in sort, a symbol of the conflagration of her life.

"A bonfire of my hopes! Tant mieux!" said she, "for what have hope and I to do with each other?"

It will thus be seen that Lady Tyrecastle was in sad and feckless mood when she arrived that night at the kopje whereon stood the old mission station. How different to the arrival some months before, when she drove gaily up behind Druro's mules! And how different too the camp!

Its peace of eventide had passed with the coming of the mill that now tapped vibrantly with twinkling lights at the shaft head; with the thrum and hustle of many boys in the compound; with all the sounds and indications, in fact, of a mine well forward on a career of great prosperity.

The mess hut was lighted brilliantly and cheerful voices could be heard; some of them seeming familiar to her ear as the dear scent of the violet trees was familiar and sweet in her nostrils.

Perhaps because of the noise of the mill and the evening hum in the compound no one seemed to have heard the car arrive, and she reached the plateau without incident. But there she paused, uncertain what next move to make. Her old hut stood closed and dark; it was pretty certain to have been kept locked up by Guthrie in her absence. So there was nothing to do but go boldly to the mess and tell them she had come for her things. While getting these she could easily manage to flick a match up into the thatch, and once a hut is ablaze there's no saving it.

She came quickly to the mess door and got a swift surprise view of its occupants before any of them saw her—Guthrie's brown, shriveled face; Jimmie Spelter back in his coats of red lead and cylinder oil; the Kipper frowning thoughtfully; and last of all—O mischance and magic!—Druro, with elbows on table and absent, far-away stare. Dinner had been cleared and they were sitting over coffee and smokes. No bottle graced the board.

They all saw her at once and for a moment no one moved, so utterly were they taken aback to see the Desmond they had known, their lounging boy with the old coat and top boots and the half closed eyes and curly smile. This yarn of manslaughter and prisons and trials and countesses in disguise must have been all a nightmare dream, then! And they all jumped up together, forgetting Lady Tyrecastle and remembering only "young Desmond" as they drew her into the room gripping her hands, shaking them nearly off, asking a thousand questions as to how "he" had come there and where "he" had been. Only Druro did not say much but just looked on, smiling, with a world of friendliness in his blue eyes and Heaven knew what wonderment and humility behind them—a wonderment that had obsessed him since the day they came and told him in hospital that Desmond was a woman and the moment when he had looked upon her standing proud and indifferent, yet with a woman's sad grace and beauty, in the dock.

He knew, while the others stood eagerly talking and taking it for granted that she had come back to be as before, that they were fooling themselves. She would never come back. That epic poem had had a period put to it; that idyll of the veldt was over. He had lost a pal, the most wonderful a man ever had—the kid! There was not an incident of the whole of their friendship and association that he had not gone over during the last few days—every single day on the veldt, the fishing, the python, the revolver. Many things that had been dark were clear now. But one thing, he thought, would always be dark—the reason why she should have chosen to grace his wretched life with her friendship. Why he, the unhappy drunkard, should have seemed worth her help, her consolation, the putting forth of a rescuing hand. Fate had been good to him, and the way was clear for him in a little time to the woman whom he loved and who loved him. But this other woman, this Desmond—— well, it was strange, dazing, bewildering; but she . . . with her half man, half woman personality, she had a knowledge of him, a closeness to his soul that no one else in the world would ever have.

These things flashed through his mind while they all stood there, Desmond perfectly at home again, drinking a cup of coffee and explaining what had brought her, that the car was still waiting, and that she was due back at Mrs. Hope's. They commenced to protest and to press her to stay the night; and then suddenly their remarks petered out into silence. They were remembering the truth and who it was

What is your degree of cleanliness?

THERE is the cleanliness that merely looks clean.

There is the cleanliness that is clean, according to ordinary standards.

Then there is the cleanliness that is antiseptically clean—the cleanliness of the hospital. It is this last and highest degree of cleanliness that brings to the discriminating woman a sense of real satisfaction.

This sort of cleanliness requires more than soap and water. It must be attained in the same way that the doctor achieves it—by the use of an effective antiseptic and disinfectant.

Genuine "Lysol" Disinfectant, originally prepared for use by the medical profession, is ideal for every purpose of personal hygiene.

If you were dying tonight and I offered you something that would give you ten years more to live, would you take it? You'd grab it. Well, fellows, I've got it, but don't wait till you're dying or it won't do you a bit of good. It will then be too late. Right now is the time. To-morrow, or any day some disease will get you and if you have not equipped yourself to fight it off, you're gone. I don't claim to cure disease. I am not a medical doctor, but I'll put you in such condition that the doctor will starve to death waiting for you to take sick. Can you imagine a mosquito trying to bite a brick wall? A fine chance.

A REBUILT MAN

I like to get the weak ones. I delight in getting hold of a man who has been turned down as hopeless by others. It's easy enough to finish a task that's more than half done. But give me the weak, sickly chap and watch him grow stronger. That's what I like. It's fun to me because I know I can do it and I like to give the other fellow the laugh. I don't just give you a veneer of muscle that looks good to others. I work on you both inside and out. I not only put big, massive arms and legs on you but I build up those inner muscles that surround your vital organs. The kind that give you real pep and energy, the kind that fire you with ambition and the courage to tackle anything set before you.

ALL I ASK IS NINETY DAYS

Who says it takes years to get in shape? Show me the man who makes any such claims and I'll make him eat his words. I'll put one full inch on your arm in just 30 days. Yes, and two full inches on your chest in the same length of time. Meanwhile, I'm putting life and pep into your old back-bone. And from then on, just watch 'em grow. At the end of thirty days you won't know yourself. Your whole body will take on an entirely different appearance. But you've only started. Now comes the real works. I've only built my foundation. I want just 60 days more (90 in all) and you'll make those friends of yours that think they're strong look like something the cat dragged in.

A REAL MAN

When I'm through with you, you're a real man. The kind that can prove it. You will be able to do things that you had thought impossible. And the beauty of it is you keep on going. Your deep full chest breathes in rich pure air stimulating your blood and making you just bubble over with vim and vitality. Your huge, square shoulders and your massive muscular arms have that craving for the exercise of a regular he man. You have the flash to your eye and the pep to your step that will make you admired and sought after in both the business and social world.

This is no idle prattle, fellows. If you doubt me, make me prove it. Go ahead. I like it. I have already done this for thousands of others and my records are unchallenged. What I have done for them, I will do for you. Come, then, for time flies and every day counts. Let this very day be the beginning of new life to you. SEND FOR MY 64-PAGE BOOK

"MUSCULAR DEVELOPMENT"

It contains dozens and dozens of full-page photographs of both myself and my numerous pupils. This book is bound to interest you and thrill you. It will be an impetus—an inspiration to every red blooded man. I could easily collect a big price for a book of this kind just as others are now doing, but I want every man and boy who is interested to just send the attached coupon and the book is his absolutely free. All I ask you to cover is the price of wrapping and postage—10 cents. Remember this does not obligate you in any way. I want you to have it. So it's yours to keep. Now don't delay one minute—this may be the turning-point in your life today. they were asking to stay the night in an old hut—a woman, a dramatic and beautiful creature from the great social world, someone to whom their everyday existence must have been a strange dream. They began to stare at her and look awkward. The spell of old times was broken. She hastened to mention her business of packing and made a move for her hut. They offered their services timidly, but she only smiled and said she could do it best by herself and it would not take long. Guthrie gave her the key.

"No one has been in there since—" he began.

That brought their minds racing back to the fatal reason of her leaving, and it was a silent band she left behind in the mess. Still, while she rolled her possessions together it was good to reflect that there were men just a few yards away who would come at her call. For that dim hut was horrible with memories. Once her feet slipped on the glassy floor and once she thought she heard a strange loud "crack" behind her. It was only the creak of the door, but it sped her movements noticeably, and in no time she had pitched her main baggage outside. There were still many things left—clothes, canvases, all her veldt equipment—but she thought nothing of sacrificing these to make her "accident" more realistic.

At last with the door closed, and standing in the center of the hut, she struck a match and pitched it up to the pointed roof. It failed and fell at her feet. A second did the same. Three is always an effective number and the third did the trick. With a little sizzling noise like the hiss of an adder it ran along the thatch, and she stood perfectly still while bright sparks and shrivelings of grass spattered about her. Rats had begun to scamper and a rain of cockroaches to fall before she opened the door and stepped out, pulling it to behind her and giving a shout of alarm that was unnecessary, for already the natives were racing to the smell of burning.

A moment later the whole camp was illuminated. Druro and the rest of them salvaged the baggage she had put out, but the heat was enough to roast an ox and no one could get within ten yards of the hut. Fortunately there were plenty of boys, and soon they were perched like birds on the tops of the neighboring huts, beating with wet sacks and branches to keep the conflagration from becoming general. As it was, no one sustained any material damage except Desmond herself. But she bore the loss of various possessions with great calm; only blaming herself diligently for having given so much trouble.

Druro went down to see her off, and they were together for a moment. He could not say much before the chauffeur, but he looked penetratingly at her as he observed:

"There are lots of things I must talk to you about, and I wish you'd make an opportunity shortly."

Her slouch hat was drawn low but he could see the reflection of the flames leaping and dancing in those strangely beautiful eyes.

"I'm going off soon," she answered vaguely.

"It is that I want to talk to you about . . . among other things. Why should you go?"

She laughed rather mirthlessly.

"It's all finished for me, Druro."

"No." He had got hold of her hand over the side of the car and it gave him a strange thrill, a sensation extraordinarily familiar, yet of which he could remember no previous occasion.

"My mind is still queer, Desmond," he said hurriedly—she had drawn her hand away—"and there are still big gaps in my memory, but some things I can never forget—things that you are mixed up with and that I must talk to you about. When? When?" he urged. "Fix a time now. Can I come over to Mrs. Hope's tomorrow?"

Desmond thought rapidly and miserably . . . What good was there in seeing him again? She wanted to get away from him and the memory of him; to take her wounded heart and its aching, incessant pain far from him and this sweet and cruel country. Must she undergo this agony again, of seeing his eyes and hearing his voice? She tried procrastination and vague compromise.

"I don't know . . . my plans are uncertain . . . I'll send you word . . . sometime."

But he was not going to be satisfied with that. He knew too well that type of promise that binds you to nothing, for he had made many such in his life.

"No; you must fix a time, Desmond. Remember, there are all sorts of things—the business of the farm, what I owe you on it, your share of this mine and"—he looked meaningly at the chauffeur's back—"and a hundred other things I can't go into here."

"I'll send and let you know," repeated Desmond.

"You promise that?" he insisted, and she promised at last, unwillingly enough, and he had to be satisfied, or pretend to be.

But his soul was filled with discontent and unrest as he walked slowly up the kopje. He didn't know what it was that he wanted. Life looked sweet enough. He had a fortune in his mine and the way was open at last that led to Gay and the fulfilment of love. Yet . . . the idea of parting with Desmond disturbed and disintegrated his joy. It was absurd, of course, but somehow he had not for a long time envisaged any picture of a future without Desmond lounging at his side. Even in contemplating marriage he had thought of Desmond still there . . . that kid! And now that the kid had proved to be a lovely and wonderful woman . . . well, of course, it wouldn't wash at all. That cock wouldn't fight, in fact.

"To hell with the sea boots," thought Lundi Druro miserably, and he felt a piercing pain as though someone had neatly and dexterously inserted a slender stiletto to the hilt under his fifth rib and left it there.

CHAPTER XXI

"YOU understand, Florence, this is not a lover's rendezvous or anything of that sort." A tristeful smile flickered over Gay Lypiatt's lips. "There is just something I have to put right between those two—Druro and Desmond—and that is why I have asked you to let me see him here."

"Of course, dearest, I understand."

Mrs. Berrington did not in the least, but looking at the sorrow-riven face rising like a tired lily above the weeds of mourning, she knew at least that there was no frivolous reason for the interview. Frivolity had passed forever, with the brightness of girlhood, from Constant Lypiatt's widow; she looked a middle-aged woman, wan and drawn, as she sat there. Florence rather wondered indeed that vanity did not prevent her from meeting her old lover just at present. But then Florence did not know the true facts; one, that there was a very natural physical reason why Gay should look thus; two, that Gay was glad of the change in herself because she believed it might make her task both easier and more complete. Tomorrow she would tell Florence about the coming child and let her communicate the news to Rhodesia, thus making an end to any speculative gossip that might have arisen concerning herself and Druro.

Tonight she intended to tell Druro—that, and many other things that would help him to a happier future than he could ever know with her. It meant driving the last nail into her own coffin of worldly happiness, but Gay Lypiatt had dwelt too long with pain to shrink from the last sacrifice; and she had already tasted of the spiritual compensation that comes to those who renounce for themselves only to give with both hands to others. In a word she had found God, and He made His ways easy before her and His paths straight.

Druro came speeding through the night to her call. He had a car now, but it could not carry him quickly enough to the woman round whom his dreams were twined; the woman who had failed him once, and who had made up for it by putting her blessed hands into the gutter and dragging him up once more into the light and sunshine. He was alive again now, vital in every nerve, tingling with hope and joy of living; and he knew he was a better man than he had ever been, for by the grace of God he had conquered his own devils, which is greater victory than the conquering of cities. Yet his heart sat very still in his breast; there was sadness in it as well as joy; that piercing, knife-like pain Desmond had put there at parting still ached and burned. He did not understand it; he only wondered why it must always be that joy is tempered by some errant pain and the salt flavor of tears penetrates the sweetest cup!

This summons to Gay's side had surprised him a little. Not that he thought it unseemly; but knowing all fair and secure before them, like a man he was willing to hasten slowly and come to her after the allotted time of waiting. That it should be she who elected to ignore convention pleased yet puzzled him, but he did not give it too much thought. All that mattered was that in a few moments now he would hold her in his arms.

Yet when they stood facing each other across Florence Berrington's drawing room, there still seemed time for delay. The wild beating of his heart, the urgent passion in his veins were stilled at sight of her. He was shocked at the signs of strain, physical and mental, that were stamped on her, and instantly the quality of his love changed from something glowing and wild to a pitiful solicitude that was tenderness itself, yet fundamentally different to the vibrant urge in his veins that he had felt as he raced to love's assignation.

She had counted on this impression her changed appearance would make, and it helped her now to quell the ardor of his eyes with a quiet glance and the gentle laying of her hands on his outstretched ones.

"Sit down, Lundi. You are not entirely well yet, I can see. And I too am—delicate."

She had arranged chairs facing each other—not too close. He found himself sitting in one of them, near enough to take her hand yet not taking it, for his own were clasped loosely together between his knees while he watched those dear eyes, lilac-shadowed, that faintly smiling mouth that spoke so gently and so bravely.

"We have got to take care of ourselves, you and I, Lundi, for we are each precious to someone."

That was a strange way of putting it, he thought. But everything was strange about her today.

"So you are to be very kind and tender to me," she murmured on, "while I am telling you about all the things that concern us—and others. Will you promise that?"

"I don't quite understand, Gay, but I'll promise anything. You know that I love——"

She put out a thin hand, restraining him.

"I know, yes. In spite of all that has passed, we are very dear to each other, and I pray it may always be so. However happy you are I want you to go on loving me, and wherever I am I shall always love you as a tender sister loves a brother—Lundi!" Her hands stretched out pleadingly, for he had risen with abruptness and stood staring heavily. She too rose, and he noticed for the first time, with pain-sharpened eyes, how wearily cumbered were her movements, and that the lovely slim lines of her were blurred and lost. Yet when she spoke it, the simple truth struck him like a blow between his eyes.

"My husband left a child to me, Lundi."

He was almost felled by the blow. The ground slid under his feet, he had to put out a hand and catch on to something. He presently found that it was her hand he was holding; they were sitting facing each other once more, and she was looking at him with sweet eyes and speaking very tenderly.

"Do not be sad, dear friend. It is the first happiness I have had for so long, and ever since I was a little child I have always longed above all things to be a mother . . . and now it is coming to me at last! You must not think me heartless when I tell you that I cannot even properly grieve for poor Constant because I—well, because it means I shall have my baby to myself."

Druro passed a hand vaguely over his eyes and back through his rough hair. With a heart as tender as any woman's he could no more have reproached this babbling mother creature than have doubled his fist and struck her. Yet the thing she was relating outraged him to the very soul, tore up his future by the roots. He was speechless. He wanted to go away by himself and unburden his heart with groans and curses, and all the time he couldn't believe it—he couldn't believe that the woman who had come to him in the shanty and kissed him and caressed him back from the edge of a shameful grave could sit there and coo at him . . . about the child of his enemy! Good God, had she no compassion! His blood-bright gaze transfixed her. There was a moment's dreadful silence, then:

"Lundi, my dear," she said poignantly,

"don't you know that that lovely girl who calls herself Desmond—your comrade through good and ill, in sickness and in health—don't you know that she is the one you must build your future on?"

"What?" said Druro in a wild, remote voice.

He got up and began to look absently for his hat, but as he had come without one his search was likely to be fruitless. Gay had his hand again.

"She loves you."

"You are crazy, Gay," he said, and gently released her hands. "And so am I. I must go away."

"Yes; you must go to her, Lundi. Go and try to make up to her a little for the terrible things she has endured from life. You can do it, for she loves you. She told me so. 'I love that drunkard,' she said, and her voice was a melody."

"You are crazy, Gay," repeated Druro, still searching absently about the room for something.

"But it is true, Lundi. She said it on the day we feared that you—that you meant suicide. And the same night, when you were drunk in the shanty and I was too cowardly to go near you, she—she was not afraid to go into the darkness where you sat—the darkness of the pit, it seemed to me."

Druro ceased suddenly to look for something and vagueness went out of his stare.

"Did you not come to the shanty that night?" he asked in a voice cold and clear as water.

"I came—to the door. I saw you sitting there and I fled. Forgive me, Lundi, but you looked so awful . . . so lost . . . and you began to laugh terribly . . . then the candle went out . . . I was revolted, terrified, and I ran back and told Desmond I was not brave enough. She put her raincoat on me and took my cloak, and then I drove away in the car and she came back to you, I suppose . . . did she?"

"Yes . . . she came back to me," said Druro in that clear voice. Then he stopped dead. But a voice inside him went on chanting, singing, shouting:

"She came back to me and fought with death and the devil for my passing soul . . . she kissed my degraded lips and held my face in her soft bosom and let me cry there like a child . . . And gave me sweet and lovely crooning words of promise for our future together . . . such radiant promises . . . if I would only leave drink and my soiled life for her. And I called her 'Gay' and swore by my love and her face that I would so do! And I did change my life and I did forsake drink! . . . But could I have done it, by God, except for her?"

"And so," Gay was saying, "you must go and find and tell her these things—for I think you love her even as she loves you, Lundi."

He waited for three days at the Jubilate Deo; days that, though occupied by work, were yet filled to the brim with a profound and searching analysis of the events of the past year—so far as he could remember them, for the hiatus in his memory still gaped like a dark hole. And through all his thoughts a little fine golden flame ran and mounted until heart and brain were alight and ablaze at last with a fire that nothing could quench save one sweet draught—a crystal draught from the lips of the woman he now knew was for him.

She was still at Mrs. Hope's, but no word had come and he could wait no longer. On the third evening he drove in, left his car in town and walked up to the hospital.

It was about nine o'clock and a twinkling of lights showed in various windows with an ambient glow from the sitting room whose doors and windows were set wide. He hoped this did not mean that Mrs. Hope was holding one of her famous bridge evenings. But to his relief he found as he quietly approached the veranda that the room was empty of all but one person—a girl he did not know. Her face was averted, but he could see that she was dressed in gray and had hair growing riotously in a curly crop that looked dark and yet glinted in the lamplight. She was leaning over a baby in her lap, apparently very carefully lifting its eyelids and peeping in. He supposed her to be one of Mrs. Hope's cases, and was just turning away to go round to the back to see if he could find the matron when she spoke, riveting him to the spot:

"You surly little rascal—I believe you're old Paul Kruger come back."

And she laughed—Desmond's deep, bell-like laugh—and stood up, lifting the baby to the light. Then very tenderly she kissed its cross little face and held it against her own, making soft crooning noises. All the blood in Lundi Druro's body seemed to leap to his heart at that sight. Those soft crooning sounds he remembered well; she had made them when she held him thus to her heart, when he too was helpless and dependent as a baby!

But except for that laugh and those dear sounds, it was a Desmond he scarcely recognized. How could he know that curly russet head when the hair he remembered was dark and slick to the scalp! How had the slim, swaggering figure he knew been so miraculously transformed into this Greek being of exquisite lines and curves rippling under the sheen of silk? The fine ivory of her throat, and a V-shaped gleam of her bosom showed in startling contrast against the richer tint of chin and cheek. But the eyes—laughing, tragic, satirical, reflective, deep and strange as mountain pools, yet simple and blue as larkspurs in a cottage garden—the eyes were the eyes of Desmond.

He had no patience to wait longer to search in those eyes for what he sought; stepping impulsively forward he stood in the lighted doorway and she saw him. They stayed looking at each other for a long moment, and in that time each saw in the other the companion of their bygone rencontre on the Paris boulevard. She saw the big, careless, hatless man with the life scarred face, the gaze on far things and the kind, blithe smile of confidence in himself and in life; while to him, for the first time, came memory and recognition of Flavia Tyrecastle, that radiant girl with tragic eyes whose life for an hour had touched his.

"So you came to Rhodesia after all," he said, half laughing, half musing at the miracle of it.

"Yes. I took your advice. You said the veldt was a good place to lose one's ghosts."

"And isn't it?"

"Oh, the veldt's all right!" She crinkled her nose in a dubious, whimsical expression curiously characteristic of "young Desmond," and suddenly they both began to laugh.

"It's all right tonight, anyway," said Druro. "Come out and see."

"What about Oom Paul?"

She looked reflectively at the baby, but he had obligingly gone to sleep, so she laid him on the sofa, propped among cushions. When she turned to Druro again her face had resumed its rather sad composure, the sparkle of humor and mischief fading from it.

"I thought we arranged you were to come in if I sent word," she said abruptly.

He did not answer. His glance, wandering in search of a wrap for her, fell on a heap of filmy blue lying over a chair. He lifted it and threw it over his arm, and its diaphanous folds gave out a faint odor of jasmine. As only a scent can do, it took memory back . . . to a night in a shanty.

"I don't need a wrap, and that is not mine." Her voice seemed strangely edged but he did not put the cloak down. His eyes took her into a warm, bold gaze.

"You wore it once for me—will you not wear it again?"

After that she moved like a woman in a dream, her eyes wide, her lips parted but finding no word to utter.

Only a few seconds of walking brought them into the lone veldt, a wide, empty world of purple veils powdered with starlight and fragrant with the breath of sun dried grasses. A little wind sauntered past, touching their faces and catching at her cloak. He could only see her dimly, except for her throat like carved moonlight and that gleam of whiteness that was the pathway to her breast. But each could hear the caught and difficult breathing of the other, and each thought that the beating of their own heart filled the land.

"What did you mean?" she faltered at last, "by what you said . . . just now?"

"That I know it was you, Flavia, who came to me in the shanty."

A faint, quivering sound issued from her lips. She tried to laugh but it was a failure.

"What does it matter now?" she said very low. "It is over long ago. I must have been mad . . . but at the time it seemed the right thing to do."

"Is that the reason you did it?"

"A good enough reason surely?" Her voice was not quite steady. "You helped me in the same way once . . . that night in Paris . . . I was on my way to the Seine when we met, and your talk, your joyous interest in life diverted me from my purpose. So you see after all it was only a return act of kindness."

"And you did it for that—just out of kindliness—friendliness?"

"Surely those are good enough reasons," she repeated lamely.

"No, they are not," he said with a stern note in his voice. "They are not reasons enough for you to put your lovely lips to a drunkard's and croon over him with lovely promises of eternal love."

He heard again that long shivering sigh from her lips, and he caught her hands and drew her close.

"But I want them again, those promises . . . those kisses I have hungered for."

She resisted, holding strong, slim hands against his breast.

"Oh, Lundi, I can't understand . . .

It Protects the Skin From Wind and Chaps

This is what winter weather does to the skin if not suitably protected—first, the wind dries out the moisture, then the cold brings chaps. The result is that the skin soon grows rough and coarse.

It you protect your skin against wind and cold, it will retain its natural softness and freshness. Your skin needs Frostilla Fragrant Lotion every day to keep it at its best. This lotion is quickly absorbed by the skin and contains no grease or oil to make it sticky. The fragrance is the delightful perfumes of many rare flowers.

Frostilla Fragrant Lotion is useful for many things. In manicuring it softens the cuticle and prevents soreness around the nails. It keeps the hands white and smooth in spite of adverse household duties. Men find it soothing after the shave. It prevents and relieves chapped ankles.

Use Frostilla Fragrant Lotion before powdering. After rubbing it into the skin wipe off the surplus with a soft cloth, then powder. No shine can appear; the skin takes on a more natural appearance and the powder clings on much longer.

This year is Frostilla Fragrant Lotion's fiftieth anniversary. Its popularity since 1873 speaks for its merit. It can be purchased everywhere in the United States and Canada. Regular price, 35 cents. The Frostilla Company, Elmira, New York.

how can it be me when it was Gay you thought, you believed——"

"My darling, my dear, that is all past, and it was Gay herself who opened my eyes to this great wonder . . . to what I did not know, but that, now I do know, I will never relinquish for man, God or devil —that it is you who lured me back from the pit; your dear, lovely lips I have dreamed of . . . you that I love with every breath of my body and every hope of my soul."

It was enough; she gave him her lips on that; gave him the short, wild kisses of a lover and the long, tender ones that are born of the mother in a woman's nature. Something of the enchantment of Africa, that old witch who lays her curses as liberally as her blessings on those she makes her own, came into their love, tinging it with a mystery, a majesty, a poignant, fearful sweetness that the loves of Europe do not know. They kissed and clung and were safe at last against each others' hearts —as safe as lovers can ever be from the ceaseless warfare of Time, fell Circumstance and the Sisters Three!

Flavia Tyrecastle at least took no chances with fate's power to harm her through the tongue of scandal, for presently they sat down on some rocks under a blackthorn, with a bush-baby chattering in the branches above them and scattering soft mimosa powder on their heads, and she told him the full story of her marriage with Tyrecastle and its tragic sequel at Dover when Gerry Sillinger shot and was shot by the seducer of his sister.

"How could I grieve for a husband who had betrayed a girl I knew and loved? And how could I, Lundi, tell the world the truth when she sat trembling for fear the child she adored would be openly branded with shame?

"It was for her child, robbed of his true heritage, that I fought to get the money, and he has that at least, poor little fellow, if he cannot bear his father's name. But it was a sordid business, that fight for money, and no wonder the world cast me into the outer darkness of its displeasure! What I do wonder now is why I should have suffered so much then, for Africa has taught me there are greater sufferings to bear than any the social world can inflict."

She shivered a little, wondering what else this terribly beautiful country might have for her. There were still perils and dark possibilities—the peril of this dear lover of hers recovering his lost memory; the peril of ponjola, the beast that never tires; the perils of Time and Circumstance and the Sisters Three! She shivered a little and sat close in the curve of his encircling arm. And Lundi Druro, the sporting parson's son, unexpectedly quoting Scripture, said gently:

"'When He hath tried me I shall come forth as gold!' As you have, my loved one —such gold as was never mined or milled by mortal hand!"

He Stooped to Conquer

at even George's most comic jests. Yes, now they were George and Charity. But that, thought George, very bitterly, of nights, was all.

All most fascinating to observe for eyes that found little interest or solace any more, except in books. All most interesting to hear about from a voice no education could rob of its cool precision—to see occupy a face and body that even such acquired necessities as lipstick could only make delightful in another fashion as paint and gilt ornaments, properly arranged, might heighten the charm of a small stone saint grown tired of prayers and cathedral niches, wanting a little live color now after so much piety. All highly instructive—all something that never in any conceivable world could lead to anything, of course.

All the same, things were very quiet and pleasant this late afternoon. Through the window came the smell of summer flowers —a cool thread of fragrance. There was something in the poise of the girl as she sat opposite him, a little relaxed, the book closed in her lap, that so perfectly matched that fragrance, thought Rodney Fether. His fingers tightened on each other as he looked at her—relaxed with an effort of will. He began to write on his pad.

"Well, how were the movies last night?"

"Very nice, sir." She seldom forgot her sirs now, except when excited. "Very nice indeed."

"So you enjoyed yourself."

A little flush of color. A spark in the glance.

"Yes sir. Mr. Hawkins took me."

Oh, Mr. Hawkins did! thought Rodney with a sudden irritation he didn't care to reason about. Mr. Hawkins didn't seem to have much to do these days. Mr. Hawkins——

"What kind of movies do you like best, Charity?"

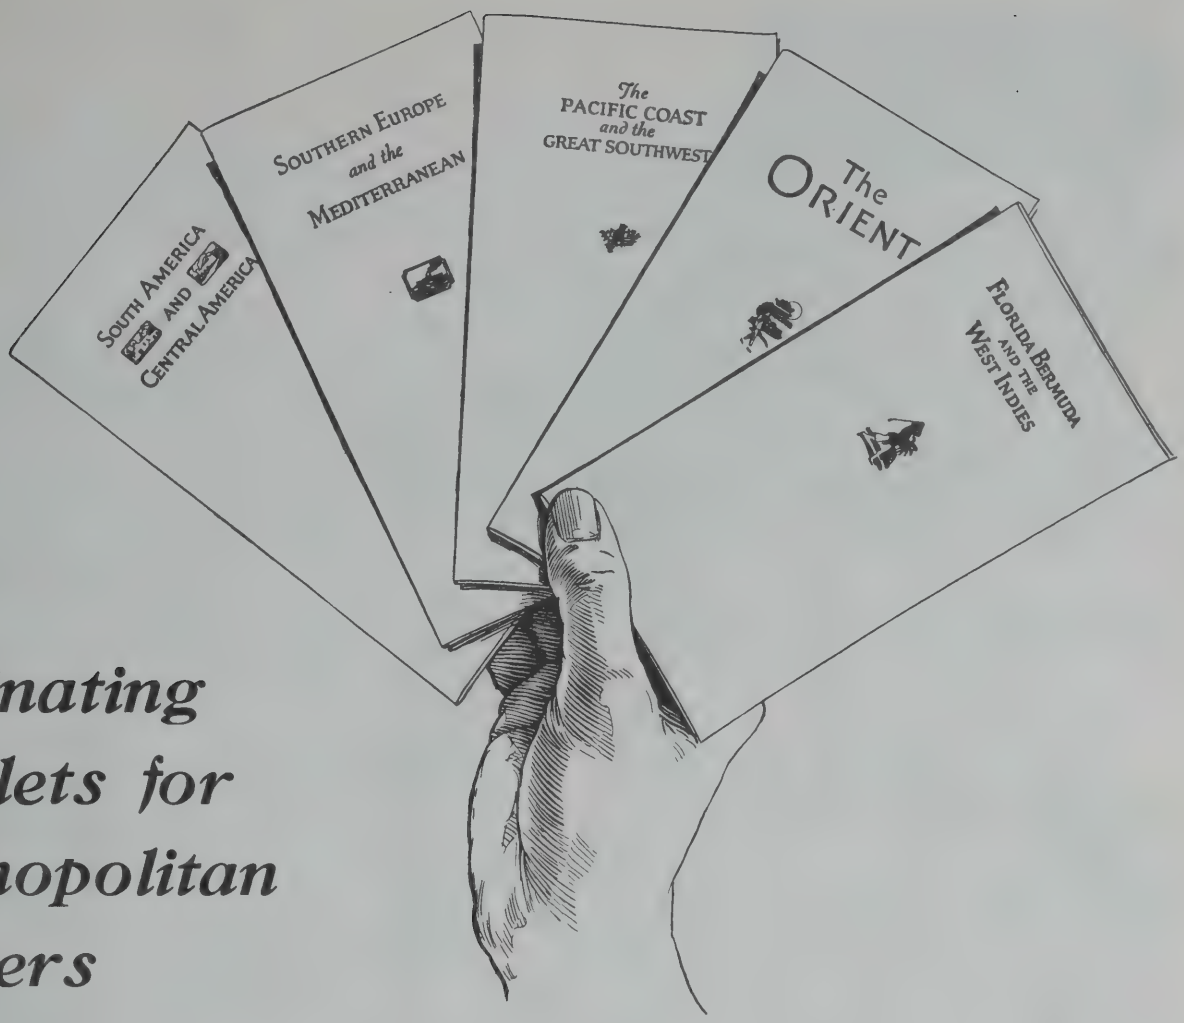
Unhesitatingly:

"The Western ones, in spite of all their foolish shooting and drinking. Everybody seems so happy and big out there."

Rodney smiled. The amusing child! But the amusing child was going on, a little diffidently.

"And Mr. Hawkins is so kind—and knowing so many things to tell me."

Oh—considerably more than bother Mr. Hawkins!



"To tell you about what? I never thought of Hawkins as a Zane Grey before but——"

"About the West, sir. He was born out there." Awedly—"Once, sir, he used to be a cowboy!"

He couldn't help the smile. No reason for her to flush like that, to speak so rapidly in Hawkins's defense.

"He's always wanted to go back—I think it's fine of him! He says a man's a man out there—he doesn't like the East much—he says he doesn't feel as if he were really breathing here, sometimes. He says a man with a girl to help him, a girl who isn't afraid, can make a home out there in no time—go right ahead. He has some money saved up too—he——"

Curious pricklings were crawling all over Rodney Fether's skin. He could feel them cover him, wandering—wherever they went they left anger and burning. Hawkins —uniformed Hawkins touching his cap—and Charity! Suddenly, after the pricklings, his whole body felt very cold.

"And has he selected the girl—by any chance—Charity?" the hand wrote slowly.

She was still talking as she read the question. Then she had stopped talking—stopped in the middle of a sentence as if something queer had struck her as dumb as he. That was all—that and the burning blush that came to her so painfully against her will.

"Well, I don't know," she said rather pitifully, after a while.

Fether rose to his feet. He knew what he wanted now.

She didn't know until his arms had gone around her crushingly, until his lips hurt her. Then she started to fight, without tears or outcry, with only a fierce struggling silence that made him let her go before he had kissed her again. She did not run—she stood there, looking at him, looking at him. One hand fixed her dress mechanically, but her eyes held all her strength.

His face worked, his throat made an indescribable gobbling sound that sickened him. His hands reached at her again—and fell. It had gone beyond the matter of hands now. Only their eyes fought, brutal and silent.

"Oh, how dirty you are!" she said with a broken gasp, and he saw her go white as paper and put one hand on the table to steady herself. He stepped forward, his fingers scrambling over the desk for pad and pencil. He could not look down and find them—that meant defeat.

"I love you, I love you," the hand wrote, shaking, sprawling. "I'll give you anything. I want you. I worship you. Come here!"

"Oh no, no, no!" in a terrified whisper. "Oh no, no, no!"

"You've got to. You must. I love you."

He was coming forward, her eyes were dying like candle flames, he had beaten her eyes.

"We'll go anywhere—you'll be rich—you'll be happy—I swear to God you'll be happy—rich—I love—Charity—oh Charity——"

The pencil slipped, trailed into scrawls. He was almost touching her.

A bell rang, the bell of the house telephone on Fether's desk.

"That's for me." Again the whisper, so terrified, so shaken, like the whisper of a child who has touched something cold and live in the dark.

The bell rang—rang. Oh—devils!—but he let her answer it, saw her answer, wax-white, heard her say yes, she'd come at once, while he scribbled, scribbled.

"Come back in an hour, darling Charity, darling. An hour, I love you—oh, I want you, I want——"

No talk, no servants' gossip. Not till they were gone. Tonight. They'd go tonight in the car. Not with Hawkins, though. He smiled suddenly. But she had to go away for a little now—he realized that perfectly—she must go away. How beatenly she looked at him now—how almost in horror.

He kissed her again and she suffered him—she was cold to kiss and she trembled. But that didn't matter. That didn't matter any more.

She was gone, looking back at him once. The same look she had worn since he kissed her first. The sort of look a young person might have acquired after seeing the Minotaur, in fact. But Rodney Fether seemed to find little unusual about it. He breathed through his teeth and again that odd sound came in his throat.

Then he went back to his chair and picked up a book to read it while he waited, but his hand shook so that he could not. So he sat there instead for a long time, merely thinking, thinking, and looking at his shaking hand.

VI

FETHER looked at his watch—it was after the hour. He held out his hand in front of him—it was quite steady now. A knock at the door. He pressed the button that meant "come in" with his steady hand.

But it wasn't Charity. It was one of the underservants. A silver tray in his hand, a note on the tray. Fether knew the sloping, Spencerian hand intuitively, before his own hand, not so steady now, had taken the envelope and gestured the servant to go.

The note began, "Mr. Rodney Fether, Sir——"

She was Charity to the end.

> You're everything that is wicked. George saw you kiss me from where he was with the car and now he won't speak to me and all the others believed it, too. I am going home—if you try to find me I will run away somewhere else, always. I don't know whether you'll repent or not because people as wicked as you like to die in their sins but you had better. I was sorry for you at first because of your being unnatural but now I am not. I feel all burning inside. I forgive you. I hope George marries somebody worthy of him. I am not—and God is not mocked.
> Very sincerely yours,

Cold and heat, utter cold, utter heat that seemed to possess the body together and altogether so that it burned and froze in the same instant. "I was sorry for you at first because of your being unnatural." Very cold, sharp anguish, gripping the hands together like wrenching frost. Then the shame came. The utmost shame.

A voice saying: "Back to your cage, poor monster, back to your cage! Back to your cage, blind monster, dumb monster that tried to play the desirable man!" A hand drumming on the desk as if ague shook it. And inside the soul?

When Fether got up from the chair where he had been sprawling like a bag, he got up as if the last three years had never existed. He got up knowing only that he had broken his own private honor and that now he had to mend it again, no matter at what price to body or mind

Going home. She must be out of the house—she wouldn't have sent that letter before. She'd have to go to New York—what time was it? Six-five. Six minutes walk to the station by the somewhat roundabout way that led out by the Fetherholme gardens and so to the road. Two or three by the commuters' short cut—but she didn't know that way, he thought. Six-five. And the up train left at six-fifteen.

One hand on the bell push, one busy with pad and pencil—that was it.

The servant who had come with the envelope answered. Fether shoved the pad under his nose. If he had not been a very perfect gentle servant he might have been surprised. As it was he said "Yes, sir" unemotionally and left on the run, thanking all the gods of servanthood as he ran that he hadn't been around when the others started to rag the Jabez girl.

Fether was at the garden window, his hands gripping the sill, pushing the sill as if the sill were the wheel of a car. Why didn't they hurry—oh God, why didn't they hurry? Only way to get anything done was do it yourself—but couldn't when you were dumb. Couldn't jump from a car to a station platform and make mouths at one of your housemaids, praying her for God's sake to come back and forgive you and marry her damned chauffeur!

There—the car was sliding down the drive.

His muscles relaxed—he turned to the other window. Thank God for that whim of his father's—he could see everything from here—tracks, station and all, like God or the Devil repenting over his handiwork.

The station seemed to jump at him as he stared—roof—tracks—up platform—sign. He swept his eyes along the straggle of waiting commuters. No Charity—in the waiting room, maybe. What was the time?

Four minutes more and the car had been gone a minute. They could make it. They could make it—just.

His eyes went back to the tracks again. His hand shook suddenly as if something had struck it. His throat made an inhuman sound.

A figure on the wrong side, the down side, across the fence. A figure stumbling along with a heavy suitcase—an instant's flash of the figure's face, white, straining. A figure that had taken the dangerous commuters' short cut that they were going to stop with barbed wire sometime, thrown its suitcase across the fence, climbed the fence itself in three clumsy movements and stood sobbing on the edge of the tracks, off the platform, looking up as the down express, the six-thirteen, which in its turmoil of mind the figure neither saw nor heard, thrust a smooth head into the cutting and rushed on the figure like a rushing bullet. A figure that started to cross, that, caught in the middle of the tracks, stopped dead, seeing the train at last, shocked out of all sense.

The dumb man had torn an ironic, white-lettered megaphone down from the wall. He had thrust it out of the window as far as he could lean. The dumb mouth rounded, strained with unbelievable effort.

"Oh God!" thought Rodney Fether, praying soundlessly, gigantically, "oh God, let me call to her! Let me call! Oh God——"

To Charity, dazzled with terror between the rails, came a horrible, strangling cry that seemed to fall from the air.

THE car that had been sent to the station after the housemaid did not come back at once. In fact it did not come back till half-past seven. Possibly because the chauffeur, George Hawkins, considered that after her recent flirtation with annihilation, that same young housemaid needed nothing quite so much as fresh air and his own society. To all of which the housemaid seemed to agree.

He had been describing to her at length, for the dozenth time, his exact sensations

OSTEOPATHY

The Application of Natural Law

Osteopathy walks hand in hand with nothing but Nature's laws.
—Dr A. T. Still

Providing a means for permanent health is the chief concern of the Osteopathic physician.

Because of this, temporary suppression of the symptoms is altogether insufficient.

To him, a symptom is but an effect. His concern is with the correction of the condition that has caused the symptom.

It is this view-point that has led the Osteopathic profession into so great an understanding and application of natural law.

Growth, repair, recovery—these are not within the power of man to supply. Nature alone, can provide them.

The efforts of the Osteopathic physician are not vain attempts to supply something over which he has no control. His work is to keep the thinking right, to keep the living right, to keep the mechanism of the body right — so that Nature can fulfill her functions and her duties without interference.

It is the natural way—and the Osteopathic physician believes, the only way—to provide a physical basis for permanent health.

Adjustment characterizes Osteopathic science. Spinal adjustment originated with Osteopathy.

Structural adjustment — the maintainence and regulation of the physical mechanism of the body — is utilized rather than drugs as curative agents.

Equally important with structural adjustment is the adjustment of diet, hygiene, sanitation, environment. Surgery is an integral part of Osteopathic practice when necessity requires its application.

at finding himself on the wrong side of the tracks while the down train roared upon her, and asking her, also for the dozenth time, just what had made her jump back in time.

"It was God, George," said Charity, her eyes very wide. "I am sure that it was God."

"Sure"—he was patient with her—"sure. But how?"

"You won't think I'm silly?"

"Ah, sweetie!"

"Well"—with a bowed and religious head—"He spoke to me."

"Honest? You heard Him?"

"In His own voice. Oh George, a terrible voice!" and Charity shuddered. "Saying, 'Go back, Charity! Back, you little fool!' " she chanted ceremonially.

"So I went," she ended. "Though before I couldn't move."

"Well, I'll certainly hand it to Him for action, anyhow," said George, with more religious feeling, perhaps, than his words implied.

In the study at Fetherholme sat a young man who approved as heartily as George of George's sentiments. Though, oddly enough, he was thinking neither of George nor his Charity. He was sitting in an armchair, talking to himself and occasionally breaking off to listen to the echo as if everything he said were sweeter than music. And "I can talk!" was his every third sentence, "Oh God, I can talk again!"

Then a thought of Charity came to him—a vague one but still a thought. He grinned—she and George certainly could have any sort of wedding present they wanted from Fetherholme. For himself, even Charity was too much part of the black dream that had held him so long to remember very much intentionally. He rose to his feet, stretched arms. The words came from his mouth again—the broken, ecstatic words. For himself it seemed as if the whole world were his now, to play with like dice. For himself, he was whole again—he had just been born.

is his custom, summer and winter. Humility almost shouted in fury as she perceived the friendly atmosphere of the Elder's house and Henry's contentment. Humility denounced vanity, the Devil and all of his wiles; she exalted her butter-making, her bread-making—both of which are admirable—but Henry sat in silence, looking only at me. (If he knew—my gown was not for him, but in memory of a summer night and a rose garden, he might have vouchsafed a glance at Humility.)

Humility questioned me as to my work among the sick, my knowledge of herbs. I answered that I knew but little of medicines, and only a few manners of helping pain or sudden illness, to be used only in the event of a chirurgeon being not procurable. I was a nurse for the sick, and could use, if necessity arose, medicines hitherto bespoken by him. The eyes of Humility glistened with an unholy light, little understood then by me.

"You must needs gather the herbs at twelve by the clock at night, in a graveyard, on a moonless night," she cried.

I laughed. "How can one see on a moonless night, or by night at all?" I answered. "Doctor Warren instructs me where to go, what tests to use. I tend the sick as he bids——"

Humility advanced toward me. With uplifted hand and a strange shout, she screamed, "You—you have been seen gathering herbs in Salem Wood, by the graveyard——"

"Violets," I answered, "almost dear English violets. I have them pressed in my Bible." I rose and found a chair nearer Henry, for I mistrusted what her violence might accomplish.

"Bible!" she screamed. "Touch it not—it would be sacrilege—touch it not!"

Out of patience with her, I laughed again: "You would have me riding on a broomstick half across the sky, sweeping the cobwebs of the world down, gathering herbs in the moon on a moonless night, crashing through graveyards. Look out, Humility, lest I take thee on behind and fly over the sea!"

It must have been the muslin gown I wore, the memory of the summer night so long ago, that lent this wildness to my tongue and humor so unseemly.

Strangely did my words fall on the startled air (in my stiff gown and cap I would not have spoken so—have gone so far). Humility hath a dull mind and a fixed stare, but I tonight was not a Puritan but an English maid far from home and yearning for the greensward, for ivied towers, for you, and all that made life beautiful. I was brought back to the present, strangely enough. Humility, frightened, trembling, gasping, asked:

"Can you fly—you say you can fly——" Without waiting for an answer she hurried on: "You say you can fly over the moon. That's what people are locked up for, for saying that. But mayhap you believe an angel would come to rescue you, an angel disguised as a man, wearing a red cloak, riding a great white horse, and lift you high from the burning faggots——"

I made appeal to Henry. "What does she mean?"

Henry, appalled at the turn of the conversation, hesitatingly replied: "It is a legend that obtains credence with the people, that if a prisoner is wrongly accused and condemned to die by fire or hanging, an angel will be seen disguised as a man, wearing a silver cuirass and a scarlet cloak, riding a white horse, and will, so the tale hath it, bear the prisoner away, and a cloud will descend to protect them. It comes, mayhap, from the profane picture of St. George saving the martyrs." Henry has an informing manner, speaking as one in authority and not as the scribes.

Humility avoided looking at me, edging carefully to the door with this parting shot: "Angels," she said, "are as scarce as innocence wrongfully accused, or tall men in red cloaks. The gaols are filled with those who torment the children." At the door she met Elder Winslow. She plucked at his sleeve and whispered. He asked impatiently her intent. "Not now—not yet——" I heard her say. She ominously looked at me and fled into the night.

The Elder told me of five new cases of fever at the house of one Maria Guilford. The doctor had journeyed into the country for Maria's sister, who on the following day would arrive to care for them. The Elder asked me to visit them early in the morning. After the Elder's departure Henry continued to sit in silence, looking steadily at me. "Is it true," he murmured softly, "is it true that you have bewitched me?"

My surprise at what I deemed a pretty compliment died within me when I perceived the pallor of his countenance. "Not that I rebel," he said softly, "but all power to think leaves me when I behold you, and all desire to leave you goes from me, and when I have left you my one thought is of how to return to your presence." With this Henry slowly walked to the door. Turning as he stood there, he asked.

"Is this strange sensation a bewitchment? Is this what Humility Cravens meant?"

With this enigmatical speech he went forth. It was not for me to consider the vagaries of Henry Bradstreet, or Humility Cravens. I dismissed them from my mind.

In the early hours of the morning, when the silvery dawn looked back, flying before the eager gaze of the sun, I sped to Maria Guilford's, where her five children lay sick of fever. I bathed them, smoothed their beds, sprinkled the lavender and violet water profusely on their pillows, prepared nourishment, insisting that Maria Guilford should rest while I cared for the children.

The poor woman blessed me, calling me the angel in adversity and various other fine praises, little deserved. I stayed on for several hours until Maria's sister came from Charlestown, brought hither by Doctor Warren to aid the stricken family. This chirurgeon gave me high praise, saying that my coming had saved the life of the little girl, who was near to starvation, and but for my knowledge of the preparation of food she would have succumbed to weakness.

With such pleasant recognition of service I left them, hastening home by the shorter path through the graveyard, where so many youths and maidens lie sleeping, dreaming, perchance, of happier days. I walked to church that morning with Mistress Winslow and my brother Walter, who is now a strong and splendid youth, and upon whom the eyes of the maidens rest contentedly. We came upon groups of people who paused suddenly, as if interrupted by us in the telling of some stirring story. A fluttering of eyes, a hush of lips followed us. My brother whispered to me:

"What import is this? What mystery is hushed as we pass by?"

Mistress Winslow looked reproachfully at Walter, for it is her custom to walk in silence to worship, with soul in harmony with the words of the preacher and not disturbed by light gossip. And so we continued on our way in communion with the day of days and hour of worship.

My brother leaves tomorrow, sent by Governor Bradstreet to a new colony to consider the waterways and the building of

BY AN ENGLISHMAN

I HAVE been to Europe and the Orient—have climbed the Alps in Switzerland and Italy, and the Chinese Himalayas. I've seen the famous island of Capri. I've ridden camels on the great Sahara Desert at sunrise. Enjoyed, in fact, most of the beauties and the grandeurs that mark different portions of the earth.

And yet I've visited no one spot on the globe that combines "so many trips abroad in one" as one section of your own country provides.

The railway journey there from your eastern cities is itself worth while, and the most comfortable that I've ever taken—summer or winter, and I've made it several times during both seasons.

But the most extraordinary thing about your Southern California, is that year-'round perfect climate, which I had heard about but never quite believed could be so delightful.

In my country we love sports and follow them almost religiously in good weather.

But in Southern California you have more than three hundred days a year with the sun shining and all our sports to boot.

English golf courses are famous, but you have many of the world's best there, and you can play almost every day. Then there's fishing, hunting, yachting and sea-bathing of the finest kind. You ride your horses in the mountains, motor to your desert, enjoy the peaceful beauty of the rare old missions, or have tea at your hotel or modest boarding place in your great central city there, and all within a radius of two hundred miles which you travel on those incomparable motor roads.

I don't see how anyone could be bored there, and I never met a fellow who was bored. He was always going here or there or doing this or that. And his children looked the happiest and healthiest that I have ever seen.

I hear that a hundred thousand new visitors went there last summer. My only wonder is that they had not been there before.

• •

Above is a tribute to a portion of your country that perhaps you've never seen—the All-Year Playground of America, the one place of its kind.

Come now or next summer—come at any season—and enjoy its complete change. Bring the family. Put your children in fine schools.

There are things to see and do here that you've never seen or done before.

It is not too soon to plan now for this great trip. No matter what season you plan to come send now for full information. Ask railroad ticket agents or mail coupon below. Plan for next summer, or come now. You'll say it's the best trip of your life.

bridges. I am so alone when he is away—"Time is not measured by hours, but by heartbeats" when my brother is away. My heart beats a thousand times as fast with anxiety for him, and a little for myself, mayhap, and time is a thousand times as long as the hours and days try to make it out.

I am with Mistress Winslow. The Elder is away, the house is of an abysmal stillness; loneliness descends upon me like a pall; fear of some unknown power of disaster is a curtain hanging blackly against the sky. I think of the last time that I saw Sir John; a haunting belief comes to me that he is on the way. I pray that he may not come too late.

There is a star looking down on me from some immeasurable height—does it shine on you out of the depths of space? And time knows no ending and too often loneliness no respite.

[July, 25, 1684]

DEAR, DEAR ELIZABETH, thank you for the plants of blackberries and currants, and above all for the rose bush in oil paper so carefully concealed—a secret joy. Red roses must bloom on this tree through a smiling June.

When my brother comes we are to build a house—a home. Every day I work in the garden that is to be; fruit and flowers will bloom here; but for the greatest part the true texture of our building will be loving thoughts and fair memories. This thought I tried to make into a poem to music, a song to sing as I planted; and then to fix the air I had in my head for it, I whistled and whistled. The birds came flying; they chirped and sang to my whistling; it was most merry and sweet, until Humility Cravens came a-peering over the hedge.

"Things grow better for incantations, don't they?" she said, smiling witlessly.

I answered by asking: "What's the worse for a song—or for a little whistling either? If I can whistle the birds to me, it may be I can sing the flowers up out of the ground!"

At that she stared and went away dumb.

Today I have your blessed letter—is this why the birds sing as my heart does? I see you feeding the peacocks on the terrace, with the towers of my dear home in sight—everywhere sunlight and roses and home. Far away I hear a horse galloping, nearer, nearer. Is Sir John riding to welcome me home? Is he riding hard—fast and faster? The picture is so clear it hurts my eyes, like looking too long at the sun.

I spoke of you to Mistress Winslow tonight. The wistfulness in my voice betrayed me; her sternness vanished.

"Dear child," she said, "you want to go home." Reproaches were not in her voice. "We will miss you and your sick people will be bereft. You are a service unto the Lord. We will pray for guidance; there will be no hindrances. The good ship Anne sails in thirty days. So pray." She held my hand, and gently told me "Good night."

I have prayed and cried unto the Lord. No light shines on me. I walk in the darkness blindly, waiting for a sign.

It behooved me today to visit Maria Guilford and her children, of whom I wrote you. Doctor Warren had sent me no word of their necessity and knowing they were well cared for by Maria's sister, I visited the sick where there was the greater need. Today I arrived at Maria's cottage, bearing cordials and fine linens for the baby, sent by Mistress Winslow. My reception by the family was of a strangeness; most curious to see. The door stood open to the sweet summer air, and when she saw me coming Maria rose and covered the baby's face. The two older children fell upon the floor, moaning; the oldest boy began to beat his head with his fists, the girl of nine fell stiff, gasping for breath. My wonderment increased when Maria shrieked, "Take your shadow from my floor!" And Humility Cravens ran out the other door of the house and into the forest, and would not turn, though I called to her loudly.

Maria poured on the ground the cordial I brought and tore the linen into a dozen pieces. On my way home I thought of the strangeness of these things, believing the sun had touched Maria's head; but as I walked I met divers others, and some among them I had nursed in illness and some befriended by gifts of money or clothing. They seemed afraid of me. One of them ran the other way; none smiled, as of old. One woman, in running, being old and unused to such haste, fell upon the ground and when I ran to help her, screamed:

"Keep off thy hands! Fare on!"

So I did, but looking back I did see the people gathered about her, some menacing me with motions. I spoke of this, sitting in the quiet room, to Mistress Winslow, and with great anxiety she regarded me.

"Is there a reason for this, my child? You have no enemies?"

As she spoke the memory of Humility Cravens hurrying from Maria's house, her look of cunning when last here, her warm thought of Henry Bradstreet, the lifting of her hand as if to strike me, her furious eyes when she talked to the Elder—all this came to me.

"Why should I have an enemy," I repeated, "unless it be Humility Cravens?"

It was then that Mistress Winslow determined that I should return to England, but first we must journey to Plymouth.

"I have a letter," she explained, "from Sir Edward Harcourt, your guardian. He forbids your visiting the sick, learning the use of medicines and the like. He adjures me to protect you and care for your safety."

"My safety?" I said. "The Indians are not upon us; there are no wars."

But Mistress Winslow seemed greatly wrought upon. "It is beyond imagination, the dangers that menace!" she cried out. "If your brother were only here!"

"In a month he will be," I consoled her.

"In a month!" she said despairingly.

At parting for the night she was almost tender.

How far away are all troubles of this little world when I have those precious words of yours. They are graven on my heart: "Sir John has embarked on the good ship Patience—he goes for the sake of a faded red rose pinned to the heart of a muslin gown." To all the stars I cry out: "Shine on! All thy bravest radiance, dear stars, to light his path! Blow gently, winds of Heaven, and bring his ship in safety; kind angels watch over him, as I pray and pray."

[July 29, 1684]

WHEN I had sealed my writings to you, I prepared for bed. Wrapping myself in a heavy white woolen and fur robe, I sat long at the window, filled with joy and peace and soul-thanksgiving. The night was fair, strewn all over with stars; but looking down I saw forms moving in the bushes. "It must be the deer from the forest straying in," I thought. I leaned from the casement. Voices came up, whisperingly.

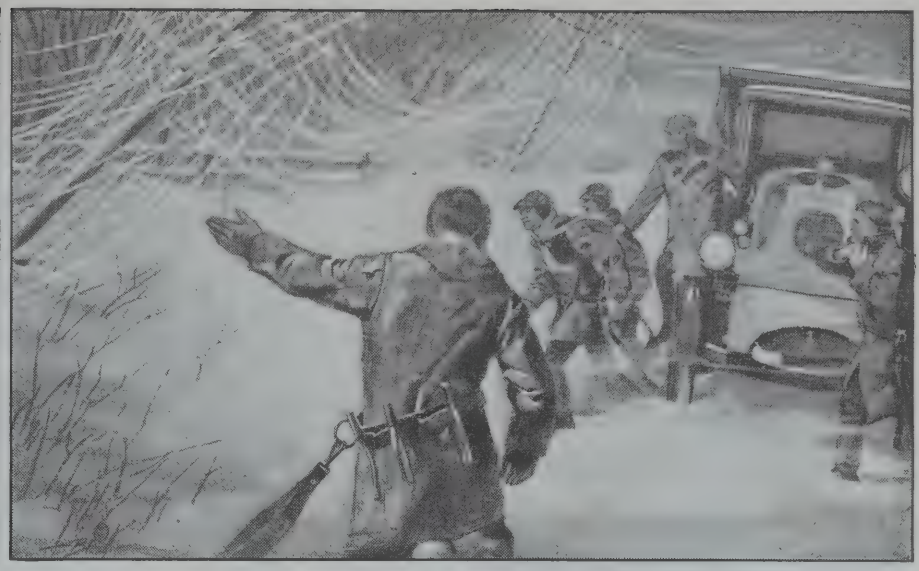
"It's she," they cried, "yonder in white!"

I withdrew from the window, unafraid but wondering. Then on the outer door came blows and cries of "Open! Open!" And on a sudden there flared torches everywhere, while staring into my quiet room were angry faces peering up over the small balcony. About to enter the window a man came. I stood before him and he screamed, falling from the balcony to the ground. Voices shouted, uniting in a horrible word: "Witch! Witch! The Devil has her!" But they reckoned not on Mistress Winslow, who stood with an old gun in her strong hands.

"This maid is in my care," she cried. "The Elder will hold you, one and all, to account, and so will Governor Bradstreet!"

Upon this they took counsel, and one tried to hush the shouting; but still they cried "Witch!" and "Burn her!" and "Hurry her to the stake!"

"Away with you, bad souls!" Mistress Winslow cried. "Away from this house!"



Her great stature, her anger prevailed upon them a little and there was quiet. But two men came in the house, one of these a church member, Mr. Brook, well known to Mistress Winslow. He showed her a warrant for my arrest, and swore that proof positive of my powers of bewitchment had been furnished him, declaring that there was no hope in any resistance; yet he promised for my safety and speedy release. He would take me in a covered wagon to the Ipswich Gaol, he said, where but few prisoners were.

. . . And so tonight I rest in Ipswich Gaol. There are ten other women housed here, one of whom is near distraught. I have soothed her to sleep and we have prayed together. There is no light in my cell at night, but a blessed window is open to the stars—they seem so near at hand. If I am soon to inhabit one of them, I pray there may be a welcome for me.

[A week later]

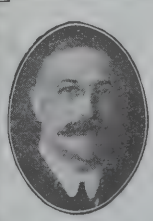
DEAR cousin of mine, it is a hard matter to write for the sobbing and weeping of the women imprisoned here. The gaoler, who brings the bread and water, is far from comforting. "They'll soon light the fire for you," he told me. "Did you hear what the Governor said at the last witch trial? 'Give her a fair trial and then hang her.'" The poor women began to pray for mercy. He leered at me: "You're a seemly wench, and high born I hear, but such fare the worst, the judges being afraid folks will say, 'They spared 'em on account of this and that,' and fearing their bewitchment on themselves."

Now am I indeed in a dream. Sometimes I fear my mind is faring worse than my body, since all of this—the weeping women, the gaol, the ride to Ipswich—seems a part of a delusion, a scene in a playhouse where I am most unaccountably a dim and unreal part of the action. That I, Mary Newton, niece of the Lady Isabella, who gave her life and fortune to the founding of a new world, to the beginning

Whatever else may fail

Linking city, village and farm, crossing mountain and wilderness, the telephone system challenges Nature in her strongholds and battles her fiercest moods.

Out on his lonely "beat" the telephone trouble-hunter braves the blizzard on snow-shoes, body bent against the wind, but eyes intent upon the wires.



North, south, east, west—in winter and summer, in forest and desert—the telephone workers guard the highways of communication. Traveling afoot where there are no roads, crawling sometimes on hands and knees, riding on burros, or motorcycles, or trucks, they "get there" as they can.

When Nature rages to that point where few things can stand against her, when property is destroyed and towns cut off, the telephone is needed more than ever. No cost is too much, no sacrifice too great, to keep the wires open. If telephone poles come down with the storm, no matter how distant they may be, no matter how difficult to reach, somehow a way is found, somehow—in blizzard, hurricane, or flood—the service is restored.

Whatever else may fail, the telephone service must not fail, if human effort can prevent it. This is the spirit of the Bell System.

How I Lost 103 lbs.

This Amazing Reduction Proves That Overweight These Days is a Woman's Own Fault

A few months ago, if you had asked what I would give to get thin I should have replied without a second thought, "Everything I possess." I had tried so many times to reduce, and tried so hard! Fortunately, something made me try the music method—and life is once more worth living!

The first Wallace reducing record played off twenty pounds for me; the complete course reduced me more than a hundred in four months. Not only that, but my state of health was so improved I can never express my gratitude. No woman who had been relieved of a mountain of fat like I carried so long would wonder why I permit this to be printed."

Wallace Tells How Much He Can Reduce You

Cases of 100 lbs. overweight are unusual. But Wallace has letters from many who lost 50 lbs; and from hundreds reduced 30 and 40 lbs. If you are but 10, 12 or 20 lbs. too heavy for style or comfort, reducing to normal is easily and quickly accomplished. Anyone using Wallace's records can attain these weights:

Height in Inches	Age 20 to 29 Years Lbs.	Age 30 to 39 Years Lbs.	Age 40 to 49 Years Lbs.	Age 50 and Over Lbs.
60	111	116	122	125
61	113	118	124	127
62	115	120	127	130
63	118	123	130	133
64	122	127	133	136
65	125	131	137	140
66	129	135	141	145
67	133	139	145	150
68	137	143	149	155
69	141	147	153	159
70	145	145	156	163

You Can Get Thin to Music

All you need to do to convince yourself that you can get thin to music is to ask Wallace for a reducing record to prove it. This first lesson is free; with it come complete instructions for its use.

Accepting this offer does not obligate you. There is no payment to be sent now, and nothing to pay on delivery. Results of this trial will make you eager for the rest of the course—but the only decision to be made now is to try it. Use this handy coupon:

WALLACE, 630 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

Please send record for first reducing lesson; free and prepaid. I will either enroll, or mail back your record at the end of a five-day trial. (114) of a new religion, I should be a prisoner in the Ipswich Gaol, is beyond my understanding. In my vanity I once believed myself a useful member of the colony, and how can I believe that I am waiting trial for wrongs uncommitted by me? I know not by whom I am accused, or of what crime. I walk in darkness and pray for guidance, for light.

[Five days later]

THE days run together in a mist of tears, like clouds shredding into rain. I was stopped in my letter to you by a visit from Doctor Warren, for whom my soul so longed. He brought me poor comfort, saying that I was accused of witchcraft and that there were no fair trials, and that my friends were striving to put off the trial until these excitements had passed. Yet he seemed fearful for himself; he confessed that often the defenders of accused persons were themselves victims of their own kindness.

"There is one way of escape," he said. "Confession. Admit everything of which you are accused. You will then," he continued in his soft, persuasive voice, "be sent to some asylum from whence you may be speedily rescued."

After his visit I seemed to come to some faint realization of my peril, but I read again your letter. You say: "Sir John Tyndale is on the way, with a goodly number of men and horses. He has been given a grant of land; he is on the way to found a new colony." Mayhap not far from here. As I count time, it is sixty days from England across the water. Forty of these days have passed since he set sail. A great hope is in my heart that he may come, that he may come in time. But if he were to come, and I not here, but taking my long and strange journey alone——

But I will not confess to such a lie, even if I die for it. I will speak the truth. I am not a witch. There are none in all the world, and thus will I testify in God's mercy, before the judges and the people.

[Salem Town—a day later]

MISTRESS WINSLOW will send to you these writings of mine, which I entrust to you; for if, in future days, aught of calumny be said of me, for the name's sake and for affection, I entrust to your discretion to make known my innocence.

They have taken me to Salem to stand trial on the morrow. I wish that my brother were here. He is a shield in danger, a torch-bearer in the darkness. Thinking of him, I am not afraid, for his bravery is imparted to me. In my loneliness I am not alone. Today a peace has come to me, a joy in my heart, for verily the Lord is with me and I fear no evil. Whatever is, is best.

[August 15, 1684]

WHEN I finished my writings I did not know what the day would bring forth, but with the abiding kindness of Mistress Winslow, and through her interest, I am allowed to write this first day's account of the trial.

The examination of Mary Newton before the worshipful esquire, John Hazelton. The opening court was held in the meeting house, and so great was the crowd I could scarcely pass through. Even the guards, who preceded me, were often pushed back upon those who led me.

Humility Cravens was first called, her deposition taken. It was written down as she spoke, for she dared not rest her eyes on me. She testifieth that on a night in June I had confessed to riding a broomstick on moonless nights, that I gathered herbs in a graveyard with which to bewitch and cure the sick, that I had visited Maria Guilford's family and sore afflicted them, that upon a visit of Mary Newton the children were thrown into spasms and like to die, that the said Mary Newton brought poisons and desired to force them to drink, that when Mary Newton left the much afflicted family she caused an aged woman to fall to the ground, making her a cripple for life, and "Many there be here who will testify to this," she said, and then stood breathless, secretly triumphant. The Judge turned to me:

"Mary Newton, you have heard this deposition. Is it true?"

I tried to make my answer modest, but my voice rang out: "I deny it!"

The Judge then asked: "Have you made no contract with the Devil?"

"No," I replied.

He continued: "Why do you hurt innocent children?"

I answered: "I do not hurt children. I love them, care for them, and when they are sick I nurse them into health again."

The Judge turned to Maria Guilford and her children, who stood, I thought, shamefaced, by the door.

"Look!" he cried out in a loud voice to Maria. "Tell if this is the person who hurt you."

The children began to scream, calling out that they were being tormented by the Devil. The Judge asked the little girl of five: "What does this maiden to you?"

The child replied: "She sings when she plants flowers; she talks to the birds, and they answer; they fly to meet her; they light on her hands; she sprinkled my pillow with water of violet to bewitch me!" The poor child looked at me and began to cry as I smiled upon her.

"Behold," said the Judge, "how the prisoner torments the child."

"Whom do you serve?" the Judge asked.

I answered that I prayed to serve God and his people.

"Why do you make poisons? Who taught you the use of herbs?"

Looking beyond the first crowded eager row of people, I saw Doctor Warren; his distraught face beseeching me to silence.

"I gather herbs to distill them for medicine," I answered. "These simple remedies have been of great benefit to many I see before me."

But the Judge responded: "They are suffering for it now. Who taught you the art of medicine? Are you in league with the Devil?"

I answered: "One can learn of medicines from books—many have been written."

"She hath confessed," the Judge announced, "to the use of black magic."

There seemed witnesses without number. The man who believed me to be an apparition and fell from my balcony deposed that I had employed spirits from the nether world to throw him to the ground. Numbed and dulled as I was by hardships and starvation, I was startled to see Humility Cravens fiercely urging Henry Bradstreet to the witness stand.

"Here!" she cried out. "Here is another victim of the singing witch."

MARION DAVIES
as Princess Mary in "When Knighthood Was in Flower"

MINERALAVA as an Aid to Beauty

by Hector Fuller

WHEN on the "silver screen" in a picturization of Charles Major's wonderful story: "When Knighthood Was in Flower," hundreds of thousands of people are made aware of the rapt beauty of Marion Davies, who so beautifully plays the role of Princess Mary, it is only natural that they should seek eagerly to discover by what means Miss Davies retains the fine qualities of the beauty which appeals.

It is not by home remedies, massage, cosmetics or paints that a woman may hope to retain the complexion of Youth. Science has shown the perfect way through Mineralava.

Miss Marion Davies herself says:

"I have found Mineralava Beauty Clay a most successful invigorator and stimulant for the skin; the perfect way to a perfect complexion."

Discovered 23 years ago as a product of the laboratories of Nature, Mineralava has been refined by the most noted chemists of Europe and America who have added to it medical ingredients which have given it healing and cleansing properties never equalled.

Sir Erasmus Wilson, M.D., F.R.S., the noted English Skin Specialist, showed that of the two layers of the human skin, the Epidermis and the Dermis, the outer one was constantly flaking and falling away. This made it clear that only a product of Nature like Mineralava that aided in the process of building up, nourishing and making pure the under skin, would result in the perfect complexion.

Mineralava makes the skin well nourished, and a well nourished skin never ages. Lines, and wrinkles, sagging muscles, oily and dry skin, sallowness, enlarged pores, coarse texture, blackheads—all are due to "Skin-Malnutrition."

Mineralava is the one perfect specific for "Skin-Malnutrition!" It not only corrects the facial blemishes you can see, it works constantly and invisibly on the tender under skin, nourishing it to a ripe and lovely texture so that it is ready, as the old skin flakes away, to take its place—new born and beautiful.

Such noted beauties of the Stage and Screen as Marion Davies, Billie Burke, Marjorie Rambeau, Julia Sanderson, Zitelka Dolores, and others, as well as thousands of happy American home women have gladly testified to the permanent qualities of Mineralava. Originally Mineralava was sold only in Beauty Parlors at as high as $15 a treatment. Today it is within the reach of every woman at $2.00 a bottle, each bottle containing eighteen treatments, or a trifle more than 10 cents a treatment. Full directions for treatment and a soft brush for applying with every bottle.

There is also an Introductory Trial Tube of Mineralava at 50c.

MINERALAVA—makes Blemished Skin Perfect!

MINERALAVA—corrects all forms of Skin-Malnutrition!

Henry, very loth, said I had spoken of riding on a broomstick through the air, above the clouds, on the road to the moon. He said that I laughed as if to show it were a jesting manner of speech.

"But laughter on such a subject!" cried the Judge. "Such laughter would be sinful in itself." Frowning upon Henry, he said: "Did the prisoner in any way bewitch you?"

Henry avowed that the prisoner, mayhap without any intention on her part, but by her seemliness and her singing and such enchantments had bewitched him. He would not look at me, but as he left the platform he turned and his eyes unwilling rose to mine. At that upon a sudden he would have fallen had not one caught him by the arm. A voice called out, "See what the witch hath done!" Then through a pushing crowd I was led back to gaol.

Now it is to say good night, beloved cousin. Sorrow not for me, for my deliverance is at hand. The light is all about me. Who am I to weep when One wore a crown of thorns?

I send you the paper they have just given me:

The Jurors, for our sovereign Lord and Lady, the King and Queen, present, that Mary Newton, spinster, daughter of Sir John Newton and Lady Elizabeth Newton, the tenth day of August, in the fourth year of the reign of William and Mary, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, King and Queen, defenders of the Faith, is convicted of practicing disreputable arts called witchcraft and sorceries. These she hath feloniously practiced, and exercised within the Township of Salem, within the County of Essex, against one Maria Guilford, Widow of Elias Guilford, deceased, and against her innocent children. These said children have been tormented and consumed and wasted by the Devil, employed by the said Mary Newton. She hath worked evil against the peace of our sovereign Lord King and his crown and his dignity, and of this she is found guilty and must suffer the penalty, for the wages of sin is death.

A second indictment charges Mary Newton with practicing arts on Humility Cravens (the chief witness in the trial), and upon Henry Bradstreet, to whom the prisoner confessed to flying over the graveyards on moonless nights. The prisoner was heard chanting unholy songs to the birds, who, bewitched, flew to her, carrying messages to the Devil. She recited incantations over the flowers to make them grow. The prisoner was seen practicing black magic, distilling sweet waters to bewitch the sick. To all of these acts testifieth Humility Cravens, Mary Wolcott, Jonathan Chilburn, Ann Woodruff.

Matthew Littlefield deposed that he was about to enter her window when an apparition so startled him that he fell to the ground and was henceforward made a cripple.

For these and for many like incidents is Mary Newton condemned to death by fire on Salem Hill, August twenty-ninth.

[Letters from Mistress Winslow, in Salem, to Elizabeth Baldwin, in London Town]

Most Honored Lady, Mistress Elizabeth Baldwin:

I was advised by Mary Newton to indite a letter to you, to convey to you her love for your friendship and affection.

These be troublesome times, full of sorrow and lamentations. My desire is to inform you of the Christian bearing and great fortitude of Mary Newton. Her prayers were for those who persecuted her. She was unafraid and inspired by the Divine Light that lighteneth everyone who cometh into the world.

The Governor tried to defer the trial, even to alter the sentence, which so incensed Mr. Hathorne and Judge Corwin they were like to accuse the Governor himself of being a victim to her bewitchment. On the morning of the execution I hastened to the gaol, for, being Governor Bradstreet's sister, I was granted entrance. I brought a parcel from her strong box in my house, for which Mary Newton had asked me.

I found her in deep meditation and prayer. At length, awakening to my presence, she asked,

"Do you hear horses galloping on, on—a tall man, wearing a red cloak, riding a great white horse?"

I bethought me of the legend, that an angel will come disguised as a man, riding a white horse, to rescue the innocent who is wrongfully accused. Believing this was in her mind, I answered, "I pray the angel comes in time."

"Do you hear aught from my brother?" she questioned me. "Will he come too late?"

I had informed her that messengers had been sent for and were searching for her brother, but without avail. I arrayed her in the embroidered muslin gown I had brought, with a faded red rose pinned on her heart. Her beauteous hair I combed and it fell in waves and floated about her as a mantel of pure gold.

On the hill a great crowd had assembled, some in pity, some in curiosity, and a few to see a high-born lady die. When Mary Newton appeared a hush fell upon them. She seemed a visitant from another world. She came steadily up the hill. Many were cowed and ashamed and turned away, but Mary Newton was oblivious to all the world. She wore a faint smile, the smile of a bride on her way to the altar, where waited the best beloved. A child cried out, "An angel is passing by!" Another gave her a lily.

At last she came to where the faggots were piled high, and the three judges stood before her there.

"Mary Newton," Judge Corwin said, "you will have a reprieve if you confess your sins, renounce the black art and your league with the Devil. Do you confess that you are a witch and have employed the Devil to torment and to engage in abominable cruelties on men, women and children?"

With a clear, high voice Mary Newton responded:

"I do not confess to an untruth. For my life's sake I will not lie, but rather die, praising God that I have lived." And so passed Mary Newton up the hill.

Fain would I have closed mine eyes to the sight before me, but so hot in haste to finish this crime were the men whose office it was to bind her to the stake, and the deed was so speedily completed, I could not look away. The silent multitude, so absorbed were they that only when the smoke of the faggots curled slowly into the air did they hear a bugle blow thrice.

On the farthermost hill a shouting and tramping of horses was, and a great cloud of dust, like a cloud from the sky, rose from over the hill. Above where stood Mary Newton came a man in a scarlet cloak, riding a white horse, followed by other men and horses, coming on the people, and the people shouting and fearfully afraid. Humility Cravens I saw deadly distraught and prone upon the ground, but I had eyes for only one, the great man in the scarlet cloak, who rode fearlessly to the faggots, to Mary Newton, where she stood smiling. With a stroke of his sword he severed the bonds that held her, and no one stayed his hand. I heard her say:

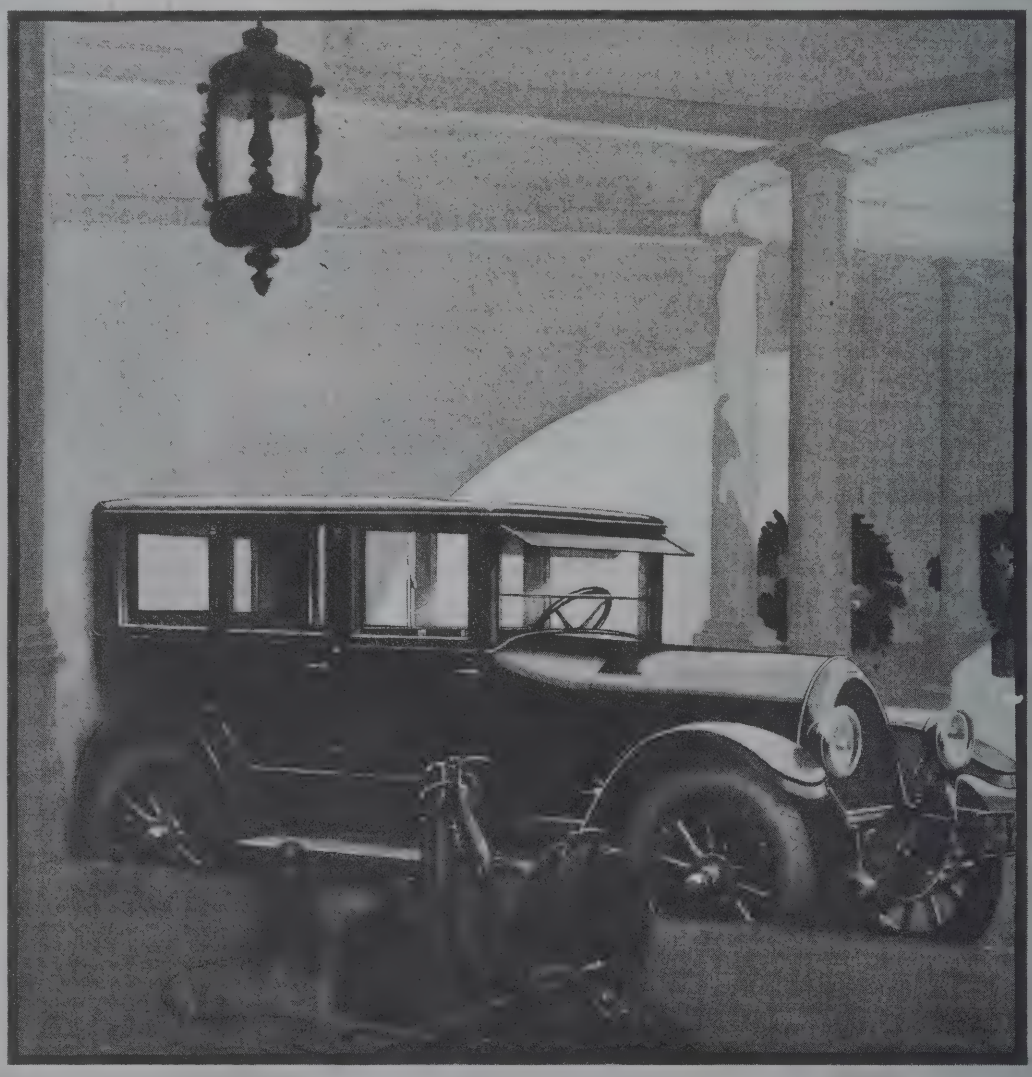
"John, beloved—have I died and gone to Heaven?"

He lifted her on high, bearing her untouched through the multitude. And so they rode away, her bright hair floating over the scarlet cloak. A bugle sounded, the horses and riders clattered and plunged after them—and all were lost to view. A cloud seemed to take them up into the sky.

Had I not seen the haggard face of Walter Newton, Mary's brother, among the first of the horsemen, I too would have shared the common belief that the legend had come true, that an angel arrayed as a man, in a scarlet cloak, and riding a white horse, had come to save her and to declare her innocence; and mayhap it was true. Who am I to contend against miracles?

A little afterward Humility Cravens cried that it was Beelzebub and all of his legions, but the multitude would have none of this. They had seen Mary Newton with the lily in her hand vanishing into the clouds as she rode beside the man with the scarlet cloak.

The flame rose high, lighted on Witches' Hill, but no victim cried out, no witch was burned, then or ever after. Thus fire purified and burned away all horrors and beliefs.



The doors of the gaols were torn down by the multitude that night. The Governor dealt sternly with all accusers, and forever the picture of Mary Newton rises in the memory of the people as she stood on the faggots, smiling on a cruel world, with faith in the deliverance which came, and praising God.

And I too give praise. His miracles endure forever.

I have the honor, dear madam, to inscribe myself,

A Clear Conscience

by S. E. KISER

I SAW a woman who had dared to think—
One who had ventured over some frontiers
From which the prudish and the timid shrink—
Make room for children old beyond their years.
I heard her say: "I'm glad I am not one
Who lives in ease because their cheeks are thin;
I wear no gems because of tasks they've done;
Thank God, I need not answer for that sin!"

I STOOD beside her where the crowds went past,
And heard her say: "I'm glad it was not I
Who rushed to spread the scandal which, at last,
Has crushed the shabby woman passing by.
They may be just—the frowning friends she had—
Who turn their hostile backs or step aside;
She may deserve their scorn, but I am glad
No word of mine has helped to kill her pride.

"I'M glad that I am not the one for whom
The man long trusted has betrayed his trust;
Upon the one who coaxed him to his doom
New joys and later favors may be thrust.
Her dreams may never be disturbed; his name
Perhaps has faded wholly from her thought,
But I am glad that I am not to blame
For bringing his old mother's hopes to naught.

"WHERE lately faith was deep faith dwells no more;
One who was not too wise to be deceived
Sits where the shadows creep across the floor,
And mourns a loss that cannot be retrieved.
Those who have brought the woeful change about
May think they did their duty and no less;
Thank God it was not I who found him out
And brought the news that wrecked her happiness!"

The Hope of Happiness

BRUCE STORRS stood up tall and straight on a prostrate sycamore, the sunlight gleaming upon his lithe, vigorous body, and with a quick, assured lifting of his arms plunged into the cool depths of the river. He rose and swam with long, confident strokes the length of a pool formed by the curving banks and returned to the log, climbing up with the same ease and grace that marked his swimming. He dashed the water from his eyes and pressed his hands backward over his shapely head. The deep tan of his face and throat and hands only emphasized the whiteness of his flesh. It was evident that he was the fortunate inheritor of clean blood in a perfectly fashioned body; that he had used himself well in his twenty-eight years and that he found satisfaction and pride in his health and strength. He surveyed the narrow valley through which the river idled and eddied before rushing into the broader channel beyond—surveyed it with something of the air of a discoverer who has found and appropriated to his own uses a new corner of the world.

It was a good place to be at the end of a day that was typical of late August in the corn belt, a day of intense dry heat with faint intimations on the horizon of the approach of autumn. With a contented sigh he sat down on the log, his feet drawn up, his shoulders bent, and aimlessly tore bits of bark from the log and tossed them into the water. Lulled by the lazy ripple, he yielded himself to revery and his eyes filled with dreams as he stared unseeingly across the stream. Suddenly he raised his head resolutely as though his thoughts had returned to the world of the actual and he had reached a conclusion of high importance. He plunged again and now his short, rapid strokes threshed the water into foam. One might have thought that in the assertion of his physical strength he was testing and reassuring himself of his complete self-mastery and buoyancy of spirit.

Refreshed and invigorated, he clambered up the bank and sought a great beech by whose pillar-like trunk he had left his belongings and proceeded to dress. From a flat canvas bag he produced a towel and a variety of toilet articles. He combed his thick, curly hair, donned a flannel shirt and knotted a blue scarf under its soft collar. His shoes of brogan type bore the imprint of a metropolitan maker and his gray knickerbockers and jacket indicated a capable tailor.

He took from the bag a package of letters addressed in a woman's hand to Bruce Storrs, and making himself comfortable with his back to the tree he began to read. The letters had been subjected to many readings as their worn appearance testified, but selecting the bulkiest he perused it carefully as though wishing to make sure that its phrases were firmly fixed in his memory.

". . . Since my talk with you," he read, "I have had less pain but the improvement is only temporary—the doctors do not deceive me as to that. I may go quickly—any day, any hour. You heard my story the other night—generously,

Bruce felt in Millicent a quality that seemed to translate her to remote and shadowy times.

"I can manage now," said Millicent, and drew her arm about the passive Leila. Bruce felt that she was paying with a fine tolerance, as I knew you would. If I had not been so satisfied of your sense of justice and so sure of your love I could never have told you. But from the hour I knew that my life was nearing its end I felt more and more that you must know. One or two things I'm afraid I didn't make clear . . . that I loved the man who is your father. Love alone could be my justification—without that I could never have lived through these years.

"The man you have called father never suspected the truth. He trusted me. It has been part of my punishment that through all these years I have had to endure the constant manifestations of his love and confidence. But for that one lapse in the second year of my marriage, I was absolutely faithful in all my obligations to him. And he was kind to you and proud of you. He did all for you that a father could, never dreaming that you were not his own. It was one of my sorrows that I couldn't give him a child of his own. Things went badly with him in his last years, as you know, and what I leave to you—it will be about fifty thousand dollars—I inherited from my father and it will help you find your place in the world.

"Your father has no idea of your existence . . . Ours was a midsummer madness, at a time when we were both young. I only knew him a little while, and I have never heard from him; but in one way or another I have known something of his life. That wild, mad love I had for him never wholly died. Please, dear, don't think harshly of me, but there have been times when I would have given my life for a sight of him. After all—you are his—his as much as mine. You came to me from him—strangely dear and beautiful. In my mind you have always been his, and I loved you the dearer. I loved him, but I could not bring myself to leave the man you have called father for him. He was not the kind of man women run away with . . .

"When I'm gone I want you to put yourself near him—learn to know him, if that should be possible. I am trusting you; you would never, I know, do him an injury. Some day he may need you. Remember, he does not know—it may be he need never know. But, oh, be kind to him . . ."

He stared at the words. Had it been one of those unaccountable affairs—he had heard of such—where a gently reared woman falls prey to a coarse fibered man in every way her inferior? The man might be common, low, ignorant and cruel. Bruce had been proud of his ancestry. The Storrs were of old American stock and his mother's family, the Bruces, had been the foremost people in their county for nearly a century. He had taken a pardonable pride in his background . . . That night when he had stumbled out of the house after hearing his mother's confession he had felt the old friendly world recede. The letters, him the compliment of assuming that he was a gentleman who would go his way and forget the whole affair.

sealed and entrusted to the family physician for delivery at her death, merely repeated what she had told him.

In his constant rereadings he had hoped that one day he would find that he had misinterpreted the message. But today he knew the folly of this; the disclosure took its place in his mind among the unalterable facts of his life. At first he had thought of destroying himself; but he was too sane and the hope of life was too strong for such a solution of his problem. And there had been offers—advantageous ones—to go to New York and Boston. He convinced himself that his mother could not seriously have meant to limit the range of his opportunities by sending him to the city where his unknown father lived. But he was resolved now not to shirk; he would do her bidding. There was a strain of superstition in him: he might invite misfortune by disregarding her plea; and moreover he had the pride and courage of youth. No one knew, no one need ever know! He had escaped from the feeling, at first poignant, that shame attached to him; that he must slink through life under the eyes of a scornful world. No; he had mastered that; his pride rallied him as with the sound of trumpets to make something fine of his life.

Life had been very pleasant in the little Ohio town where John Storrs had been a lawyer of average attainments—in no way brilliant but highly respected for his probity and enjoying for years a fair practice. Bruce had cousins of his own age, cheery, wholesome contemporaries with whom he had chummed from childhood. The Storrs, like the Bruces, his mother's people, were of a type familiar in Mid-western county seats, kindly, optimistic, well-to-do folk, but not too contented or self-satisfied not to be keenly alive to the stir and movement of the larger world.

The old house, built in the 'forties by John Storrs's grandfather, had become suddenly to Bruce a strange and alien place that denied his right of occupancy. The elms in the yard seemed to mock him, whispering "You don't belong here!" and as quickly as possible he had closed the house, made excuses to his relatives, given a power of attorney to the president of the local bank, an old friend, to act for him in all matters and announced that he'd look about a bit and take a vacation before settling down to his profession. In his restlessness and uncertainty he wished to avoid people, weary himself by day, and at night fling himself upon the kindly earth that belonged to no man.

This was all past now and he had arrived, it seemed inevitably, in the town where his father lived.

The beauty of the declining day stirred longings and aspirations, definite and clear, in his mind and heart. His debt to his mother was enormous. He remembered now her happiness at the first manifestation of his interest in form, color and harmony; her hand guiding his when he first began to draw; her delight in his first experiment with a box of colors, given him on one of his birthdays. Yes; he should be a painter; that came first; then his aptitude in modeling made it plain that sculpture was to be his true vocation. To be a creator of beautiful things!—here, she had urged, lay the surest hope of happiness.

Very precious were all these memories; they brought a wistful smile to his face. She had always seemed to him curiously innocent, with the innocence of light-hearted childhood. To think of her as carrying a stain through her life was abhorrent. Hers was the blithest, cheeriest spirit he had known. The things she had taught him to reverence were a testimony to her innate fineness; she had denied herself for him, jealously guarding her patrimony that it might pass to him intact. The manly part for him was to live in the light of the ideals she had set for him. Pity and love for one who had been so sensitive to beauty in all its forms touched him now; brought a sob to his throat. He found a comfort in the thought that her confession might be attributable to a hope that in his life hers might be expiated . . .

He took up the letters and turned them over again for the last time, his eyes caught and held now and then by some phrase. He held the sheets against his face for a moment, then slowly tore them into strips, added the worn envelopes and burned them. Not content with this, he trampled the charred fragments into the sandy turf.

The sun, a huge brazen ball, was low in the west when he set off along the river with confident, springy step. He stopped at a farmhouse and asked for supper. The evening meal was over, the farmer's wife explained; but she produced a pitcher of milk and a plate of corn bread. Her husband appeared, and instantly prejudiced by the knickerbockers doggedly quizzed the stranger as to the nature and direction of his journey.

Storrs was a new species, not to be confused with the ordinary tramp who demands food at farmhouses, and suddenly contrite that the repast she was providing was so meager the woman rose and disappeared into the kitchen, returning with a huge piece of spice cake and a dish of sliced peaches. She was taken aback when he rose deferentially to accept the offering but her tired face relaxed in a smile at his cordial expressions of gratitude. She joined her husband on the stoop, finding the handsome pilgrim's visit a welcome break in the monotonous day. As he ate he answered their questions unhurriedly. The range of his wanderings mystified her; in her eyes he was a young Ulysses, all the more fascinating because her imagination was unequal to the task of explaining the long journeys afoot he was describing quite casually as though they were nothing remarkable.

"I guess the war left a lot o' you boys restless," she suggested.

"Oh, it wasn't the war that made a rover of me!" he replied with a smile. "It was this way with me. When I got home I found I had something to think out—something I had to get used to"—he frowned and became silent for a moment—"so I decided I could do it better by tramping. But I've settled things in my own mind pretty well now," he ended, half to himself, and smiled, unaware that he had only added to their mystification.

"Yes?" The woman's tone was almost eager. She was curious as to the real reason for his wanderings and what it was that he had settled. In the luminous twilight her dull imagination quickened to a sense of something romantic in this stranger, and she was disappointed when he told of a winter spent in various industrial centers; of an experience as a laborer in a great steel mill, just to see what it was like, he said—a fortnight in New York and a more recent tramp through the Valley of Virginia.

"I reckon you don't have to work?" the farmer asked, baffled in his attempts to account for a young man who strolled over the country so aimlessly, wearing what struck him as an outlandish garb.

"Oh, but I do! I've done considerable work as I've sauntered around. I'm an architect—or hope to be! I've earned my keep as I've traveled by getting jobs as a draughtsman."

"Going to stop in the city?" the woman inquired.

"Yes," Bruce replied, following the direction of her glance.

"You know folks there?" she persisted. "I guess it's hard getting started if you ain't got friends."

"There's a chap living there I knew in college; that's all. But when you strike a strange town where you don't know anyone the only thing to do is to buckle in and make them want to know you!"

"I guess you can do that," she remarked with shy admiration.

The farmer shuffled his feet on the brick walk. For all he knew the young stranger might be a burglar. He resented his wife's tone of friendliness and resolved to deny the request if the young man asked the privilege of sleeping in the barn; but the stranger not only failed to ask for lodging but produced a dollar bill from his pocket and insisted that the woman accept it. This transaction served instantly to dispel the farmer's suspicions. He answered with unnecessary detail Bruce's questions as to the shortest way to town, and walked with him to a lane that ran along the edge of a cornfield and afforded a short cut to the highway.

Bruce had expected to reach the city before nightfall but already the twilight was deepening and the first stars glimmered in the pale sky. Now that he was near the end of his self-imposed wanderings he experienced a sense of elation. The unhappy thoughts with which he had left his Ohio home a little more than a year earlier had gradually become dim in his memory. The letters he had burned at the riverside really marked in his consciousness a dispersion of doubts and questions that left his spirit free. His mother's revelation had greatly shaken him; but she need never have told him; and it spoke for her courage and her faith in him that she had confessed the truth. They had been companions in an unusual sense. From his earliest youth she had interested him in the things that had been her delight—books, music, pictures. She was herself an accomplished musician and strains of old melodies she had taught him recurred to him now—helped him to visualize her in the comfortable home in the little town where he was born—its tasteful furnishings, its garden and countless other manifestations of her cultivated taste.

As he swung along the road with the cool breeze blowing upon him from fields of tall ripening corn there was no bitterness in his soul. He had beaten down the bitter thought that had assailed him in the early days of his journeying—the sense that a stigma attached to him, not the less hateful because he alone had knowledge of it, the feeling that there was something fantastic in the idea that he should put himself where, in any need, he could serve the father he had never known.

This had now all the sanctity of a commission from the dead. He speculated as to what manner of man this could be who had awakened so deep a love in the heart of the good woman he knew his mother to have been—a love which she had carried in her heart to her last hours. In his long ponderings he had, he felt, come to understand her better than he ever had in her lifetime—her imaginative and romantic side, her swiftly changing moods, her innumerable small talents that had now a charm and a pathos in the retrospect. Age had never, to his eyes, laid hands upon her. Even through the last long illness she had retained the look and the spirit of youth.

Rounding a bend in the river the flare of an amusement park apprised him that he was close upon the city—a city he had heretofore never visited and knew of only from his newspaper reading as a prosperous industrial center. Here, for the strangest reason in the world, he was to make his home, perhaps spend the remainder of his days! He crossed a stone bridge with a sense that the act marked an important transition in his life, and after passing through the noisy aisles of the park boarded a trolley car and rode into town.

He had formed a very clear idea of what he meant to do, and arriving at the business center he went directly to the Hotel Fordham to which he had expressed his trunk from Cincinnati.

THE pencil with which Bruce was idly scribbling on a sheet of hotel paper traced his name unconsciously.

Bruce Storrs

It was not his name; he had no honest right to it. He had speculated many times in his wanderings as to whether he shouldn't change it but this would lead to endless embarrassments. Now, with his thoughts crystallized by the knowledge that this other man who had been his mother's lover was within reach, he experienced a strong sense of loyalty to the memory of the man he had called father. It would be a contemptible thing to abandon the name of one who had shown him so tender an affection and understood so perfectly his needs and aims . . .

Somewhere among the several hundred thousand people of the city about him was the man his mother had described. In the quiet room he experienced suddenly a feeling of loneliness. Usually in his wanderings he had stopped at cheap lodging houses and the very comfort of his surroundings now added to his feeling of strangeness in having at last arrived at a goal which marked not merely the end of his physical wandering but the termination of a struggle with his own spirit. He sent down for the evening papers and found himself scanning carefully the local news, thinking that he might find some clue to the activities of Franklin Mills. He wondered whether he could be growing morbid about the thing. When he burned his mother's letters beside the river that afternoon he had been satisfied of the serenity of his own mind; and now he was hating himself for his weakness.

His attention was caught by the caption, "Franklin Mills Sells Site of Old Homestead to Trust Company." The name fell like a blow upon his consciousness. He seized the telephone book and hurriedly turned the pages.

Mills Franklin Jefferson Ave.....Saybrook 1322
Mills Franklin First Ntl Bnk Bldg.....Main 2222

He stared at the two lines till they were a blur before his eyes. There was but one man of the name in the directory; there could be no mistake as to his identity.

It was a disconcerting thought that by calling these numbers he might at any time hear Franklin Mills's voice. The idea both fascinated and repelled him. What, after all, had he to do with Franklin Mills! Nothing, but for the plea of the woman this man had wronged back yonder in a past all but covered by the waters of oblivion.

He turned to the newspaper and reread the item about the real estate transaction, then opened to the personal and society page, where he found this item:

> Miss Leila Mills of Jefferson Avenue gave a luncheon yesterday at the Faraway Country Club for her house guest, Miss Helene Ridgeway of Cincinnati. The decorations were purple asters and pink roses.

Helene Ridgeway he knew; she had been the college chum of one of his gay cousins. He had not realized the strain he had undergone in the past year till he saw the familiar name of the girl. The nightmare pictures he had conjured up faded; whatever Mills might be he was at least a reputable citizen and that was something to be thankful for; and obviously he was not poor and helpless.

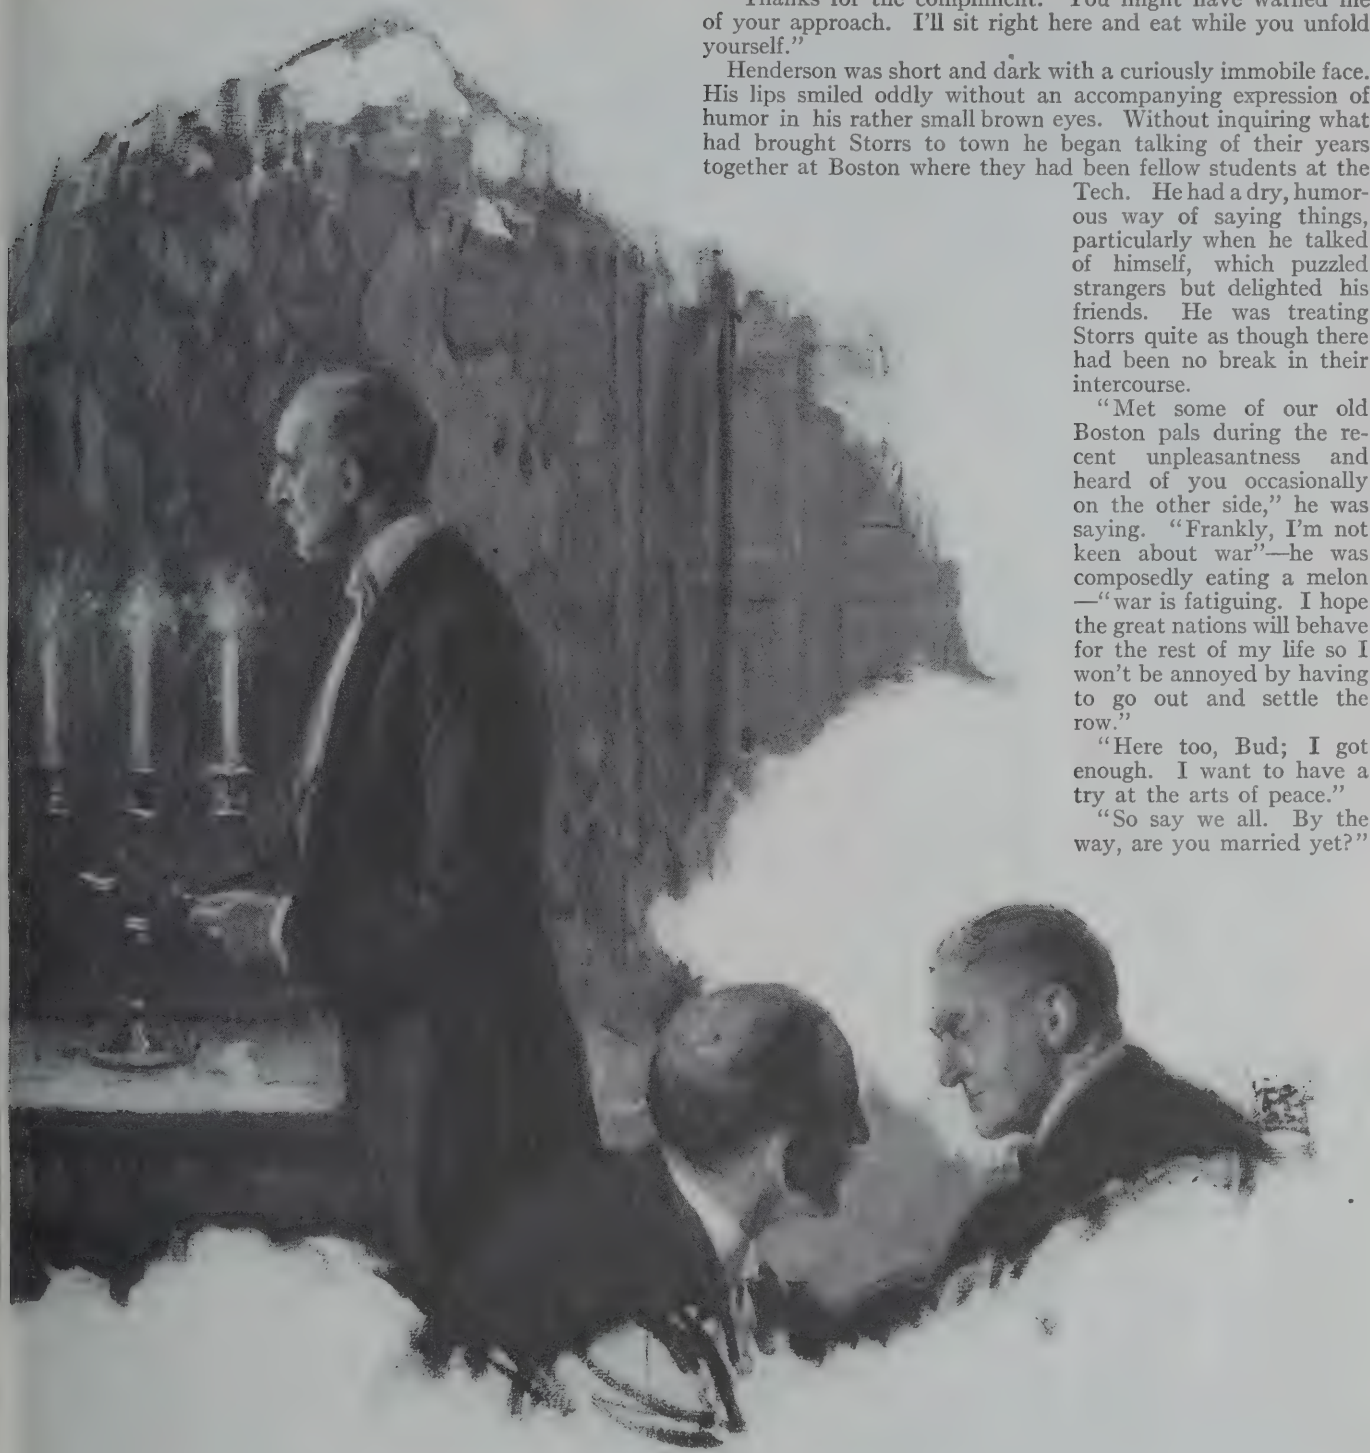
The Leila referred to must be his daughter and the same blood ran in her veins as in his own . . . He flung the paper away; touched his forehead, found it covered with perspiration. He paced the floor till he had quieted himself, paused at the window, finding relief in the lights and sounds of the street, the bells and whistles of trains at the railway station somewhere in the distance. He was quite sane, he assured himself. The world surged round him, indifferent to his hopes and aims and fears. He might, he reasoned, dismiss his mother's story from his mind as untrue—the fabrication of a sick woman's mind. He must keep tight hold of himself . . .



His mother had urged him to think kindly of Franklin Mills; and yet, now that the man was within reach, a contempt that bordered upon hatred filled his heart. For his mother his love turned for the moment to pity. It was an astounding thing, this dark page of her life carried all those years in her heart. He recalled the look she had bent upon him at times when he and his putative father had talked happily together. John Storrs had lavished an unusual devotion upon his wife to the end of his life. The wrong done him seemed monstrous as Bruce thought of it, remembering Storrs's pride in him, the sympathetic interest he had taken in his education, the emotion with which they had parted when Bruce went away to war. There was a vast pathos in all this—in the very ignorance of his wife's infidelity that John Storrs had carried to his grave.

"Mr. Mills," said Millicent, "let me present Mr. Storrs." Guardedly Bruce studied the man who was his father.

CHAPTER II

AWAKE early, Bruce donned a gray business suit and went down to breakfast. His immediate concern was to find employment; for in work, he knew, lay his hope of happiness and peace. He had thrust into his pocket letters from architects who had employed him in various cities commending him as an excellent draughtsman; and he bore a letter certifying to his good character and trustworthiness from the president of the bank in his native town. He was not pressed by immediate need. His travels had been inexpensive; in fact he had a little more than earned his way; and he had not only the fifty thousand dollars his mother had left invested in securities but he carried drafts for the accumulated income—something over a thousand dollars—to tide him over any possible difficulties in finding an opening that promised well for the future. He had finished his breakfast and lingered, deep in thought, when a young man who had just entered the dining room paused beside him.

"Is it or is it not Bruce Storrs?" he demanded. "I spotted you from the door—didn't think there could be another such head and shoulders."

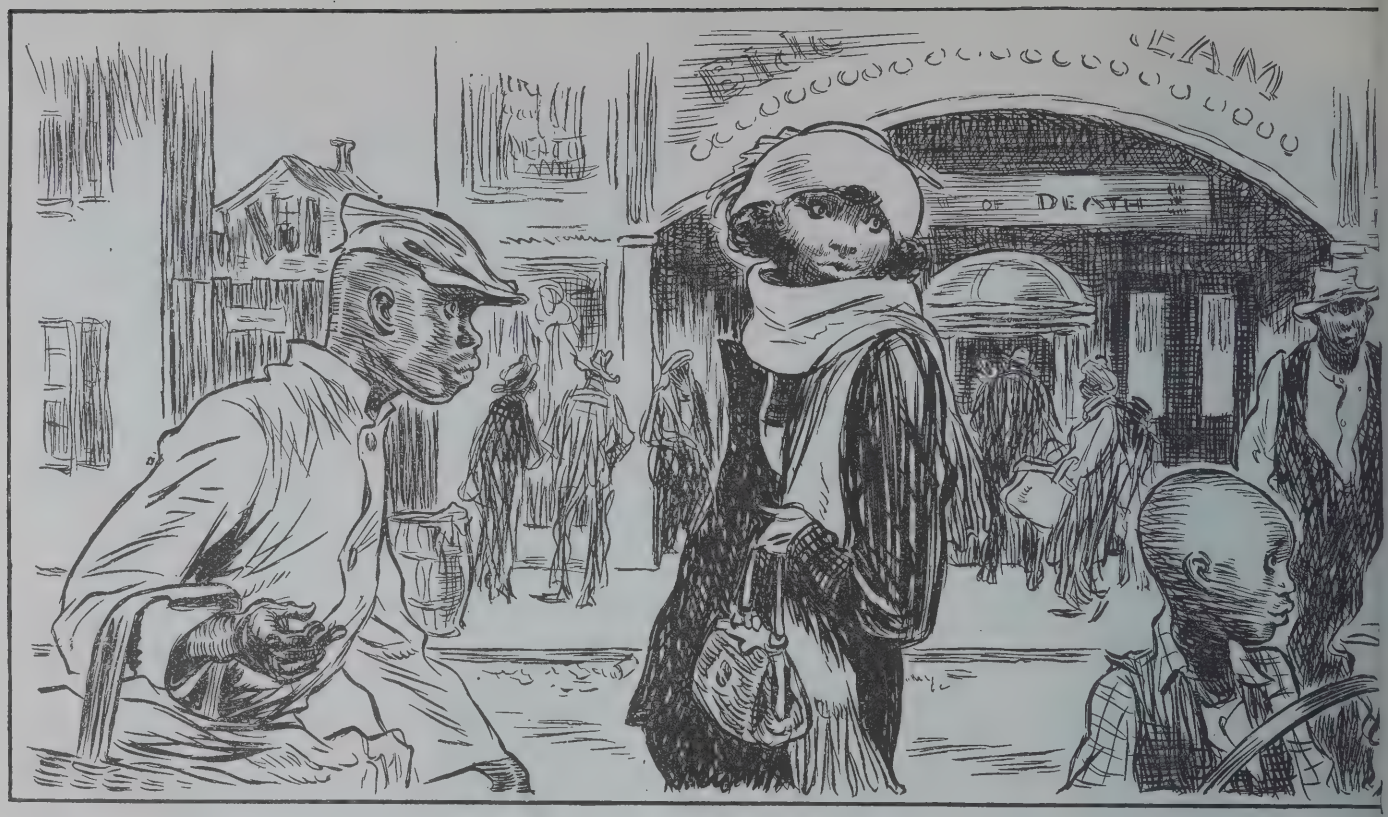
"Bud Henderson!"

Storrs was on his feet, wringing the hand of the young man, who was regarding him with a pleased grin.

"You good old Indian! I was just about to go out and ask the nearest cop where to find you! You're the only man I know in town!"

"Thanks for the compliment. You might have warned me of your approach. I'll sit right here and eat while you unfold yourself."

Henderson was short and dark with a curiously immobile face. His lips smiled oddly without an accompanying expression of humor in his rather small brown eyes. Without inquiring what had brought Storrs to town he began talking of their years together at Boston where they had been fellow students at the Tech. He had a dry, humorous way of saying things, particularly when he talked of himself, which puzzled strangers but delighted his friends. He was treating Storrs quite as though there had been no break in their intercourse.



"Met some of our old Boston pals during the recent unpleasantness and heard of you occasionally on the other side," he was saying. "Frankly, I'm not keen about war"—he was composedly eating a melon—"war is fatiguing. I hope the great nations will behave for the rest of my life so I won't be annoyed by having to go out and settle the row."

"Here too, Bud; I got enough. I want to have a try at the arts of peace."

"So say we all. By the way, are you married yet?"

"No."

"That's bad. Marriage is an honorable estate; I'm rather keen about it. I took me a wife as soon as I got back from France. Oh Lord, no! None of the girls we knew around Boston. Couldn't afford them and besides it's a mistake not to marry in your home town and it's also easier when you're a bloomin' pauper. I married into one of the strongest wholesale grocery houses in all these parts. I'll drive you by the warehouse; an impressive pile—one of the biggest concerns west of Pittsburgh. Maybelle is the only child of the Conrad of Conrad, Buxton and Pettibone. A wonderful girl, Maybelle—one of the really strong, powerful women of this great nation. She's out of town at present playing a golf tournament for the huckleberry association championship. That's why I'm chasing downtown for breakfast—cook's on a vacation. You'll meet Maybelle; she's a person, that girl! Married me (Continued on page 163)

BEFORE continuing the speaker looked about him to make sure the rest of the group suitably were impressed. They were, and he did:

"Yas suzz, tha's the way it is wid me. W'en I starts gittin' bad I gits so bad my muscles all bind on me an' I has crampin' pains frum haid to foot. Tha's only jest the beginnin'. W'en I gits mad clear th'ough, it's time to pack the wimmin an' chillen to a place of safety an' remove the weakin's, the cripples an' the sickly ones to the cyclome cellar. 'Count of that, is w'y they calls me Wild Bill, the Human Harrycane.

"I reckin it muster been travelin' wid the circus, playin' alto cornet in the Genuwine Zulu Band, w'ich has made me so rough that-a-way.

"Circusses ain't no place fur people wid weak hearts. Prob'ly"—his eye swept the ring of properly awed faces that encircled him—"prob'ly they ain't none of you niggers present w'ich could last one season out wid a circus; but me, I stayed on goin' on nine yeahs. An' went stronger all the time!

"Tek that time in Springfield, Ohio, w'en the bigges' elephint, name of Emily, went rampagious by reason of somebody havin' give her a bottle of pepper-sauce an' her thinkin' 'twas red pop till too late fur her to change her mind 'bout drinkin' it. A elephint 'bout the size of a steam calliope that's burnin' up insides of her wid some new kind of a hell-fire w'ich water won't squench is a powerful onhealthy pusson to prank wid, I'll tell the waitin' world!

"Well, fust they gits the menagerie top cleared out an' 'en they reclaims the w'ite man that'd give her the stuff out frum under the sea-lionses' tank; w'ich they called him a practical joker in the paper next mawnin' but he suttinly wuzn't very practical lookin' w'en they wuz totin' him off to the city horspital wid one laig kind of flappin', an' him talkin' delirious. An' 'en they gits Emily chained up an' roped down an' the chief bull-man he starts in ca'mmin' her down wid a pitchfork.

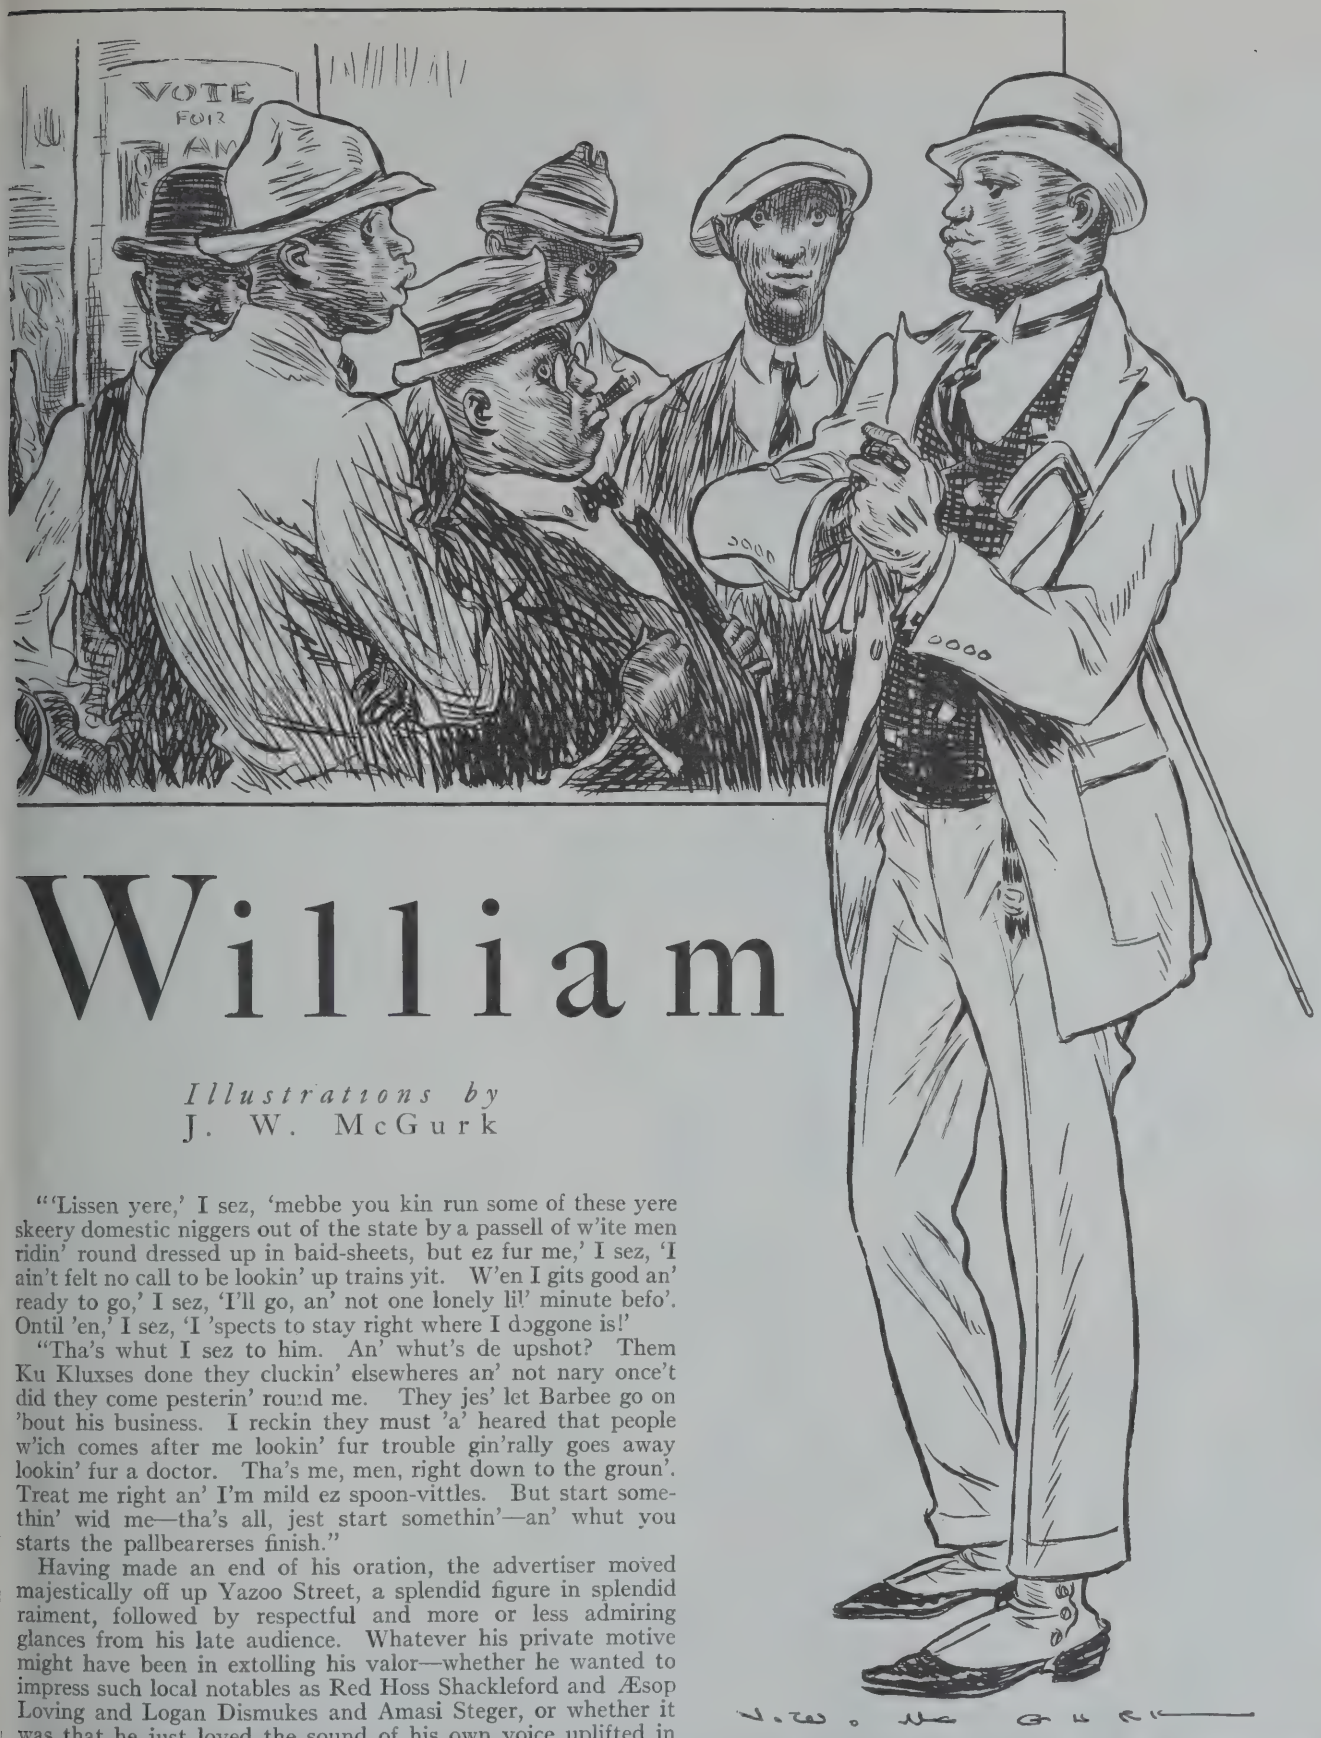
"Me, I didn't know nuthin' 'bout it, bein' downtown whilst 'twas goin' on; but w'en I gits back to the lot an' starts in th'ough the markee, one of the razorbacks he sez to me, he sez:

" 'Hole on, black boy, they's a crazy elephint in that there tent!'

"An' I sez to him: 'Saginaw,' I sez, 'it don't mek no diff'unce to me ef this yere tent is upholstered in elephints; yere's where I'm headed an' yere's where I'm goin'!'

"Excusin' of the head bull-man I wuz the onliest one w'ich went near Emily the rest of the ev'nin'. An' ef you don't believe me, all you got do is jest write to my ole boss, Mist' Peter J. Powerses, Esquire, Owner, keer of Winter Quarterses, Waterloo, Ioway, an' he'll tell you percisely the same w'ich I jest is been.

"An' 'en, tek the time yere last fall w'en I wuz stoppin' off down yonder in Texas an' the Ku Kluxses started projectin' 'round. They taken an' whupped two uppidy cullid boys, an' they toted one w'ite man off to the outskirts an' fixed him up fur the Indian summer in some tar an' some feathers an' w'en he come crawlin' back to town next mawnin' he looked like a frizzly chicken caught out in a high wind. Yas, suzz, that w'ite man wuz ever'thing a hen is, 'ceptin' he couldn't lay aigs an' didn't feel much lak cacklin'. They tells me he wuz the better part of two weeks sheddin'.



"So folkses in gin'ral and 'specially cullid folkses begins lookin' wall-eyed ever' time anybody speaks of them ole Ku Kluxses. But me, I ain't payin' 'em no mind. An' so one day a man come up to me an' he sez to me, he sez:

"'Look yere, nigger, ain't you actin' purty brash round this town fur a visitin' nigger? Next thing you knows, the Entertainment Committee goin' be waitin' on you!'

"I jest looks him in the eye an' I sez to him:

"'Is this a warnin'?'

"'Tek it or leave it be,' he sez; 'but they tells me pickin' plumages off frum betwixt yore shoulder blades ain't no easy job.'

"Tha's whut I sez to him. An' whut's de upshot? Them Ku Kluxses done they cluckin' elsewheres an' not nary once't did they come pesterin' round me. They jes' let Barbee go on 'bout his business. Treat me right an' I'm mild ez spoon-vittles. But start somethin' wid me—tha's all, jest start somethin'—an' whut you starts the pallbearerses finish."

Having made an end of his oration, the advertiser moved majestically off up Yazoo Street, a splendid figure in splendid raiment, followed by respectful and more or less admiring glances from his late audience. Whatever his private motive might have been in extolling his valor—whether he wanted to impress such local notables as Red Hoss Shackleford and Æsop Loving and Logan Dismukes and Amasi Steger, or whether it was that he just loved the sound of his own voice uplifted in self-worshiping—there was no doubt of the results in the minds of the hearers. They had harkened without interrupting, and they believed without question. For all remaining there knew the truth about this departing personage and might testify to it. They knew him for one of those rarest of created beings—a boaster who lived up, spirit and deed, to the text of his boasting. Twice already, since his recent advent, had he proved it. He had proved it on the stricken body of Smooth Crumbaugh and he had proved it in the instance of Abraham Begat Isaac Hopper.

If one wished to be technical about it, or fussy, it wasn't precisely an advent. More exactly was it in the nature of a triumphant re-entry. This fascinating and traveled bravo had been born and partly brought up in these same parts which his presence now adorned. Ten years before he had stolen away with a street carnival, an inconspicuous stripling then, and of the color of scorched molasses, giving no discernible signs of ultimate genius or future distinction. After these years he had returned in the full possession of his greatness—a gifted musician, a graceful and sinewy athlete, a conversationalist of rare powers whose favorite topic was himself, a master at retort and repartee, a metropolitan and a man of the world—yes, and, as speedily developed, a man of his word.

Almost, in his absence, he had been forgotten; the truant had become a faint, chrome-shaded memory vaguely to be recalled—if recalled at all—in connection with dazzling teeth and nimble feet and an adolescent aptitude for playing on a mouth organ. These things served to fix no identities in a town abounding in brown-skinned youths who could dance and syncopate. But it did not require of him many ways or indeed many hours after his arrival back to reimpress himself upon the residents of north Yazoo Street and Smoketown and Plunkett's Hill.

For this swift enlargement of his repute there were reasons and good reasons. To begin with, he was the dashing dark conquistador whose sketchy portrait has just been painted, in part, with the help of his own quoted language. In the second place, he was such a finished musician as the Afro-American populace of his home town never in all their lives had known. Thirdly, his wardrobe caught and held the eye. Fourthly, he wore for a handle on his name the title of Professor.

Now, music—either the love for it or the power to produce it—is supposed popularly to exert a gentling influence upon the human individual who cultivates this one of the muses; is even held to have charms to soothe the savage breast and bend a knotted oak. (See Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations," page 294, for fuller particulars.) It still is an issue in dispute whether dogs do or do not like music—their behavior when hearing it leaves one in doubt—but zoologists agree that as regards the beasts of the field and even of the wild, the softening and restraining effects are undeniable.

So, by rights of naturalistic laws, the returned one, being an accomplished instrumentalist and a composer in his own rights, should have been of gentle mold; there again he upset the averages. Here was a braggart who by his acts justified all his bragging, here a sweet minstrel, a wandering troubadour who, when crossed or irritated, swung a devastating fist. Hence, and properly hence, Wild Bill, the Human Hurricane.

As, on this day, he swaggered off through Yazoo Street with his fawn-colored derby cocked far to one side, those left behind stared at him in his retreat and for a space were mute, dominated still by the spell of his personality.

It was Æsop Loving who broke the little silence. Himself, Æsop was given to stylish adornment of the person.

"Suttinly talk biggetty, don't he?" he murmured.

"Suttinly do," agreed Amasi Steger. "An' likewise act biggetty. An' is biggetty, ef it comes down to that."

"Also is," Logan Dismukes added with unqualified sincerity. "Shorely is jest whut you jest sez, Amasi."

"Still, I've tuck notice 'at the bigger they is, the harder they falls," said Æsop. An undercurrent of jealousy, one might even say of malice, coursed beneath his words. Softly he began chanting the refrain of a song written long before by a local bard in commemoration of the crime, trial and hanging of that famous malefactor, Devil George Winston. It ran like this:

Well. fly high, ole buzzard, you bound to light some day!

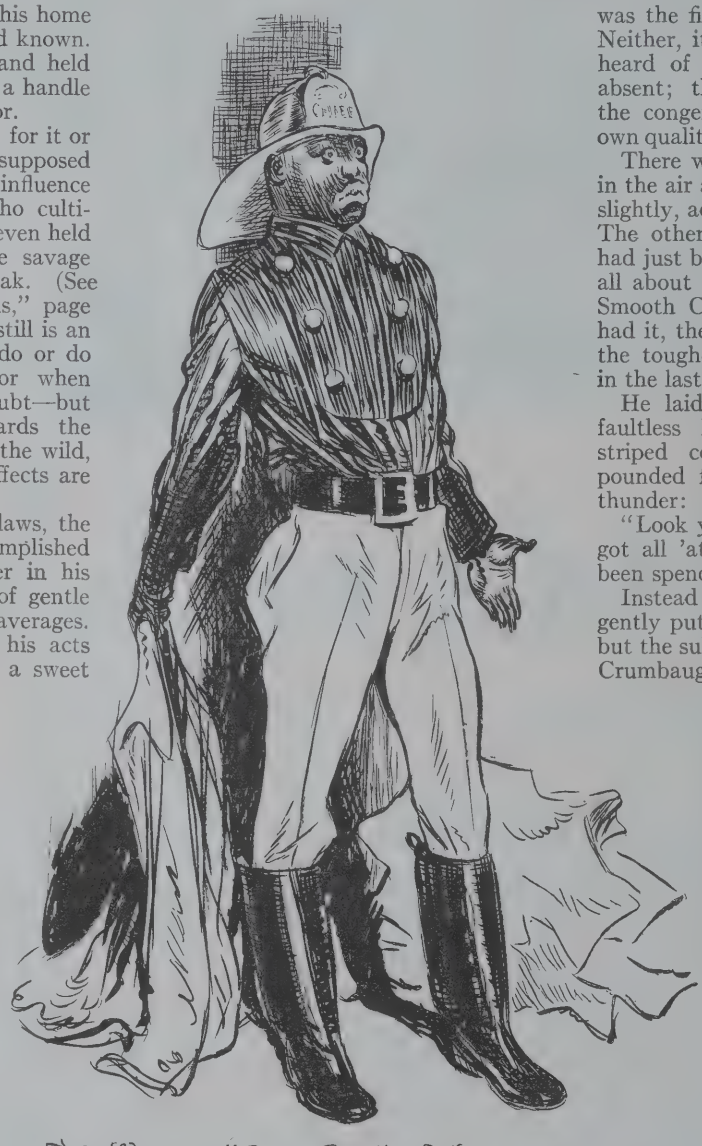
"Better tek keer 'at w'en he lights 'tain't on top of you," said Red Hoss Shackleford. "My memory ain't so pore but I still kin remember whut happen' to Smooth Crumbaugh th'other night. Talk 'bout lightnin' strikin'—um-m-ph huh!"

At this the hush redescended again upon all there. The reminiscence was fresh in their minds; it would stay fresh through the long years to come. Mentally each recreated the setting and the scene: the interior of the Bleeding Heart short-order and soft drink emporium at nighttime of the second day following Professor Barbee's arrival; Tump Glass, of the night shift, serving him and those he had invited to join him in a light snack of cold barbecued shoat; the host in the generous act of paying the total charge from a fat roll of bills; and at that precise moment the timed and dramatic entry of Smooth Crumbaugh, swaying under the influences of synthetic gin and therefore doubly dangerous.

As he came through the door his bloodshot eye had fallen upon the currency in the stranger's hand; the very sight of it seemed to inflame the desperado. It was the first meeting between these two. Neither, it would appear, previously had heard of the other. Smooth had been absent; the Professor had been busy at the congenial task of recommending his own qualities.

There was a feel of impending tragedy in the air as Smooth Crumbaugh, lurching slightly, advanced toward the new arrival. The others present shrank aside. They had just been hearing the Professor telling all about himself. But they knew about Smooth Crumbaugh. As the old saying had it, the farther you went up his street the tougher they got, and Smooth lived in the last house.

He laid a huge black paw upon the faultless lapel of the Professor's pin-striped coat, and his opening speech pounded forth from him in a menacing thunder:



"Look yere, slim nigger, how come you got all 'at money fur to spend an' ain't been spendin' none of it on me?"

Instead of answering, the other almost gently put a counter question of his own; but the subtle irony of it was over Smooth Crumbaugh's bullet head.

"Who is you, ef at all, may I ast?"

"You better ast!" Smooth's fingers closed on the garment and he jerked its wearer roughly. "I is the offerci'l bully of dis town. An' w'en a strange nigger blow in yere wid cash he gin'elly pays his life insho'ence by givin' me the mos' part of it——"

Parlor magicians have proved that the hand may be quicker than the eye. So swiftly did the Professor's right hand clump into a fist and so swiftly did the fist travel to its mark, that the spectators sensed rather than saw its upward swing. But there was no doubt about where it struck; they heard it land and, astounded, marked its effect.

——an eye-filling, soul-lifting, magnetic figure in a shiny helmet.

Say two minutes later the dethroned Smooth Crumbaugh came to. On account of his jaw he spoke what might properly be called broken English; even his words, somehow, seemed swollen and stiff and sore. From the floor where he lay the smitten one put the query almost humbly:

"Mister, who is you, anyways?"

Professor Barbee paused from blowing on a skinned knuckle. One jaunty elbow was resting on the lunch counter. He was not exalted, not noticeably ruffled. He was poised calmness itself.

"Me?" he said; "now you asts me who I is? Well, I'm goin' tell you. I is the pusson you thought you wuz w'en you come in yere."

No one who was eyewitness to this thing—and Æsop Loving had been numbered among those who did witness it—would forget it, however long he might live. Nor would Æsop cease to have vivid recollection of an occurrence of two weeks later down at the foot of Franklin Street, for likewise he had been present when this subsequent thing happened. To the envious Æsop, now trailing in second place as sartorial runner-up, it seemed the fates were decreeing that always he must be on hand when this usurping upstart scored his most brilliant triumphs.

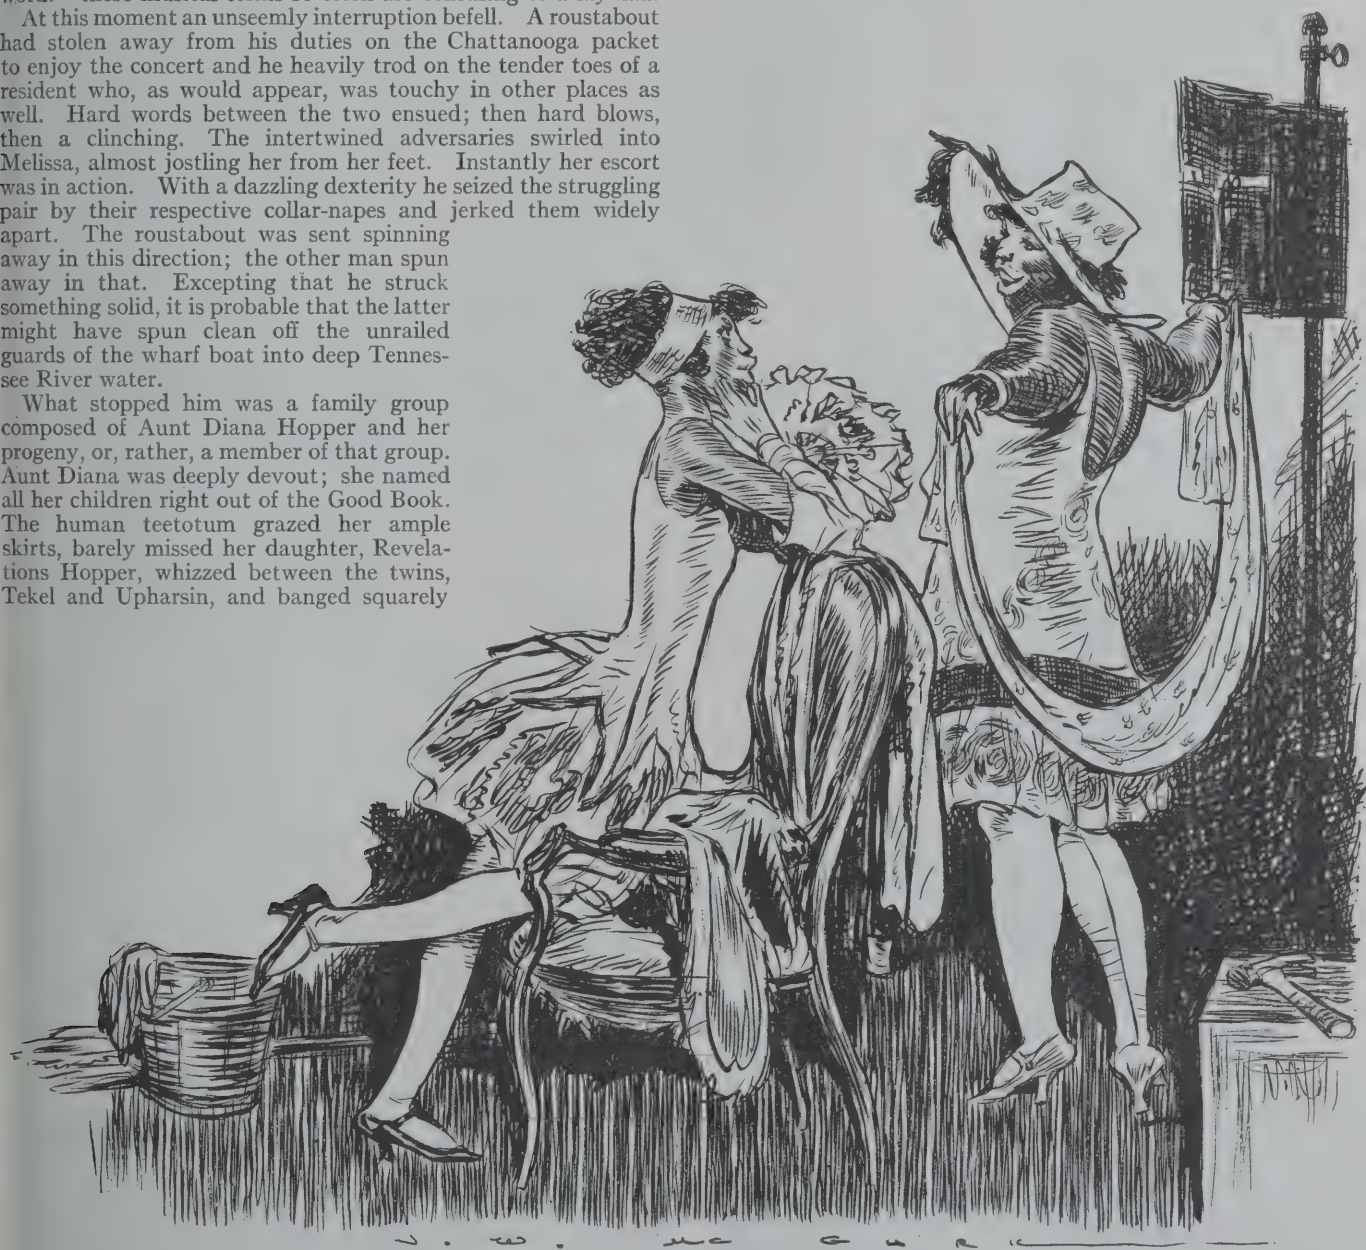
Swift's Floating Palace had arrived to pay its annual visit. The show boat was nosed in at the bank just above the upper wharf boat; the customary band concert preceding the evening performance was going on; and the sloping gravel wharf was speckled with clumps of listeners. Other auditors were massed on the shovel-blade decks of the upper wharf boat. Mainly they were colored. The lower floor of the aquatic theater might or might not be filled with white patrons that night, but the proprietor knew, as his professional glance swept the shore, that the gallery would hold a capacity audience. He was sorry his theater wasn't all gallery; he always was sorry when he reached this town, with its forty percent of black population.

On this evening the dashing Barbee was squiring an acknowledged Yazoo Street belle, one Melissa Grider. He was, as usual, a mold of fashion; she preened her smartest feathers. She was his chosen companion now; later, when the curtain went up, she would be his guest aloft up there in what some white folks call peanut heaven. They stood together on the wharf boat. In the manner of one who knows the amusement world by heart he was directing the attention of his flattered lady to certain technical faults on the part of the show boat's band leader in the direction of the march measure then being rendered—or is rendered the word?—these musical terms so often are confusing to a layman.

At this moment an unseemly interruption befell. A roustabout had stolen away from his duties on the Chattanooga packet to enjoy the concert and he heavily trod on the tender toes of a resident who, as would appear, was touchy in other places as well. Hard words between the two ensued; then hard blows, then a clinching. The intertwined adversaries swirled into Melissa, almost jostling her from her feet. Instantly her escort was in action. With a dazzling dexterity he seized the struggling pair by their respective collar-napes and jerked them widely apart. The roustabout was sent spinning away in this direction; the other man spun away in that. Excepting that he struck something solid, it is probable that the latter might have spun clean off the unrailed guards of the wharf boat into deep Tennessee River water.



What stopped him was a family group composed of Aunt Diana Hopper and her progeny, or, rather, a member of that group. Aunt Diana was deeply devout; she named all her children right out of the Good Book. The human teetotum grazed her ample skirts, barely missed her daughter, Revelations Hopper, whizzed between the twins, Tekel and Upharsin, and banged squarely into her son, whose chief claim to distinction, other than having been christened after words traced out by his mother's finger in Matthew, first chapter and second verse, was that at the age of twelve he weighed 140 pounds, although of no more than the average height.

The chunky prodigy was perched on the gunwales of the wharf boat, facing outward, when a swiftly moving body struck him from behind and sent him, for all his firm bulk, straight overboard. Upon striking the water he did two things, practically simultaneously:

He went glug and he went down.

Terrific clamor arose, but the agonized shriek of Aunt Diana led all the rest.

If it was a white man who expertly pronged the grapple end of a boat hook into the collar of the victim as he arose to the surface, it was Professor Barbee who directed the supplemental rescue work. It was Barbee who made everybody stand back and give the gurgling boy air; Barbee who suggested up-ending him so that the water he had swallowed might, by gravity, be induced to flow out again; and Barbee, and none other, who added a final noble touch to the picture by handing the frantic mother a ten dollar bill as balm for her feelings and as payment for damage to her son's wardrobe. In fact, the Professor took the center of the stage from him who by rights should have been the real hero, just as at a funeral your polished undertaker sometimes steals the limelight away from the remains. There was sympathy for young Abraham Begat Isaac Hopper; but there were cheers for Wild Bill, the efficient Human Hurricane.

If the straw-toned Ophelia had the advantage in complexion, there was something compelling about Melissa Grider.

Nevertheless, and notwithstanding that his thoughts had been directed back to these historic events, Æsop Loving now renewed his crooning of the line which carried in it a warning and a prophecy concerning the buzzard that flies too high. With a reedy note of disfavor in his tones he was repeating the pregnant refrain long after the form of Wild Bill had been lost from view in the distance. As Æsop figured it, nature and luck had done entirely too much in their joint endowment of this individual. All right for him to be a pugilistic marvel, all right perhaps that, temperamentally, he should be the pet of fortune. But to make a walking fashion plate of him was carrying prodigality just a plentiful little bit too far. Æsop's one grain of comfort lay in recalling the proverb about pride going before a fall.

Still, as time went by, it must be confessed that the gods of humility deigned not to set snares or pitfalls for the Professor's unstrayed and unstumbling feet. By day and by night he kept right on gaining in popular favor so that his civic fame became many cubits high. In society he was an enormous success; artistically, he had no rival worthy of the name. Being abundantly supplied with funds he felt no call to follow after any of those devices which spoil most of the working hours of workaday folks, and thus had fuller opportunity for the exercise of his social talents. With him it was more a labor of love than of necessity when he formed the largest colored orchestra this end of the State had ever known, with himself—naturally—as its leader. He was more than its leader; he was a dictator, if ever there has been one.

It was felt, though, that he reached the ultimate pinnacles of popularity and prominence when he set in motion his plan for organizing and equipping the Plunkett's Hill All-Colored Volunteer Fire Fighters' Brigade. A holocaust gave him the cue for this forward step. One windy night in the late fall, fire originated in a cowshed on Emery Lane, upon the far slope of the gentle eminence known as Plunkett's Hill, and well beyond the corporate limits. With all promptitude the paid department answered the call.

But from Central Station to the alarmed neighborhood was a distance of fully two miles; from Station No. 2 the way was even longer. Moreover, the run must be made in part through muddy by-streets where the heavy hose carts had slow going; and finally, to top the chapter of disaster, the water mains ended at the municipal boundary. Before the fire had burned itself out for lack of more material to feed upon, the Colored Fraternity Temple, a frame structure two stories in height, had gone up in flame with almost the spontaneous alacrity of a celluloid comb, and a long stretch of those narrow, two room wooden dwellings known South as "gun barrels" had been swept to their spindly brick foundations. The main reason why all the sufferers were colored was because no white families whatsoever lived in the burnt district or, indeed, anywhere within the devastated and distracted suburb.

Fairly before the ashes were cold, Professor Barbee had his inspiration. But he bided his time, holding the idea in reserve until the suitable moment for presenting it had arrived. With his other favors he had a sense of psychology. He struck, so to speak, while the iron was hot, at a mass meeting which had been called by and for members of the race to take steps for succoring the chief losers by the fire. In another part of town on the same evening, white residents were acting in the same worthy cause.

Two of the colored pastors, the one colored lawyer practicing at the local bar, and both of the colored physicians, as representatives of the higher professions, had been heard. On behalf of the capitalistic classes, the colored undertaker and Green Wilgus, the leading master barber, also had spoken when Professor Barbee, rising from where he sat in the body of the house, obtained recognition and advanced to the platform and took the floor.

A ripple of surprise ran through the assemblage. It was observed now that his trousers were tucked into rubber boots and that he wore a long raincoat buttoned up to his throat; yet the night was not a rainy one, either, and the hall seemed well heated. Likewise, as though to enhance public curiosity, he bore in the crook of his left elbow a mysterious queer shaped object encased in paper.

But when he began to speak, speculations regarding these curious accessories immediately were lost in admiration for his flow of language and in interest for the topic with which he dealt. His powers of eloquence never had been shown to better advantage than now. It was, as he said at the outset, all very well to raise money for temporarily housing and feeding those made homeless. (Applause.) But his thoughts went further even than this laudable end. Let the people cure, in so far as was possible, the present ills resulting from the late confergation—his use of this word creating a distinct sensation—but let also his hearers look to steps which in future would lessen the possibilities of another such destructive visitation. (Great applause.) He continued:

"In briefly, this yere is now the notion w'ich I has worked out in my own haid: We will start up a all-cullid voluntary fire departmint fur the special purtecktion of the chief cullid locality, w'ich, ez you all full well knows, is Plunkett's Hill. We will have our own ingine house out there, wid our own ingine an' our own hook-an'-ladder wagginses an' so fo'th, kep' on the insides of it. We will have our own reg'lation uniforms same ez I has seen 'em in Nawthern parts of the country endurin' of my travels to an' fro, w'ich them uniforms'll be made to awder, fur the members thereof. [Distinct stir of approval.]

"An' so, my friends, w'en yereafter the summonses rings out on the midnight air, 'stid of us runnin' round waitin' fur the w'ite firemen to git there, an' in the meantime all our prop'ty mebbe mos' lakly gettin' consumed to the ground by the devourin' elemint, our own cullid fire-fightin' fools will hustle into they uniforms, bring fo'th our own cullid ingines an' all, an' prob'ly git 'at fire all squenched out an damped down befo' them w'ite firemen is more'n ha'fway to the spot. They will be a chief, w'ich he will tote a brass trumpet fur to yell his awders th'ough it, an' they'll be sev'l deputy chiefs.

"Nur is that all. We fu'thermo' must have, by all means, a ladies' oxiliary society to purvide comfort an' hot cawfee in cold weather fur our gallant men-folkses. Fur, ez all wise men knows, you kinnot do nothin' right in this world widout the helpin' aid of the sweet an' lovin' hands of the fair ladies of the land. [Cheers and handclaps and Aunt Diana Hopper crying out: "Heah 'im, Lawd!" as though in church.] Also an' mo'over besides, we will have fur the mo' elderly men a exempt firemen's association w'ich I finds they also is quite common in the Nawth where I is been . . ."

Voice from the floor, speaking eagerly:

"Whut-all these yere exemptious firemen got to do, Br'er Barbee?"

If the query for the moment daunted him, the Professor gave no sign of it; possibly he did bat his eyes once or twice. Sparring for time, he addressed the direction from which the interruption had come:

"I don' know ez I percisely ketched the question. Will the gen'elman w'ich perpound' it kindly rise in his place an' state her once't ag'in fur my understandin'?"

Uncle Gid Fowler, the veteran janitor of the Planters' National Bank, got upon his feet.

"Ez one of de older men w'ich you mentions, I wants to know dis—whut is de duty of these yere exemptious ones?"

"Oh! Tha's it, is it? You desires to know whut the exempt firemen do? Well, suh, I'm very glad 'at question wuz put by you—very glad indeed. The exempt firemen—they"—he might have been hesitating for the value of the dramatic effect. But it was only a very brief pause, for this was a ready thinker—"they natchelly goes to all the fires w'ich otherwise would be exempted. They ain't no tellin' w'en one of these yere exempt fires'll break out." He hurried forward to forestall any more of these technical riddles. "An' in between times they gives counsel an' advices to the younger men. An' they also wears a uniform. [More applause, led by Uncle Gid Fowler.]

"Speakin' of uniforms, Mist' Cheerman, I desires to speak on slightly fu'ther. Figgerin' 'at this yere notion of mine would meet wid yore ondivided favor yere tonight, I taken it 'pun myse'f to awder a reg'lation voluntary fireman's uniform frum a large Nawthern establishment, w'ich I has patronized 'em frequent in the past. I done this privately an' unbeknownst to all. I sent the awder in by the telegraph company, payin' all the expenses out of my own pocket, an' only yistiddy evenin' the uniform arrive', safe an' sound—an' yere it is fur you all to see!"

With one swift motion he rent from the bulky parcel, which all this while he had been nursing in his left arm, its paper covering and clapped it upon his head; with another fast play of arms and shoulders he divested himself of his shrouding raincoat and stood revealed, an eye-filling, soul-lifting, magnetic figure in a shiny metal helmet with the word "Chief" in gold letters across its frontlet, in a flannel shirt with a double row of big buttons down its breast, in a wide black belt with a broad bright buckle of brass to latch it, in glistening rubber boots. Now, the shirt, moreover, was in color a brilliant crimson; and the contrasting buttons were of lustrous pearl and in the gaslight shot forth iridescent gleams. And the helmet made headgear fit for a king.

As one, the entire assembly rose to its feet, cheering. Professor Barbee knew his people, there's no denying that. Charity is sweet and altogether admirable, but charity, however much to be commended and practiced, is, after all, rarely picturesque or spectacular. Almost the original object of the gathering was forgotten in the flare of enthusiasm which swept Colored Odd Fellows' Hall in the wake of the favorite citizen's master stroke. The prospect of playing a godlike rôle as a saver of life and property from the clutch of greedy mounting flames; the possibility of being a subchief—there was no doubt regarding the identity of the chief; practically he'd already elected himself, and the selection, by acclamation as it were, had been ratified—the hope of owning one of those red shirts and one of those towering (Continued on page 146)

Writes on Life and Love as it Seems

Now That I'm Fifty

LAST month I was fifty years old.

That, as a mere fact, is of interest chiefly to myself. For, from twenty-one to eighty-one, birthdays do not thrill anyone but their victims. We ask:

"How soon will he be old enough to vote?"

And we ask:

"How soon will he be the oldest man we've ever had in the club (or the church or the village)?"

During the intervening decades, one's birthday, as a birthday, does not come under the caption of news.

Yet there is more to the fiftieth milestone than a mere personal event. For it is probably the most starkly significant milestone along the whole up-and downhill trail that leads from the maternity hospital to the undertaking establishment.

There is much to be learned from Fifty; yes, and much to be remembered. That is why I am writing these reflections on the grim age of half-a-hundred. If they wax personal and egotistic now and then—or even oftener than that—forgive me. It is impossible to view any scene or any experience except through one's own eyes. Besides, I have not been old long enough to keep from talking about it.

Some years ago George Ade wrote about an age he had reached. Ring Lardner wrote on another age. So there is nothing original about this thing I am doing—except that I can't give my series a humorous turn, after the Ade-Lardner fashion. Partly, because I am not a humorist. Chiefly, because it is just about as humorous to be fifty years old as to have lost three-fourths of one's fortune or three of one's four limbs.

I might speak poetically of my fiftieth birthday as my Golden Wedding to Life. That has a fine sound. But it doesn't make sense. There is nothing poetic about Fifty. As wisely write a Sonnet to an Ankle Brace or an Ode to Malaria.

I think the foregoing is enough of an introduction. Let's go.

At fifty, one is old. But one is old in only the true meaning of the word. Don't mistake "old" for "decaying," please. The two are far apart; in human life they ought to be something like a quarter century or more apart.

There is a world of difference, for example, between rotting wood and old wood. The latter is seasoned. It is firm, durable, staunch. It can endure much. True, it no longer has the riotous sap and growth of green wood; nor has it green wood's elastic resilience. It does not spring back readily into place from every crushing force which dashes against it. But neither does it flinch under that force. It withstands all pressure, right gallantly.

Being no longer green and young and springy, it snaps and goes to pieces, of course—if the pressure becomes too great. And there is no recovery from such breakage. No new wood tissue takes the place of the smashed fiber. But it has not yet felt the dank touch of decay. It can still endure much weight.

Do you get the analogy? Perhaps not. But in pitiably few years you will be glad to comfort yourself with it.

There are some things, of course, wherein Fifty is nearing bankruptcy. Among them are Love-making, Dissipation, Pleasure and the like.

In the gloriously idiotic and idiotically glorious Twenties, everything is possible and most things are desirable. In the Twenties, a man holds every winning card in his hand; with the possible—and usual—exception of the Money Card. He has Looks and Spirit and seething Vitality and Hope and a half-score other swiftly losable but Heaven-sent assets.

In the Thirties and often past the mid-Forties, he has the technic and the experience and the skill taught him by his Twenties; and a lot of assets left over from waning Youth. These enable him to win—yes, often to win against the redoubtable Twenties themselves—by dint of his greater craft and wisdom and by that same hard-acquired technic.

But Heaven help the Fifty-and-after-Fifty fun seeker who has not ample cash to pay for his fun!

Satan help the Fifty-and-after-Fifty Lothario who has not plenty of cash! The Money Card is the only trump left in his hand! He gets what he can pay for across the counter; never more, sometimes ludicrously less. Age has no temptations that money cannot buy.

If the success maxims would take cognizance of these grisly facts, they could scare Youth into laying up money against the rainy day of Fifty; far better than by shaking before adolescence the terrors of the poorhouse.

There is gay romance about the penniless pleasure seeker of Twenty. There is nauseating futility about the penniless pleasure seeker of Fifty. Let me illustrate one petty phase of what I mean:

A few years ago I came out of Rector's, a little before one o'clock in the morning. At a dozen or more of the restaurant's tables had sat girls whose youth was evident, each with an escort who could not have been less than fifty years old. These men were sleek and they fairly oozed prosperity. Their fair young companions were ardently interested in them. That was plain.

I rounded the corner, into Fiftieth Street. In front of me were three Winter Garden girls, just freed from a late rehearsal. They were waiting for a street car or for a taxicab or for an easy mark or for I don't know what. Assuredly they weren't waiting for what presently accosted them.

An upstanding elderly man—perhaps a shade over fifty—passed along. He was in street cleaner uniform and carried a broom, musket-fashion. At sight of the trio of youthful choristers he gave them a grin, which held only good comradeship. Every one of the three expressed her feelings in characteristic fashion. One sniffed, disgustedly, and turned her back on the civil chap. The second shrilled:

"At his age, too! The old fool!"

The third said, in icy rebuke:

"Gran'pa, you'd ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

Indignant and triple virtue had blocked the possible advances of a man as young and quite as well preserved as were any of that phalanx of oldsters in Rector's.

I saw one of the trio a week later, by the way, at Shanley's; leaning far across a table and staring with baby-eyed adoration into the face of her escort—who could not have been a day under sixty and whose teeth were showing bad teamwork as he ate.

No, at Fifty one must either be rich or sedate. One of the two. Nor is this cynicism. It is human nature.

You hear and read much about old men's darlings. But only of "Rich old men's darlings." That is understood.

A girl still under thirty marries a man of fifty or more. She does it because he is so good or so generous or so lonely or so maturely attractive. But you'll observe he is always comfortably well off.

Queer coincidence, isn't it?

The newspapers have yet to chronicle the first romance wherein the president's pretty stenographer on the seventh floor is swept off her feet and married by the fine looking fifty year old elevator starter.

No; though she is quite likely to marry her boss, who is two years older than the starter; and who is not as good looking or as well preserved. And people smile kindly at the sweet mating of May and late October.

"Put money in your purse." The Lord knows you'll need it, if you live to be Fifty.

Next month there will be more of Mr. Terhune's mellow philosophy on Life at Fifty

A Love Story of Greenwich Village, Where it is Considered Eccentric to be Normal

Blindman's Buff

Illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg

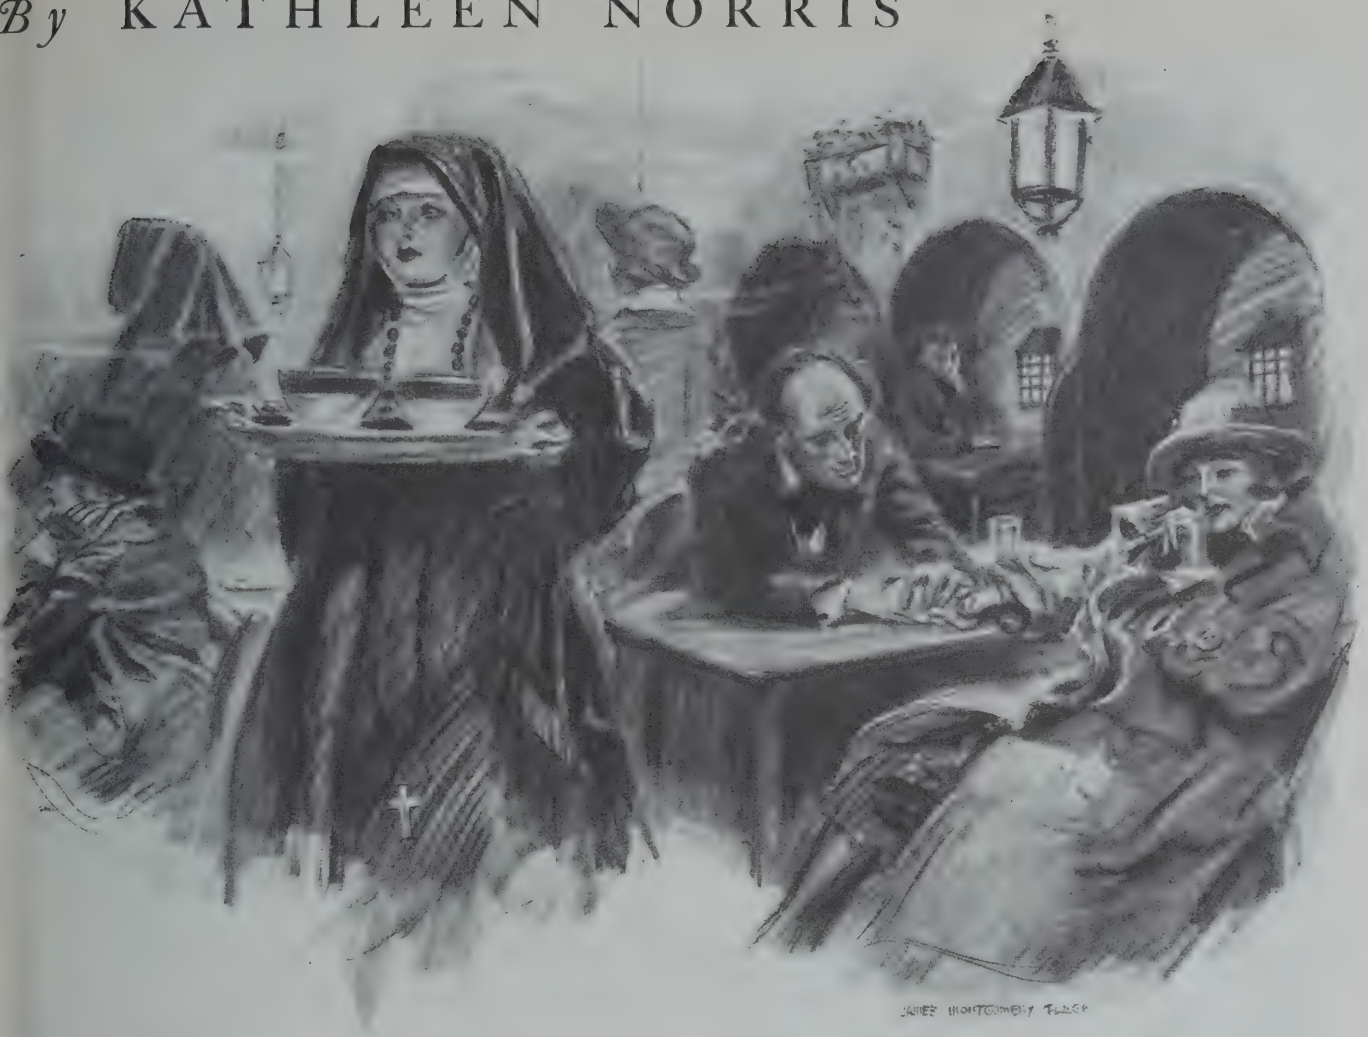
THE girl was actually sitting at his table; she had been there, a part of the strange, exciting set, as it were, ever since Bruce had come in.

She treated it with a sort of affectionate disdain; but to Bruce it was all glitteringly new and important. He felt deeply privileged to be among these extraordinary folk; it seemed to him that never to have known Greenwich Village would have been never to have known the world.

He loved every inch of it, those eight or ten square blocks on the west side of New York, hemmed in by warehouses and the foreign quarters, that contain such a richness of youth and independence and beauty and talent.

The old brownstone houses so extraordinarily changed, with lemon and indigo walls in the rooms that once knew hoop skirts and jangling crystal gasoliers; the dark and crowded streets; the lantern-lighted basement doorways and the tables beyond; the roaring thunder of the elevated trains on the curving track overhead; the coarse plates of marvelous spaghetti; and everywhere, everywhere, the laughter, the companionship, the linked arms and murmuring voices of happy and carefree youth. Some new and fantastic eating place, some new and fantastic plan, was presented almost every day; and they weren't all bluffers, Bruce would tell himself. That girl was really selling stories—that man was talking pretty straight socialism, he'd been in Russia and in Poland, he knew what he was talking about.

There was so much to notice, through the drifting blue cigarette smoke, between the polished dark bare floor and the low chrome-yellow ceiling, that he had been only indistinctly aware of her. The big basement room was full of men and girls, and of long narrow bare tables flanked with benches—tables and benches all pushed at crooked angles now—and it was full too of laughter, singing and shouting. The young waitresses, working their difficult way through the crowd, loaded trays held high, were dressed like little nuns, with clicking wooden rosaries at their belts, and demure rosy faces framed in crisp clean bibs and coifs.



Even these busy stage-religious, however, showed slim silk-stockinged legs and twinkling slippers, and many of the other women for all their unconventionality were more modestly dressed. These wore lemon-yellow smocks, with their pretty heads bobbed like mediæval heralds, or brief shirt-like effects in homespun, or sinuous satins wound round their graceful bodies like the petals of a calla lily. Tam-o'-shanters were popular, erratic toques and turbans; many were bareheaded.

There was a piano in a corner, incessantly banged by a long haired, pale young man with a cigarette drooping from his moist lips. He was abetted by two half hysterical girls in black satin, but his music—if it was music—and their voices were alike drowned in the general clamor of the room.

Socialists were talking, dark faced, perspiring young men and bloodless, oriental looking girls, banging the tables. Lovers were murmuring, one young man was thrumming a ukulele, two were deep over a chess game at the cluttered corner of a table, and half a dozen jesters were busy, moving from group to group, laughing, shouting, ready with names. The usual heavily talkative florid men and blazing-eyed girls who had been drinking added a last touch to the scene with which Bruce was beginning to feel fairly familiar, a scene repeated in a score of these little Bohemian places every night.

Bruce was supposedly with Carter Poole, the same Carter Poole who had had three articles upon modern Russia in the

By KATHLEEN NORRIS

Weekly Areopagitican. But Carter had seen a full lipped, dark eyed charmer a few tables away, and had gone over to sit beside her, in a twisted chair, and murmur to her. Bruce could see her smiling as she listened, her roving eyes filled with an amusement almost maternal.

So now he was free to look at this girl who was sitting here at his own table. Apparently everybody knew her; various young persons had been dropping into the chair beside her or had greeted her as they circled the room. They had called her Poppy.

She was young, to begin with; perhaps twenty. Her skin had a satiny freshness and fairness, and her round eyes were blue and set in deep-curving lashes, like those of certain small children and all dolls. Her mouth was firm and wide, with just a hint of something jocose in its young, clean-cut lines, and Bruce immediately liked the firm, lean molding of cheeks and chin, and the feathery touches of soft, gold-browned hair at her temples and over her ears.

Her hand, slim and burned to a soft even brown by wholesome sunlight, lay idly on the table. Meals in the Little Cloister were surprisingly good and filling; this girl had made hers, he noted, of a stone bowl of bubbling onion soup, and the crackers, yellow pale Swiss cheese and coffee over which she was loitering now. He wondered if she was poor, to order so frugal a meal.

The plain little blue silk frock and the fantastic wide white organdie collar she wore told nothing to the untrained masculine eye.

"Hello, Poppy!" he hazarded.

She flashed him a reassuring smile. Bruce was of an aspect calculated not to alarm.

"Hello!" she said unconcernedly, and looked into her cup.

"Haven't I seen you here before?" Bruce asked.

He thought of the giggling, fluttering girls at dances, at home in Lorain, Ohio, and compared them, to their infinite disadvantage, with this composed young person, who sent her blue gaze idly about the noisy, crowded room, brought her black-fringed eyes thoughtfully to his and answered, pleasantly indifferent:

"I don't know. I'm sometimes here. You've been here before?"

"Only once," he had to confess. "But I've been—to all the other places," he said, with some little pride. "The Bargain Counter and the Three Aces and the Yellow Peril and Stumble Inn——"

"Oh, yes! I know," she interrupted lazily, as he paused. "But I like it here best."

Bruce by a series of imperceptible jerks hitched his chair nearer. He could now face the room almost as she was facing it, and when she raised those troubling, exhilarating, intoxicating blue eyes she had to look at him obliquely, almost over her shoulder.

"I like you—you're wonderful! I like you—you're wonderful!" something began to sing dizzily in his heart and brain. Carter would have said it outright, almost any other man in the room would have said it at once, as a matter of course. But Bruce was not familiar enough with the ways and manners of this new world—he was not indeed familiar with the glorious, dizzying, almost terrifying sensation he was experiencing—to take advantage of the moment.

The tone of her oddly reluctant, oddly husky voice, the lift of her indifferent, wise blue eyes, the movement of her beautiful little head above the fantastic collar and under the spray of golden brown hair and the wide hat, were making his senses actually spin.

He wanted her to talk—he did not care what she said. He wanted her to look at him, to go on locking those slender brown fingers and unlocking them, to stir her coffee again.

"Tell me who some of these people are," he said aloud, to say something.

"Who interests you?" she asked obligingly but without enthusiasm. He pointed them out and she identified them. Bill Kates and Marian Strong—Marian did the little clever pen and inks. Kiki Fraser, who was to have a play on. Joe Beaver and Tony—they called Tony "the Sheik." Lew Rogers's girl; everyone called her Betty-girl. Those two, reddening their lips, were "just some of the girls who come here—girls from some Western town."

"They pay for the men's meals," said Poppy, with an expression of distaste. "And so the men rush them and they think they are having a glorious time. Their mothers and aunts take in sewing, I suppose, to give the talented member of the family a chance in 'Noo-Yok'!"

Bruce laughed, stopped suddenly and flushed a little. Poppy was stirring her fourth half demi-tasse of strong black coffee.

"Can you sleep after that?" he asked at random.

"Oh—sleep!" She looked almost ecstatic. "One reason I'm not here so much is that I'm working hard," she said, "and how I love to sleep!"

It was the first personal note; he warmed to it.

"What's your work?" he asked.

They were both bending over the table now, their heads close together. Bruce was dizzy with ecstasy; this was the last touch of felicity. Life intoxicated him; the wonderful city, his wonderful job, his wonderful new friends and all the experiences to which they introduced him, and now this hour of music, joy, laughter, this glorious crowd of youthful geniuses and independents and rebels, and lastly, this woman, with her exquisite mouth moving upon such slow, thoughtful words, and her eyelashes dropped upon her cheek, and her broad hat shading her beautiful face and the curly tendrils of her soft hair.

"I work with a designer—it's nicer than it sounds," she said. "And I'm twenty," she said, routing all his senses with an upward glance and a slow smile. "My father is an actor, on the road now. I'm French, Bohemian, Irish and American, and I was married when I was eighteen—only it didn't take!"

Her casual, leisurely manner, and the quick flash of a smile with which she finished, robbed the parting revelation of its shock. She ended with an indifferent: "That's me. Who are you?"

Bruce confessed to Lorain, Ohio. He had gone to war at twenty-one, had had a taste of the big Eastern cities. Now his sisters were married and his father and mother perfectly satisfied that he should come on and write novels; of course he didn't mean at once, but some day. His mother had an old friend who took in an occasional boarder, in New York—she had given him a letter of introduction to her—and he had immediately secured a job on the Planet.

He said the last proudly; but she knew all about that.

"Space and detail?" she said, nodding. "Do they use your stuff yet? Are you making any money?"

"I don't have to worry about that," Bruce was upon the point of answering. But some little lingering remnant of sanity restrained him. So instead he answered, with an imitation of her own impassive manner: "Some. I'm sorry," he added, after one of the pleasant dreamy silences that are at least as important, under such circumstances, as any words can be, "I'm sorry about that marriage. What—what went wrong?"

"Everything!" she said gaily.

And the flash of her white teeth was like sunlight on enamel.

Bruce, whose family was one of the moral, social, financial and civic ramparts of Lorain, was sorry about that marriage, of course. It wasn't that lots of divorced women—older women—weren't perfectly fine and all right and all that. But this girl was so poised, so cool, so self-possessed about it. And she was so young.

However, so far as he was concerned the mischief was done. It didn't matter what she did, thought or said any longer. She was simply Poppy, and the whole world was Poppy, and the smoky room, and the smoky city, and the smoky planet existed only as a setting for her strange beauty, her strange glances, her strange sweet husky voice.

After a while they went with others to Humpy Cardigan's studio and danced. Everyone naturally wanted to dance with Poppy, and she danced indifferently with them all. Bruce felt almost faint with the felicity of actually holding her, broad hat, transparent frill, little silk gown, and the sweetness and youth and fragrance of the girl inside them, in his arms.

She danced beautifully, and without a word or a look for him. No matter. He went out into the hallway, when she went downstairs with Mrs. Cardigan at ten o'clock, and waited for her to come back. There was no one else to talk to, to look at, in the world.

The studio was on the fourth floor, with mansard windows back and front. It was lighted dimly by dangling lanterns in red shades; people were flirting earnestly on all the lumpy divans that sank so treacherously in unexpected spots. The pretty slippered feet of the girls, Bruce noted, were almost as high as their noses, as they propped themselves with pillows that were inches too far back for comfort.

Bruce smoked and waited. But Phyllis Cardigan, a lean, eager, imitative woman in dark crimson velvet, came back alone.

"Poppy's gone," she announced, in a world of ashes, emptiness, brass and darkness, to Bruce. "She always goes home early. She's a darling, isn't she?"

"She's a wonder—that girl. She can do anything!" Carter Poole said, lounging into their conversation. "The Sheik is mad about her. She won't go to the Beaux Arts ball with him—said she would rather go in a crowd. She's a handful, she is!"

"She's remarkable," Bruce said slowly. For some obscure reason he would have preferred them not to praise her. It made his own feeling for her less sacred, somehow. "She's been married?" he asked reluctantly.

"Yes——" But Phyllis Cardigan dismissed it with a gesture. "She never talks about it!" she said, shaking her head.

Bruce had that to comfort him. She never talked about it? Yes, but she had told him about it, voluntarily. Ah, what if she had liked him, as he liked her—— He longed to ask her full name; he would not admit even to these casual acquaintances that he knew not even that about her.

He haunted the Little Cloister. And four days later she came in again, and his heart made a great bound as he saw her, and his mouth grew dry and the palms of his hands wet. She was with two other girls; stupid, handsome creatures, who were listening to her, laughing at what she said. She wore a lacy black gown tonight, and a small black hat with a drooping feather that touched her shoulder. She looked older, adorably womanly and self-possessed.

"You—you look lovely!" Bruce said, making his way at once to her side.

"My best clothes!" she admitted, smiling her wise, composed smile. "I've been to a Tory tea party," she confided. "That explains the regalia. Now all I want is some salad, and then I've got to go."

"You shan't go this time," Bruce assured her steadily, "without leaving me your address!"

"Oh, really?" The blue eyes came up suddenly to his, and for almost the first time in his experience with her there was no hint of her habitual raillery and boredom in her tone. "Do you like me?" she asked, looking him straight in the eyes.

"No," he answered a little thickly, feeling himself tremble, and the red blood in his face. "I love you," he said, trying to laugh. "You—you're my girl!"

"Very well—but of course nobody ever tells the truth in a place like this!" Poppy reminded him serenely. "Combination salad without the cucumber, Kitty," she said to the little waitress. "You give me your address; that'll be the better way!"

"I write mother detailed accounts," confessed Bruce, "of my quiet domestic evenings with her old friend."

she added thoughtfully. "I'm a working woman—you might take me to lunch some day!"

"Yes, I'll do all of that," he said, unsmiling. "But—but that isn't all. I don't even know your name."

She looked up placidly, her maternal gaze breaking over him with a faint, indulgent amusement. He was sitting back, the big arms in the tweed coat folded over his big chest, his firm, square jaw thrust forward by the grip of his teeth, his steel-gray eyes narrowed to slits.

"Very simple, dear child," she said. "My name is Poppy."

"You weren't christened Poppy, I suppose?"

"A baby born as I was—a real Bohemian baby isn't cluttered with any such possession as a christening!"

"You aren't a genuine Bohemian?" he asked, diverted. He saw, being imaginative, a swarthy gypsy father, in vaudeville, a flat cluttered with red shawls and guitars.

"Ah, my dear, what a petty, dirty, sordid imitation this is!" she said suddenly, somber eyes upon the fast filling room. "But over there—the stars, and the dark summer nights, and the old men and women all singing together!"

She looked thoughtfully into space for some moments.

"You're so clean and sweet," she went on suddenly, touching his hand gently with hers. "Don't make love to me. Be—be friendly."

"I'll be more than that!" he said gravely, stirred.

"Jankow—and then Madison—those are my names," she told him gaily, with a delicious and heart-stopping change of mood. "Now where will we lunch tomorrow?"

"No, but, Poppy—will you truly?" he pleaded, shaken at the mere thought that she might not be serious.

"Why of course I will! Where are you living?"

"At the Priory. But let's make it definite, now."

"At the Priory," she echoed, surprised. "But I thought—I thought you were boarding with a friend of your mother? Wasn't that a success? Did you move?"

"Well, Poole took me to the Priory, and I'm having too good a time there to get out," Bruce confessed, sufficiently obsessed to note with exultation that she had remembered the details. "Don't worry—there are a lot of decent fellows there!"

She scowled, adorably maternal and concerned.

"Yes, I know. But you're so young and green!" she objected. "Does your mother know it?"

"No." He grinned, all boy. "I write mother detailed accounts of my quiet domestic evenings with her old friend," he confessed. "And some day I'll make it all true. No hurry."

"But isn't that wrong?" the girl questioned.

"You're right, it's dead wrong. But my mother's a worrier. Wait a minute—here's how she writes me!"

He took out his wallet, and she examined its contents, putting it in order for him, and he showed her his mother's last letter, with its old-fashioned, cramped writing, and its "My dearest Tommie," and "God bless my dear boy, lovingly, Mother." Bruce's heart seemed to turn to a sort of liquid fire as he watched her and listened to her grave comments and commands. She was a totally different girl from the Poppy of last week; all the gypsy, all the rebel seemed to have been temporarily subdued by the "Tory tea."

She told him how to reach his mother's friend, what street car to take, at what corner to leave it; she advised him about restaurants, laundries, shops. She said: "Some of these men you're running with are straight, Bruce, and some aren't, of course. But almost all of them will let you pay for their meals or their room, or lend them money. I hate to see you—stung. Here's my man," she finished, rising. "I'm going to a private view of some pictures. Tomorrow, at Cadanasso's, at one?"

He had been listening absorbedly, more and more in love every instant. But now chill doubt, despair, jealousy, resentment, engulfed him. She had gone out of his world until tomorrow, and there was absolutely nothing left, except some chairs and tables and some dry, uninteresting voices and faces.

She was with a man he never had seen before, a disgusting looking man; she was talking to him. Her beauty, her smile, her upcurling lashes and her black lacy dress were still in the city—right here—but not with him. Bruce felt dazed, cold, limp, his mouth was dry and his head hot.

He walked up past Cardigan's studio and looked up at the windows and imagined the red lights and the lumpy couches, and a faint image of her, with her vital blue eyes and satiny firm little chin, was evoked by the mere memory.

Bruce presently ate a dinner of sawdust and plaster of Paris, meanwhile watching dummies of wax and cloth revolving about him and listening to plain English words spoken in an entirely foreign tongue. He went to bed early and was almost four hours reading a brief love story, because every time he came to any word of beauty, youth or passion his throat shut spasmodically and he had to look away from the page and remember Poppy.

The next day he walked round corners and looked unseeing into windows and pulled out his watch and put it away again. The fearful thought that if she failed him he had no way of tracing her made him stand still, once, brought up with a round turn in the sidewalk traffic, thereby infuriating some score of other pedestrains.

One o'clock. One-four. Bruce's heart began to sink steadily, like a plummet.

Suddenly a belted brown coat on a slim figure, a narrow little strip of fur against a soft, smooth cheek, a tipped little rowdyish hat over brown-gold spraying locks, and seeking blue eyes—it was Poppy! All the world straightened out for Bruce, and invisible hands turned up the sunlight, higher—higher—higher—into unbelievable brilliance and beauty and ecstasy, as he tucked her little gloved hand under his arm.

Where would they go? Oh, anywhere—anywhere! And how long had they? Ah, too short a time—even if it were a thousand years!

A shaded interior, after the glare; big cushiony leather wall seats, on which they could be close together; music—a menu——

Bruce was a big man, almost twenty-five. But he trembled, his hands were clumsy, his hat fell twice to the floor, he stammered and laughed like a yokel. And what—and what? Toasted muffins?

They were leaning on the table, murmuring, murmuring. He had been living for this for nineteen hours.

After that came their glorious time. For four weeks they saw each other every day. They were Bohemians of the Bohemians,

"I can only warn you," Bruce said, "I'm never going to let her go again."

and if Bruce had fancied that he had glimpsed the real joy and beauty, the freedom and independence of the "Village" before he knew her, he learned better now.

They always lunched together, among weird surroundings of yellow stenciled cats or calico lamp shades. He came to know everybody, as she did, all the long haired men and short haired women, all the successes and failures, all the Italian, French, Dutch, Swiss restaurants, and the American restaurants, the "Nice Respectable Little Joint," and the "Blue Iris," and the "Three Girls and Aunt Katy."

They drifted, young, utterly content, wholly in love, all about the city; they explored, they laughed, they confided. And every hour of meeting had its separate thrill, and every parting was a moment of real pain. Bruce came to know every expression of the beautiful blue eyes, and for Poppy a tweed coat on big angular shoulders anywhere possessed an almost sickening shock of joy and pain.

Bruce saw her dancing with all sorts of men; some looked like murderers, some like weaklings. He saw her sometimes ringleader in nonsense and hilarity, sometimes somberly an onlooker only. He saw her redden her full lips, talking as she rubbed on the lipstick, he came to know which were her best gloves, to feel free to ask her to wear the little rowdyish hat on some special occasion, not to forget the brown coat. He never called her anything but Poppy, nor reflected much upon what her life was when they were not together. There were scores of girls and young men drifting about the Village; nobody knew why they were, or cared, Poppy was one of a hundred.

Certain groups were always together; Poppy and Bruce would comment upon them. The tall girl with the red earrings and the thin, shaggy headed boy were quarreling again. Little Maisie looked as if she had been crying; Jerry was probably acting up.

Bruce never had the privilege of seeing Poppy home. She explained briefly and firmly that there would be no compromise on that point. She would let him take her to the subway, they would loiter up and down the long, bleak, odorous arcade, then she would nod a brief, casual good night, in the din and jar of the train that thundered in. Bruce as a small-town man was unaccustomed to so unnatural an arrangement; she had a way of looking very small and solitary as the belted back of her brown coat and the drooping feather disappeared.

But that, he told himself, was one of the glories of this marvelous new life. This rioting crowd of girls and men needed no background. They were, that was enough! They said things that overturned the world, they admitted love, they flung themselves into each other's arms, they rioted in extravagant dress, extravagant eating and drinking, in speech for which other young bodies were beaten and exiled and burned only a few hundred years ago!

Bruce drank deep of it, exulting. And for three weeks, four weeks, Poppy shared the glory with him to the least instant of adventure. Then there was a change.

He had noted that she was unwontedly thoughtful for a day or two; she roused herself with visible effort to reckless rejoinder, to mad dancing, to all the noise and fury and excitement. She hung lifelessly over the question of a costume for the Easter ball.

"Easter?" she mused, over the strawberry ice that she was idly scraping, upon an enervating, breathless green day of early spring. "We seize upon the word—but what does Lent mean to us?"

"Or to any other sensible person?" Bruce said roundly.

The awnings at Leopoldi's were besieged by the onslaught of the battering sunlight today, the street was hot and noisy. Voices echoed and ran unseen in the city, like the talking waters of brooks released by spring. Bruce, watching the beloved face, with the upcurling lashes dropped, bent tenderly toward her.

"What's the matter, sweet?" he pleaded.

She looked up, her eyes brimming, her mouth trying to smile.

"I don't know. I get so sick of it all!"

"Sick of——" He was honestly at a loss.

"Oh, these people!" Poppy said desperately. "These women, with their artificial hair and their artificial faces and their artificial brains! I'm so utterly weary of hearing lies—and dancing with men who shove dirty hands right into my back, and who say things men—men oughtn't say to girls! And of painted tables and heavy blue and red bowls and crash window curtaining! I almost think I could stand Nottingham lace and a euchre party at the Odd Fellows' Hall; anything—anything real!"

"This is real," Bruce said. "This is the realest—the most natural group in the world! I'll bet that even in Russia—in Paris—men and women don't get together so honestly. These girls aren't embroidering pillows and picking each other's reputations to pieces; they're dressing, talking, acting—just as they feel! It does me good. It's life in the raw——"

"Oh, please!" She was all out of key today, her eyes filled, her tone was faintly impatient. "Please, Bruce, don't you begin on bunk like that!"

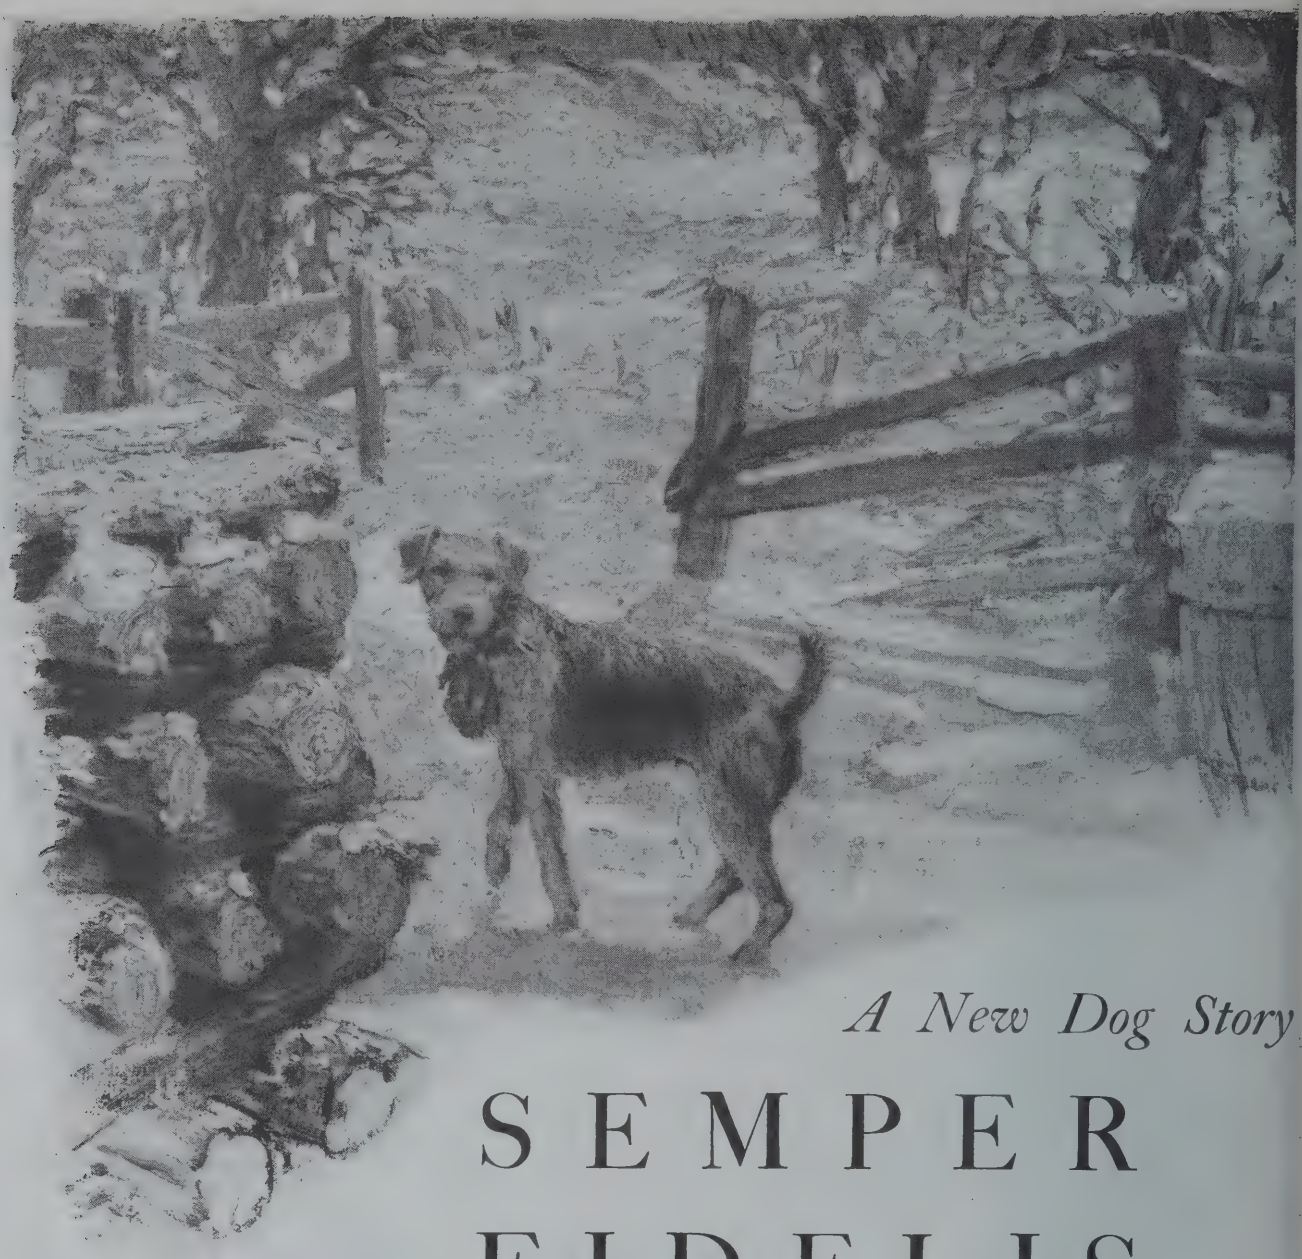
"You're mad because all the time Oscar was dancing with you he was kissing your shoulder," Bruce reproached her, surprised.

"He was drunk," she offered simply.

"Well, but—my heaven! You're not going to get fussy about that. He'd been drinking, but he was all right!"

They had differed before; this was their first quarrel. Bruce panted with the amazement and agony of crossing her; Poppy looked down at the bright green oilcloth of the table with swimming eyes. She hated these ready tears; she seemed utterly idiotic today.

"I don't see why you should get mad just because Oscar Florence kissed your shoulder—he kisses everybody! His kisses don't mean anything," Bruce resumed sulkily, after a pause.



Poppy's blue eyes looked about the low-ceiled room, swimming in long streams and scarves of cigarette smoke; she blinked at the moving figures, the vacuously laughing faces, the flushed cheeks, the tousle of hair and skirts and silk-clad slim legs, the eager, disheveled men, perspiring, messing food and spilling glasses. Red lights cast an almost demoniac glow upon the confusion; a jazz band was making any speech difficult.

"I suppose," she said speaking slowly and levelly in a sudden lull, and with a stiff throat, "I suppose that what I am really sorry about—perhaps—is that you don't mind his doing so!"

"What!" Bruce shouted, through the recommencing uproar of the band. He had heard her, and she knew it. She merely shrugged, looked wearily into space and fell silent.

Presently she rose and walked composedly through the seething throng, engineering her way nicely through tables set at disorderly angles, and men and girls occupying chairs in every position but the customary one. Sometimes she was stopped by a slim perfumed hand, or a big, heavy one; she loitered, but Bruce noticed that her face was weary and that she did not smile.

"Are they happy?" she asked, in the street, in all the swarming confusion of five o'clock. "Happier, I mean, than young people are anyway when they're together, with music and something to eat? Don't—don't they have just as good a (Continued on page 140)

A New Dog Story

SEMPER FIDELIS

OF ONE thing old Dan Pelly, dog trainer and worshiper at the shrine of the Little God of the Open Spaces, was thoroughly convinced. A bucksaw is an invention of the Devil. In the contemplation of three cords of peeled Valparaiso live oak and the instrument of torture hereinbefore referred to, plus a slab of fat bacon rind with which to grease the recalcitrant blade, Dan felt his spirit wither; a low melancholy settled over him; in his search for solace he sat down on the sawbuck, loaded his pipe and gazed about him for a dog, into whose receptive ear he might pour the burden of his disgust.

From his nest of clean straw in the corner of the woodshed he saw Clonmel Knight, whose kennel name was Toby, rise to Dan's unspoken plea for social intercourse.

"Well, Toby, you old ruin," Dan greeted the dog, "how about you?"

Toby yawned loudly, stretched himself and in effect replied: "Nicely, thank you, Dan, for an old dog." Then he slouched across the woodshed and crept in between Dan's knees, where he sighed with relief in a very human sort of way. As he approached Dan noticed the uncertainty in his walk, a pathetic swaying of his hind quarters, accompanied by electric jerkings of the head.

"Well, Toby, old pup," he said, ruffling the little, alert V-shaped ears, "the years tiptoe by and we're old and doddering before we know it. Holy cats, I never know I'm past fifty until I start sawing and splitting wood for the winter, and then, as the feller says, I get a pain in my back and anguish in my heart and, in a manner of speaking, they sort o' wring my brow."

Clonmel Knight, alias Toby, coughed—the cough of the aged and infirm—and wagged his brief tail. Not that he heard a word Dan Pelly had said, for Toby was quite deaf, but because Dan was ruffling his ears and in a happier day loving words had always accompanied that loving caress.

Dan continued to talk to the dog. "You're feeling the downhill pull worse than ever this past month, Toby. I think you've got a touch of rheumatism and this cold weather doesn't improve it any; your appetite ain't any too good and I notice you've got a cataract on one eye. Confound your picture, Toby, what are you aiming to do, anyhow? Live forever? Don't you know you were whelped in April of nineteen six and here it is coming Christmas in the year Annie Domino nineteen twenty-two? Toby, you're plumb see-nile."

Following unconsciously the habit of a lifetime, Dan's calloused hands roved over Toby in search of a possible wood tick. "Toby," he admonished the decrepit Airedale, "if I hadn't kept these visitors away from you by two baths a week in tepid water, one bath a month in creolin, plenty of grooming and a nice bed of pine or cedar shavings, you'd have been a memory years ago. And at that I ain't done right by you, Toby. Five years ago, when that scourge of virulent distemper killed every dog in my kennels except you, but left you with chorea and a disconnected sense of equilibrium, I should have eased you out under the rose bushes in the back garden. But I didn't have the heart to.

"I kept banking on that iron Airedale constitution of yours to outgrow it—and besides, you'd been Johnny's dog, and every time I'd think I ought to do the decent thing by you, Toby, I'd get a vision of you standing on your hind legs by the coffin looking in at him and wondering why he didn't whistle to you like a little boy should—ah, Toby, I can close my eyes and see you two trudging off up the cañon, Johnny with his twenty-two caliber rifle on his shoulder and you trotting ahead a little bit, looking back over your shoulder at my little man from time to time—I get thinking of him around Christmas time, Toby, and when I do I don't want to saw wood. I want to get out in the woods and tramp and tramp and try to forget."

Toby raised his head—long and broad and flat, as all good Airedale's heads should be—and smiled. His small dark eyes, long since robbed of the fire of youth, were very wistful; his tasseled, three-vertebræ tail semaphored, in the language of his kind, the ancient message of dogdom: "I love you."

"Yes, yes, I know you do, Toby. And I love you, too, old pal. It hurts me to see you in misery. I got you as a three months' old puppy for Johnny, when he was ten years old. You were a valuable dog, Toby, a lineal descendant of the first great dogs of your breed ever imported into the United States—Clonmel Marvel and Bath Lady. I traded a two-year old, well trained Irish setter for you to a gentleman that had a weakness for the big, red, headstrong fool. You were Johnny's dog for four years—and how you loved him! You wouldn't have any false gods before you in those days, would you, Toby? The best you ever had for me was a polite 'Good morning to you, Dan, but the rest of the day for Johnny.' But when Johnny left us you came to me for comfort—and oh, Toby boy, the days we've spent afield together trying to forget Johnny! Toby, do you know that the coons, lynx, skunks, badger, gray foxes, rabbits and bobcats you've killed single-handed, and the bear and cougar you've treed for me in your day would fill a couple of box cars? Well, that's a fact; and the blood you've shed a-doing it would fill one of them ten gallon hats like the movie cowboys wear.

"You've been mauled an' bitten an' scratched until your old hide must look like a crazy quilt; you've been poisoned and run over by buckboards and a flivver; you've been sprayed by skunks till you was blind and cried with shame because you couldn't see the enemy nor smell him and you were afraid he'd get away; you've clumb trees and fell out of them or been knocked out of them by what was in the tree first; you've rolled over cliffs and once you dropped into an old dry well and was there twelve days without food or water before I found you; you've allowed big buck coons to take you into water, where Old Man Coon aimed to get you under and drown you—and you went under with him and killed him on the bottom. That grip across the brisket and no let-go till the breastbone cracked, eh, Toby?"

Toby whisked his tail in sad remembrance of a halcyon youth.

"Remember that day you and Johnny and me was out gathering mushrooms in the Little Antelope Valley? It was just our luck not to have a gun with us. You were scouting up an arroyo when I spotted a coyote headed straight for Johnny. Of course I knew an ordinary coyote would naturally head straight away from Johnny, and in a jiffy I realized that this one had hydrophobia.

"I yelled to Johnny to climb a madrone tree close by and he just did get up in time. Then I whistled for you—and you came. You bet you did, Toby—and that mad coyote went to meet you. He bit you twice before you got the right hold and killed him. He had rabies, all right. I sent his head up to the University of California to be examined, and you, you reckless old fool, I had to take you up to the city and have a regular doctor give you the Pasteur treatment. That's the time you and Johnny got your pictures in the city paper—and I guess, if it hadn't been for that, Johnny would have died without us ever having a picture of him!"

Toby shivered with the old chorea shiver, augmented by the tremors of age; he swayed and seemed half minded to sit down abruptly, but recovered himself.

Dan nodded understandingly. "Yes, Toby, and you would have set down if you'd been anything but an Airedale terrier. Your kind ain't much on beauty, but if handsome is what handsome does, you're the most beautiful dog in the world. You've just naturally got too much courage to die, Toby. I'm on to you. You just stay alive to fight that chorea and the disposition of your hind quarters to skid off the right of way, don't you?—although Martha says the only thing that keeps you alive is the hope that some day I'll relent and take you hunting again.

"She says you're just a-hangin' on by faith. I keep telling her I dassen't take you afield, because you're so old and that distemper has left you with such a weak heart you can't stand much exercise. You'd keel over with heart disease, just like little Midgie, my old black and white pointer bitch. She'd retrieved a quail and was coming out of a thicket with the dead bird in her mouth when she stopped to point a live bird in the grass in front of her. I made her hold it while I tried to get a picture with my kodak, but the exercise and the excitement and repression was too much and she dropped dead on point. Martha says that's the way a good field dog should die—in action, faithful to the end.

"Well, that's all right for a setter or a pointer, but you're a varmint dog, Toby, and I can't risk you on the field of honor. Your teeth are about gone, your speed is gone, your sight is at least half gone, and while you threw back pretty strong to your otter hound ancestors in the matter of a nose—for I always did believe you hunted more by scent than sight—and might be able to waddle along somehow on a coon track, I'm afraid, Toby, when you caught up with your coon he'd turn and give you an all-fired licking! You're the only Airedale I ever knew that lived up to the old brag of the Airedale fancy that an Airedale can do everything any other dog can do—and then lick the other dog; only—you ain't the dog you used to be, Toby.

"You wouldn't want me to take you afield wheezing along on two legs and a half and have a skunk cover you with disgrace, would you, Toby? Of course you wouldn't. You can't be killed in action, Toby. You've just got to figure yourself an old soldier that's been crippled up in a dozen campaigns and finally lands in the Old Soldiers' Home. Faithful to the last, Toby, but they don't die sword in hand."

Toby again raised his dim eyes to his master. Yes, he was finding it increasingly difficult to resist that impulse to flop over awkwardly after any exertion, and, as Dan Pelly had remarked, he was living on faith and courage. However, he would buck up—he would buck Dan up. All his life he had carried a merry tail. Tomorrow was another day!

He took Dan's wrist in his snags of teeth, growled ferociously and pretended to be a very devil of a fellow.

Dan Pelly closed his eyes in sudden pain. He had a vision of Toby doing that to Johnny's wrist, in a vain effort to make him play, a few minutes after Dan and the neighbors had taken Johnny from the swimming pool and laid him in the grass along the bank. Ah, memories, memories! And yet 'twas better to have loved and lost than never to have known those fourteen years of fatherhood. Dan was not embittered—he was too hopeless a sentimentalist for that—but a part of him had stayed with Johnny among the wild flowers in an old country cemetery. He knew the fallacy of life and the sweet mercy of death.

Toby continued to threaten and growl. Suddenly his hind legs skidded out from under him and he collapsed on the woodshed floor. It was the chorea.

Dan thought the old dog was dying and knelt beside him. He lifted his head and Toby smiled apologetically and tried to kiss the wrist which a moment before he had pretended to bite.

"So be it, Clonmel Knight, called Toby," Dan murmured, with sudden, adamantine resolution. "We'll call that our last good by. I'll play fair with you, boy. I'll not let you hang on and suffer and die by inches. Wait for me in the Happy Hunting Grounds and when you see Johnny-boy kiss him for me."

Like all out-o'-door men, Dan Pelly was a pagan. He believed that all field dogs have souls.

He went directly to the house. His wife, Martha, was in the kitchen making mincemeat and as he entered she turned her old sweet face toward him and smiled, for she saw that the old visions had taken possession of him again, that he was unhappy.

"Have a piece of mince pie, dear?"

"No-o-o," he sighed. A long silence. Then: "Martha, I can't saw that wood until Toby gets out of the woodshed. Have we got any chloroform in the house?"

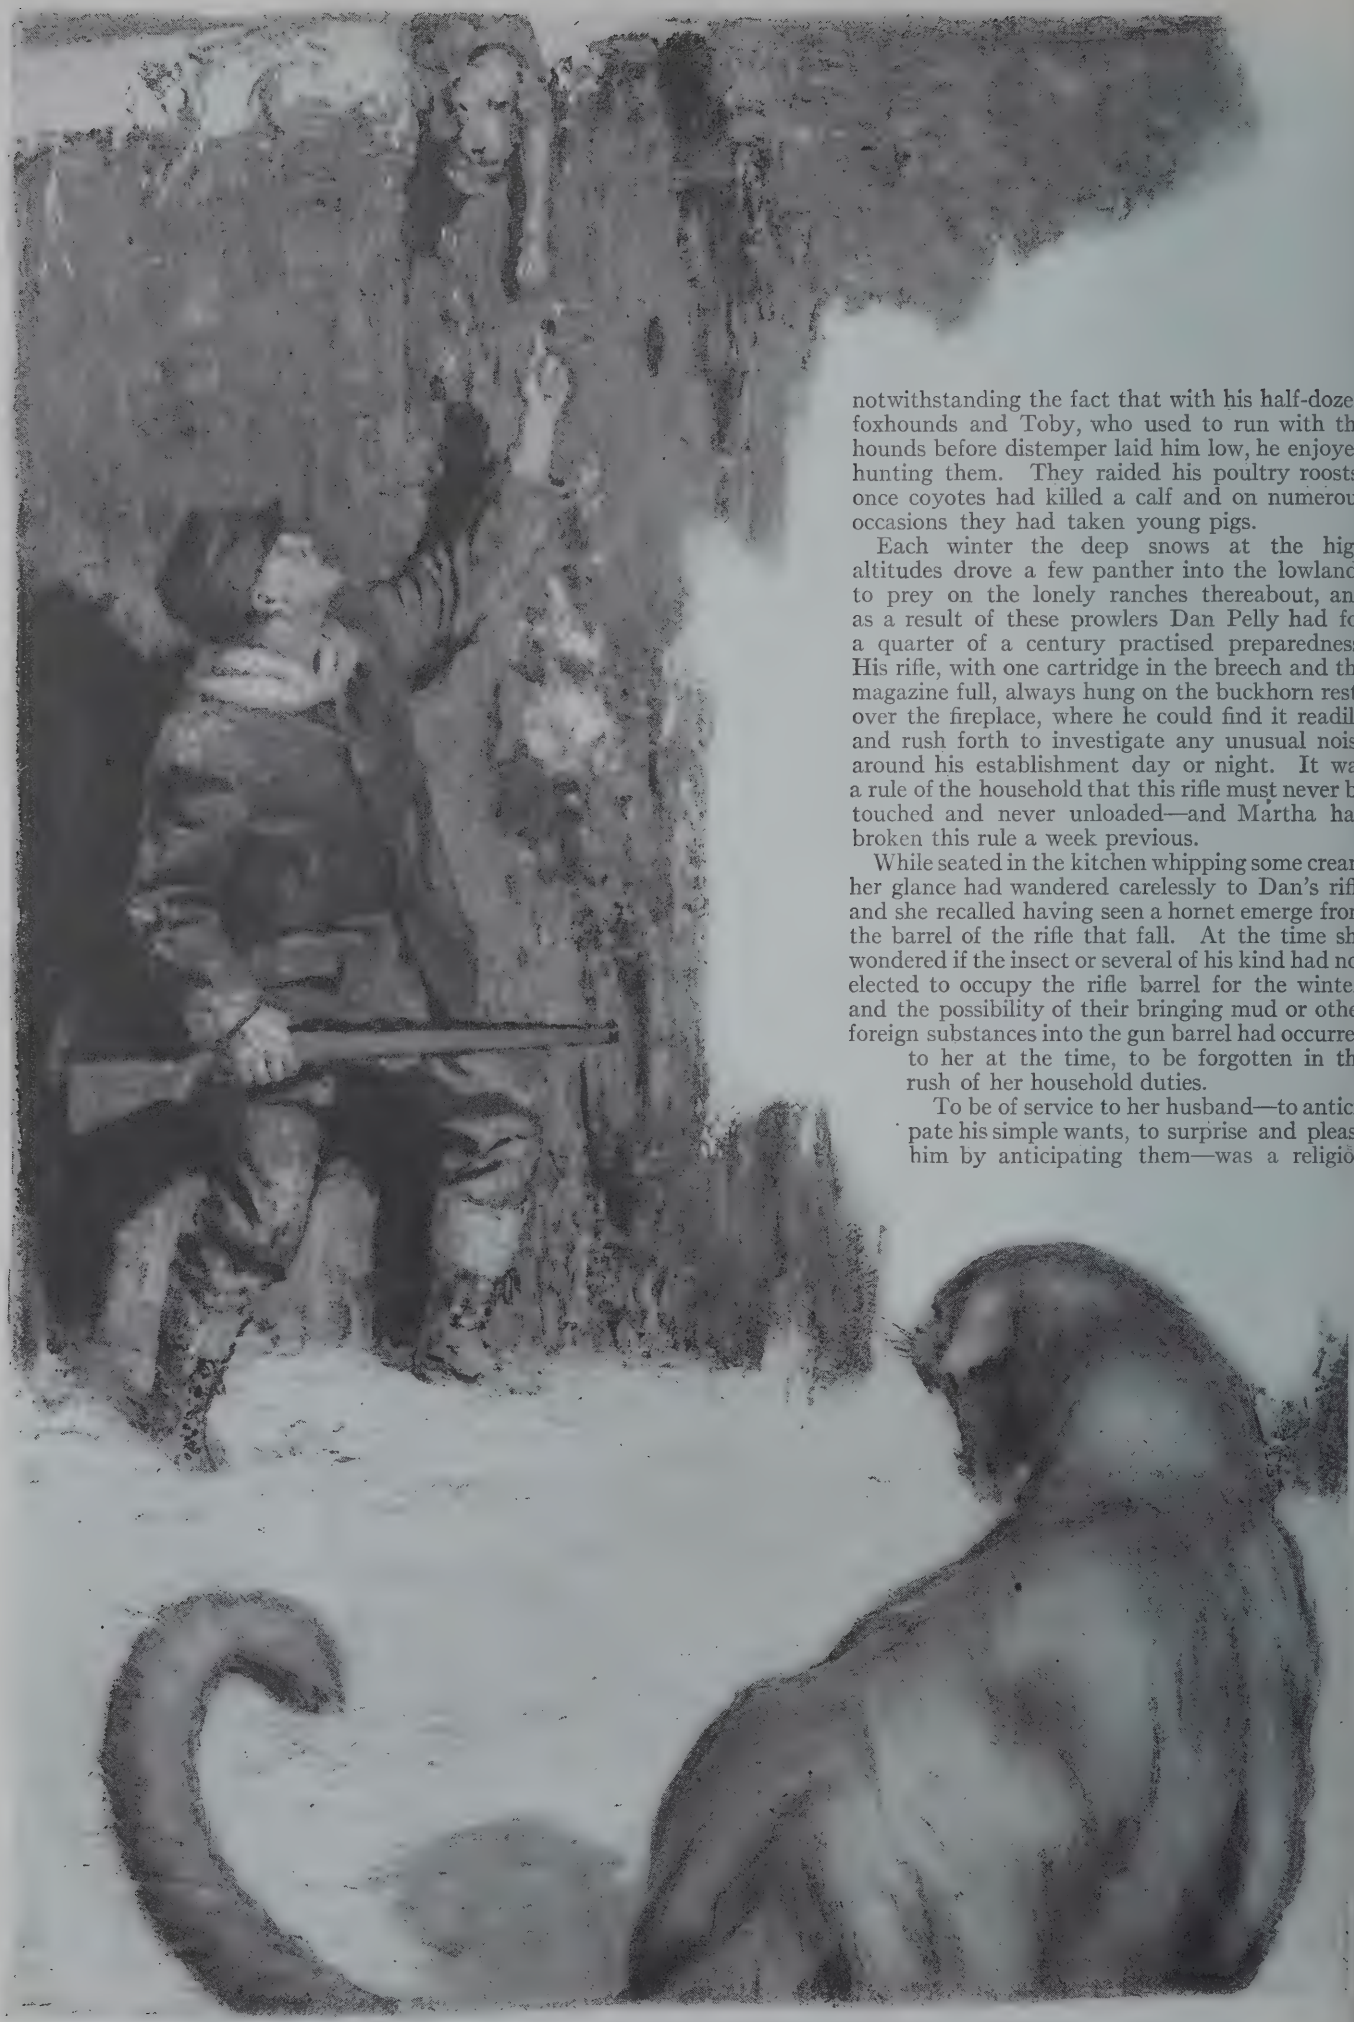
"Oh, Dan, how can you bear to do it?"

"I can't, Martha. But it's got to be done. I think he suffers a lot, although you can never tell about an Airedale. They never complain. I've a notion his grub doesn't taste any more like grub to him than sawdust does, and he's getting those blind staggers more and more frequent. Is there any chloroform left?"

Martha nodded. Dan rose, took from its buckhorn rests over the fireplace his most treasured possession—a 6.5 mm. Mannlicher-Schoenauer sporting carbine—and faced Martha.

"I'm going for a pasear up into the timber on Little Butte," he explained. "Heard grouse drumming up there last week and I have a notion I can shoot the heads off a brace of cock grouse for next Sunday's dinner. Got a few traps out up that way, too. They ought to be looked after. Lafe Foster, who rides for the Diamond Bar outfit over in the Little Antelope Valley, came through here yesterday on his way to town. I asked him to bring out our mail. He'll come by about four o'clock, I reckon, so's to get over the pass before dark. Give him the chloroform and a sponge and five dollars and tell him to bury Toby in the back garden next to Pathfinder's Princess and Old Keepsake."

He walked to the door and stood a moment looking out across the white fields. "I reckon there must be two foot of snow out there, Martha," he said presently, "but we had a fair freeze last night, so it don't seem likely I'll need snowshoes. The sun's out but there ain't no warmth to it to speak of—well, so long for a few hours, Martha."



He went to the kennels where he kept the dogs sent to him to board and train. Among the dozen or more dogs there he kept his own grand little field trial winner, an English setter named Tiny Tim. "Come on, Timmy," he called, and opened the kennel door for Tiny Tim to squeeze out. "We're going for a hike up on Little Butte. The snow's just that hard it won't ball up on your feet, and it's a grand day for a bit of exercise."

Martha watched him disappear across the field that sloped gently up to the mouth of a cañon which in turn swept gradually upward two miles to a broken and rugged country, sparsely timbered with mountain pine, laurel and madrone, and known as Little Butte from a small conical hill which buttressed its western flank. From the time Dan left the house until he and Tiny Tim disappeared up the cañon his trail was quite distinct in the snow.

Martha's eyes were sad and troubled, but around her mouth grim little lines of determination now appeared. In the Pelly household she was the leader—the strongest link in the matrimonial chain. Dan never disputed her leadership, and the fact that he had left to her the task of arranging Toby's obsequies was only another of his ways of admitting it. Lacking the courage to do the job himself, he assumed, quite naturally, that Martha would be equal to the task; so, having acquainted her with his wishes, he had beaten a retreat before she had time to protest or suggest other arrangements for Toby's disposal.

"Poor old Dan," she murmured. "He has the heart of a child. Well, Lafe Foster is not similarly troubled—oh, dear! Dan's gone away with an empty rifle. There are the six cartridges in his desk in the living room."

It was true. Dan Pelly lived in a country where coyotes, coons, lynx and bobcats were all too plentiful to suit him, notwithstanding the fact that with his half-dozen foxhounds and Toby, who used to run with the hounds before distemper laid him low, he enjoyed hunting them. They raided his poultry roosts; once coyotes had killed a calf and on numerous occasions they had taken young pigs.

Each winter the deep snows at the high altitudes drove a few panther into the lowlands to prey on the lonely ranches thereabout, and as a result of these prowlers Dan Pelly had for a quarter of a century practised preparedness. His rifle, with one cartridge in the breech and the magazine full, always hung on the buckhorn rests over the fireplace, where he could find it readily and rush forth to investigate any unusual noise around his establishment day or night. It was a rule of the household that this rifle must never be touched and never unloaded—and Martha had broken this rule a week previous.

While seated in the kitchen whipping some cream her glance had wandered carelessly to Dan's rifle and she recalled having seen a hornet emerge from the barrel of the rifle that fall. At the time she wondered if the insect or several of his kind had not elected to occupy the rifle barrel for the winter, and the possibility of their bringing mud or other foreign substances into the gun barrel had occurred to her at the time, to be forgotten in the rush of her household duties.

To be of service to her husband—to anticipate his simple wants, to surprise and please him by anticipating them—was a religion with Martha. Hence when the memory of the hornets returned to her she took down the rifle, pumped the cartridge out of the chamber and squinted down the barrel, with the breech presented against the white wall opposite. Gracious, the rifle was filthy! She couldn't see through it. With the instinct of a clean and orderly woman, therefore, she pumped the remaining five cartridges out of the magazine and cleaned and oiled the rifle thoroughly. Then, noticing that the brass shells of the cartridges, having been in the magazine several months, had commenced to accumulate verdigris, she had set them aside to clean them also.

Presently a neighbor had called and the task had been deferred; the neighbor stayed for dinner and, seeking to keep from her Dan the knowledge that the only fixed rule of his existence had been defied, Martha had placed the cartridges temporarily in a drawer in an old desk. Then she forgot about them entirely and Dan, too sure of his rifle even to slide the bolt and see that it was loaded, had departed in ignorance of the fact that he carried an empty gun and would have his appetite for grouse restrained accordingly.

Martha was annoyed but not frightened. She knew Dan would not say anything, even though he might resent her interference in the affairs of his department. But it distressed her to think of his disappointment, and since discovery was inevitable she resolved to do her best to right her error. She would tie the cartridges in a bandanna handkerchief, fasten them to Tiny Tim's collar and turn him loose on the trail of his master, with instructions to "Go—fetch." Nothing could be simpler.

She tied the cartridges in a flaming red bandanna handkerchief in order that Dan could not possibly fail to see it against the snowy pelt of Tiny Tim, and went out to the kennels. But Tiny Tim was not there and when she found the footprints of a man and a small dog in the clean snow back of the barn and leading away across the field, she realized that Dan had taken the little setter with him for company. Tiny Tim was almost entirely white and against the snowfield he had not been visible.

Disappointed, Martha returned to the house, pausing en route at the woodshed to look in at Toby. The woodshed door was locked but through a knot hole in the door she saw a small dark eye set in a halo of grizzled hair that had once been fawn-colored. Toby, standing on his unsteady hind legs to reach this knot hole, had gazed out across the field and seen his master, rifle on shoulder and accompanied by Tiny Tim, faring forth along the paths of glory while he, poor, helpless prisoner, remained behind, like a sick soldier in hospital. Martha opened the door and with a short, quick, rapturous bark, Toby sprang out, skidded, rolled over in the snow, got up foolishly and started at a stiff, unsteady lope along the track taken by Dan Pelly and Tiny Tim.

"Toby!"

Martha's high, somewhat shrill cry penetrated to the old dog's dull ears; he paused and faced about inquiringly. With a crook of her finger Martha summoned him to her and he came obediently but reluctantly.

"Toby, dear," she said, as she fastened the bandanna around his collar, "you're a poor old invalid, but you want to go so go you shall. You haven't got another hunt left in you, but you might reach Dan with these cartridges before he climbs the hogsback to Little Butte. The run and the climb will probably break your poor heart, but that will be as it should be. You should be given your chance, Toby—the chance that all good hunting dogs merit—the chance to die on the field of honor. Good dog, Toby. Go find Dan. If you can't smell him you can track him through the snow by sight. Don't come back, Toby. Cafe Foster will be waiting with a chloroform sponge at the bottom of his cowboy boot, and he'll slip the boot leg over your poor head. Good by, Toby. Good by, Johnny's dog . . ."

She was weeping silently as she returned to the house. Toby, uttering his short, rapturous barks, scurried uncertainly and not very speedily away through the snow. His head hung low as his dim eyes and dull nose sought the trail, but his tasseled tail hung high and twitched merrily. Frequently the devilish short circuit between his brain and his hind legs made him sit down clumsily, but after a minute's rest he would start on again. For Clonmel Knight, called Toby, was an Airedale, a descendant of champions, and in his family tree there had never been a coward or a weakling. He possessed in superlative degree the will to live, he will to plod on, to fight to the finish. Come what might he would not quit.

His short bark grew shriller and there was in it an eager, sobbing note as he turned into the cañon that led upward to Little Butte, for another trail had crossed that of Dan Pelly and Tiny Tim. Toby stood, swaying, on the trail and studied these footprints; then he ran his old nose into them and sniffed and sniffed.

"Dan, Dan Pelly," he barked. "It's a panther. He crossed here. He'll go up the other hogsback and come down into Little Butte. Come on, let's get him."

But there was no Dan to cheer him on, to consult with him as to the proper course to pursue. Toby hesitated, wept a little—or so his complaining whimpering appeared to indicate—and reluctantly abandoned the panther's trail to follow that of Dan Pelly. Where the trail led straight up to the hogsback from the cañon floor, Toby sat down of his own free will to rest. He was badly winded, his legs trembled and his heart ached and thumped. After a five minute rest, however, he felt better, so he started, very slowly and laboriously, to follow Dan Pelly's footprints up the hill.

Although no longer young, Dan Pelly was in the pink of physical condition. All his life he had hunted, he had never dissipated; he went up a hill faster than most men go down it. There was no game in the valley in which he was at all interested; he knew there were grouse on Little Butte, so to Little Butte he went as fast as his sturdy old legs would carry him, with Timmy frisking on ahead, ranging wide and sniffing every prospect in a vain search for quail.

Suddenly as Dan toiled upward there came to him, borne on the clear, cold air, a shrill bark from Tiny Tim. Dan paused, frowning. Was Tiny Tim forgetting his manners and barking at a grouse in a tree, or was he disgracing himself as a quail dog by running a rabbit?

The dog was not in sight. He had disappeared into the scrubby timber. But presently he barked again and this time there was terror in his bark. Indeed, it was scarcely a bark. It was a most disgraceful yelp, portentous of death in its most violent form, and Dan was not at all surprised when a black speck, which was Timmy's black ears preceding Timmy, burst from the timber and came toward Dan with all the speed of which he was capable. Indeed, so fast did he come that whatever had been pursuing him must have realized the futility of pursuit, for although Dan's keen eyes searched the edge of the timber he saw nothing. Nevertheless, he knew!

Timmy came flying up in a flurry of snow and tried to leap into Dan's arms for protection. "So you ran slam bang into a hungry panther, eh?" Dan queried the little setter. "Well, there's nothing a hungry panther likes better than a juicy little dog, so I reckon he give you a run for a hundred yards or so. Well, they're fast for a little way, Timmy, but they can't keep it up. You come to heel, Timmy, if you don't want to get et up, and we'll get on that panther's trail and see if we can't tree him. There's a state bounty on panthers, Timmy. Thirty dollars for a female and twenty for a male, and the Diamond Bar outfit over in the Little Antelope pays an additional bounty of twenty dollars for any kind of a panther killed on or near their range. And I get the pelts, too. Dang it, why didn't I bring the hounds? If old Toby were only here now, and in his old form, he'd have that panther treed in jig time. Come on, Timmy. I won't let him hurt you."

Tiny Tim, however, was not so certain of that. He was a bird dog, not a warrior, and his recent experience had quite shocked his gentle nature. He had never been pursued by a panther before and he was not anxious to repeat the terrible experience. Timmy held strongly to the opinion that it is no disgrace to run when one is afraid, so, acting upon that opinion, he turned and, tail between his legs, fled ignobly for home. Dan chuckled at the runaway and pressed on at a trot to the timber.

By following the line of Timmy's ignominious retreat Dan came promptly to the evidence of Timmy's fright. As he had suspected, it was a panther, and a full grown one at that. Following the plainly visible trail through the snow he came abruptly upon the evidences of a panther party which Timmy had evidently interrupted. In a small open space among the trees the snow was stained red, and from the opposite direction, leading up to the point of an evident tragedy, Dan observed the small, neat imprint of a deer's hoofs.

"Hum!" Dan Pelly soliloquized. "Old Señor Panther killed a deer here and was about to dine when Timmy, the little fool, dashed in and interrupted him. The panther chased Timmy away and then returned to his kill. He has carried the carcass away to eat in a spot where he will not be likely to be interrupted again."

The trail was easier to follow now. There was no possibility of mistaking it, for the drops of blood from the freshly killed deer stained the snow crimson each place the panther set his gory burden down and rested for a few moments before proceeding.

"Good big buck," Dan soliloquized. (Continued on page 153)

The BOY Who Wouldn't STAY DOWN

Illustrations by A. H. Henkel

DOWN along Manhattan's Newspaper Row he used to appear each week with a sheaf of pictures of beautiful Broadway stars. He came from an uptown theatrical office—a young Hebrew office boy with a solemn, pinched face and the enduring eyes of a race inured to oppression.

He was a comic-tragic figure whose mind seemed touched by melancholy and wonder.

Somehow dramatic editors he visited felt they should use his pictures. He had none of the brashness of the shock-proof press agent. He felt conspicuously in the way and would wait hours patiently and uncomplainingly in anterooms.

Someone dubbed him "Faithful Mike." It was a pseudonym that fitted like a glove. When playwrights, actors and Rialto elegantes come to call at the producer's office, he followed them around in wide-eyed admiration, for this solemn boy was gripped by the theater's glamour. He took care of their hats and sticks and helped them on with their overcoats.

Secretly he nursed the great ambition. To produce a play had become his all-absorbing dream, and tucked away in his inconspicuous post he absorbed every phase of the swirling life about him.

He was first at the office and last to leave, but somehow he found time to slip in to rehearsals, to read rejected play scripts and study what the theater calls "technic." Opening nights found him enthroned among the gallery gods, eager and attentive.

One day he had his bold moment and shyly told the producer of his boyish hopes.

"If you ever get a play," he pleaded, "that has just a few characters and costs little to produce I'd like to try it." Then his cheeks flamed red and he hurried out, overwhelmed by his own audacity.

In a few months a play came that had no possibilities. In a rather jesting spirit the producer turned it over to "Faithful Mike."

The lad quit his job and began the first steps of producing. All his savings went into the initial step of assembling the cast. He borrowed from anyone who would lend. There were feverish days when the play seemed destined not to leave the barrier.

Then the office boy producer would leave his rehearsals and scour the Broadway bypaths for more dollars. It was a heart-breaking struggle that a wise and cynical Rialto watched with amused tolerance.

The production opened in an obscure Pennsylvania town and failed dismally in one night—the worst "flop" in Broadway's history. The young producer was left with seven property overcoats, eleven dollars in cash and a frozen dream.

Two days later he was back at his office boy job—helping with overcoats and laughing off sophisticated jibes. And he began again his weekly pilgrimages to Newspaper Row to peddle pictures of worthier plays.

"Faithful Mike" had been a failure and nowhere is failure so colossal as along the Glittering Way. It bows only to the great god Success. Scorn, however, did not kill his enthusiasm.

It was a few months ago that the boy, perhaps a bit shyer than usual, dropped into the newspaper shops with neatly typed advance notices of another play he was to produce.

He had dug up a mystery play, of all things, in a season that had run the gamut of hair-raising thrillers. There were tolerant smiles when he departed.

How he produced the play is an account of an achievement of the impossible—an impossible story of an impossible street. Hurling himself against Broadway's flinty heart, he found it soft and simple. He knocked the illusions sky high and left the theater world stunned—this mild mannered youth of twenty-five years.

Armed only with an ignoble, hooted failure, he secured one of the most attractive playhouses in the city. He directed rehearsals in person—with a gentleness that brought moisture to the eyes of calloused players.

The opening night! Critics came because there happened to be no other opening that night and Mike was a "good kid." Too, it was a human interest story—this office boy, without skill or talent, who refused stubbornly to be suffocated by failure.

"Faithful Mike" was there in the lobby to greet them in his timid way. He was not in evening clothes and he had not touched food all day. His eyes were fever-bright and his face drawn and chalk-white.

The Death Watch arrived.

The orchestra pits filled with typical first-nighters—the hardest-boiled audience in the world. And they remained with the critics to see a bit of theatrical history making.

The play was a success—a "wallop." From the rise of the curtain it was greeted with riotous bursts of applause. A theme so threadbare as mystery had been given a new twist—devastatingly furious and shuddery.

Before the curtain fell, scouts from the ticket agencies had leaped to the telephone to notify their chiefs. The house was a "buy" and already it was sold out for six weeks and destined for a long Broadway run. Magically, it would pile up a fortune for its producer. One firm had offered a quarter-million for all rights. Statisticians say it will make two millions.

And when the audience passed out into the lobby going home, "Faithful Mike" was there helping folk on with their overcoats and fetching drinks in paper cups for the ladies. He had not yet realized he was no longer an office boy.

They found him after the theater had been darkened in an obscure corner, a little crumpled and forlorn. The dawn was breaking for him and he was greeting it with honest tears.

Part Six: CHAPTER X

VERY early in the morning, in the dark hour that precedes the dawn, Marny Geradine rode out from Algiers in the guise of an Arab boy, her slender figure concealed in the voluminous folds of a long white burnous, her fair face hidden by the haick that was pulled far forward over her brow. Beside her Hosein was riding with a wary eye on her horse, ready at any moment to catch the bridle should the nervous strength that was supporting her fail suddenly. A few paces ahead of them Carew in the dark blue burnous he affected was hardly distinguishable in the gloom.

Trembling with bodily weakness and the still lingering fear she could not conquer, she strained her eyes to keep him in sight. Only with him near her was she safe. On him and on his strength she was utterly dependent, for she had no longer any strength of her own. The courageous spirit that had sustained her for so long was broken at last, and spent in mind and body her only hope was in him.

He had sworn that she was safe, that he had passed through the Villa des Ombres unrecognized, that he had brought her unseen to his own house. But the words that had soothed her as he held her in his strong embrace seemed to lose power when he was absent. He had been obliged to leave her almost at once and the touch of his first kiss was still warm on her lips when he had hurried away to make the arrangements for which so little time was available. He had bade her rest but, nerve-racked and overwrought, rest had been impossible as she lay starting and shivering at every noise that echoed through the strange house. Like a terrified child that requires repeated and audible consolation she longed for the sound of his voice, for the tangible comfort of his shielding arms.

And now as she rode through the deserted streets of the sleeping suburb fear for herself was mingled with a new and terrible fear for him. She had as yet no knowledge of what had passed in the Villa des Ombres after she had lost consciousness, and she was obsessed with the thought of her husband. She saw him in every shadow; the very sound of the horses' feet seemed to her excited fancy like hurrying pursuing footsteps. She hated herself for her want of confidence. At the bottom of her heart she knew that her trust in Carew was implicit, that it was only her overstrained nerves that made her shiver with dread, that turned her sick each time her horse quickened his pace or swerved from some object that only he could see. She tried to fight against her weakness, to believe that her disguise was complete, but she knew that she would have no peace until the town was left behind, until, the open country reached, she could abandon the rôle of attendant and ride beside the man to whom she had given herself and gain fresh strength and courage from his nearness. And from time to time unconsciously she strove to lessen the distance between them, checking her horse again with a sharp little sigh as she heard Hosein's low voiced "Doucement, doucement" repeated warningly.

The way seemed never ending.

To avoid passing the Villa des Ombres a wide detour was necessary, and Marny began to think they would never win clear of the tree-lined avenues and succession of silent villas that appeared to extend indefinitely.

There were few abroad at this early hour, but the occasional passing of some chance pedestrian made her shrink within the folds of the enveloping burnous, wild eyed with apprehension and faint with the heavy beating of her tired heart. And once the sound of galloping hoofs behind them came near to shattering what little self-control was left to her and with a choking cry she drove her horse against Hosein's, clutching frantically at the man's arm and reeling weakly in the saddle. But it was only an Arab, wraith-like in the darkness and immersed in his own concerns, who tore by at breakneck speed on a raking chestnut that squealed an angry defiance at the other horses as he clattered past. She recovered herself with a feeling of shame for her own cowardice, wondering miserably if she would ever regain the strength and nerve that five years of crushing experience had slowly sapped from her.

Still dazed with the horror of the last few hours, she could hardly believe in the fact of her deliverance. Was it really over, the life of pain that had transformed her from a happy, carefree child into a sorrowful, disillusioned woman who had prayed for death to release her from bondage that was intolerable?

And death had been very near to her last night. She had realized it when, seeking to prevent what she knew to be an injustice, she had thrown herself between her husband and the wretched Arab valet, and Geradine, mad with drink and rage, had turned to wreak on her the same punishment he had inflicted on his servant. His face had been the face of a devil, distorted almost beyond recognition, and in his glittering red-flecked eyes she had read her fate. Temporarily insane, he was past knowing what he did; and helpless against his strength, she was well aware now that but for the coming of Carew the ghastly scene must have ended in tragedy, that body or brain must have succumbed to the fury of his passion. Never while she lived would she forget. Still close to hers she seemed to see that savage bestial face, the staring, bloodshot eyes blazing with merciless ferocity; her lacerated shoulders still quivered as if they shrank again under the cruel blows that had rained on her till consciousness fled. The brutality of years had reached culmination when, with words whose foulness had scorched her soul, he had beaten her like a dog. That was what she had been! His dog—kicked or caressed as the mood took him. A thing of no account. His chattel—sold to him like a slave in an eastern market, taken by him merely to satisfy his basest instincts.

Shudderingly she tried to banish thought, to put him from her mind, but her shaken brain was beyond control and over and over again she lived through the cruelty of the years that were past until every nerve in her aching body seemed strained to breaking point. Trembling from head to foot and bathed in perspiration she wondered if the horror of it would ever leave her, if all her life was to be a nightmare of hideous recollection.

Drooping with fatigue, her wet hands slipping on the bridle she grasped mechanically, she prayed desperately for the open country that meant freedom and happiness. And gradually yielding to the physical pain that was swamping all other feeling, she ceased to notice the locality through which they were passing and she had almost drifted into unconsciousness when the sound of the voice she had longed for roused her to the fact that at last the town was left behind. Slowly she raised her head to meet the grave eyes that looked searchingly into hers. And at sight of her face Carew reined nearer, and she felt his cool strong fingers close with practiced touch about her wrist.

"Can you hold out a bit longer, dear? We're rather close to Algiers, yet," he said. The tender anxiety of his voice made her set her teeth to keep back the sob that rose in her throat, a sob of joy and wonder at the consideration to which she was so unused.

She drew herself straighter in the saddle and smiled at him bravely.

"I'm all right," she gasped. "If—if I can ride beside you," she added faintly. His lips tightened as he eyed her doubtfully. Then without answering he wheeled Suliman towards the south.

The movements of her horse were easy, and away from the metaled roads the slow canter at which they rode was less jarring, but it took all her resolution to maintain the upright carriage she had adopted and hide from him the weakness that was steadily overcoming her. The nervous strength that had upheld her at first was slipping from her fast now that the immediate fear of discovery was past and in the reaction of relief she feared the collapse that was threatening momentarily. She pulled the haick closer about her face that he might not see the moisture lying thick on her forehead and rode on with compressed lips, fighting the spells of faintness that made her head reel and the surrounding landscape appear to waver in curious undulations before her eyes.

The dawn was brightening. Already it was light enough to see distinctly, and despite her fatigue Marny looked with interest on a district that was new to her.

For some time still their way led past farms and fruit gardens but of human life they saw little. The few field workers and goatherds they met were absorbed in their own affairs and paid no heed to their passing, or at most bestowed on them a perfunctory salaam that was due to Carew's supposed rank. He looked like a chief, she thought with a strange new feeling of pride. It was difficult seeing him thus to remember that he was an Englishman. To her he would always be an Arab, a man of the open, a desert dweller. And in the sandy wastes of the great wilderness towards which her thoughts had turned so longingly she would live with him the wild free life of her dreams, a life that might prove hard and dangerous but a life that would be made sweet by his love and companionship.

If only she need not have come to him like this! If only he had found her in the time of her unfettered girlhood when he could have taken her unstained and without dishonor! But over their love now hung the shadow of disgrace. And it was for her sake that he had done what would be held up to him as a reproach. For her sake——

He heard the sob she tried to smother and winced, his eyes sweeping the horizon impatiently. He knew that she had almost reached the limit of her endurance and his arms were aching to hold her, to ease the pain of her weary little body against his own strong limbs; but while the scattered farms still stretched about them he dared not risk the chance of passing observation. Neither, because of her weakness, did he dare to quicken their slow pace—an unaccustomed pace at which Suliman was fretting and protesting, rearing from time to time as he tried to break into the usual gallop.

But at length the last outlying vineyard was passed and, screened by the rising ground of the foothills they were approaching, precaution was no longer necessary. With a sigh of relief Carew swung his horse close to hers and bending sideways lifted her easily out of the saddle. She yielded without demur, relaxing against him with a moan of utter exhaustion. He knew that she was crying, but he knew also that the tears which hurt him so poignantly were necessary to relieve the excited brain that had gone so perilously near to destruction, and he made no attempt to check them. Tightening his arm about her he gave Suliman his head.

With a snort of pleasure the big bay leaped forward, free to go his own pace at last, galloping as he had galloped when once before he had carried double. The memory of that midnight ride came to Carew as he glanced down at the girl he held before him. With what different feelings he had carried her then! How he had revolted at her proximity, hating the slight burden that was now so precious. Every moment had been torture. Now, in the ecstasy that filled him, he wished that the way were longer, that the moment might never come when he would have to waken from his dream ride of almost unbelievable happiness and face the stern realities of the difficult course that lay before them. For an instant his somber eyes grew stern and brooding; then he thrust the thought of the future from him. There was time enough to think of that. Now he could think only of her.

His face grew very tender, very pitiful as he looked at her. Poor little tired child, bruised and broken with appalling experience—would even his love, great as it was, compensate for the suffering that had wrecked her young life? All that was best in him rose up as he caught her closer with a stifled whisper.

That he might never fail her, that she might never regret the step she had taken, never regret the faith she had in him, was the prayer that burst from his innermost soul—a prayer that was deeper, more fervent than any he had ever uttered in his life.

But as the bay tore on with long swinging strides that were the perfection of movement Carew put from him everything but the joy of the moment. After the enforced stay in a town he had come to loathe, after the tedious days of comparative inactivity made hideous by mental struggle, he felt like a man released from prison. Behind him lay all he wished to forget. Before him lay a new life, new happiness, new hope. He could hardly realize yet what it meant to him. No longer alone, with something more than his work to live for, he seemed to see the world suddenly with new eyes—a world transformed and beautified. Eagerly he looked at the brightening sky. The dawn had almost come, a dawn that was to him symbolical.

A feeling of exultation came over him. The wild rush through the air, the cool wind blowing against his face, was like an intoxicant stirring him as it always stirred him, and today more powerfully than ever before. For did he not hold in his arms his heart's desire—was not the woman he had craved his at last? With a quick fierce laugh he drove his knees into Suliman's ribs and swung him round to face the open hillside. Gallantly the horse attacked the steep incline but the gradient was punishing and gradually his pace slackened till it dropped to a walk. Picking his steps carefully amongst the scrub and boulders, he wound his way laboriously up the twisting track till he reached the summit to stand with heaving sides and wide distended nostrils.

And at the same moment the sun rose clear of the banking clouds of gold and crimson, and the full light came with startling suddenness, revealing all the wild beauty of the desolate hills. A scene of more than ordinary grandeur, or so it seemed to the man whose heart was throbbing with a passion that almost frightened him and whose whole sensitive being was thrilling and responding to the radiant glory of this the most marvelous sunrise he had ever witnessed. Behind them Hosein was on his knees absorbed in rapt devotion, and alone with her he viewed the advent of the new day, the new life that they would live together. The reins dropped loose on Suliman's neck as he raised her high in his arms till their lips met and her shy eyes fell under the ardor of his burning kiss. A kiss that with its hungry passion, its complete possessiveness, awoke her to a fuller realization of the step she had taken.

She was trembling when at last he released her, her quivering face scarlet with shame. Miserably she stared at him, struggling to free herself.

"Let me go," she moaned. "I hadn't any right to ask you—I hadn't any right to make it so difficult for you." But in her piteous eyes he read the despair that gave the lie to her stumbling, sobbing words.

"You want to go—back to him?" he said slowly.

He was answered in the sharp cry that burst from her as she shuddered closer into his arms, clinging to him with all her feeble strength. With a soft little laugh of triumph he kissed her again and turned in the saddle to shout to Hosein, who had finished his prayers and was waiting discreetly in the background.

As he ranged alongside leading the spare horse, Marny tried to raise herself.

"I'm rested now—let me ride," she murmured.

Carew saw her face contract with the pain that movement caused her, and shook his head. "You are not fit to ride. Lie still and rest," he said decisively.

"But you can't carry me all the way; I'm so heavy——" she objected faintly.

"Heavy!" he laughed. "About as heavy as an extra carbine." And following his swift glance she noticed for the the first time the leathern holster that projected beyond his knee. The sight of it reminded her of the hazardous life that would be hers and made her rebel against the weakness that seemed to make her so unfit a companion for him.

"Let me try," she pleaded.

But he shook his head again.

"Do as you're told, my dear," he said, with a smile that softened the peremptoriness of his tone. "You're worn out, and you are on the highroad to fever unless you take things easily. I can't have you knocking up out in the desert. You'll want all your strength where we're going."

Where were they going? She wondered without caring. She knew nothing of his plans. She was content to go where he took her, content to follow where he led. She had given her life into his keeping; she was satisfied to leave to him the ordering of that life. With a tired sigh she dropped her head on his breast, thankful for the support of the strong arm crooked about her, yielding to the strength that was so strangely gentle.

A drowsiness she did not attempt to combat stole over her as she lay with closed eyes listening to the murmur of the two men's voices. Dreamily she became aware that Hosein had left them and that they were alone on the top of the sun-warmed hill. Dead with sleep she felt Carew's arms tighten round her, heard without fully comprehending his explanation that he had sent the Arab on to prepare the camp for their coming, and slept as his lips touched hers.

A great gladness dawned in Carew's eyes as he stooped his head to the soft curls.

It was late in the afternoon when she woke. Still heavy and confused with sleep, at first she was conscious only of the feeling of bodily comfort that enveloped her. Her tired limbs were at rest and she lay propped against soft cushions that eased the dull ache of her wounded shoulders. With a little sigh of physical content she nestled deeper into the silken pillows, inhaling the faint oriental perfume that clung about them, wondering vaguely when Ann would come to waken her. Ann? Ann would never come to her again! Ann was gone, the victim of petty spite and tyranny. And she—— With a cry she started up, staring around her in bewilderment. Then remembrance came with a rush, and sobbing with relief she sank back on the cushions of the wide divan where once before she had slept with such curious confidence.

Hour after hour Carew lay motionless in the warm sand, the blood beating in his ears, his brain on fire.

Wonderingly she looked about the room, at the simple but costly Arab furnishings, at the well stocked gun rack that stood near the couch on which she was lying, at the litter of masculine belongings that with their suggestion of intimacy served to bring home to her even more fully than before the significance of what she had done. His room! The hot blood flamed into her cheeks and she hid her face in the pillows, whispering his name, shivering with a new sweet fear and joy that made her long for him and yet shrink from even the thought of his coming.

How long since he had brought her here? How long since she had fallen asleep in his arms on the top of the sun-bathed hill? The room was perceptibly darker when at last she raised her head and sat up, listening for some sound to penetrate from the adjoining room that should assure her of his nearness. But she heard only the distant hum of the scattered camp—the shrill squeal of an angry stallion, the doleful long drawn bray of a donkey and, near at hand, the monotonous creak and whine of some unknown piece of mechanism whose use she could not guess. Strange unfamiliar noises that yet seemed so oddly familiar, like the faint echoes of a far off memory urging the remembrance of another long forgotten life when she had lived and loved in close proximity to the sounds that now thrilled her with vague wonderings. Did love ever die—was this passion that had overwhelmed her so suddenly only the reawakening of a love that had been born in bygone ages? Had she loved him then? Had he too lived in that remote past that seemed struggling for recognition? Had their wandering souls, long desolate and alone, triumphed over the barrier that separated them to converge once more and know again the transient rapture of earthly happiness?

With a tremulous smile she slipped from the couch and went slowly to the little dressing table at the farther end of the room. Curiously she stared at herself in the tiny mirror, frowning at the weary white face she saw reflected.

The close drawn haick had been removed and, tumbled by the heavy headdress, her hair lay loose in curling waves about her shoulders. The color crept into her cheeks again as she strove to roll it up into something approaching order. As she wrestled with the few pins that remained to her, two hands placed suddenly on her shoulders made her start violently.

"Must you hide it all away? It was very pretty as it was."

There was a new note in his voice, a new hint of definite ownership in his manner as he coolly unloosened the soft coils she had hastily bound up and drew her to him. But she dared not meet his look and, surrendering to his arms, she hid her face against him in an agony of shyness.

With a tender word of expostulation he slipped his hand under her chin and raised her head. His ardent love was crying out for expression but the shamed piteousness of her eyes checked the passionate words that rushed to his lips. What was his love worth if self came before consideration? He stooped his cheek to hers.

"Do you think I don't understand?" he murmured. "Do you think I don't realize how—strange it is? But you can't be shy with me, dear. Only remember that I love you, that I'd give my life to keep you happy. I'll do all I can to make it easy for you——" But even as he spoke the restraint he imposed on himself slipped for a moment and he crushed her to him convulsively. "Child, child, if you knew how I have longed for you! If you knew what it means to me to hold you in my arms—here—to know that you are mine, mine utterly! Marny ——" He pulled himself up sharply with a gesture of compunction, his hands dropping to his sides. "Forgive me, dear," he said gently, "I didn't mean to be rough with you—I wouldn't hurt you for the world."

The tears that were so near the surface welled into her eyes and she looked at him strangely.

"Rough?" she whispered slowly. "I wonder if you know what roughness means—I wonder if you could hurt me if you tried!" Then her face contracted suddenly and her hands went out to him in shuddering appeal. "Keep me from remembering!" she cried wildly. "Help me to blot out the past. I can't tell even you. I want to forget—everything—everything but your love. Oh, my desert healer, you heal others, heal me too! Make me strong again—strong and fit to share your life, to be your helper. Don't let me think! Oh, Gervas, don't—let—me—think!"

The look he had dreaded to see again was back in her eyes and her whole body was shaking as she clung to him with all her shyness forgotten in the greater mental distress that made her seek his help and consolation. With almost womanly tenderness he soothed her, holding her till the nervous trembling passed and she lay still in his arms.

"It's over," he said at last, "over and done with. It's a new life we've begun together, dearest. A new life that will bring you health and strength and, God helping me, a greater joy than we have ever known. The desert will heal you, Marny, as it healed me years ago. Shut your mind to the past. Think only of the future—and of our happiness."

A bitter sob escaped her. "We haven't any right to be happy," she moaned. He did not answer but she felt him stiffen suddenly and her eyes leaped to his with a new fear dawning in them. "Gervas," she gasped, "what will you do—if he won't divorce me? Oh, you don't know him as I do, you don't know of what he is capable! He would do it just to feel that his power was over me still, just to keep me bound, just to hurt us. Gervas, if I can never be free, if I can never be your wife—what then?"

A shadow passed over his face as he looked down at her.

"Will the price of our happiness be too big for you to pay, Marny—or is it me that you doubt?" he asked slowly.

"Gervas——"

But his kisses stopped her frantic protestations and there was only love and pity in his eyes as he gathered her closer.

"You will always be my wife—as you are my wife to me now. Nothing can alter that. Nothing shall ever come between us. God knows how you've suffered, and He can judge me for what I have done when the time comes. But while I live you're mine and no power on earth shall take you from me." His deep voice was vibrant with passion and for a moment the fierce pressure of his arms was pain. Then as if ashamed of his own display of feeling he put her from him. "I'm a brute," he exclaimed remorsefully. "Come and eat, you pale child. I hadn't the heart to wake you before, you were sleeping so soundly."

Shyness fell on her again as he led her into the adjoining room. And throughout the meal that followed she was very silent, eating mechanically what was put before her and studiously avoiding his eyes as from time to time she glanced with furtive curiosity about the big tent.

His heart ached for her as he watched her with an intentness he was careful to conceal. He was longing to help her, longing to make easier the difficult situation which he knew she was only now realizing in its entirety, fearful of augmenting her constraint by any word or gesture that should emphasize the new relationship between them. Love made it easy for him to guess her thoughts. With fine intuition he understood perfectly the struggle that complete realization must have awakened in her mind. Though she loved him, though she had given herself to him, still he knew that she must be shrinking sensitively from the consequences of her own act. His arms had been a refuge she had turned to in her need, but they were the arms of the man who loved her, and here in his tent she must be facing the hard fact of her obligation, facing the payment of her freedom—a payment that only love could make endurable.

More than ever did his own love clamor for utterance but he gripped himself resolutely, playing the part of impassive host with almost cold courtesy while he attended to her wants and keeping the conversation strictly to trivialities. And trivial conversation was not easy. They knew so little the one of the other. He had as yet no knowledge of her tastes, no knowledge of her interests. In spite of the love that had swept them both off their feet they were, to all intents and purposes, strangers to each other, and further hindered by her shy reserve, a common meeting ground was difficult to find.

But when the short twilight had faded and the lamps were lighted in the tent, when Hosein had come and gone for the last time, leaving them alone, he found it impossible to maintain the detached attitude he had adopted, impossible to avoid reference to certain subjects that must of necessity be discussed between them.

The sense of their aloneness, the intimacy of the moment, was stirring him deeply and the sight of her lying amongst the heaped up cushions of the divan, lovelier than he had ever seen her, infinitely pathetic as she seemed in her utter dependence on him, was an appeal that was too strong to be resisted. His heart was beating furiously as he went to her.

And affected no less than he, her breath came fast and her shy eyes met his for only a moment as she moved to make place for him. Sitting down beside her he caught her slim hands up to his lips. Then, still holding them in his firm grasp, he crashed through the faint barrier that had risen between them and spoke with unreserved frankness of the future and the life that they would share together. And afterwards, because he believed that only by mutual confidence and trust could their love be perfected, he broke the silence of years and told her the story of his life, the tragedy that had wrecked his early manhood and driven him to a self-imposed exile, and of the consolation he had found in the work that had become so dear to him. And his own confidence ended, he drew from her bit by bit the history of her girlhood and pitiful marriage. But of what she had suffered at the hands of the brute to whom her brother had sold her she would say nothing.

A LOVE Story by our old friend

FRANK R. ADAMS

The LUCK That Failed

Illustrations by Charles D. Mitchell

THE blessed, blessed relief of not having the youngsters to take care of for one whole day.

Carmelita Bellegarde, combination nursemaid, governess and slave to the Scott-Murphy children called down a blessing upon their aunt, Mrs. Lydia Scott-Murphy, who believed that the bringing up of children should not be relegated to servants and was giving a twenty-four hour demonstration of what motherly care could do for them.

Carmelita wished her luck—fervently—but she had no illusions. The twins and Mary Louise would be back in her care, for good, by morning. There was not much hope that Aunt Lydia would ever care to repeat the experiment. No one who was not paid for it generously would ever deliberately seek the society of the spoiled little Scott-Murphys a second time.

Therefore it behooved Carmelita to make the most of her freedom. Even Mr. and Mrs. Scott-Murphy were away for the day, visiting friends at Del Mar. There wasn't a thing on the program except to have a good time.

The trouble was that, at Coronado, there isn't much to do unless you are one of the swells, and even then you have to know the right crowd. From the veranda of the hotel Carmelita surveyed the beach. It was all nice and glisteny in the morning sun. Old Mother Pacific had scrubbed it clean with an overnight storm. Even yet the rollers were pretty high. But they were subsiding.

Several riding parties were galloping on the hard sand left by the receding tide, the women all in gleaming white, the men with white breeches too, but dark coats usually—with a few colored ones.

In front of the hotel on the curved driveway were several insolent beasts of high powered cars waiting indolently for passengers more indolent than themselves who were chatting on the veranda steps preparing for the tremendous fatigue of being driven somewhere for luncheon.

Carmelita sighed rebelliously. She could not take part in the expensive pleasure of either the riders or the drivers. It took money, clothes and social position to make one eligible for either group. Oh well, it didn't matter! Carmelita had made her own bed when she had struck out for herself. She was doing the work of an inferior; she would have to accept whatever disadvantage the caste system thrust upon her.

Still, she wanted to amuse herself. She was as pretty as most of the girls in the white breeches astride the galloping horses, prettier than any of the ladies in sports costumes and gay sweaters who loitered on the veranda. There ought to be something interesting going on that even a nursemaid could participate in unobtrusively. She wasn't wearing a uniform and there was no brand of service on her forehead.

And she was in a receptive mood.

Carmelita sauntered down the steps doing a careful imitation of the dollar duchesses who did nothing else all day. She pretended that she felt very supercilious and if one of the other nursemaids who worked for families staying at the hotel had been in the path she would doubtless have stepped on her without noticing that something crunched under her heel.

She strolled with studied, loitering steps along the beach walk past the garages to the bathhouse. There she stood for a moment in the pose of a lady wondering whether to go for a plunge in the pool or just to rest.

Why not?

She had been there before with the children and she liked swimming. It was a democratic institution.

And she had a bathing suit that had never been worn yet. Darn good reason why not, too. It was one that her loving aunt had sent her from Deauville and while it was the most conservative pattern that could be obtained at the French resort it was still two laps and a couple of jumps ahead of anything that was being displayed in the land of the (except for a few amendments) free. Certainly it had not been appropriate in the least for a nursemaid who cared to retain her job.

But today was different.

Carmelita went back to her room and got the little waterproof bag that contained the garment which she had privately named "The Disgrace of Deauville" and a modest bathrobe.

The bathrobe was a happy thought. Because when she got the economical costume on she had a panic. There is no use trying to describe how she looked in it except to say that it was dull black but that the effect was not in the least somber because there were so many places where it wasn't.

Carmelita, who had adopted Puritan standards because she was brought up in America far from her French and Spanish relatives, thought she appeared immodest. As a matter of fact she didn't. Probably it was because she was so young yet and so unspoiled. There were beginning curves in her figure but scarcely noticeable ones and her face wasn't an experienced face at all. Nothing was written on it yet but gentleness and naïve charm. There wasn't even very much beauty there, mostly alertness and sympathy, rather like a friendly pup whose expression says "What'll we do now?" If you looked at her attentively for some little time she "got you," as the saying is, but there was nothing flamboyant about her allure, nothing to arrest the gaze of a roving eye.

Carmelita had gotten clear out of her dressing room before she got her final attack of stage fright and decided that she could never in all the world take off her bathrobe and dive into the pool before all the crowd that was assembled. It was the morning bathing hour and there were a good many there including nonparticipating spectators.

Still, she had shown herself and it looked silly to go back. Happy thought! The ocean was just outside. She had noticed that no one was going in on the beach owing to the surf but she was a good swimmer and had no fear. No one would see her at all outside, or, if a few did, they would be so far away that they would not notice her costume.

She was in luck. There was only one lone, solitary beach rider in sight and he or she was quite a way off. Carmelita practically had the Pacific to herself.

From the shelter of the bathrobe out to deep water was only a ten second interval. Once submerged and swimming she murmured a blessing on the head of the French designer who had conceived the streamlines of her maillot. It surely was fun to have one's movements in the water absolutely unhampered by clothes. It was next to being a mermaid. Carmelita, luxuriating in her freedom and confident of her strength as a swimmer, headed out to sea.

Because she was swimming on her back with her eyes on the tossing sky and her ears under water she neither saw nor heard what transpired on the beach she had just left.

The lone horseman coming up toward the hotel from the south had seen her plunge in, apparently struggle with the waves for a while and then disappear. He arrived on thundering hoofs and stopped where her bathrobe marked the spot she had gone in.

He shaded his eyes with his hands but the head he had at first seen bobbing around through the surf was no longer in view. He thought he saw a submerged something out there but he wasn't sure.

To the mind of the horseman this was no occasion for discussing pros and cons. The situation required action and he came from a country where action largely takes the place of words.

"In you go, Paint," he said to his horse, heading the latter straight for Honolulu and making him wade out despite a quite natural equine aversion to wet feet. "Don't stop to tell me you don't savvy salt water. Neither do I. Let's git."

The break of the waves was already slapping the horse in the belly and he didn't like it one little bit. But he had a foolish idea that the man astride of his back was greater than the Pacific and would doubtless guide him safely out on the other side. So he went in deeper and deeper and finally began to swim.

"Good boy, Paint," his master encouraged. "You'll be sproutin' fins and flippers yet. That party ought to be right about—here she is."

Carmelita coming up from a swim under water found her surprised self almost alongside a swimming horse, probably the last thing she had expected to collide with out in that particular ocean.

More breath-taking even than the discovery of the horse in her bathtub was the next thing that happened, which was that the man in the saddle flopped off into the water beside her, grabbed her unceremoniously under his arm and hanging on to his mount's tail in some mysterious way guided him to the shore.

It was a very mad mermaid whom the gallant horseman planted upright on her own feet there on the beach. She was so mad that she forgot for the moment how very scanty her glued-on rompers were and she stamped her foot like the spoiled child that she looked.

"What do you mean by yanking me out of the ocean like that?" she demanded.

By this time her distinctly disheveled rescuer had begun to realize that perhaps he had made an error. Carmelita was not even puffing and she was not water-logged as a drowned person should be.

"Why?" she asked again.

He grinned. "Well, they wasn't anyone in sight but you so I rode out to ask the way to Hotel del Coronado."

As the hotel was in unmistakably plain sight and as no other building could ever be confused with its rambling mid-Cleveland elegance the girl did not deign to answer.

"I didn't aim to give offense, ma'am. It just happens that me—I mean I—and my pony here ain't none too familiar with the customs on the ocean and we thought when you went down and didn't come up you was drowned."

"Didn't you guess I was swimming under water?" Carmelita had picked up her bathrobe by this time and had thrown it over her shoulders.

"No, ma'am," the man assured her, "we didn't know a body could do that."

"Can't you swim under water yourself?"

"No, ma'am, none whatever. Not under nor over. The facilities ain't remarkable out where I come from, down Little Pecos Valley way, and I ain't never learned to swim. I wasn't just positive Paint—that's the cayuse—had any education along that line either until after we got quite a ways out."

"You can't swim?" Carmelita echoed, incredulous, "and yet you went out in a sea like that? Absurd!"

"Yes, ma'am. I kinda thought so myself. If you're all right I'll be goin' on. Thank you kindly for telling me where the hotel is."

She hadn't told him that, hadn't told him anything in fact, but she felt too ridiculous to call him back and say that she had been unspeakably ungracious to a person who had taken incalculable risks in venturing out into the heavy surf and treacherous undertow without the slightest knowledge of swimming, merely to rescue a perfect stranger.

Before she could conquer her pride he had mounted damply and loped away at the easy gait of a range rider.

He looked well in the saddle although his English cut riding clothes were an anachronism on him. And his voice had been pleasant even if choice of language symbols was a little uncouth.

Yes, she rather liked him now that it was too late.

II

She recollected him pleasantly all through luncheon, which she ate as usual in the children's dining room quite sequestered from the gay crowd in the enormous main hall. His advent had put quite a little edge in the day, enough to last her for a dull week to follow.

Carmelita rather imagined that she had exhausted the possibilities of Coronado for adventure but after luncheon she put on her best afternoon dress anyway. It could not easily be distinguished from the best afternoon dresses of most of the guests. To tell the truth it had been Mrs. Scott-Murphy's best afternoon costume until the week previous, when Mrs. Rear-admiral Blennon, "Why, it's Carmelita!" said Mr. Scott-Murphy, who had a slightly roving eye. "My dear girl, walk down the avenue a ways and we'll go for a ride." "I have an engagement," Carmelita lied.

whom Mrs. Scott-Murphy couldn't see with binoculars, had appeared in one like it before Mrs. Scott-Murphy had sprung hers. Then her mistress had given hers to Carmelita with the stipulated condition that she should wear it as often as possible when off duty.

Which was no hardship because it was a lovely thing in rust color with a severely simple knot of old gold ribbons at the left shoulder. Carmelita had a stunning hat that went with it which she had made herself. It was large, black, and had a veil hanging from its left brim. The entire effect was that of a lovely English girl who has let a French modiste bring out her best points.

Carmelita knew from consulting, first her mirror and then the glances of one or two people whom she passed, that she had achieved an effect. It seemed too bad to be all dressed up with nothing particular in prospect but after all it was something to be dressed up. She went outdoors to show herself off.

On the hotel driveway were parked many, many cars.

Carmelita looked them all over as if searching for her own personal equipage. It was fun to imagine what it would be like to sit back amid that luxurious upholstery and order about the smartly liveried chauffeurs.

The car she liked the very most was an open one with a deep maroon body and a powerful black snout that looked as if it might be friendly. There was nothing supercilious about that car and yet it had swank. It acted as if its owner loved it and, in return, it loved back.

She wondered who did own it and raised her eyes from her inspection of the running gear. There was no one in the tonneau but in the driver's seat sat her rescuer of the morning. He was wearing a blue suit now and a cap, but in those clothes, too, he seemed to hint at chaps and a sombrero.

He smiled as she caught his eye. He looked as if he hoped she would speak.

So she did.

"Good afternoon," she said.

"Good afternoon, ma'am."

"I was so surprised and embarrassed this morning," she continued graciously, "that I'm afraid I was not very polite. I didn't even thank you for risking your life to save mine. I do wish to thank you now."

"It wasn't anything, ma'am. When I went after you I didn't know you were so—so beautiful or I wouldn't have had the nerve to do it but as a matter of fact I sort of half had the idea that if I saved somebody's life they might be willing to talk to me. You see I've been awful lonesome since I came down San Diego way."

"Don't you know anybody?"

"Not really," he confessed. "Not the right sort of people. I'm all jake with the race track gang that hangs out at the Grant Hotel in town—that's where I'm stopping—but I'm a rank outsider with all this Army and Navy gang and the society swells that lives here. I bought me the right kind of clothes—even the dude riding pants you saw this morning—but that ain't all that's the matter with me, I guess."

Carmelita felt that the interview had gone far enough. "You are waiting for someone?" she suggested, starting away

"Why," Carmelita asked, "is everybody so glum?" said Dan. "We're among the few who are not going

"They bet on Surfboat," to tear up their tickets."

"Not now, ma'am, not since you came out."

"You were waiting for me?"

"Yes." Right straight from the shoulder, too. "I tried to keep myself from being a darn fool but it wasn't any use. I had to come over and see if you didn't come out again. So I did."

"But what for?"

"Well, until I saw you I was hopin' I'd have the nerve to ask you to go for a ride with me but now I don't dast."

He grinned at her shyly as he put his invitation in the only way that she could possibly have considered it. The onus of regarding it as an invitation at all was strictly up to her.

Finally she grinned back.

"I'll go with you." She climbed in beside him.

"Gosh a'mighty!"

Carmelita grew all warm inside. It was nice to have such genuine surprised homage from a man whose masculinity and method satisfied her ideals more fully than did those of the winter resort idlers whose weaknesses she had viewed long and microscopically from the undercrust.

There was a good deal of traffic.

"I wonder where everybody is going?" Carmelita asked.

"To Tia Juana," her driver replied, stealing a place in ahead of a big limousine. "It's almost time for the first race. Would you like to go?"

Would she? Of course. Carmelita had never been across the California border into Mexico and had never in all her life seen a horse race. Here were two adventures held temptingly before her. But she must not be too eager, must appear to be blasé.

"It's about the only thing to do, isn't it?" She managed the air of indifference perfectly.

He sighed. No use to tell her that he had not dared to hope that she would give him that much of her time.

The afternoon was an act right out of a musical comedy. The sun was bright and happy, the slumbering hills in the background were distant scenery and everybody had on spick and span clothes and smiled. Later there was an orchestra.

Carmelita was full of sparkle. There had not been anyone in her life for a long time with whom she had cared to exchange ideas. She had to be careful not to tell him anything about herself and the conditions under which she was living, but Carmelita knew other things, had traveled a good deal and had read much. On mundane subjects her mind was a considerably greater reservoir than that of her companion. On the other hand he had a novel point of view and a shrewd estimate of character and conditions that demonstrated an innate cleverness and education of another sort.

As a matter of fact he had graduated from a Western university.

"I know the rules of grammar and everything. I got in the habit of talking Western from associating with the ridin' crews at the motion picture studios. BEAUTY in distress! What chivalrous emotions are stirred! And yet there are times when an unfeeling world looks on, wreathed in smiles, with never a helping hand extended. Take, for example, a lady leading two pups. A crowded sidewalk, the roar of motors, the shrilling notes of traffic whistles, a thousand and one distracting sights and sounds. GRIEF is not commonly considered a subject for amusement. Tears are sobering things. Distress disturbs, and yet there are times when even these may have their silver lining.

It is spring. The windows are open, the curtains lazily flapping. In the farmyard sounds the hen's maternal cluck, a distant anvil rings, there is a sprightly sound of hammering, the strokes rising in rhythmic cadence as the nail is driven home. Children's voices come from every vacant lot. The cloud of winter is passing and hearts are happier for no particular reason. In other words, Spring.

Little "Wobbie" tags along, hated by his elder brother who has been delegated to guard and protect him from harm and danger. Spring is calling, temptations rear up on all sides, elder brother is full of vitamines. He hearkens to the call and little Wobbie is left high and dry, and very mad. People pause and another smile leaves its impress upon the ages.

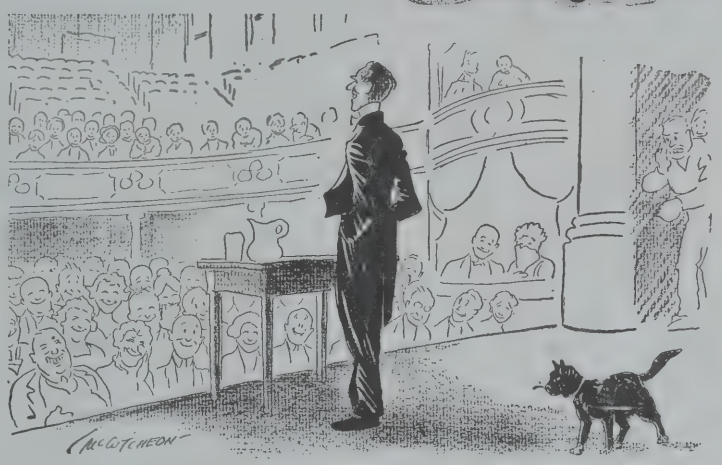
SOMETIMES they appear—a refreshing breath from the simpler places. The blight of sophistication has not yet ettled down upon them. Hand in hand, absorbed and unonscious, they lay their frank affections before a mocking orld. They haven't learned that sentiment shown in pubc becomes the cue for empty laughter.

But real affection has great dignity, no matter where or ow revealed. So that when clinging souls unashamed walk own the busy streets, worldly faces soften beneath the int and there are wistful aches in abused and battered earts.



They leave a glow like sunshine in the wake of a thousand iiles.

The speaker's depression as soon communicated to e audience. He could not ake his jokes crack. The old sure fire ones were missing on all cylinders. The audience stared in stony silence.

Suddenly the frozen faces melted. "At last I'm getting 'em over," thought the lecturer. His spirits rose. New reserves of vitality responded to the call. Confidence returned. The smiles spread, laughter and snickering brightened the hall, the funereal gloom of a moment before was magically transformed. That night he wrote home that the lecture was a huge success: "Started off slow, but I got 'em at last."

DEMOCRACY, a noble institution more frequently preached than practiced. In the rounded phrases of ie spellbinder, it is pictured as the ark of freedom, the ılladium of our liberties, whatever that means, and the olden bond that unites peoples in liberty, equality and aternity. Stirring words!

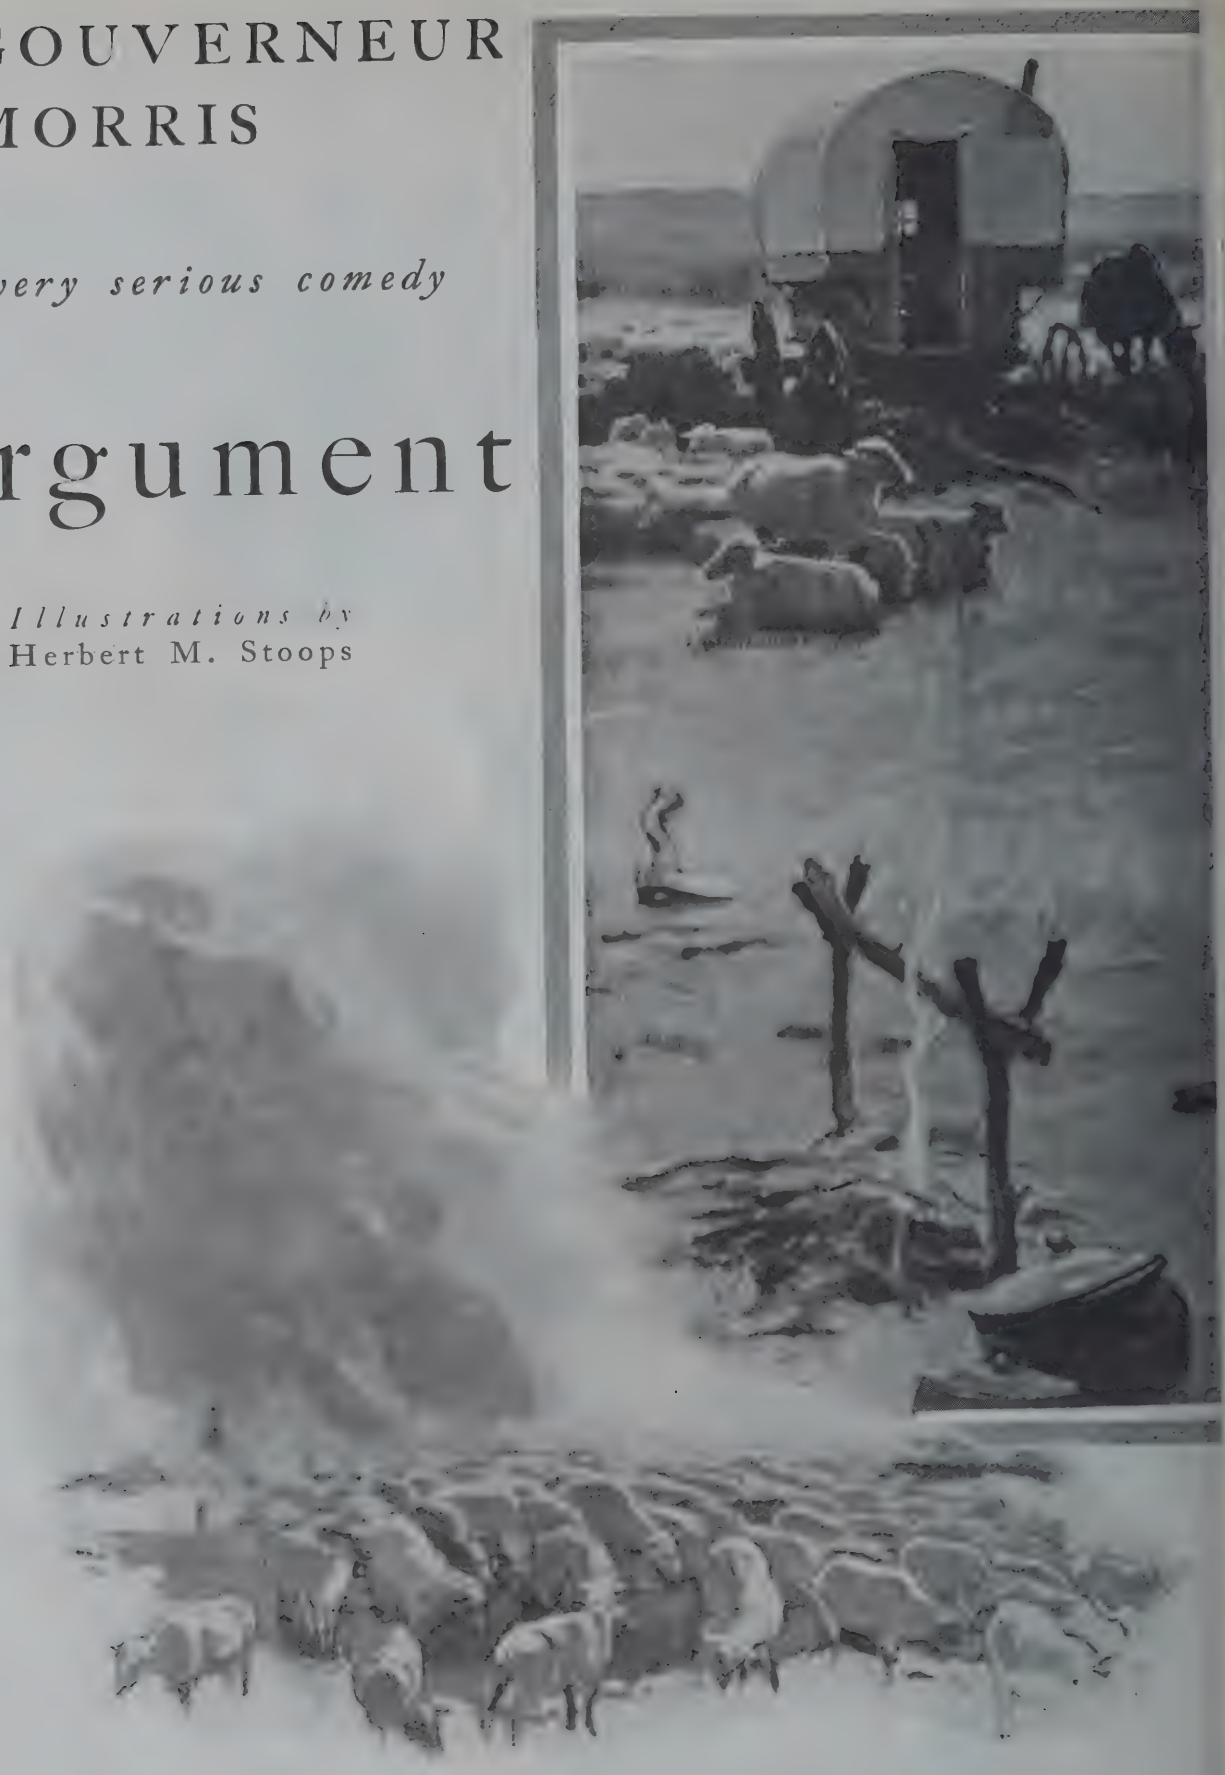
Everybody starts out in life with a full complement of emocratic principles. Up to three, every child, rich or oor, is by nature democratic. He knows no class distinction, the friendly advance of the stranger is taken at its ce value, he trades smile for smile and is happy.

In his truly democratic soul, he harbors no base suscions. He expands joyously to every friendly breeze, matter from what lowly quarter. He is the real demoat. By five he has slowly edged, or been pushed, away om that delightful no-man's land where caste and class nsciousness are unknown, and a few years later he begins wonder if democracy isn't just something to talk about political campaigns.

ORIGINALITY, confidence and self-reliance! Splendid qualities! Without these the world would stagnate, progress would falter, humanity would lean.

Take the sign painter, for instance. Serene in his self-confidence, he is giving his originality a pleasant ride. His beautiful sign contains an unsuspected flaw. There is one consonant overweight.

A man has paused with a sudden look of interest. A crowd gathers. Smiles bloom but the painter paints serenely on. He is used to admiring people. They are no treat to him, but he adds a few extra flourishes as a slight concession to the vulgar herd.



If some kind hearted soul, eager to do good, should tell him he is making a fatal error, the painter would turn around and set down his paint pot, run a withering glance up and down the well meaning stranger, take out his pipe, spit and then inquire in a scathing voice, "Say, who asked you to butt in here?"

Argument

THIS world is full of works that have to be done. Some men are born to find diamonds, some to cut diamonds and some to wear them; and some men are born to keep bees or raise hogs. Domes have to be gilded, and cesspools have to be cleaned. And there's never any end to anything. And there won't be ever until the world falls into the sun.

Just so long as the world keeps its distance from the sun it will need blankets. If there weren't any sheep there wouldn't be any blankets, and there soon wouldn't be any sheep if there weren't men and dogs to take care of them. Herding sheep is one of the world's works that has to be done. It has its good sides and its bad sides. And it's mostly done by men who can't get along with other men, or put up with their laws and their talk—talk, talk, talk, all day talk—and who get shoved out of the cities and towns into the open.

It must have been the Indian in Joe that didn't like talk. He never saw but one girl that he wanted to have around all the time. She was a poor relation of the Camposantos. Nobody wanted her except Joe. He spoke to the priest about her, and the priest said she was no good to anybody, and if he wanted to marry her nobody would stand in the way. So they were married. He never knew whether she wanted to go with him or not. He didn't know how to ask her and she couldn't have answered him if he had. She'd had scarlet fever when she was little and it had left her deaf and dumb.

"After that," said Mescal, "I get to feeling pretty lonely and so I come to you and we join flocks."

He wasn't always glad that he'd taken her to live with him, but when she died and was gone for good he knew that he'd rather have had her back with him than not. She was company; not too much company like most people, but just enough.

He didn't mind good talk. He didn't mind being told things that he didn't know. He had a book of knowledge in six volumes, and he read it over and over until he knew everything that was in it. It was the only thing he ever had that he set a big value on; but when he knew everything that was in it, its value was gone and he threw it away. What's the use of pointing and saying "There's the beans?" Pointing is enough. People are always telling you things that you know already; like "it's a warm day" or "it's a cold day." Before he was driven to sheep herding he'd known people, men and women, who'd spend a good ten or twelve hours a day wasting words, and be hard at it the next morning. Most of the people he knew were like that. So he pulled out. And he never went near a town except when he had to buy supplies.

Nobody would be so foolish as to say that Joe was a good citizen. He seldom knew who was President, or why. He wasn't clean. He hardly ever changed his clothes, except during the rainy season when they got too wet for comfort. And he wouldn't have known what to do with a toothbrush. But good citizen or not, he did his little share in the world's work—the work that simply has to be done—and he did it well and honestly. He neither praised himself for doing this nor pitied himself for having to do it.

The only home that he knew was a little van on wheels. It had a window and a stovepipe. A gray horse pulled it from range to range. And the sheep, dirty gray with adobe dust, went ahead of it, and behind it, and on either side, almost as far as the eye could see. A formidable cloud of dust moved above them and followed them from pasture to pasture. Bolo, a gray dog descended from wolves, marshaled the sheep and gave them their orders. He was very old and wise and silent.

Wars lasting many years have been fought for smaller territories than that over which Joe and Bolo ranged with their sheep. Kingdoms, empires and republics with fewer acres to their names have affected the whole history of civilization.

Like so much of California it was a region strong in soil and weak in water. Rain fell upon it occasionally during four months of the year. These rains forced the wild grasses and flowers into a fantastic growth and profusion. And their sudden and complete cessation forced these same vegetables into a premature period of ripening and rest. Ponds evaporated to nothing. Rivers turned into sand and pebbles and dust. Here and there at wide intervals water from underground sources managed to exist as water until the replenishing rains came back again.

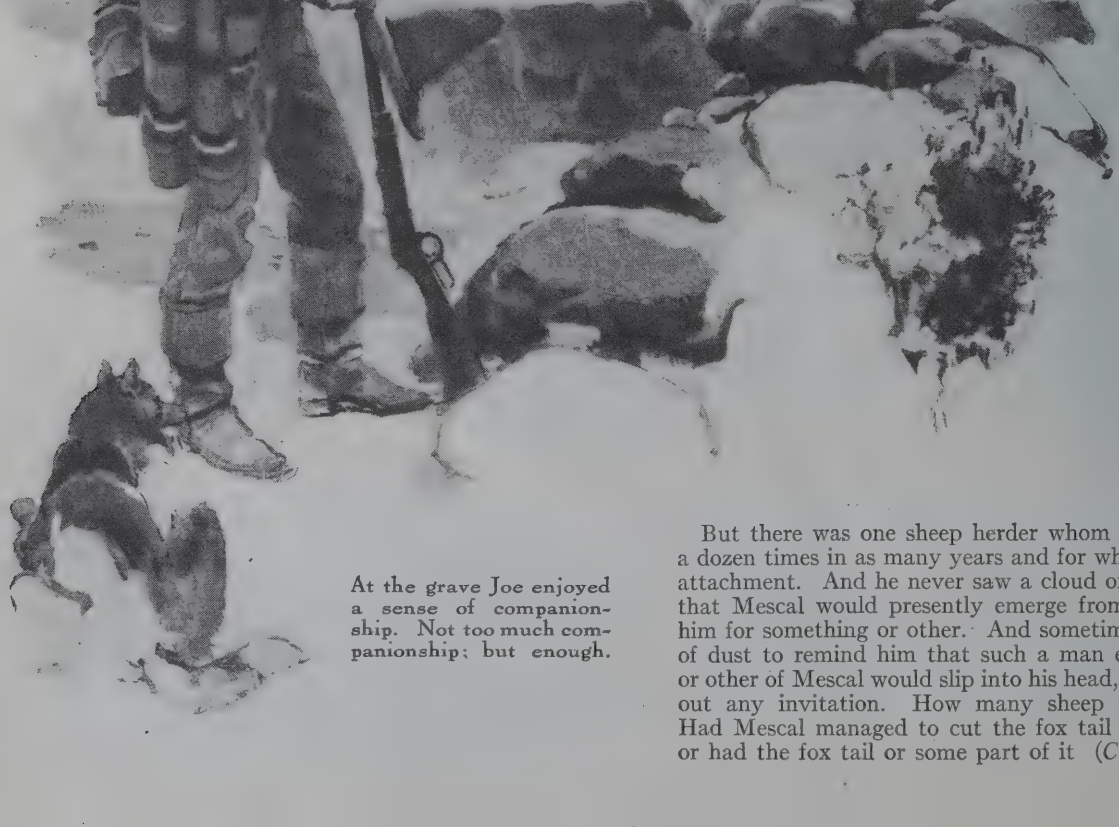
From the first of July until November the whole region was the color of very old dry hay, upon which the sunshine lay very thick and hot, and over which, every afternoon, a drying wind blew strongly.

There were many mountains and hills. And many of them were densely covered with chaparral. Chaparral is a miniature forest. It has about the same ratio to a squirrel that a regular forest has to a man. It is composed, and very densely, of twisted and tormented trees, some of which are very very old and all of which are very hard and tough. By midsummer it is a dead forest, brown and gray, and thick with dust. The roots of the chaparral trees are very fine grained and heavy. They burn like coal, and they come in handy when a sheep herder runs out of kerosene.

Deer, coyotes, bears and even lions have made roads and runways through the chaparral. So have sheep and cattle. It is a network of such roads and runways, twisting, turning, crossing and recrossing. Nearly all the bears and lions had long since passed out of the region over which Joe and Bolo herded their sheep, but like the ancient Romans the roads which they made have survived them.



But these roads are more like tunnels than roads. To follow those which the cattle have made, a man must be forever ducking his head. To follow the deer roads and the bear roads he must double over and bend his knees. Only Bolo could follow the sheep into the chaparral and drive them out.

There was little for the sheep to eat in the chaparral and less for them to drink, but it had a perverse attraction for them. They soon, however, became confused even among the runways which they themselves had made, and gave themselves up for lost. Then they would find their tongues and bleat terribly for help and guidance, especially if night were falling.

Once every year Joe camped for some weeks near the spot where he had buried his wife. The cairn of limestone boulders and the wooden cross which marked her grave and prevented the coyotes from exhuming her body gave him pleasure. He was proud of it. It is not given to every man to build up with his own hands a pile of stones which will last indefinitely.

In this monument to the deaf and dumb woman, and in this protective covering for her humble body, the one creative impulse of his life had had its fulfillment.

The grave was almost a personality to him. In its neighborhood he enjoyed a sense of companionship. It was not the complete companionship which some men enjoy; not too much companionship; but enough.

At the grave Joe enjoyed a sense of companionship. Not too much companionship; but enough.

II

Sometimes far off Joe and Bolo saw vast clouds of dust moving slowly in this direction or that. And they knew that these clouds of dust concealed other flocks of sheep, other sheep herders and other dogs.

Sometimes a man would emerge from one of these dust clouds and come toward them. It might take him an hour or even two hours to get to them. When they first saw him he might be five or six miles away; and many people would not have been able to see him at all. But Joe and Bolo had eyes like telescopes, and the moment the speck of a man emerged from his cloud of dust and began to move toward them Joe would think to himself: "That is Henry. He is out of tobacco." Or, "That is little Pico," or, "That is Alvarez. He still limps."

Without exception the veins and arteries of these sheep herders carried the blood of more than one race. Henry was more Portuguese than Indian. Little Pico and Alvarez were more Indian than Spanish. They were silent and simple men. Their wills seldom entertained more than one purpose at a time. Henry, for instance, would come for the purpose of buying a little tobacco. When he had secured the tobacco another purpose would possess him to get back to his sheep.

Joe himself seldom paid visits to the other sheep herders. He was a forward looking man and nearly always had everything that he needed packed away in his little gypsy wagon. He vastly preferred his own dust to that of others.

But there was one sheep herder whom Joe had seen perhaps a dozen times in as many years and for whom he had formed an attachment. And he never saw a cloud of dust without hoping that Mescal would presently emerge from it and come to ask him for something or other. And sometimes without any cloud of dust to remind him that such a man existed, some thought or other of Mescal would slip into his head, all by itself and without any invitation. How many sheep was Mescal herding? Had Mescal managed to cut the fox tail out of his dog's foot, or had the fox tail or some part of it (Continued on page 120)

The Younger Mr. BURRAGE

Illustrations by Raeburn Van Buren

AT FIVE o'clock on the twenty-ninth of June, Philip Fairbain Burrage stepped down from the taxi that had brought him to the Burrage home on Eaton Avenue. The paying of the fare and the removal rom the taxi of certain articles too precious to be entrusted to he expressman marked definitely the end of his college career nd the beginning of something new.

Philip Fairbain looked exactly what he was—an awfully nice oy. He had awfully nice blue eyes that stared people up and lown without making them uncomfortable, and an awfully nice quarish chin, and a nice slow smile that was rather worth vaiting for. During his four years at the university he had disinguished himself academically in no way save by the narrowess of the margin by which he had passed his examinations. On the football field he had distinguished himself by his bility to get in the way of the other team. Philip Fairbain lid not play brilliantly, but he played hard and steadily and vith enormous earnestness. That was the way Philip did things.

The strange thing about Philip Fairbain was that he was lways getting his own way without seeming to do so at all. He never announced beforehand what he was going to do; he ever annoyed people by arguing about how he was going to do t. But somehow, while the rival interest was planning how to pend the prize money when it came in, Philip was walking nobtrusively away with the prize in his pocket all the time.

"Thanks," said Philip to the driver. Then he thrust his head or a moment back inside the taxi. "Come, Plute," he said.

Plute came. Plute was the kind of dog that is more hound han anything else. His tail hung down straight behind, his ead hung down before; he had about him the air f hanging down all over. When he raised his head, vhich was seldom, he displayed a large, rather vhitish face with a tendency to pepper and saltess round the muzzle. In the past one of his eyes ad met with reverses, which gave it the appearnce of being made of not very good green glass.

The Burrage home was a solid, reputable brick ouse, suited to the family of a solid, reputable busiess man of Mr. Burrage's connections. It had bout it a capable, rather successful look not unike that of Mr. Burrage himself.

In the hall Philip Fairbain and his father met. o Philip, Mr. Burrage appeared even more capable and more successful than he had during the Easter holidays. Mr. Burrage had an uncompromising face that ended in a particularly uncompromising chin.

"How do you do?" aid Philip.

Mr. Burrage did not eply in kind. His corliality, if he had meant ny, was checked at its ource by the sudden ight of Plute.

"What," he demandd, "is that?"

"A dog," said Philip 'airbain mildly.

"A dog!" shouted Mr. Burrage, his voice rising o its customary office itch. "That thing! What you bringing it in ere for?"

"It's my dog," Philip xplained.

"What," Mr. Burrage demanded, "is that?" "A dog," said Philip Fairbain mildly.

"Your dog!" his father echoed with a fine sarcasm. "And where did you think you were going to put it?"

"In my room," said Philip.

At the sheer enormity of the outrage Mr. Burrage was for a moment silent, and Philip and Plute began to climb the stairs.

"Philip!" said Mr. Burrage.

"I'm afraid I'll have to take him up just for now," said Philip in a tone of gentle apology. "I couldn't leave him down here, could I?"

And Philip Fairbain Burrage and his dog disappeared round the bend at the top of the stairs.

June thirtieth was among the most important days of Philip's life. In the morning he began his business career; in the evening he met Noreen Gordon.

At nine o'clock Mr. Burrage took Philip into the mahogany and leather office from which the famous Burrage Real Estate Company was directed, and explained to him as much of the business as he thought he needed to understand. Mr. Burrage himself was the kind of man who always made up his mind the right way and acted accordingly. He did not make mistakes. It was no secret that he thought but meanly of his son's attainments. Football was all right, he was accustomed to say, but it was not what he had sent Phil to college for.

Philip Fairbain stood on the opposite side of the mahogany desk and gazed back at his father. No worries clouded his smooth brow; in his wide blue eyes was a kind of wondering interest. Philip's very calmness irritated his father.

"Well," he said, "so you're sure you want to work here?"

"Yes, sir," said Philip.

"Thirty dollars, then," Mr. Burrage stated, with the air of a sovereign delivering his ultimatum. "That's what I'd pay any other young man, and that's what I'll pay you."

"Yes, sir," said Philip.

"Of course," said Mr. Burrage, "if you should ever show any real ability for the business I'd be glad to take you in. If you don't, there's no more reason why I should make you a partner than anybody else. I don't believe in favoritism."

"No, sir," said Philip.

He rose and thrust his hand back through the shock of fair hair that was several shades lighter than his sunburned face. Something in the gesture and in the way that his tall young son towered over him inexpressibly irritated Mr. Burrage.

He rang a bell and had Philip Fairbain taken away to be instructed in his new duties.

Almost exactly twelve hours later Philip met Noreen Gordon at a Linwood Country Club dance. Noreen Gordon was the season's sensation. She was reputed to be enormously clever. She was rich; she was traveled; she was beautiful. She wore strange lovely clothes and followed strange mad impulses that caught the imagination of the young people who made up the society of wealthy suburban Linwood. It was characteristic of Noreen Gordon that she had let her bobbed hair grow a little before anyone else had thought of it, and when all the other girls in her set struggled with dangling ends, she had no short ends to dangle. Noreen Gordon was that rare thing known inclusively as different.

Philip Fairbain Burrage caught his first glimpse of her as she stood in one corner of the club house piazza walled round by her adorers. All the young men in Linwood were in love with Noreen Gordon. From the vantage point of his height and the one low step that led into the hunt room, Philip could look down over their adoring heads and see her plainly.

Noreen was wearing black. She was fond of black because she knew perfectly that it emphasized the red-gold in her tawny hair and the lights in her brown eyes. Philip Fairbain watched her for some time with a considerable degree of attention and a considerable degree of pleasure. Then he came down from the low step that led into the hunt room and joined her group. He addressed himself to two men on the outskirts whom he knew.

"I want to meet her," he said.

"I don't blame you," said Kenard Warren moodily.

But Don McKeen was more obliging.

"All right," he said. "I guess I can manage it for you."

Don managed it. It was all the same to Don however many new men Noreen met; he knew that he had no chance anyway. It was rumored that just now the prospects of Mr. Hopkinson Bowers showed brightest, but no one could really tell, of course, where Noreen Gordon was concerned.

"I want to dance with you," said Philip when the introduction had been made.

He was dazzled by the glory of Miss Gordon, but he did not forget what he had come for. In Philip's simple creed there was no guile; when he saw what he wanted he asked for it.

The group round Miss Gordon laughed, some of the men a bit too loudly.

"That's what we all want," someone said.

Noreen laughed too—lightly.

"Can't," she said. "I haven't any dances left."

"Extras?" aked Philip.

"Nothing," said Noreen Gordon. "They're all divided round in little pieces. And I hate being cut in on all the time."

"That's too bad," said Philip sympathetically.

For the greater part of the evening Philip Fairbain Burrage stood in the doorway and watched Noreen Gordon drift past in the arms of those more fortunate than he. He liked to watch Noreen and he watched her. He watched her thoroughly. Members of the Linwood Country Club exchanged amused glances over the new victim of Noreen's charms.

After a time Philip missed her, and because he very much wanted to look at her some more he set out to find her. At last he did.

Noreen was sitting in one corner of the divan that stood at a turn in the winding stairs.

"May I sit here?" said Philip.

Noreen Gordon was half angry, half amused. She raised her shoulders ever so slightly, and Philip, taking it for permission, sat.

"Mr. Bowers has just gone for ices," Noreen told him.

"Yes," said Philip.

He made no suggestion that he should go away. He simply sat. For the time being he had achieved exactly what he wanted.

Noreen made a little conversation.

"Aren't you dancing tonight, Mr. Burrage?" she asked.

"No," said Philip. Then he explained. "You said you hadn't any dances."

"There are other people," Noreen suggested.

"Not for me," said Philip.

And then Mr. Hopkinson Bowers came up with the ices.

"Here's Mr. Bowers," Noreen prodded Philip Fairbain gently.

"Yes," said Philip. "Good evening, Mr. Bowers. I think there's room for all of us."

He moved over obligingly in the direction of Noreen Gordon, and made room for Mr. Bowers on his other side.

Noreen looked once at the grave face of Philip Fairbain, and once at the purple countenance of Mr. Bowers, and smothered her quick desire to laugh with a spoonful of pistachio and cherry. Noreen Gordon might be clever and beautiful and rich in her own right, but more than that she had a sense of humor.

Mr. Bowers nearly choked with mingled pistachio and rage. Then he drew up a chair on the other side of Miss Noreen Gordon and took his place there with what dignity he could muster, while Noreen smiled provokingly into the middle distance.

From that point Philip Fairbain did not take an active part in the conversation, but he was satisfied.

When Mr. Robinson came to claim Miss Gordon for the next dance, Philip rose with Mr. Bowers and bowed her gravely away.

Then he went home.

At the end of his second five dollar day in the employ of G. H. Burrage, Philip saw Miss Gordon again. He was waiting at a street crossing when she drove up, dazzling in a long low-slung brown car of unmistakable manufacture. Noreen herself wore brown to match her car, with a touch of brightness in her floating scarf and the burnt orange of the quill in her saucy hat. There was arrogance in the very curl of her fingers as she put out her hand to signal her stop in the press of traffic.

Philip Fairbain stood on the curbing and adored. With one hand he gripped his hat brim so that he might be able to snatch off his hat with the least possible delay when she should see him. But the occasion for snatching it off did not arise. Noreen Gordon looked over Philip and through him and round him, but no gleam of recognition brightened her eyes. And presently Philip found that she had driven away and that he was standing absurdly on the street corner, gaping at the place where she had been, with his hat brim in his hand.

It was partly this incident that decided him in what he had not been sure that he was going to do. He went home and called Miss Noreen Gordon on the telephone. She was in.

"It's hot," he said when at last he had the connection. "I could take you to ride at eight o'clock if you could go."

"Thank you," said Noreen. "I couldn't. I'm going to be busy."

There was a note of crisp finality in her voice. Philip Fairbain ignored it.

Suddenly they came upon something not usually included in an exhibition of the Nichols estate. It was Noreen.

"I could take you at quarter past eight," he said, "if you could go then."

"I couldn't," Noreen repeated.

"I could take you——" began Philip.

Over the wire there came first a little bang, then a click, then silence. The little bang was Miss Noreen Gordon stamping her foot; the click was Miss Noreen Gordon hanging up the receiver. She was suddenly, unreasonably angry. She could not herself have told exactly why, and that very thing increased her wrath.

Then the telephone rang again.

"Hello," said Philip Fairbain, "I guess they cut us off. I was going to say that I could take you at half-past eight if you could go then."

As suddenly and unreasonably as she had been angry, Noreen was enormously amused. For an instant she struggled with her merriment; then she laughed frankly into the telephone.

"Well," she said, "you certainly have got a line."

"Yes," said Philip. "It's a bad line; cut our connection. Could you go at half-past eight?"

"Yes," said Noreen.

She was much more surprised than Philip to hear herself saying so. After all Philip had no way of knowing that Noreen had already refused five invitations for the evening in order that she might stay quietly at home and decide once for all whether she would or would not marry Mr. Hopkinson Bowers.

At eight-thirty they rode. Philip, weaving his way through the traffic on his way to the river drive, was conscious only of the warmth of rushing air and the nearness of Noreen Gordon. Noreen was wondering if, after all, she might decide that question while she rode.

Then something happened. Over the side of the car by Philip's left elbow something rose—something large and rather whitish with a not very good green eye on the nearer side.

For the greater part of the evening Philip Fairbain watched Noreen Gordon—thoroughly.

Noreen Gordon, who had no nerves, gave an honest start.

"What is it?" she demanded.

"It's a dog," Philip explained.

Noreen recovered herself. She leaned forward and examined Plute's elevated countenance.

"Oh, yes," she said, "that's it! I knew it reminded me of something, and I couldn't think what."

Philip said nothing.

"Perhaps you'd better put him off now," Noreen suggested.

"I can't," said Philip. "He's my dog. He likes to ride on the step."

"How very interesting," Noreen murmured. "Who gave him to you?"

"I bought him," said Philip.

"No! Really?" she tormented him. "Aren't you extravagant!"

Philip had grown rather red under his tan, but he knew better than to try to defend himself. He was silent.

"I think you'd better put him off now," she suggested again.

"I can't," said Philip. "He couldn't keep up."

"Then you had better," said Noreen. "I'm so afraid he'll fall."

Philip Fairbain took his attention from the wheel long enough to glance briefly at Miss Gordon. His worst suspicions were confirmed.

"You're not really afraid he'll fall," he charged her gravely. "You don't want to be seen riding in a car that has him on the outside of it."

"You're so clever!" Noreen murmured.

There was a considerable silence. Then:

"I'll tell you what we could do," said Philip Fairbain. "We could take him inside."

Miss Gordon made a delicate gesture of distaste. "Whatever you do," she said, "don't let that beast in here."

"Well—all right," said Philip. "I'll leave him outside if you'd rather."

For a long moment Noreen Gordon could not decide whether to be very angry or very much amused. She was distinctly not accustomed to this treatment. At last she laughed.

"Well," she said, "you certainly have got a brand new line all your own."

"I haven't any line," said Philip.

"And that," said Noreen, "is part of it."

Philip pondered for some time over what she meant by this.

As a whole, however, Philip found the ride entirely satisfactory. For the time being he had exactly what he wanted. He was content to urge his car onward through the warm June twilight and know that she was there beside him, to feel the touch of her shoulder as she swayed toward him on the turns, to steal a glance at her now and then and see the bewildering color of her hair. He was quite content to let Noreen do most of the talking. If Noreen said that he had a line, he was content to have one.

II

Taking everything together it was rather a long summer for Philip Fairbain. There was little tennis and less golf, and no long vacations in the woods, and no deep sea fishing off the coast of Maine. It was increasingly borne in on Philip that he had never had to work before.

Nevertheless he pegged away at his thirty dollar job with a kind of resolute enthusiasm. He went at selling houses hard and earnestly as he had gone at football, and he told the whole truth about the property which he handled with a completeness that would have shocked his more conservative father.

From the beginning his sales were rather good. There was something about Philip's slow smile and the directness of his look that made everyone want to own a house. The fact that Mr. Burrage was not impressed by the things that his son sold was chiefly because he had known in advance that his son would not sell anything.

On the whole it was not a dull summer, either for Philip or for any of the other young men in Linwood; for Noreen Gordon was at least spasmodically in town. Noreen was not summering at any of the resorts where it had been her custom to summer in former years, and though she was forever dashing off for brilliant parties at shore or lake or mountains, she was as forever dashing back again to enliven Linwood. The fact was that Noreen had become interested in architecture and landscape gardening, and had thrown herself into the study of these subjects with the enthusiasm which she always lavished on her whims. She was aking two courses in the summer school, she told everyone, and imply couldn't be away from the city for long at a time.

Noreen attended lectures with gusto; she filled little leather olumes with hastily scribbled notes; she peeped and botanized ll over greater Boston. Sometimes she let Philip drive her bout the city while she scrutinized its architecture and wrote lown her impressions of it on bits of paper which she presently ost.

Philip always remembered as one of their best times together he Saturday afternoon when they went out to look at the old ichols place. He had showed it to her a little timidly as a uriosity, and she had been pleased beyond his wildest dreams. he old Nichols mansion had been built and the Nichols grounds id out some forty years before by Augustine Antony Nichols. ugustine Nichols had had a very great deal of money, and had elieved in getting his money's worth. When he had laid out is estate he had undoubtedly done so. No one could have got ny more on any estate. Since his death some years before it d been in the hands of G. H. Burrage. As yet no one had ought it.

Philip took Noreen up a long winding drive edged with strange egetation, and round the back of the house to the porte-cochère t the side. There was revealed gradually to Noreen's startled yes an immensity of great tawdry wooden building, originally ainted one of the more offensive shades of mustard yellow, and rnamented with a wealth of pie-crust trimming round the eaves.

"Mid-Victorian," Noreen murmured.

They went inside first, through the great echoing rooms with heir black marble fireplaces and their jingling chandeliers and heir floors laid down in patterns like so many patchwork quilts.

Noreen was delighted. She had never before seen anything o consistently dreadful, nd she hurried on ahead f Philip from room to oom, keeping up a fire of xclamation and comment s she went.

"Oh just see!" she cried. See that mantelpiece—and carved all over—with enetian scenes. Look—here's a gondola. And hink of the good crystal hey wasted on that elec-ric light thing. It would ave made a string of glass eads for everyone in the ity. Isn't the whole thing crime?"

"Yes," said Philip.

He was less interested in ne crime committed twenty years earlier by ugustine Nichols than he was in the poise and wing of Noreen's slender figure in its white ort suit.

They opened the front door.

"It would have a knocker, wouldn't it?" oreen laughed. "Lion couchant."

Then she gasped. She had not really seen ne front of the estate before, and the full effect urst upon her at once.

"Oh—oh—oh!" she cried. "A brick terrace nd two steps down into a French parterre—in ront of this house. And—oh Phil!—do I see a unken Italian garden in the distance?"

"Yes," said Philip.

He followed her down the two brick steps nd along one of the formal paths of the French arterre. The geometrical regularity of the arden as a whole and the neat way in which ne squares and triangles and rectangles and apezoids of the beds were fitted together was uite unspoiled by neglect.

"It makes you wonder what it was that you sed to know about the square of the hypote-use, doesn't it?" Noreen laughed.

"Yes," said Philip obligingly.

We are sorry to have to say, however, that is was not strictly true. What he was really ondering at the time was whether Miss ordon would let him take her somewhere r tea.

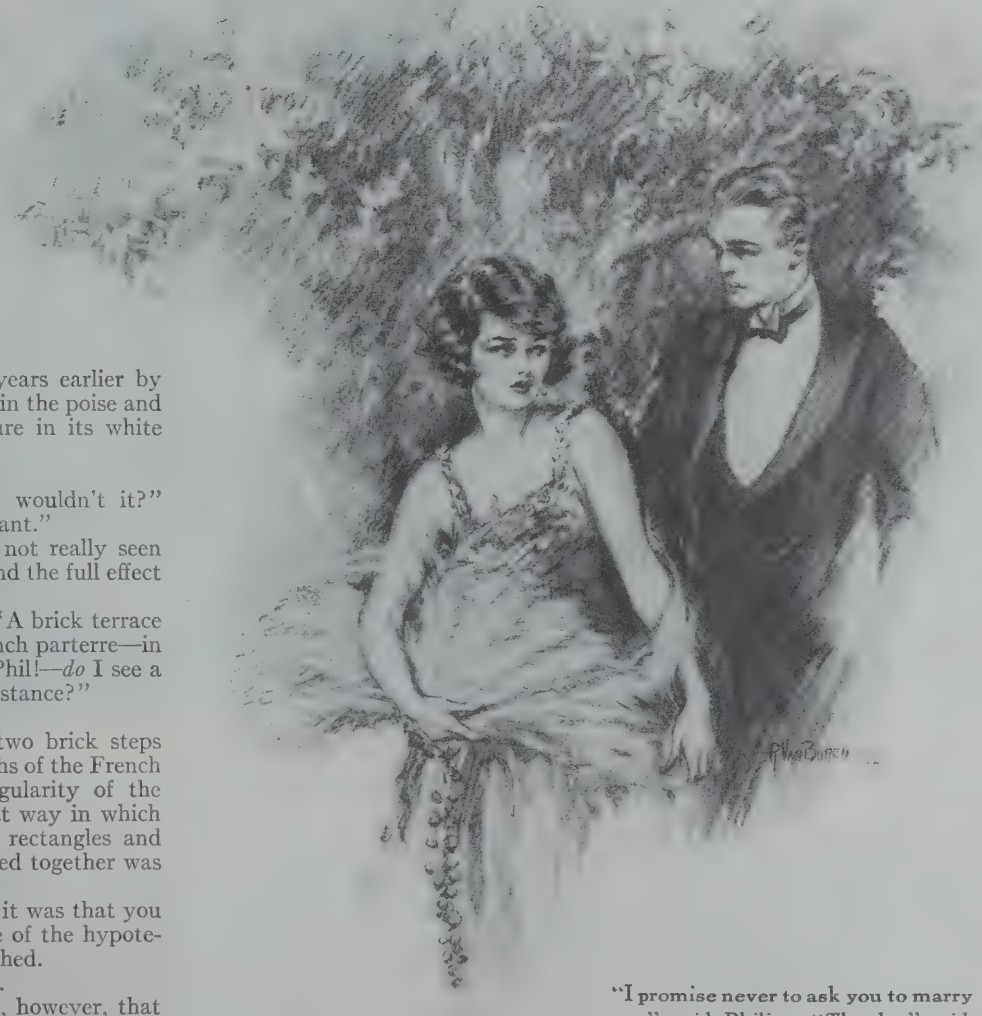
At the lower end of the garden two sentinels clipped from box stood beside the path.

"Topiary work," Noreen murmured again.

A little farther on a granite dove drank perpetually from a granite bowl.

Then they went down more steps and into the Italian garden—a maze of graveled paths and strange plants and strange stiff seats with a great deal of carving. In the center was a spraying fountain. Philip turned the water on and it sprayed. Noreen laughed out in delight.

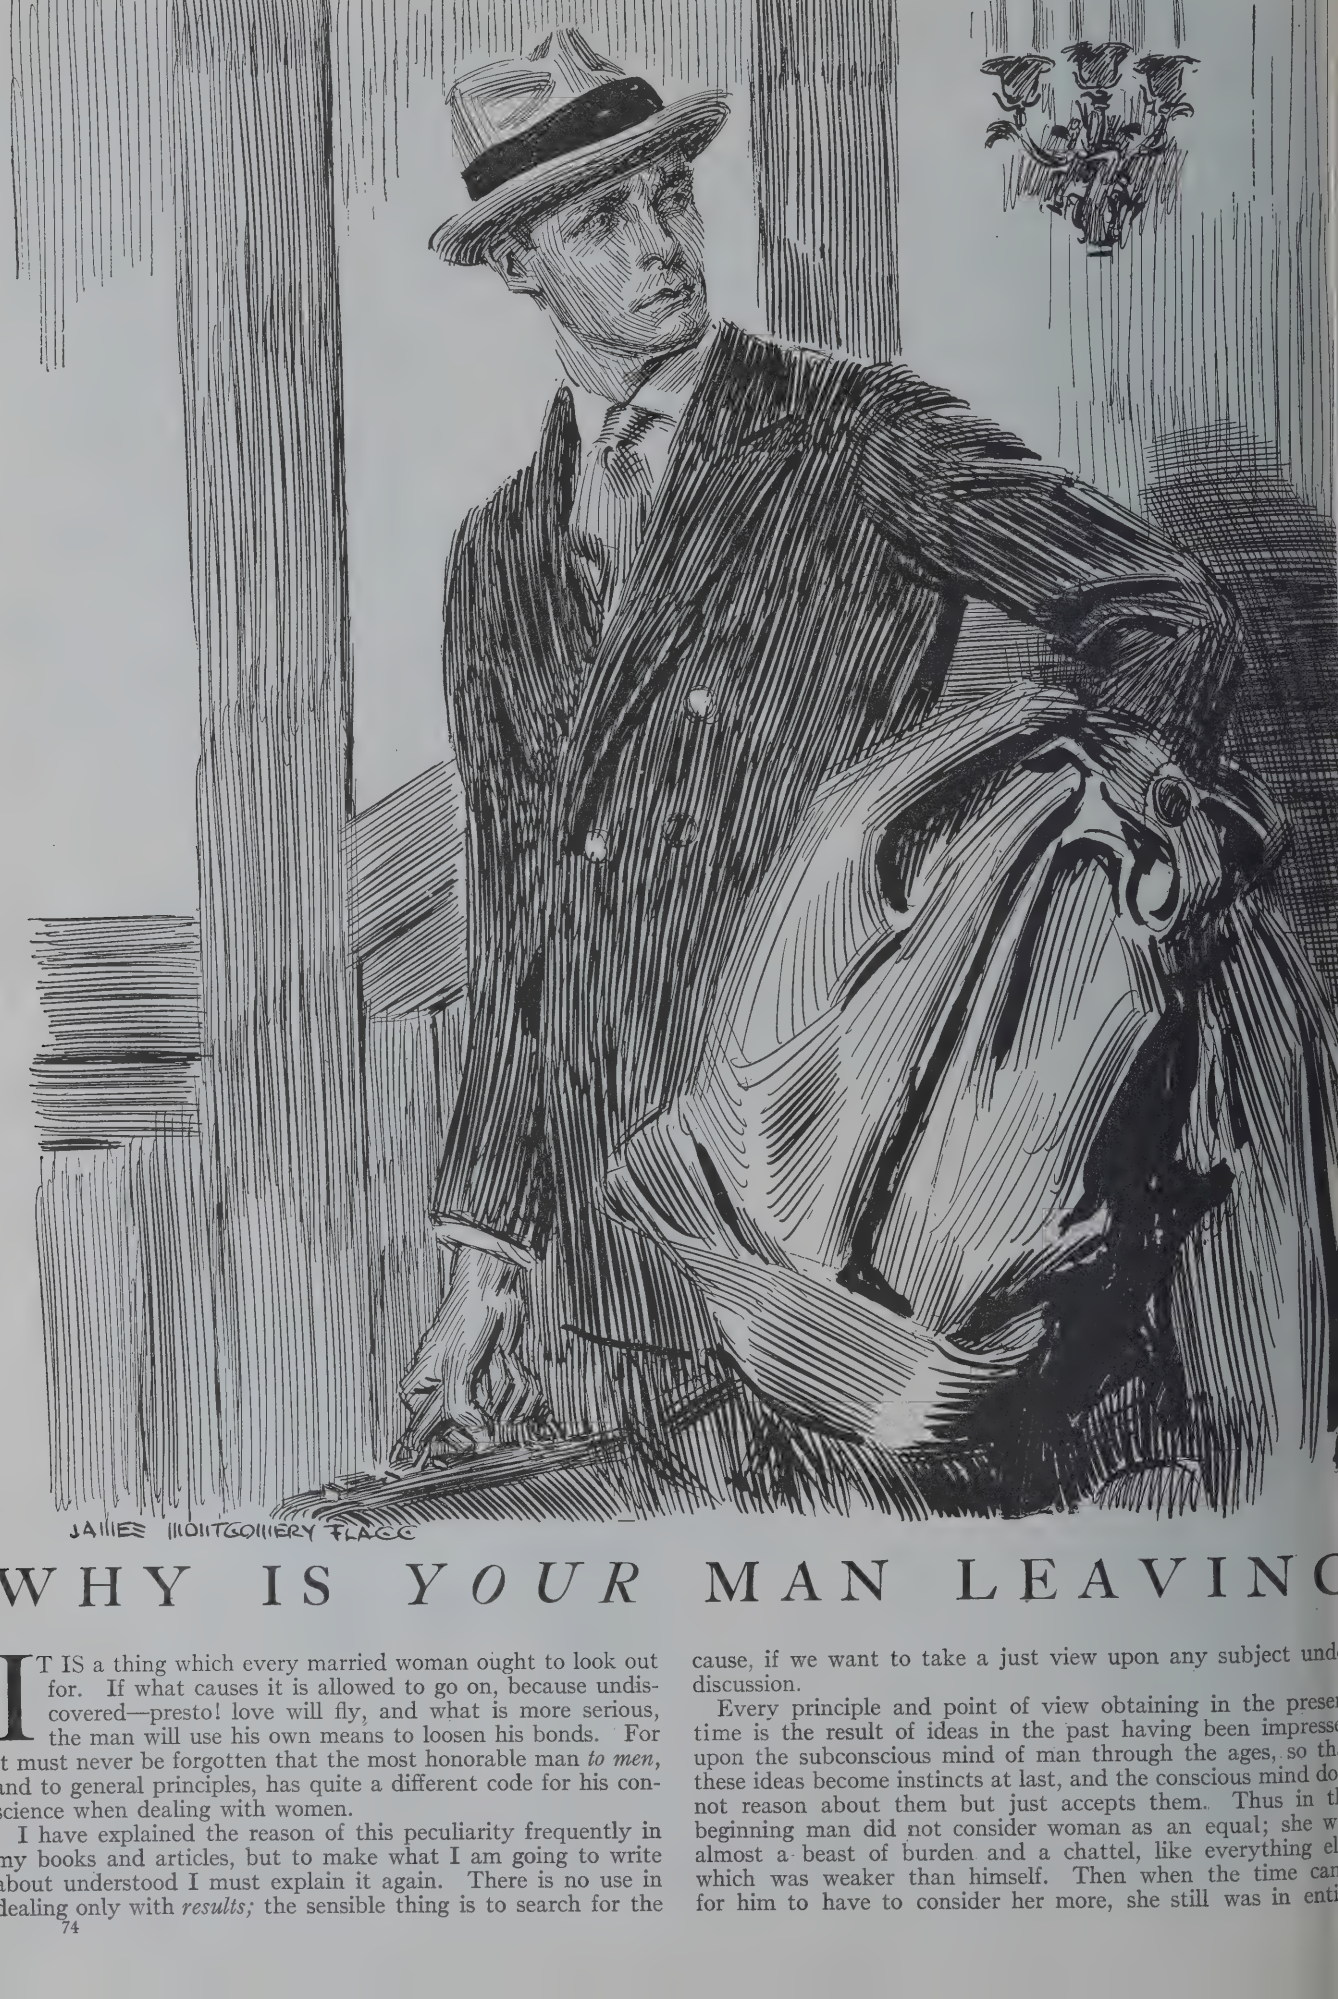
"I'm going to come and sketch this place some day," she said, "for a horrible example in my gardening class."



Philip and Noreen sat beside the spraying fountain on a cold stone seat and looked about them. On one side Diana ran fleetly through the greenwood, with her marble hair flying in the wind and her marble petticoat flapping round her knees; on the other a noble buck, unconscious of his danger, stood gazing into the distance and chewing his marble cud. Just opposite two fat cupids sat on a kind of perch and fitted their arrows to their bows.

"Kind of a hunting scene," said Philip.

This remark was among the most successful that he had ever made to Noreen Gordon. It was on the strength of it that he had courage to ask her to go to tea.



It may have been partly because of it too that she accepted. At any rate she was very nice to him, and his afternoon was a success.

But fortune and Noreen Gordon were not always kind to Philip that summer. Indeed, Noreen treated him at all times with the utmost caprice. Sometimes she was gracious; sometimes she was almost rude. Sometimes (Continued on page 135)

"I promise never to ask you to marry me," said Philip. "Thanks," said Noreen. "That's very reassuring."

WHY IS THAT MAN LEAVING

WHY IS YOUR MAN LEAVING

IT IS a thing which every married woman ought to look out for. If what causes it is allowed to go on, because undiscovered—presto! love will fly, and what is more serious, the man will use his own means to loosen his bonds. For it must never be forgotten that the most honorable man to men, and to general principles, has quite a different code for his conscience when dealing with women.

I have explained the reason of this peculiarity frequently in my books and articles, but to make what I am going to write about understood I must explain it again. There is no use in dealing only with results; the sensible thing is to search for the cause, if we want to take a just view upon any subject und discussion.

Every principle and point of view obtaining in the prese time is the result of ideas in the past having been impress upon the subconscious mind of man through the ages, so th these ideas become instincts at last, and the conscious mind do not reason about them but just accepts them. Thus in t beginning man did not consider woman as an equal; she w almost a beast of burden and a chattel, like everything el which was weaker than himself. Then when the time ca for him to have to consider her more, she still was in enti subjection to him as either wife or daughter. He could order and had to be obeyed merely because he was a man—not because he had a character which commands obedience. He could do as he pleased and had not to give an account of his actions or suffer restraint in any way. Then gradually woman emerged and tried to assert herself—and man found that it saved fuss to lie to her. He felt no dishonor about this because in no way did he consider her an equal—honor was for his dealings with men.

To lie to a woman to make things go smoothly and save himself trouble was no more to him than humoring a tricky horse, because in that way he got more out of the creature than by thrashing it to bits—all this not because man is a cruel brute but simply because of the result of primitive conditions.

Then civilization advanced, and the laws of chivalry grew to be a force. But by that time the idea that it was quite natural to lie to woman, in man had become an instinct.

It takes many generations of deliberate training to produce, or eradicate, an instinct, however much the conscious reason may go against it.

Thus in the present day man's subconscious mind still feels there is not the same dishonor in lying to a woman as in lying to a man. Even though if he were asked (Continued on page 128)

The Poisoner

Illustrations by F. R. Gruger

"If I wasn't telling the truth," exclaimed Carval, "do you think I'd dare do this?"

A POISON RING? I've never seen one. Let me look at it."

Kyran Kildare slipped the ring from his thin finger, so little characteristic of a sculptor, and held out under the yellow lamplight towards his friend Carval, at hose house he had been dining.

"Yes, that is what it is—a poison ring. Made by Benvenuto ellini for one of the Medici—probably Cosimo himself. Look t that intaglio! Isn't it exquisite?" His narrow, sensitive ıce was aglow.

Oswald Carval took the ring and examined it with interest, greeing mentally that the sculptor's delight in it was fully ıstified. He did not share all of Kildare's enthusiasms by any ıeans, but this exquisitely chased and chiseled thing was some-ıing quite out of the ordinary.

"H'm!" he mused. "I wonder did they actually carry poison round in those things!"

As an analytical chemist he was professionally interested in oisons.

"Do you see that tiny excrescence below the medallion? Press !" said Kildare.

But Carval's thick fingers were too clumsy; and the sculptor ook back the ring and with his thumb nail easily released the ring. The beryl on which the intaglio was cut flew back, evealing a hollow receptacle beneath, perhaps a quarter of an ıch in diameter and depth.

"You'd make a poor poisoner!" he laughed.

"Think so?" grinned Carval. "Where did you get it?"

"Just luck! They're hard to get. A queer old uncle of mine, ho lives in Florence, bought it of a bankrupt marchese—one of the 'new poor,' you know—and let me have it for the same price. There's no question as to its genuineness. It's a family heirloom."

"They had powerful poisons!" said Carval. "It's strange we don't know more about them. I suppose one reason is that in those days chemistry—or alchemy as they called it—was popularly regarded as akin to necromancy—the Black Art—and as having something distinctly devilish about it."

"Well, isn't there?" inquired Kildare. "Your chemist is the only real sorcerer!"

"Quite the contrary," returned Carval with a faint smile on his florid face. "My profession is most banal. The age of poison is over; the age of the antiseptic is here. Bicarbonate of soda—not bichloride of mercury!"

"What is that?"

"Bichloride of mercury? Well, that and potassium cyanide are about the only modern poisons that ring could hold effectively. Dilute either in water and put a drop on the end of a dog's tongue and he'll never wag his tail again!"

"Poor dog!" Kildare shuddered and a shadow passed over his face—a face almost as finely chiseled as those of the Pallas Athene on the intaglio. "Do you suppose they knew about potassium cyanide in those days?"

"Very likely. That may be what your ring contained."

Kildare, the "Wild Irishman" as his Bohemian friends called

"'So Nicoletta is false to me! Ha!' I fill the goblets with red wine and, turning aside, empty th him, lifted his chin with a peculiar gesture, as if by so doing he could get an angle of vision by which he might look down the vista of the ages.

"I wonder!" he sighed. "I know a chap who always carries a little phial of some such stuff around with him so that in the event of accident or fire he can escape a death of agony."

"A very dangerous expedient!" replied the chemist. "There are moments when most men, if the means were readily at hand, might be tempted to take their lives without any real justification."

"Well, why shouldn't they?" demanded Kildare. "Their lives are their own. Like as not I may take it into my head to cheat the hangman myself some day."

"Don't talk nonsense!" warned his friend.

"I mean it!" retorted the sculptor.

"Anyhow, I advise you to be careful how you monkey with that thing," said Carval. "The inside of it looks clean enough but that ring may have been tucked away in a chest somewhere for the last five hundred years. Poisons are very persistent. They lose nothing of their potency through age."

Kildare looked into the ring.

"By George! Do you mean that if by remote chance the cavity still contained some tiny speck of what do you call it—one so small you couldn't see it even—that it could still do the trick?"

"Yes," answered Carval. "I know of a case where that actually happened—in Atlanta, Georgia!"

Kildare slid the ring on his finger, lighted a cigarette and leaned back, his long legs crossed upon a carved teakwood taboret.

"Funny mind you've got to remember that sort of thing. Fancy—Atlanta, Georgia!"

"My memory for fact is good enough." Carval did not see contents of this ring into the one destined for you. 'Let us drink to the fair Nicoletta,' I cry."

to resent the slur upon its selective aspect. "As for poisons persisting, there's nothing peculiar in that. Nothing in nature is destructible. You merely shatter the arrangement of molecules which form a new combination."

Kildare nodded.

" 'Imperial Caesar dead and turned to clay Might stop a hole to keep the wind away'?"

"Exactly. An atom of cyanide is now and ever will be—an atom of cyanide. You can't annihilate it. Nothing in nature is ever lost—not even a light ray."

"Who then can doubt immortality!" mumured Kildare. "If the flash of the seagull's wing, the song of the nightingale, the lover's whisper, the first gleam of the evening star are never lost, but live forever! Rather beautiful, that!"

Carval eyed him tolerantly. Visionaries and poets were not in his line.

"Unfortunately immortality is not confined merely to the beautiful," he remarked.

Kildare's face darkened.

"Doubtless true!" he admitted. "I suppose the poison of slander is as persistent as that of your cyanide."

"From what I know of the Cinquecento it was as popular as any other," said Carval drily.

Kildare turned the ring slowly around on his finger.

"The Golden Age for all that! Even if they had the vices of their virtues. They knew how to live. At white heat—the only way. Nothing's worth while that's not done with passion. After all, you can forgive anything done in hot blood, can't you? Of course there were a lot of treacherous folk too, smiling villains. But most of 'em, if they were going to run you through, shouted first 'On guard!' "

"The poisoner didn't," retorted the chemist grimly.

"No," assented Kildare. "But even so, poisoning was a well recognized means to an end. By St. Gregory! To have that ring on my finger, and to know that it has held death for so many gallant men and beautiful women, makes me feel like one of the Sforzas or Borgias myself!"

He sprang from his chair and stood on the hearthrug in front of his phlegmatic friend.

"Can't you imagine our dining here together like this six hundred years ago in Florence? You have come at my invitation with a few of our friends to taste some rare old Falernian or to plan for some amorous adventure. There is Annibal Caro, Baccio Bandinelli, the Marquis del Vasto, Luigi Pulci, Giulio Romano, perhaps Arturo Traiano, the Pope's chamberlain, or even Orazio Baglioni himself—a gay and distinguished company. Your pages loiter outside. Within, a wandering bard has just sung a ballad for us, and you have thrown him a piece of gold. My servant enters bearing a great golden flagon—one of Cellini's masterpieces—places it upon the table among the garlands and sweetmeats, and bowing, retires. Can't you see him?"

He waved his hand towards the door.

" 'Good my lord,' " quoth I, 'and how doth your lordship with the fair Lucrezia?'

" 'Lucrezia!' say you. 'Nay, I have no longer interest in the wench. I have a new mistress—Nicoletta, the daughter of Strozzi the Armorer.'

"Like the sting of an adder the name plunges through my heart. So Nicoletta is false to me! Ha! From the flagon I fill the goblets brimming with red wine and, turning quickly aside, open my ring—this very ring!—and empty its contents into the one destined for you.

" 'Good my lord,' I cry, 'let us drink to the fair Nicoletta!'

"Unsuspecting, you lift the goblet to your lips.

" 'To Nicoletta!' they all shout.

"Suddenly you turn pale, the goblet crashes to the floor, you clutch wildly at the table. The Baglioni catches you in his arms. But already you are dead!"

Kildare acted out the imaginary scene with all the ardor of his volatile temperament. Those unaware that he was the only child of an Italian mother and an Irish father sometimes thought him queer—at times almost irrational—for his moods followed one another quickly, plunging from reckless gaiety to deep depression.

Carval's pale gray eyes regarded him calmly.

"And then," he grunted, "my good friend, Arturo Traiano, the chamberlain to His Holiness, promptly runs you through with his snickersnee!"

Kildare did not seem to hear him. He was standing with one hand upon his forehead and with the other, upon which shone the ring, extended towards the lamp.

"Tomorrow," he cried, "I shall do a bust of Benvenuto! My magnum opus! The ring will be my inspiration. It will be the talisman opening the gate to the Cinquecento. I shall live at the court of Cosimo and move among the noble ladies, the gallants, courtiers, pages, men at arms, priests, foreign envoys and artists that filled his palace!" He turned suddenly to Carval. "But as it is, the talisman is incomplete. You must give me some poison, some of that potassium cyanide, to put in it. Unless the ring is exactly as it was in the days of Benvenuto it will have no potency."

Carval allowed the smoke of his cigarette to wreathe itself slowly from his nostrils.

"Nonsense!" he answered presently. "What a crazy idea!"

"I am quite in earnest," declared Kildare excitedly. "A businessman like you doesn't understand. It might mean all the difference between success and failure. No doubt you have some of the stuff right here in your laboratory."

His glance shifted to a door at the end of the room. Carval shrugged his shoulders.

"Haven't you?" persisted Kildare.

"Perhaps."

"Then give it to me!"

"My dear fellow, the law doesn't permit it."

"But I ask it as a favor."

He was pleading now—half beside himself, it seemed to Carval.

"No—no! It's quite impossible!"

"I beg of you!"

For perhaps half a minute Carval did not reply. His stolid rather beefy countenance gave no inkling of his thoughts.

Kildare crossed over and laid his hand on his shoulder.

"If you are my friend!" he said with emotion. "As a friend I ask it!"

Carval took several puffs from his cigarette.

"Oh well!" he replied finally. "If it means as much to you as all that!"

He arose with his customary deliberation and walked slowly to the door leading to his laboratory.

Kildare's glance followed the thickset figure until it disappeared. A good friend, Carval! A conscientious chap, too. His eyes wandered round the room. But what appalling taste! However, what could you expect from a chemist—a manufacturing chemist at that? Carval's only lengthy vacation had been a trip to China, and he had filled his drawing room with what he regarded as artistic trophies of his visit—deformed bronze idols, hideous grinning masks, grotesque images of wild animals, terrifying implements of torture and of war, massive tables and cabinets of teak, horrible black and yellow screens. But what particularly tortured Kildare was the fact that the room in which these treasures had been so methodically arranged had white woodwork picked out in gold, a pink satin wall covering and a brown Brussels carpet. Nevertheless, Kildare was fond of this practical friend of his and admired the traits in the other which he did not himself possess. Presently he sat down again and once more examined the beauties of the ring.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the door, in his white tiled laboratory the practical friend was standing before a row of jars upon a glass shelf.

"If that is what he wants——" he muttered to himself.

He took down one of the jars.

A few minutes later Carval came back holding in his palm a paper on which was a tiny pile of white powder.

"There!" he said, as one might to a child. "I'll let you have this upon one condition—that you will never let anyone know I gave it to you. It would make me liable to criminal prosecution."

"I promise," agreed Kildare. "Now put it in the ring."

He pressed the spring and the intaglio flew back, revealing the pyramidal hollow beneath. Then he held it out, still upon his finger. Carval shook his head.

"Is it as dangerous as all that?" asked Kildare.

"One never knows!" replied Carval ominously. "Give me the ring."

He made a cone of the paper and with the utmost caution poured its contents into the receptacle. They were both astonished at the amount it held. Evidently the bottom was deeper than appeared. When it was all in Carval moistened it slightly with a medicine dropper in order that it might cake, and snapped back the intaglio.

"There you are!" he said. "There's enough stuff in there to kill a thousand dogs—or men."

Kildare put it back eagerly on his finger.

"I can't thank you enough!" he cried. "I don't blame you for thinking me an idiot—but honestly, it will make all the difference. Now I shall really feel as if the shade of Benvenuto were at my elbow. You shall see something worthy of the period of—poison! And now, old man, I must hurry along. I think I'll drop in on Margaret for a moment before going home. Shall I give her your regards?"

"By all means," answered Carval, placing the paper in the grate, where it writhed for a moment before bursting into flame. He knew that Miss Welford was to be out that evening, but he saw no object in letting Kildare know that he knew. "I hope you're satisfied. Remember now—one drop of that stuff! Well, if you must be off. Good night."

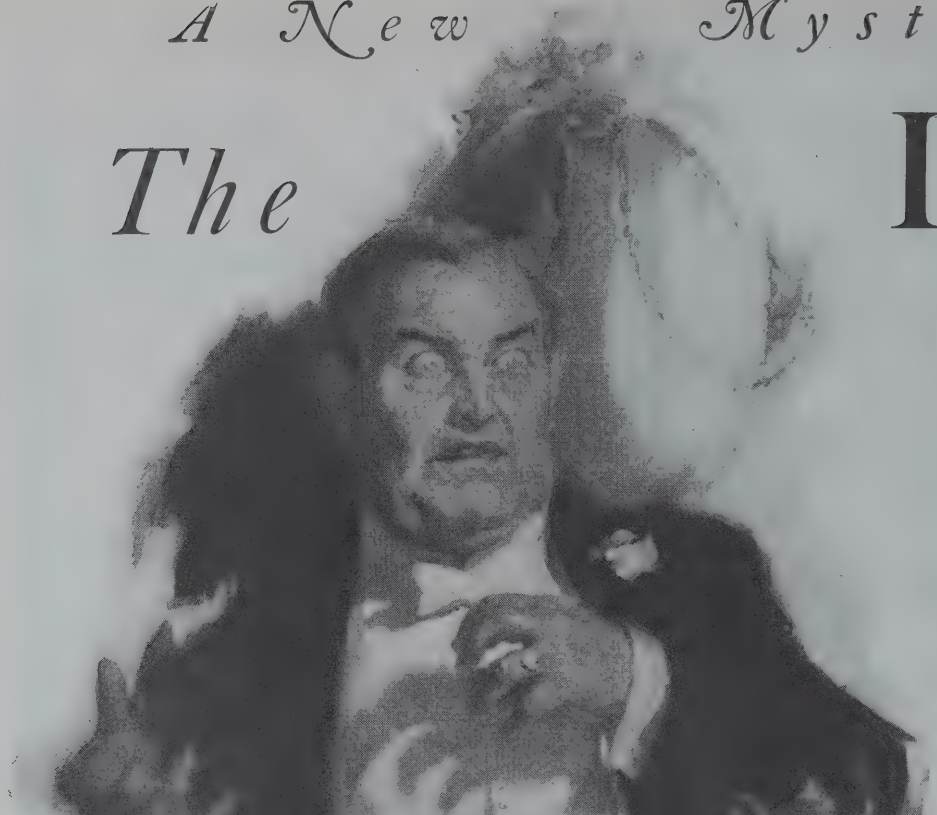
II

KILDARE, disappointed in his attempt to call upon Miss Welford, returned dejectedly to his studio on Washington Square. He had been keen to show Margaret the ring and to tell her of his plan to do the bust of Cellini, yet it was characteristic of him that he preferred to take a chance on finding her out than call her up and make an appointment by telephone. Kildare did not like telephones; and he abominated electricity, alarm clocks and stiff shirts. His apparent disregard of many conventions, however, was due less to opposition to them than to the fact that his mind was apt to be on something else. He was impulsive, temperamental and wholly irresponsible about his engagements, all of which, he maintained, should be taken as made with a mental reservation.

His friends, who were many, forgave these eccentricities on account of his gentleness, loyalty and high spirits, for he always made a "party" of anything that might be toward, irrespective of who composed the gathering, exhausting himself in story telling, games and all sorts of horseplay. In consequence he was in universal demand, which interfered sadly with his work.

"I turns around," Mrs. O'Connell told Margaret, "and sees him lying there on the floor dead."

e had a small income, enough to live on, and that was all he inted. He drank a little, though not immoderately, but cause his sensitive temperament reacted quickly to alcohol got credit for drinking more than he really did. He had me talent but was easily discouraged, and as he inevitably sisted on doing everything differently from the way agreed upon, and frequently in an outburst of temper destroyed work which had taken months of his own and his sitter's time, got few orders.



A charming crank! One of those vague irresponsibles you stumble upon in a Dublin pothouse or at tea at Lady Gregory's; a mediæval spirit in a Sinn Fein body; (Continued on page 156)

A Résumé of Part One:

THE story takes place in the New York of today. It concerns:

MICHAEL LANYARD, THE LONE WOLF, once prince of European jewel thieves, now a member of the British Secret Service on leave of absence.

EVE DE MONTALAIS, whom he loves as he has never loved before—a woman of beauty, of charm, of wealth.

MORPHEW, powerful New York bootlegger and director of criminals.

PAGAN, a satellite of Morphew's.

MALLISON, gentleman crook and member of Morphew's crew.

LIANE DELORME, demi-mondaine and one-time underworld acquaintance of the Lone Wolf.

MRS. FOLLIOTT MCFEE, who is piquant and inordinately rich, whose nickname is FOLLY and who lives up to it.

Between Michael Lanyard and Eve de Montalais there exists a singularly deep understanding. He has just declared his love for her; "yet I may not," he says, "ask you to become my wife." Pressed for a reason, "Wherever I go," he tells her, "I am a marked man. Hunted. Society never has patience with the penitent." He cannot ask Eve to share such a life. In the back of his mind, too, lies the reason that he is now poor, Eve rich.

Eve will not accept his reasoning. As they talk (at the Ritz) enters a curiously forbidding personality, who seems from a near by table covertly to be watching them. They have seen this man before. Eve shivers. Lanyard confesses to an instinctive foreboding that their paths will somehow cross.

That night, parting from Eve, he kisses her for the first time. Thereafter Lanyard knows that despite all difficulties he must make his new life as a criminal who has reformed such that he can marry Eve without bringing on her disgrace and hardship.

Returning homeward down Fifth Avenue pondering this problem, he unexpectedly runs into Liane Delorme, whom he had last seen in Paris years befo She greets him with effusive affecti and insists on his accompanying her the Clique Club. ghastly with pallor beneath her war paint, strode into the room.

The corridor was choked with people, flustered waiters mixed in with guests whom the alarm had routed out of the other private rooms, all aimlessly milling about and questioning one another with vacant eyes and babbling tongues. Nobody offered to stay Lanyard; on the other hand nobody offered to get out of his way. Pagan passed him, plying busy elbows, his habitual leer erased. Of Mrs. McFee one saw nothing.

Halfway to the head of the staircase the jam on the narrow landing grew too dense to be penetrated other than by main strength and ill will; and, crowded against the banisters, Lanyard waited a general movement that would permit him to proceed.

Looking down over the handrail, he commanded a view of the first landing, the stage of a more lively scene as guests and employees of the "club" stampeding for the stairs were checked, hustled and bully-ragged by a squad of police, readily to be picked out by their flat-topped blue caps, and a number of plain-clothes men, quite as conspicuously badged by those weatherworn derbies lacking which self-respecting police detectives consider themselves no sportsmen in their attitude toward lawbreakers.

Hectoring cries of authority, plain profanity of an unimaginative citizenry and yammering of hysterical women manufactured a clamor that drowned out all lesser noises till somebody near Lanyard used stentorian lungs to suggest the roof as a possible way of escape; upon which advice the whole body of people surged toward the third flight of stairs.

In that moment, while clinging to the banister rail to keep from being swept along, Lanyard heard his name shrilled in a pathetic voice and saw Mrs. McFee struggling in the rush, the violet eyes darkly dilate with dismay, the mouth of a child tremulous with appeal. Immediately Lanyard threw himself toward her. Tripped and jostled till her strength failed, his arms alone saved the young woman from going down under those panic feet. Then putting his shoulders to the press, he dragged her out of the worst of it and into the semi-shelter of a jog in the wall, in front of which he planted himself as a screen.

"Now we're all right," he said cheerfully. "Take it easy and don't worry."

"But I can't help worrying!" the small person objected, clutching the lapels of his dress coat with importunate hands. "How can I, if I'm going to be arrested and put in jail and brought up in a police court with all these awful people? The shame of it! the disgrace!"

"If you'll trust to me," Lanyard suggested, "I think I can promise you none of those calamities will happen."

"But how can you——"

"I'm sure I know a way . . ."

As he spoke, with no warning whatsoever the house from cellar to roof was drenched with darkness absolute.

This thing befell with stupefying dramatic force. Where there had been deafening hubbub and confusion to confound the readiest, a lull of a long moment succeeded, during which every voice was hushed and nobody stirred. In this breathing spell Lanyard found time to divine what had happened: that some creature of Morphew's, acting possibly on inspiration but more probably in conformance with a plan preconcerted against such an emergency, had disconnected the master switch of the electric wiring system for the house. Then Folly McFee whimpered in new fright and caught him closer to her; and in another breath the turmoil revived in redoubled volume.

Lanyard lifted his hands to the woman's and gently disengaged them.

"There, Mrs. McFee! don't be alarmed. They've simply shut off the lights to give the people the police are after a chance to escape. If you will only calm yourself and have a little faith in me, I'll get you out of this in a jiffy, and no harm done."

"But my wrap! I can't go without my wrap—I'd catch my death! And my hand bag, too—I left it on the table——"

"I'll find them for you; it wont delay us a minute . . ."

Lanyard swept the darkness roundabout with an extended hand, which came into contact with nothing; then, satisfied that the landing was now practically clear, drew the woman out of her corner and coolly wound an arm around her.

"I'll be better able to avoid losing you this way," he explained. "Hope you don't mind."

"No-o," said the small voice. "I think—I believe I rather like it."

In witness whereto, she snuggled . . .

For all that unmitigated murk Lanyard experienced no difficulty in finding the way back to the right door.

"Hello?" he called, pausing on its threshold. "I've got Mrs. McFee here, safe and sound. Somebody make a light; I noticed candles on the mantelpiece . . ."

Nothing answered him. But this he had discounted. Releasing the woman and bidding her stop where she was, he struck a match whose flare revealed a room deserted.

Folly McFee gave a gasp of astonishment: "Where are they?"

"In sound American slanguage," Lanyard replied, crossing to the fireplace and applying the flame to the wicks of molded and tinted candles that decorated its mantel, "our friends have flown the coop. You see, Morphew told me just now that he's the proprietor of these premises; so I'm inclined to suspect the lights were put out to permit him to make a clean getaway . . . But here's your wrap." He draped the sable robe around the woman's shoulders. "And your bag," he added, finding the same where Folly had left it.

"But I don't understand!" she protested, lifting a bewildered small face to the light.

"I never imagined you would, Mrs. McFee," Lanyard laughed, catching up one of the candlesticks and turning to the door. "If you had understood, I fancy, you would never have come here tonight—or any night—that is, unless it's a fad of yours to live up to your nickname . . ."

The words failed on his lips as he pulled up just short of the door, finding this blocked by a long, lanky shape of humanity lounging with one lazy shoulder against the frame; the derby of tradition on the back of his head, hands buried in the pockets of an unbuttoned overcoat—one of them, Lanyard hadn't any doubt whatever, holding an automatic pistol ready.

"The devil!" he exclaimed involuntarily.

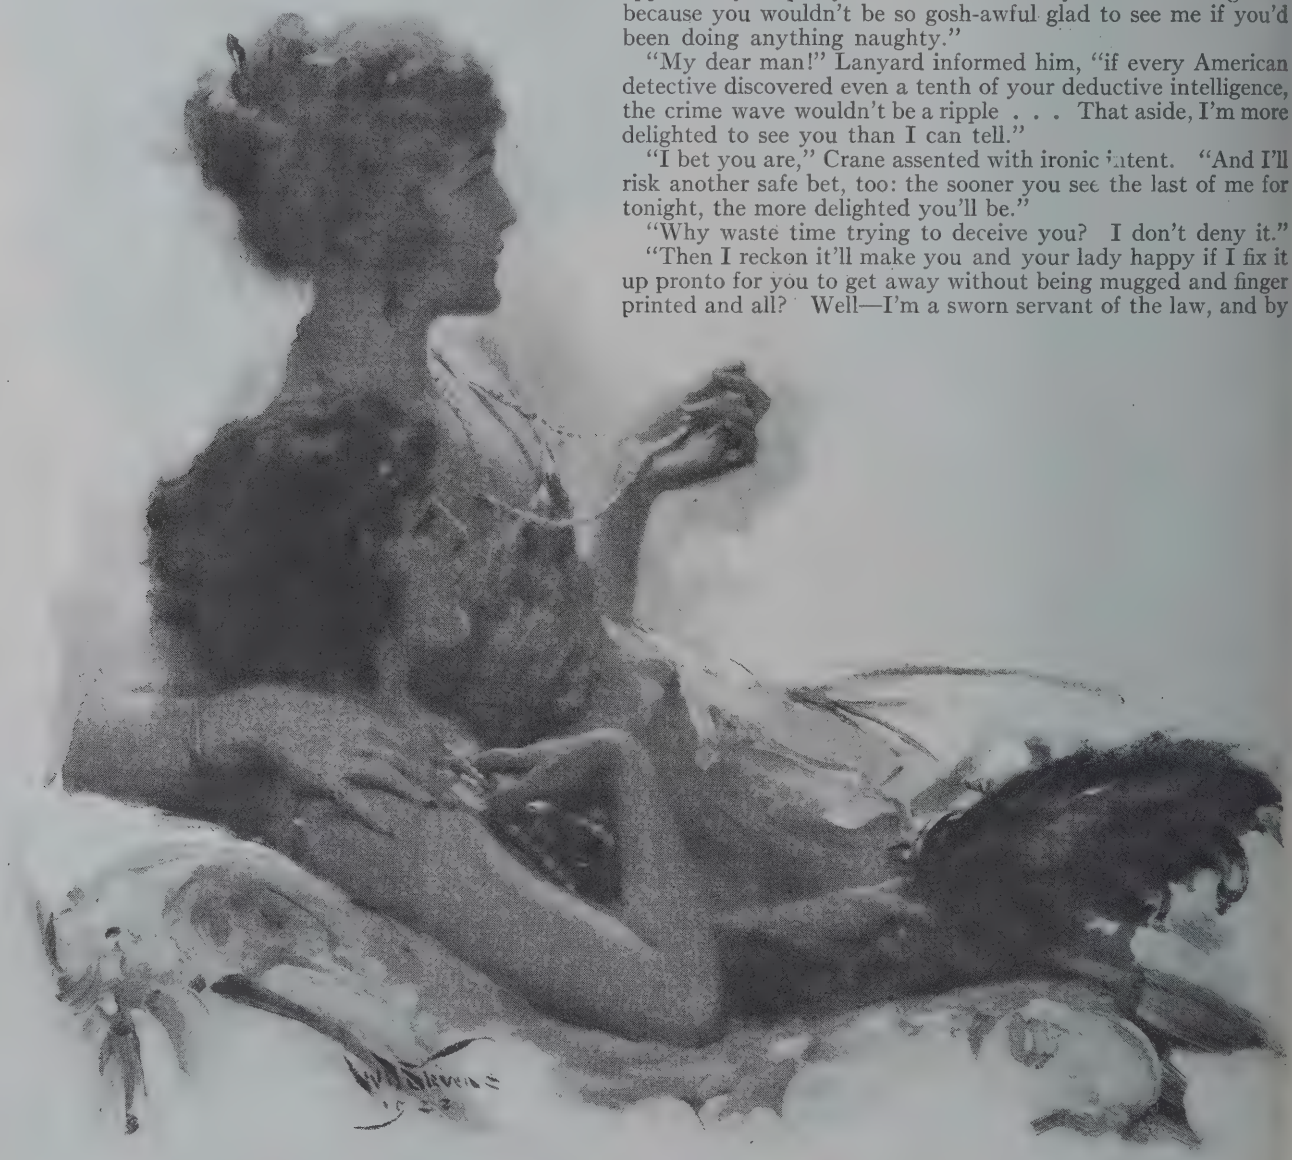
"Devil yourself, Monseer Lanyard," a nasal drawl returned. "Funny! I was thinking only a day or so ago it was about time for you and me to be bumping into each other again. And now, lo and behold you!"

"It can't be!" Lanyard cried incredulously, stepping nearer and holding the candle high.

"Wrong again—it can," drawled the humorous voice. "It is!"

The candlelight ruddled the lineaments of a North American Indian in the skin of a paleface: narrowed eyes beneath a lofty brow, a thin nose with a prominent bridge, lantern jaws and high cheek bones, a wide slit of a firm lipped mouth.

"Crane!" Lanyard cried in unfeigned pleasure.



"Never forget anything, do you?" Mr. Crane complained in mock bitterness. "Here I was counting on being able to put something over on you because you hadn't seen me for five or six years—nineteen-seventeen, wasn't it?—and you'd ought to've forgotten my map entirely . . . Swell chance!" He surrendered to Lanyard's friendly grasp a bony hand of tremendous strength. "Well!" he groused on, "I guess here's where I miss another opportunity to put you out of harm's way—in the hoosegow—because you wouldn't be so gosh-awful glad to see me if you'd been doing anything naughty."

"My dear man!" Lanyard informed him, "if every American detective discovered even a tenth of your deductive intelligence, the crime wave wouldn't be a ripple . . . That aside, I'm more delighted to see you than I can tell."

"I bet you are," Crane assented with ironic intent. "And I'll risk another safe bet, too: the sooner you see the last of me for tonight, the more delighted you'll be."

"Why waste time trying to deceive you? I don't deny it."

"Then I reckon it'll make you and your lady happy if I fix it up pronto for you to get away without being mugged and finger printed and all? Well—I'm a sworn servant of the law, and by

"To be frank," admitted Pagan, "I had the Lone Wolf in mind. The fellow is here now and up to his old tricks again."

all accounts you're a desperate bad character; but come along . . . Only you got to promise you won't tell on me."

Crane sighed heavily and straightened up, but Lanyard dropped a detaining hand on his arm.

"A moment, my friend, by your leave. My personal gratitude I hope to prove when you have more time. But Mrs. McFee, too, would like to thank you . . . Permit me, Mrs. McFee—Mr. Crane . . ."

"Mrs. Folliott McFee?" Crane queried quickly, with a glint of interest, and engulfed in his grasp her absurdly insignificant hand. "How do you do, ma'am—pleased to meet you."

"It's awfully sweet of you," Folly replied with trusting eyes and that hint—no more—of an infantile lisp which she had found so serviceable in dealing with certain types of men. "I'm sure I'd be frightened silly if it wasn't for you and Mr. Lanyard."

"Nothing for you to be scared about," Crane reassured her. "It's the outfit that runs this joint we're after tonight, not the general public, that great body"—his tone took on the authentic twang of a public orator—"of simple minded, plain living, law-deriding hooch hounds that forms the sturdy backbone of this glorious nation . . . Listen to 'em yap!" He grinned broadly, cocking an appreciative ear to the clamor. "No, ma'am—even if you and Monseer Lanyard hadn't run into me, the worst that could have happened to you would've been to have your names and addresses taken so as you could be called as witnesses in case we caught anybody. Which," Crane added with conviction, "I don't much think we will, not tonight, not since they put the lights out on us. That's a brand new dodge, and a hot one. After this gets out, I reckon we'll have to carry our own lighting plant along with us for night work, like they do in the movies."

He was piloting Mrs. McFee down the corridor while thus discoursing, in the wake of the candle. Now, at the head of the stairs, he nodded to a patrolman stationed there, and the three were permitted to descend.

The raiding party had by this time found other candles and brought a few electric torches into play, by whose meager illumination the business of winnowing out the goats from the sheep was proceeding in the rooms which had been reserved for dancing. But of this Lanyard and Folly McFee caught only the barest of glimpses in passing; for Crane was obviously in haste to discharge his friendly duty and be rid of them, and passed them with all possible expedition through the house. But at the front door he held them for a moment.

"There's more or less of a mob outside," he stated; "but I guess you won't have much trouble finding a taxi. That is, unless Mrs. McFee came in her own car . . ." But it appeared that Folly hadn't. "Then I guess it's good night, folks! Only, I'd like one word with you first, Lanyard, if Mrs. McFee won't mind . . ."

Drawing Lanyard aside, Crane dropped his voice: "Still with the B. S. S.? Doing anything special over here?"

"No—in fact, nothing. Leave of absence."

"I see. Where are you stopping?" Crane noted the address on the back of an envelope. "I'll look you up as soon's I get time. Like to have a chin about this and that."

"Do, my friend, and don't delay too long."

Passed by Crane through the police lines but pursued by jeers and catcalls of the crowd which had collected, Lanyard and Folly hurried round the corner into Sixth Avenue, and there by good fortune picked up a cab almost at once. This they would hardly have needed but for the drizzle, which had set in again; Folly McFee, it appeared, lived in the lower Fifties, just east of Park Avenue. Learning which, Lanyard hushed a sigh of content; the shorter the drive, the better. This latter part of his evening exhilarated him not at all, and though the woman at his side was charming enough in her fashion, nothing would please him more than to see the last of her and be free to trot home to his dreams of Eve. In fact, he found himself surprisingly sleepy, considering the hour which, according to a street clock on Fifth Avenue, still lacked a few minutes of two—so swift had been the transaction of events since his meeting with Liane Delorme.

A plaintive sigh from the other corner of the seat recalled him.

"You are tired, madame?" he inquired of the small figure huddled in that magnificent panoply of fur.

Passing lights fitfully revealed a petulant face to match Folly's tone: "More disgusted than tired. I'm so awfully grateful, and you've been such a perfect brick to me, Mr. Lanyard, it makes me sick to have you think me a little fool."

"But I assure you, I do not think anything of the sort."

"You forget what you said back there in the Clique Club about it's being a fad of mine to live up to my name."

"That would be unforgivable were it open to the construction you put on it, madame. What I said was——"

"I know perfectly well what you said, at least what you meant: that I ought to have known better than to be there at all. But I don't see why."

"I should like very much to tell you, if I might without seeming to presume . . ."

"But I want you to tell me, Mr. Lanyard; I don't want to do things that make people think it's a fad of mine——"

"Surely you will be generous enough to forget those stupid words. Otherwise I shall never forgive myself."

"I will . . . on one condition." A suggestion of the impish spirit of an hour ago revived in Folly's smile. "And that is, that you explain what you meant—right away."

"But it's so late, madame; and we are already at your home."

The cab was in fact halting in front of one of those demure bijou residences into which modern architectural ingenuity has, in the more fashionable quarters of New York, remodeled so many of the brownstone and brick abominations of decades dead and gone.

"Late?" Folly McFee expostulated, opening wide eyes. "Why, it's only two—the shank of the evening! Plenty of time to come in and have a drink and a cigarette and tell me how to save myself from the pitfalls of life in a great city."

And Lanyard, helping the woman to alight, with a bow and a smile covered yet another sigh of sentimental desolation. There was no refusal possible without rudeness . . .

By the time he had paid off the taxi Folly had used a latchkey and was unfastening the throat of her wrap in the little entrance hall.

"Do leave your coat and hat here, Mr. Lanyard—and make believe you're not bored to tears with the prospect of spending half an hour alone with a pretty woman who thinks you're rather nice."

"You do me injustice," he returned gravely. "This pensive silence which you misconstrue is solely due to wonder what your family will think . . ."

"The Saints be praised!" cried Folly McFee, rolling up devout eyes, "I haven't a suspicion of family, more than a maiden aunt who insists on living with me for the looks of the thing. But if it's information you're fishing for, it's only fair to tell you I'm a lone, lorn widdy woman, and have been for years. So you needn't be hoping for a jealous husband to pop in unexpectedly and protect you from my wiles."

She danced to the back of the hall, bidding him follow with a beckoning head and a bewitching smile.

The room was a study and lounge in which easy chairs faced the embers of an open fire and windows heavily draped contributed to a cozy and informal atmosphere.

Here, measurably less bored than he thought he ought to be, Lanyard accepted a cigarette and a highball compounded with such Scotch as he had not tasted since leaving England, and made himself comfortable on one side of the fireplace while on the other Folly curled herself up interestingly with her feet beneath her.

"And now," she announced with a speciously naïve look, "I'm waiting to be told why I'm aptly nicknamed."

Smiling, Lanyard put his glass aside. "Perhaps one reason is because you recklessly invite into your home at ungodly hours a man about whom you know nothing whatever."

"I know enough from the way you've behaved tonight. Besides, anything I want to know about you I can find out from Liane any time I care to ask." Folly made a provoking face. "You'll have to do better than that!"

Lanyard shrugged. "I see there's no fobbing you off . . . Is it permitted to be plain-spoken?"

"Please. Even if it hurts, I'm sure I'll find it refreshing . . ." With malice Folly amended: "Coming from a man." She pursued with all the gravity of a sagacious infant: "You know, Mr. Lanyard, it's all tosh, this effort you men are forever making to persuade the world you're the straightforward sex. Maybe you are among yourselves, but with women——!"

Her eyes called Heaven to witness to the subtlety of masculine methods with women.

"I agree entirely, madame. But do you claim more for your own sex?"

"Oh, there's never any doubt about a woman's mind! She may not always say what she means—sometimes she doesn't just know how—but one always knows what she means."

"One always knows she means business . . ."

"Precisely." Folly giggled joyously. "You know, Mr. Lanyard, you're too delightful. I'm afraid you're a dangerous man."

Lanyard bowed his appreciation of this flattery. "You begin to believe, perhaps, you may have been a trifle injudicious in asking me in . . ."

The young woman agitated a dissenting head till its bobbed brassy tresses fluffed out like an aureole.

"Not the least bit!" she declared. "You could be dangerous and not half try; but so long as you persist in being a gentleman, why should I fear? Here am I using all my girlish arts to make you flirt—and all you can think of is how quickly you can read me the lecture I need and escape. Ain't that the truth?" She relished in elfin mischief Lanyard's momentary loss of countenance, then abruptly made a prim mouth and sat with modest eyes downcast to folded hands. "Well," she sighed, "go on . . ."

"No," Lanyard demurred; "I don't think I shall, if you don't mind. I begin to see my mistake; you can be trusted very well to take care of yourself."

"But if I insist? It isn't good manners to start something without finishing it."

"A man might better rush down a steep place into the sea than take a dare to advise any woman . . . But evidently I may as well resign myself to being thrown out instead of taking my leave in orderly fashion."

"Anything, so long as you get away sometime soon!" Folly lisped, without looking up: "I understand!"

"To begin with, then: You are an extremely attractive young woman."

"Yes, I know. But is this part of the lecture? or have I at last succeeded in rousing you?"

But Lanyard wouldn't be diverted. "And apparently," he persisted, "too well supplied with money to know a real care."

"Simple sloughs of the wretched stuff," Folly admitted frankly. "That sable coat you wore tonight can't have cost less than twenty thousand dollars."

"How little men know! It cost thirty."

"I could see the lights going full blast," Crane told Lanyard, "so I just naturally walked in and found you a total loss."

"The jewels you're wearing would ransom a profiteer's wife . . ."

"Why not? I'm a profiteer's widow."

"Those emeralds alone must be worth a hundred thousand . . ."

"You do know emeralds, don't you, Mr. Lanyard?"

"Altogether, taken as you stand, you'd probably assay a quarter of a million. Yet you complacently riot about town and without a moment's hesitation trust yourself in resorts like the Clique Club, rendezvous of the rarest set of rogues New York can boast—and your host its self-confessed proprietor!"

"Oh! everybody knows Morphy's the King of the Bootleggers; but nobody except revenue officials considers a bootlegger a criminal nowadays."

"Possibly not. Still, I fancy, society is less kindly disposed toward professional blackmailers, notorious demi-mondaines and jewel thieves of international ill fame."

"Mr. Lanyard! you don't mean to say——" Folly McFee sat up and made shocked eyes.

"I am one whose lot it has been to see a vast deal of this world, madame. I give you my word I recognized representatives of all those classes at the Clique tonight."

The woman illustrated a little thrill of delicious dread. "Of course, as to blackmailers, I've nothing to fear——"

"Pardon—but can you be sure? In the absence of any fair excuse for bleeding their victims, blackmailers have been known to manufacture evidence. And it's always, with them, the open season for high-spirited young women of fortune with a taste for entertaining indiscretions."

The violet eyes widened and darkened. "Mr. Lanyard! you don't mean—you don't think——"

"Tell me this, Mrs. McFee: How did you make the acquaintance of Mr. Morphew?"

"Why, through Madame Delorme——"

"And Liane?"

"Mally introduced us."

"And Mr. Mallison?"

"Oh, I don't know! I really don't remember where I met Mally. Somewhere at a dance. He's the perfectest dancer in town."

"They are, as a rule."

"'They'?"

"Permit one more impertinent question: Does Mr. Mallison make love to you?"

"Why, of course! It's the only conversation he has."

"And you encourage him?"

"Now, it's no use your trying to make me believe Mally's a blackmailer. He hasn't got enough brains—or anything else."

"Perhaps not. But others have, with whom he herds. For example, Mr. Morphew."

"Morphy!" Folly laughed the notion to scorn. "The King of the Bootleggers makes too much money—he doesn't need to levy blackmail."

"It may be merely a hobby of his," Lanyard submitted reasonably; "or perhaps he's keeping his hand in in order to have a good trade to fall back on if ever anything happens to upset the Eighteenth Amendment."

"You aren't serious, Mr. Lanyard?"

"Madame—I know."

"How can you?"

"Your American courts permit a witness to refuse to answer leading questions on the ground that his testimony might tend to incriminate or degrade."

"You mean Morphy's trying to blackmail you? What a wicked life you must have led."

"I don't deny that; but rest assured, I admit it only to convince you I am not guessing. You will do well, believe me, madame, to avoid hereafter Mr. Morphew and all his crew."

"I'll bet," said Crane, "the sooner you see the last of me tonight, the more delighted you'll be."

"Mally and Peter Pagan and Liane Delorme? And they've been such fun! What's the matter with Liane?"

"Madame Delorme," Lanyard said slowly and with meaning, "I have known many years. Her friendship I value highly. I should be very sad to do anything to deserve her enmity."

"You are provoking!" Folly declared. "Forever tantalizing one with hints. I presume you mean me to understand she's the 'notorious demi-mondaine' you had in mind."

"Has Liane told you nothing about herself?"

"Oh, heaps! but——"

"Then I beg you to excuse me from saying anything that might, possibly through my ignorance of the true facts, conflict with her confidences."

"Beast!" said Folly McFee with feeling, and made a face of pique at him. "I suppose it's no use trying to pump you about that international jewel thief you mentioned."

"None whatever, madame."

"Of course you mean the Lone Wolf."

"But why that one?"

"Peter Pagan was talking about him at the Ritz tonight—told us there was a rumor the Lone Wolf had convalesced from his reformation and was operating again, right here in New York."

"I have no doubt," Lanyard agreed with entire tranquillity, "there is such a rumor . . . And now that I have duly functioned in my paternal rôle, my dear young woman"—he rose—"now I have told you all I know——"

"Anybody that believes that!"

"I fancy you will be relieved if I bid you good night."

"I think you're perfectly damn horrid," said Folly McFee, rising and extending her hand. "First you spoil my evening, then you run away!"

"You will forgive me one spoiled evening, I know, if anything I may have said preserves to you the beauty of your tomorrows."

"I won't forgive you for running away from me," the young woman promised darkly, holding fast to his hand and unleashing 80 c. p. eyes to do their most devastating work. "You can be rather a dear when you choose; but I don't think it's a bit fair of you to rob me of four friends and not replace them with one!"

"But I trust very truly ——" Lanyard began.

A peremptory buzz of the door bell interrupted.

CHAPTER V

FOLLY McFEE whipped her hand away with a jerk; her round eyes consulted Lanyard's; in that furtive tone which we seem instinctively to adopt in times of apprehension, irrespective of the possibility of being overheard—"What can that mean," she demanded—"at this hour of morning? Who can it be?"

"One or more of our fancy friends, undoubtedly," Lanyard replied with comforting absence of agitation, "calling to inquire if you got safely home—with, I'll wager, some transparent excuse for having left you to shift for yourself during the raid."

"But," the woman expostulated with a frown, "I don't want to see them . . . And all the servants are in bed . . ."

"Then I'm afraid there's no way out of it." Lanyard moved toward the hall door as the bell sounded another and even more imperative stridulation. "Let me——"

"No," Folly decided, darting ahead, "I'll let them in. But I do wish I didn't have to."

"Then remember," Lanyard enjoined, "better not give them any reason to suspect I have warned you . . ."

"I understand." She paused an instant, nodding back to him. "I'll do my best. But promise me one thing: you won't leave me alone with them."

He promised, a gay flirt of that fair head thanked him, Folly vanished. And in another moment Lanyard heard her give little cries of elation whose ring was as true as one could wish: "Liane! Peter! How sweet of you both!" And the listener gave a nod of thoughtful approbation.

The dry accents of Mr. Pagan replied: "I told Liane you were all right, but she wouldn't hear of going home without stopping to make sure . . ."

"Oh, I'm all right, of course! Mr. Lanyard brought me home. Thanks to him we didn't have the least trouble. But do come in, both of you, and tell him how you got out of it."

Liane was heard to consent, stipulating, however, that they would stop only a moment; and the three entered the study to find Lanyard at a wide window in the rear wall, thoughtfully peering out through its tear-blinded black panes.

"Ah! ah! my friend," Liane saluted him in lively imitation of the tone one might employ to a child caught in mild mischief; and wagged a forefinger of reproof. "What are you up to there?"

"Trying to make out whether or not it's raining again," Lanyard explained serenely, dropping the sumptuous draperies his hands parted.

"You might have waited to ask us."

"Judging by the state of mind you and Monsieur Pagan were betraying when I saw you last," Lanyard retorted, "it seemed fair to doubt whether you'd pay much attention to a drop or two of rain." He comprehended Pagan in a lightly mocking bow. "You might tell us—we've been no end mystified——"

"I know," Mr. Pagan interrupted brightly. "You want the answer to that historical riddle: Where was Morphew when the lights went out?"

"Not where he was, monsieur, but where he went—and not alone—and with such amazing expedition."

"We didn't know what to think," Folly declared. "You vanished from that room like tumblers in a pantomime!"

"It was very simple," Pagan elucidated glibly. "Everybody seemed to be making for the roof, so we followed the crowd."

"Presuming, of course," Liane amended, "you would, as well."

"You see," commented Lanyard, nodding to Folly, "how simply some things may be explained!" And thereby earned and enjoyed a resentful look from Pagan. "And did you actually get away across the roofs?"

"Unhappily, no. Those wretched police were up there too," said Liane with disgust. "So we had to go back and line up with the rest and give our names and addresses."

"Monsieur Morphew too?" Lanyard's tone was skeptical. "And that so charming Monsieur Mallison?"

"All of us," Pagan snapped in a strange fit of bad temper. "That's what delayed us so."

"Frankly, monsieur, you surprise me!"

"How so?"

"Why, if I were in Monsieur Morphew's shoes——"

"You'd rattle," Pagan asserted.

"What a literal mind you have, my friend! Well! but if I were, like that good soul, proprietor of an institution so open to police attentions, I would be at pains to provide myself with more than one secret avenue of escape—when the lights go out."

"You've got to make allowances for Morph," Pagan stated blandly. "He hasn't had your early advantages."

At this juncture, apparently possessed by the belief that some sharp distraction was indicated if open hostilities were to be averted, Liane pounced upon Lanyard's barely tasted highball.

"Why waste time trying to deceive you?" Lanyard answered.

"What do I see? And this hour I have been dying of thirst!" She gulped with gusto, making eyes at Lanyard over the rim of the glass. "Yours, my friend? Never mind—Folly will fetch you another."

"Do with a drink myself," Pagan volunteered. "No—don't you budge, Mrs. McFee—I know the way."

He ducked briskly out into the hall and was presently heard in the dining room making melody with glasses and siphons and ice.

Having drained her glass, Liane set it aside, crossed to Lanyard and petted his cheek with the authentic professional touch. "You mustn't mind Peter, mon coco," she cooed affectionately in French. "He presumes, perhaps, but then he's a privileged type."

"Mind him?" Lanyard questioned in a tone that implied he found the thought weird. "Vermin, my dear Liane, were ever my pet aversion. If you set any value on this insect, be good enough to keep him out from under my feet."

"Every time you do that," Folly (Continued on page 104)

When Good Fellows Get Together

Illustrations by Wallace Morgan

"I'm going to Europe," said Silas T. Green,
"Where one can be free, if you get what I mean;
Where people aren't meek as a passell of rabbits
And don't let the laws fix their personal habits.
For here's my position,
I view Prohibition
As nothing but Puritan flibberty-gibberty.
I'm going where Volstead Laws cease to annoy,
And where I can plainly and calmly enjoy
A generous measure of Personal Liberty!"

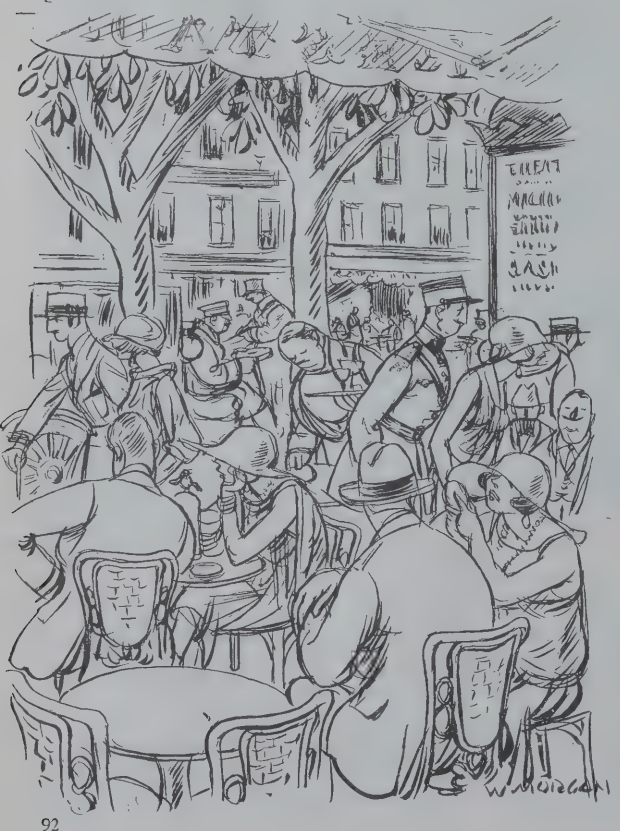
Thus spake Silas Green. And his comrades agreed
That Silas had uttered a mouthful, indeed.
They said, "Why, this country's been put on the blink
By bigots who won't let a gentleman drink,
While bootleggers thrive selling terrible stuff;

You can't get away from here quickly enough.
Drink hearty, old scout,
As you travel about;
You're a lucky old bird and a fortunate cuss,
So now and then toss off a highball for us."

[2]

Thus Silas departed
In fashion light-hearted,
And landing in London he sought the Savoy,
And there, in the bar, started in to enjoy
The freedom he wished. Silas Green was no stew,
He put away maybe a highball or two,
Then sat at his table and sized up the crowd.
He heard conversation exceedingly loud
And, seeking its source,
He noticed, perforce,
A number of men whom he'd met with before
In days when our country had barrooms galore.
They'd grown a lot flabbier,
Pastier, shakier,
Their clothes were much shabbier,
Hands a bit quakier,
But otherwise they were the same bunch of stews,
The same gang of barflies that sopped up the booze
In days when John Barleycorn still held his reign,
Those bright, happy days that the Wets would regain!

A few of them recognized Silas T. Green
And dragged him among them and called him "Old Bean,"
And pawed him all over in fashion symbolic
Of undying friendship, and showed alcoholic
And sloppy affection. So Silas bought Scotch
And helped them get drunker—then pulled out his watch
And mumbled "appointment" and got out of there.
"Give me air!" muttered Silas. "Good Lord, gimme air!"



He walked and he walked till he reached the east side
Where most of the poor folks of London abide;
Wherever he passed
The bars ran, full blast,
And horrible hags
In filth and in rags
Came reeling and wavering out in the night,

While men, faces haggard
With alcohol, staggered
Along in the gutter—a gay, merry sight.
And Silas T. Green
With grave thoughtful mien
Climbed up on a bus and went back to the Strand.
He thought to himself, "From the sights I have scanned,
I know that tomorrow the courts will be full
Of sons and of daughters of hearty John Bull,
Arrested for drunkenness, bestial and sodden;
And there will be children, starved, stunted, down-trodden,
And men who have beaten and battered their wives
—Still, Personal Liberty clearly survives!
I'll have to admit that this isn't so pleasant,
I've seen quite enough of old London, at present;
I'll take a run over to Paris, I think,
The French are a people Who Know How To Drink!"

[3]

So Silas crossed over
The channel from Dover

(It's kind of the English to furnish that rhyme)
And all in good time
He landed in Paris, the blithe and the gay,
"Where everyone drinks in a moderate way,"
Or so people said.
And Silas had read
What a temperate folk were the people of France,
The land of light wines and of lighter romance.
At first he was charmed and delighted to find
The thousands who sipped a light wine while they dined,
Or loafed over cordials of every variety
In praiseworthy comfort and perfect sobriety.
"How cozy and pleasant, how simply delectable!
These people make drinking a pleasure respectable."
Our hero declared. "Here's a form of diversion
On which the most bigoted can't cast aspersion;
Yes, these are the people whom tourists describe
As thoroughly knowing the way to imbibe."

So Silas T. Green
Felt pleased and serene
With that part of Paris which, so far, he'd seen.
But like every tourist,
Yes, even the purest,
He wanted to witness the Life of Montmartre
Supposedly gayest of spots on the chart.
And so he set out where the bright lights were winking
In many a famous and brilliant café,
To see how the French, with their Moderate Drinking,
Performed when they chanced to be specially gay.
He did all the joints
At the various points
His friends recommended, and found, with dismay,
A crowd which progressively
Drank most excessively,
And though drunken foreigners predominated,
The natives, too, proved to be inebriated.
And under the clamor,
The jazz and the glamour
Which costly surroundings attempted to throw,
Beneath all the show
Of perfumes and jewels and servile suavity,
Silas T. Green sensed the ancient depravity,
The union of drink with commercialized vice,
Which, Silas conceded, was not very nice!

We need not detail
Exactly the trail
That Silas Green followed through Paris that night,
Except to expound
That Silas T. found
The French people often get pie-eyed, all right.

For cognac is potent, and little cafés
Are everywhere anyone happens to gaze,
And "Well," remarked Silas T. Green, "it's the bunk
When people say Frenchmen don't ever get drunk!"

[4]

Still, Silas went on with his quest very grittily,
Visited Germany, ran down to Italy,
Seeking with fervor that much discussed land,
Or nation, or race, which might quite understand
The Right Way to Drink. But wherever he went
He never found people entirely content
With merely enough
Of John Barleycorn's stuff—
Too Much pleased them better; he frequently viewed
The Latin or Teuton undoubtedly stewed,
There always were places where patrons were busy
In making themselves very cheerfully dizzy,
And others who'd sunk in
A deep stupor drunken.
So, though he'd heard travelers sagely affirm many Times that they Knew How to Drink there in Germany,
Or heard that Italians were known as a tribe,
That understood just the Right Way to Imbibe,
He found on a closer, more accurate view
Wherever there's Drink there is drunkenness too!

So Silas sailed home
O'er the salt ocean foam
And it's worthy of note that the bar of the ship
Never saw Silas Green during all of his trip,
And it's also a fact quite beyond all dispute
That most of the others drank vichy, en route.

[5]

Oh the grin on the mien
Of Silas T. Green
When the Statue of Liberty gleamed in the skies!
"Oh Lady," he cried, "you're a sight for sore eyes!
You're the right kind of Liberty, Lady, for me,
For I've had enough of the kind that's abroad;
That Personal Liberty proved but to be
A jade and a wanton, a boozy old fraud.
My gosh, you look stately and pure and serene,
I take off my hat!" observed Silas T. Green.

That night in the club when his friends gathered round,
He said to them "Boys, I have much to expound,
But if you imagine I'll knock Prohibition
And praise Europe's moist alcoholic condition
You've got a new guess—for I've changed my position!
I guess I'd forgotten," Remarked Silas T.,
"How thoroughly rotten
A gin mill can be;
I failed to remember how, once on a time,
The corner saloon brought corruption and crime,

And all I recalled were the pleasanter things,
The warm friendly feeling that alcohol brings,
The glow of elation
A cocktail supplies,
The comfy sensation
A gin rickey buys;
I swore and I grumbled because these were lost,
But I had forgotten how much they can cost
In manhood that's shattered,
In womanhood soiled,
In evils wide scattered,
In domiciles spoiled;
All these I'd forgotten, but Europe recalled
These facts to my mind with a shock that appalled.
Yes, bootlegging's bad enough, it is a curse,
But I'll tell the world that the barrooms are worse.
At first it was fun, without breaking the law,
To drink what I wanted, whenever I chose,
But after a while, well, the things that I saw
That trail alcohol any place that it goes,
They stuck in my craw,
And they just made me sick—
And so, boys, I beat it for home, mighty quick.
I learned—it's a fact which a man cannot blink—
There isn't a nation that Knows How to Drink!
I went over Wet, but I'm back here a Dry,
For after the sights that offended my eye
This Personal Liberty bunk doesn't go,
I watched it abroad and believe me, I know!

"A visit to Europe, I'll hand you my hunch,
Would make Prohibitionists out of this bunch.
To Andrew J. Volstead I make my salaam—
You think that I'm preaching? You bet that I am!"

The Perkinses' Career

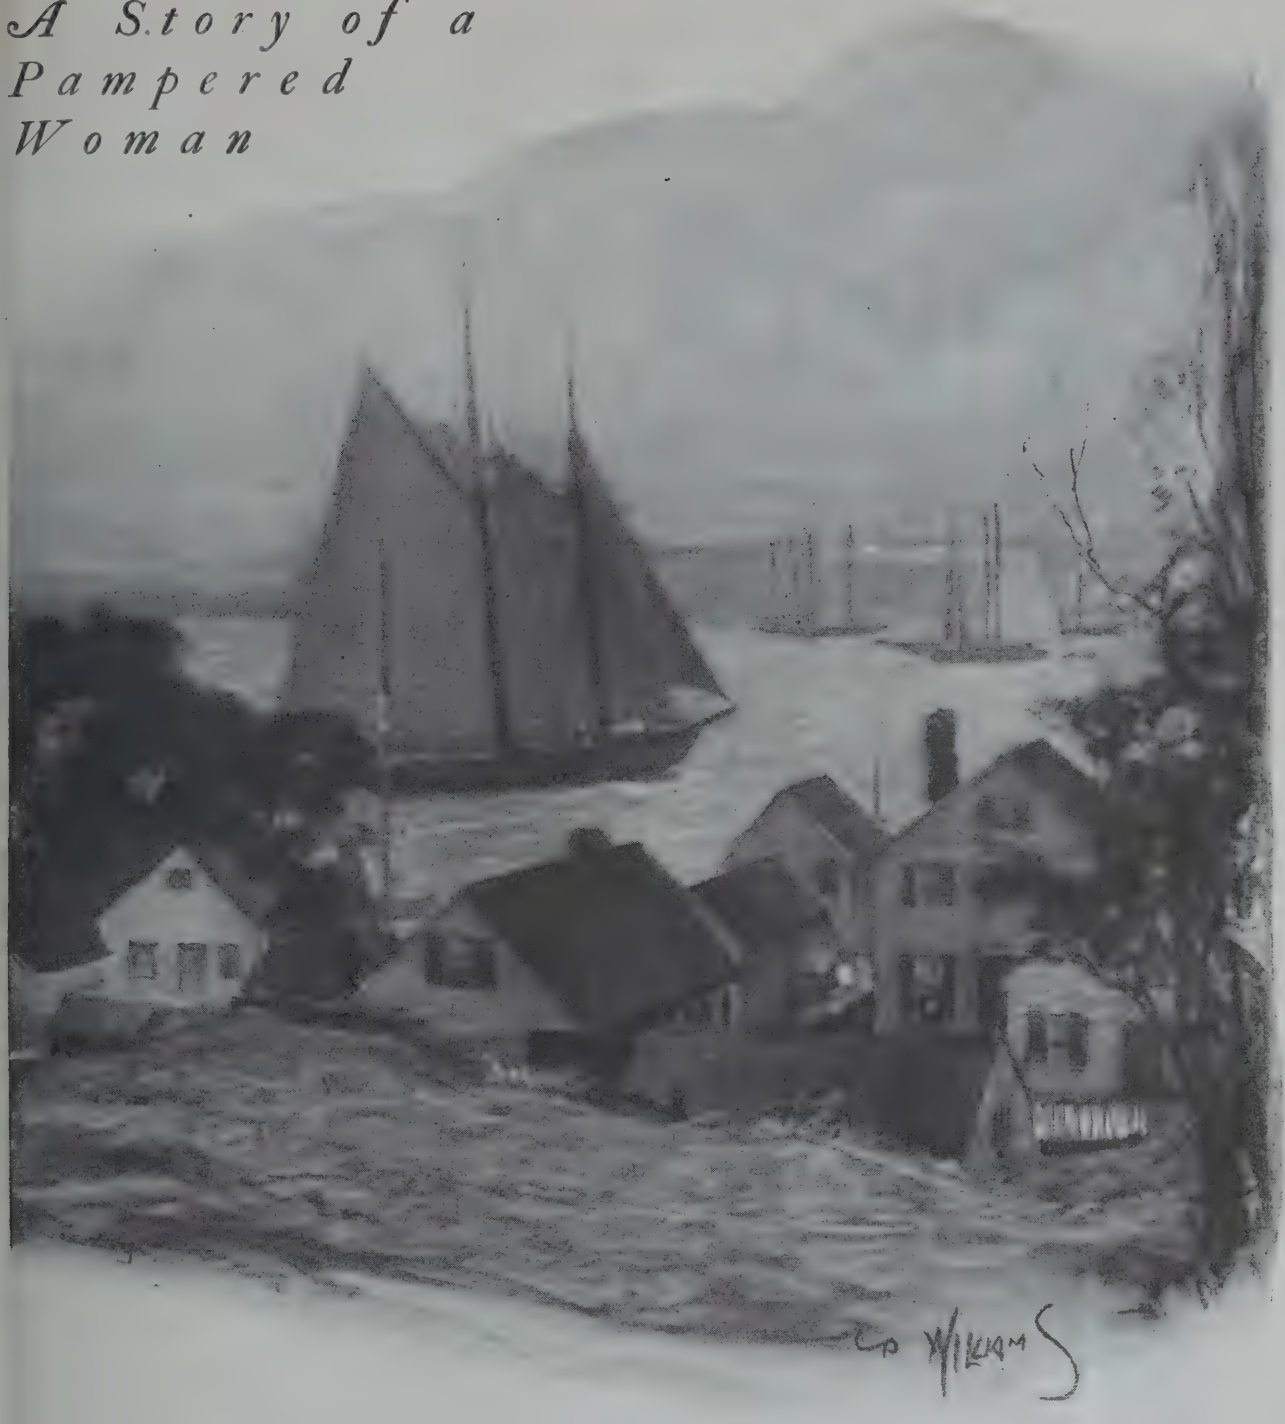
Illustrations

ONLY a few people knew that Mrs. William Pennington had gone so far as to file a petition for divorce against her husband. Those few people thought that she withdrew the petition because of ambition. For of course a divorce action, following William Pennington's nomination for the governorship, would have absolutely killed his chances of election.

But you can't fool servants. Your family, your friends, your acquaintances: these you may deceive as to your domestic felicity. But the cook, the butler, the housemaids, the chauffeur —they know.

The Penningtons are indisputably happy. And if it be asked how, having made a botch of it the first time, the Penningtons made a success of it the second, this is the answer: one obligation creates another, and the fulfilling of one's duty may sometimes bring reward.

In September, 1882, the Jane Louise sailed from Bucksport, Maine, for the Behring Sea. From the docks and banks people waved good by. The curtained windows of some houses told of women brave enough to stand a three years' separation from their husbands, but not so courageous that they could expose their tear-stained cheeks to the sympathetic gaze of their neighbors. Across the river, from the ramparts of the old fort that commanded the reaches of the stream, Frank Perkins watched the Jane Louise sail down to the sea.



A smarter craft had never left Bucksport. The tide was with her, and with all her canvas set the schooner heeled before a land breeze that, by its piney odor, must have swept across Moosehead and the woods between.

A beautiful sight; a gallant sight; a sight that thrilled—and almost broke—the heart.

For until last week Frank Perkins had expected to sail on the Jane Louise. Like most of Bucksport's adventurous youth, he followed the sea. He knew the Banks. He knew the far ports of China. He had been on the Shenandoah when she raced the Roanoke around the Horn. He knew the Western Ocean and the distant Marquesas; Good Hope and Hatteras were familiar, even friendly names to him.

His father had died with "Albemarle" Cushing; his uncle had manned one of the guns that whipped the Alabama; his grandfather had served with Decatur; and it was a proud family legend that when the Bon Homme Richard lowered away a longboat to carry Paul Jones to his landing on the British coast, a Perkins had pulled an oar.

In the veins of the boy who through misty eyes gazed at the gallant Jane Louise were at least four generations of seafaring blood. His career thus far had proved his heritage, for at nineteen he could have been second officer of the schooner that now scudded down the wide reaches of the Penobscot.

Captain Ira Hooper had pleaded with him only yesterday to rescind his decision not to go on the whaling cruise to the Northern Pacific.

"'Taint fair to yourself, Frank," said the Captain. "You're only nineteen. We'll be back before your twenty-second birthday. Your share ought to run close to seven thousand dollars, if we have any luck. That'd set you up for life, my boy."

Young Perkins shook his head. "I know, Cap'n," he said. "I figured that all out, but I've been figurin' something else, too. A man owes something to his wife."

"That's jest it," argued the Captain. "You ain't married yet. Wait till you come back. Loretta is the right stock; she'll wait fer ye."

The young man smiled. "I ain't worryin' none about Loretta not waitin'," he replied. "But—where's she going to wait?"

"Ain't she all right with her aunt?" demanded the Captain.

Perkins shook his head. "She ain't rightly her aunt, only by marriage, and Loretta ain't any too welcome. But don't get the idea that Loretta's been carryin' on or anything like that. She wants me to sail with you, Cap'n, but I figure it ain't fair. I know how it is with sailors, and how it is with their wives. They don't get to see each other sometimes for years. That'd kill Loretta."

Captain Hooper stared at the youth. He didn't argue any more. When a young man thinks that his absence will kill his prospective bride, he is past all argument. The Captain understood; he had felt that way himself some twenty-five years ago.

And so the Jane Louise sailed away . . . But the mist had gone from young Perkins's eyes before the towering foremast had disappeared behind a bluff of the river. For he was genuinely and completely in love with Loretta Blaisdell. Small, blonde and winsome, she carried with her an air of delicacy that did not indicate weakness of body, but rather spoke of refinement of soul. She had come from Massachusetts upon the death of her parents only a year ago. Perkins, returning from a voyage to the Banks, had met her and been swept off his feet. She was only seventeen, yet neither of them, in that time and community, was thought too young for marriage.

During the lovely summer months they had gone rowing upon the river, driven as far as Bangor behind the fast mare that was the pride of Perkins's heart, picnicked on the islands, walked along the grassy lanes in the twilight; they had done all those simple things which young folks are wont to do. Not until Loretta's lips had willingly met his own did young Perkins give any serious thought to the future. Then it came over him suddenly that he could not bear to leave Loretta, that she could not bear to have him go.

He had given little care to the future. He was sturdy and capable. His advancement had been rapid, due to the fact that he had spent much time in the study of navigation. Save for his years, he was capable of taking a ship from Maine to Hongkong and back again. He had always assumed that he would follow the sea until he was old enough to retire and build for himself one of those magnificent tree-shaded homes on Main Street to which all sailors seem to turn.

At first he had looked forward to the day, not so very far away, when he would be skipper of a big ship and would take Loretta with him in the captain's cabin to the far ports of the sea.

But before that time could come there must be separation. Captain Hooper's offer to take him whaling to the Behring Sea, to be gone three years, was a magnificent offer, and his heart leaped in gratitude when the Captain made it. A moment later he realized that he could not accept. He knew that it would not be fair to Loretta. Although she was the sturdy daughter of a sturdy strain, there was something in her eyes that seemed to warn him that she lived more exquisitely in her nerves, in her brain, in her heart, than the other girls he knew. There was something in the way she looked at him that told him, unsophisticated and unsoiled though he was, that when she had completely surrendered herself to him she could not live without her conqueror. And his clean boy's heart ached even at the thought of leaving her. Not that he was not of a man's stature in his soul as well as his body. He could endure separation, because it was man's part to do his work even though it took him away.

But Loretta . . . He gave up the sea which he loved, because he loved Loretta more.

In October they were married. Frank knew quite a lot about carpentry. In his few years at sea he had been frugal. He was able to purchase a third interest in a wheelwright's business. Popular, industrious, "able," in a modest way he prospered. Three years after their marriage a son was born.

They christened him Frank, and although the age of steam had come and the age of the sail was going, Perkins stayed up late the night of the christening talking to his wife about the great ship that Frank, Junior, would some day skipper. The adoring Loretta's eyes were wet as she listened. She knew how dear had been his career to her husband, and the fact that he never whimpered made her love him the more. Yet Perkins had no regrets. Loretta was more charming as a wife than she had been as a sweetheart; she was more adorable as a mother than she had been as a wife.

Then, in 1888, an amazing offer was made to Frank Perkins. A former shipmate had emigrated to the Argentine. A great many years older than Frank, he had seen the possibilities of the South American country. A letter came from him, telling of the fortune in cattle and lands that in ten years he had amassed. In American money he was worth at least three hundred thousand dollars. What he needed, however, according to his letter, was a man in whose ability and integrity he could trust. Frank Perkins was the man. He would give him a salary of three thousand dollars a year to start, a house for himself and his little family, transportation to the ranch and a very definite promise of a partnership within five years.

But the offer must be accepted immediately, and the Perkinses must sail at once. For the rancher must leave on a trip to Europe within two months. If Perkins, to whom he made the first offer, could not accept, he must give the chance to another man.

Loretta and Frank stayed up until dawn, reading and rereading the letter. The salary offered was fully twice what Frank was making as a wheelwright. The future was far beyond anything he could hope for in Bucksport. And there was no need of their separating. The rancher knew of their marriage, of the existence of little Frank. All the old spirit of adventure was aroused in Perkins. Together he and Loretta wrote the letter of acceptance. He even, in his excitement, put on his hat and coat and heavy rubber boots to venture out into the darkness and drop the letter in the post office at once. That is how delighted and thrilled they were.

But during the hours of the night while they had talked, a blizzard, that historic storm still known as the blizzard of 'eighty-eight, had begun. As Perkins opened the front door, a smothering whirl of snow enveloped them. It took all his strength to close the door. He turned back to Loretta, smiling whimsically.

"I guess," he told her, "this letter can wait till morning."

"I think it can, Frank," she replied.

But in the morning a matter more vital than the letter made him forget all about it. For little Frank had the croup. The home remedies that Loretta applied did not seem to avail against the progress of the disease. The roads were almost impassable, yet Frank, equipped with a huge shovel, broke a path from their house, well out upon the outskirts of Bucksport, to the main road, and fought his way through the storm to the home of Doctor Taylor, whom he brought back with him. Not even a sleigh that tipped over twice could deter the doctor from his errand of aid.

But in the wake of the great blizzard came a disease that people said had its inception in far-off Russia; they called it "la grippe," and after the attack of croup had subsided little Frank yielded to the new plague. The letter to the Argentine was forgotten, while day and night they battled for the youngster's life. And then the fight became more desperate, for the plague from Russia gave way to pneumonia.

Six weeks they waged the unequal battle. It was a week after the pathetic little funeral that Loretta, putting away Frank's heavy winter coat, now that May was almost here, found the letter addressed to the Argentine. She sighed as she tore it up. It was too late to mail it now.

The wheelwright shop continued to give a living to the Perkinses. But Frank was one of those souls who are born for big things and who, if they miss their destiny, cannot achieve greatly in the little things. The sea; the plains of the Argentine: in either of these he would have been successful. Not that he was unsuccessful in Bucksport, but his success was measured modestly. He was respected and liked, and a good workman. But he was no petty trader. Where another man would have carried a line of carriage supplies and harness, Perkins could not. His partner had died and he had used all his savings to buy the business from the widow. But when he owned the whole business, it brought him in little more than a third had brought him.

It was the trader's day, and he was no trader. To do things on a big scale; to raise things in a large way: this was his rôle, yet he was not, it seemed, destined to fill it.

In 'ninety-two Beryl was born. Loretta named her. She insisted that the baby was entitled to a name that somehow suggested romance. She was not fair like her mother, but dark, with olive skin and black hair. Her eyes lost their infantile blueness earlier than with most children's and had a queer greenish tint that reminded Loretta of the aquamarines that formed the necklace that Frank had given her on their wedding. The eyes seemed to change color in the light as does a beryl, and so her mother named her.

But the strain of their first-born had taken toll of Loretta's health, and the new baby was forced also to pay the price of those weeks of alternating hope and despair and final bitter anguish. From her birth Beryl was "delicate."

There was an exotic air about the child. The delicacy of her mother's mind and soul was translated to the daughter in terms of the flesh. For there was nothing of the fragile in the temperament of Beryl. Although the Perkinses did not know it, her dominant trait was a pertinacious selfishness. It was not, however, noticeable even to those outside her family. For from babyhood she was so beautiful in a wild gypsy sort of way, and so filled with fascinations, that it was the natural thing, it seemed, for her to command and the rest of the world to obey.

The Perkinses proudly marveled at her. Where other children were shy and ill at ease in the presence of "company," Beryl, as an infant, was supremely self-possessed. She had none of the little embarrassments of childhood. And yet there was about her none of the forwardness of the average precocious child. She simply seemed to take everything as her due; and she took a great deal.

For in her fourth year, recovering slowly from some infantile malady, her mother took her to the White Mountains. Such a urney was an unheard-of expense. All told, it cost her ther in the neighborhood of four hundred dollars. That m of money was exactly the amount needed to purchase r the shop some new machinery on which the wheelwright's e had been eagerly fixed for several months.

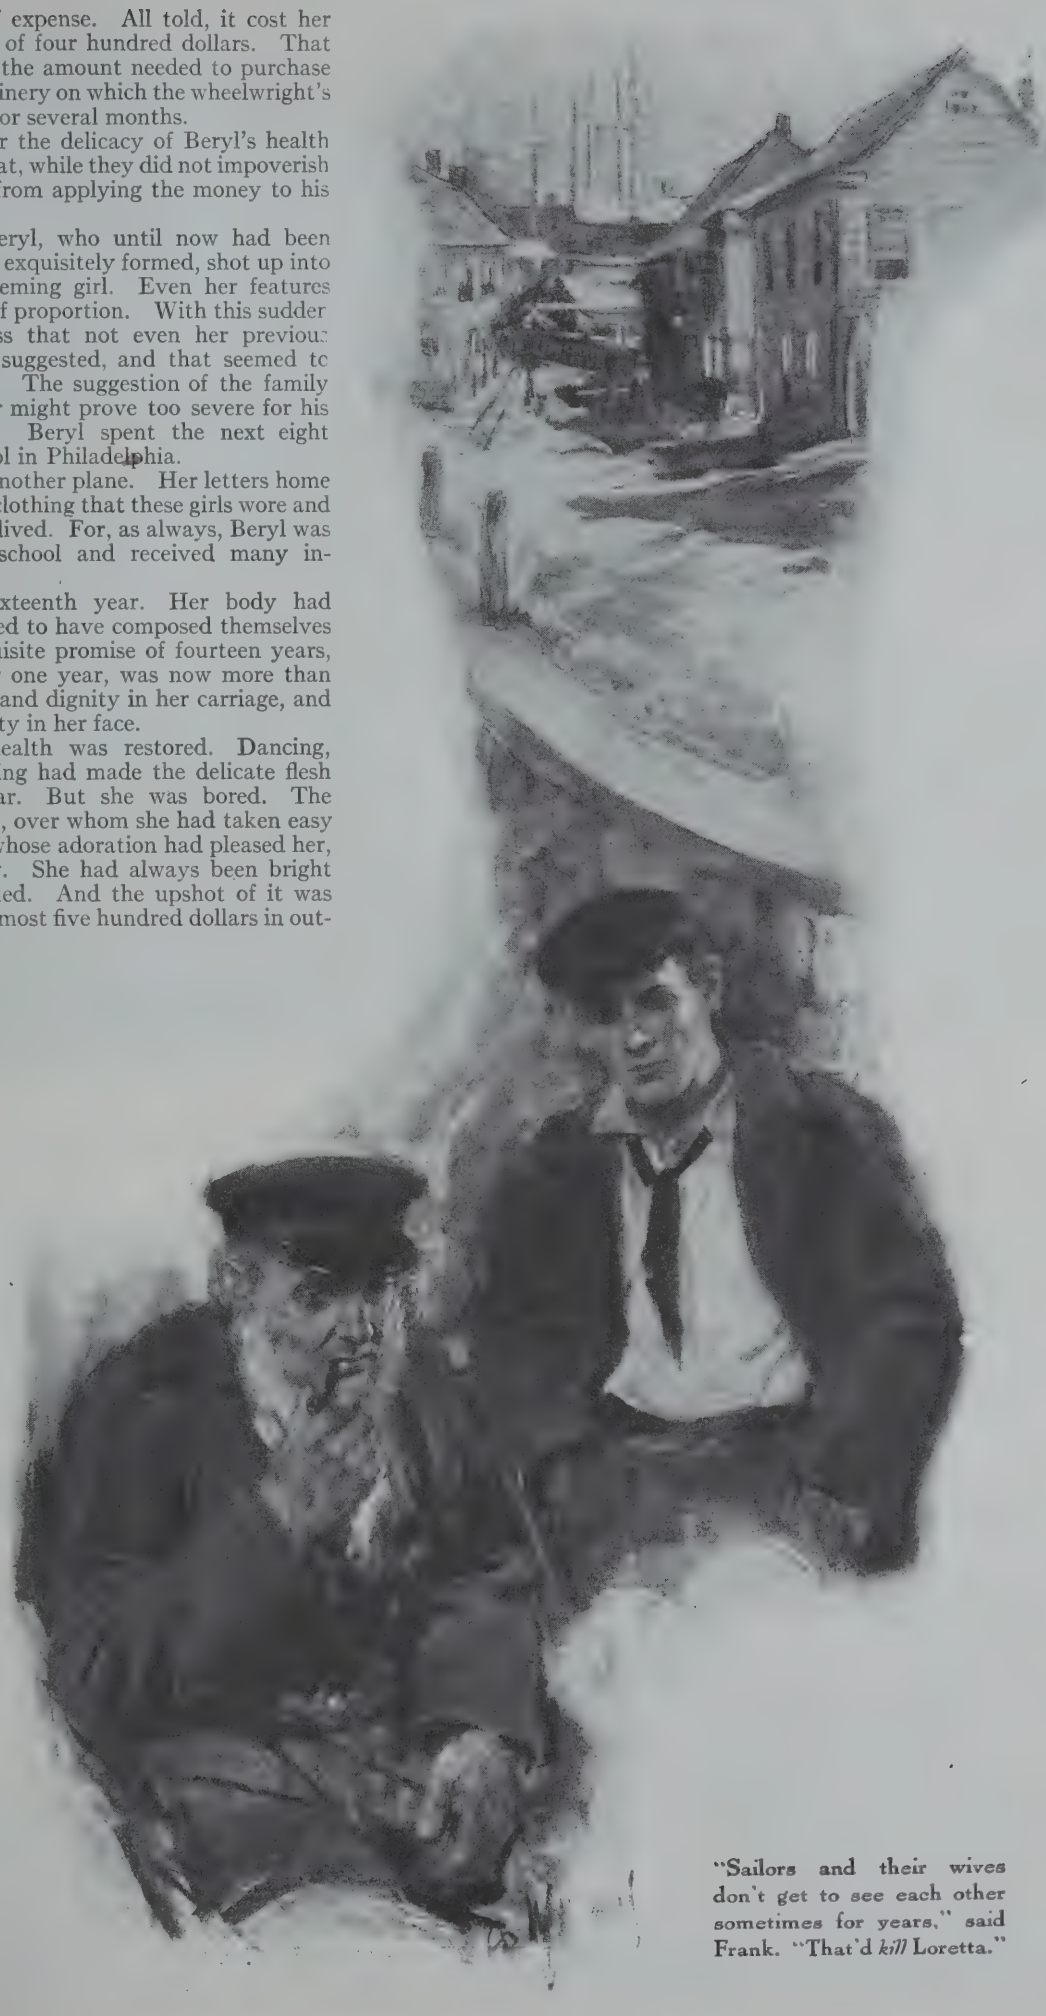
Until the fourteenth year the delicacy of Beryl's health pelled similar expenses that, while they did not impoverish r father, prevented him from applying the money to his siness.

In her fifteenth year Beryl, who until now had been ther undersized, although exquisitely formed, shot up into tall, awkward, gawky-seeming girl. Even her features emed to have grown out of proportion. With this sudden owth came a languidness that not even her previous licacy of health had ever suggested, and that seemed to minate her active spirits. The suggestion of the family ctor that a Maine winter might prove too severe for his ughter alarmed Perkins. Beryl spent the next eight nths at a boarding school in Philadelphia.



Here she met girls from another plane. Her letters home re filled with tales of the clothing that these girls wore and the homes in which they lived. For, as always, Beryl was pular in the boarding school and received many in- ations.

She returned in her sixteenth year. Her body had nded; her features seemed to have composed themselves o agreement. The exquisite promise of fourteen years, ich had been denied for one year, was now more than filled. There was grace and dignity in her carriage, and ere was a wonderful beauty in her face.

But best of all, her health was restored. Dancing, sket ball, tennis and riding had made the delicate flesh come hard and muscular. But she was bored. The ys and girls of Bucksport, over whom she had taken easy dership in the past and whose adoration had pleased her, red her insufferably now. She had always been bright d merry. Now she sulked. And the upshot of it was t Frank Perkins spent almost five hundred dollars in out- ing Beryl for a weeks' stay with hool friends of 's in the Adiron- ks.

It was not with- t something of a nch that Perkins ted with this ney. He and retta talked it r well into the ht; but Beryl was th apple of their es; she could do no ong; vaguely her rents dreamed at dreams for her. Ad while there was n trace of snobbery in their souls, they re thrilled when Beryl sent them a nvspaper clipping in which a society tor mentioned her a one of the guests o he Landon house pty in the Adiron- dks.

Beryl went back t school in the fall. Although her health seemed absolutely ared, there was n even argument about her going ay, despite the enses. She spent h winters at the sl ool and the major p t of her vacations v ting friends until h eighteenth year,

"Sailors and their wives don't get to see each other sometimes for years," said Frank. "That'd kill Loretta."

when she graduated. Then she came home.

She had not mentioned, in any of her recent letters, her plans for the summer. Nor did she, during the first week at home, refer at all to any matters outside of the homely things of Bucksport. But at the end of the week, at the supper table, she exploded the bomb.

"Daddy," she said, "I want to go to Europe."

Perkins wiped coffee from his mouth with the back of his hand. Then he guffawed loudly.

"You don't say, Beryl! Say, I want to go to Europe, too. Maybe one of your rich friends will take us all." He looked at his wife. "How about it, Loretta?"

But Loretta had seen the steely glare in her daughter's eyes. Those eyes seemed able to change from hardest green to softest blue. But now they were their greenest and hardest. Loretta smiled deprecatingly.

"It would be nice, Frank," she said.

Something in the quaver of her voice informed her husband that here was no wild jest, but absolute seriousness. He stared at his daughter, and suddenly felt uncomfortable, as he always did when Beryl's eyes were green.

"Well, Beryl," he said uncertainly, "I've always heard Europe was a fine place. I ain't ever been there, though I've been pretty nigh everywhere else."

"'Scuse me, Beryl," said Perkins. "It's your own business. Whatever you do, Loretta Silence descended upon the three. Beryl stared at her plate, eating mechanically. Between father and mother passed timorous, questioning glances. The atmosphere became filled with strain, and finally Perkins spoke.

"What's the idea, Beryl?" he asked her.

His daughter looked at him. Her eyes were hot. "Is there anything strange in my wishing to go to Europe?" she demanded angrily. "Nearly all the girls in my class have been there."

"I know," said her father, "but they got more money than I have."

"Money!" exclaimed Beryl contemptuously. "It won't cost any more—hardly any more—to keep me in Europe three years than it would to keep me in school."

Perkins stared at her. "But you're through school, Beryl. We hadn't calc'lated on keeping you anywhere but with us until Mr. Right came along and——" His smile faded before her fiery contempt.

"Do you think 'Mr. Right,' as you call him, will be found among the yokels of this town?" she asked.

Her mother lifted her faded blue eyes. In a pathetic way, Loretta Perkins was still pretty. Perhaps the delicacy of her nature lent beauty to her face that was lined with worry, to her body that had become angular through almost thirty years of performing household tasks. To Frank Perkins she was still the arch young thing of his boyhood. Even to strangers she could never be completely commonplace. Now her blue eyes were alight with rebuke.

"I married a Bucksport boy, Beryl," she said.

For a moment the daughter's face was stormy; then suddenly it twitched in penitential grief. "I didn't mean it," she cried. "Not that way. Daddy is just the finest—he isn't a yokel, he couldn't be." She pushed back her chair and rose from the table, standing erect before them. Her shoulders were thrown back and her hands outstretched appealingly. "You think I want to go to Europe to play. I want to go there to work."

In the corner of the room was a piano. For the Perkins's home was so modest that dining room and parlor were one. Beryl walked to the piano. She sat down before it. Her fingers touched the keys; her head was thrown back. From her lips came words that were foreign, their meaning indistinguishable to her mother and father, but the fire and passion and beauty of the voice that uttered them told their own story.

The Perkinses had a phonograph. They had heard great singers in their humble home. They heard one now. When she had finished, her mother and father were staring at each other, holding their breath. Beryl wheeled on the piano stool. She laughed triumphantly.

"Do you understand what I mean?" she asked.

Her father's breath whistled through his lips. "Why, Beryl, why didn't you ever tell us?"

"I never knew it until last month," she answered.

"But you don't have to study or work," said her mother.

The girl laughed tolerantly. "I'm awful, daddy and mother. I can't do a single thing. But I have the foundation of a voice. A great voice, if you'll only let me go abroad to work—it will cost money, I know it. But do you know what opera singers earn? It'll be a loan, daddy; I'll be earning hundreds of dollars a week in a few years. I'll give it all back and more too."

Perkins arose and walked toward his daughter. "Don't you never talk about giving money to your mother nor me," he said gently. "All we got is yours, Beryl."

So Beryl Perkins went abroad. Not without misgivings did her parents watch the Mediterranean liner sail away from its dock in East Boston. She was young and beautiful, and capricious. And they were parents, middle-aged, creators of an offspring who seemed destined to adorn other planes. Yet they and me are with you." Suddenly Beryl saw herself as she had never been visible to her own eyes before.

forced back their tears. Their great love and their great pride in her forbade them to let her know how deeply they would miss her. Nor did she even suspect that the raising of a thousand dollars in cash was not easily accomplished; that certain securities which frugality had enabled them to purchase were sacrificed at a loss. Beryl sailed away; she did not know these things. And if she had known them, she would have looked upon them as sacrifices rightly performed for her.

She was a person to whom self-expression was as necessary as breathing or eating. It was not enough to pour out her soul in song. She must pour it out in letters. Her parents attributed her frequent lengthy accounts of her doings to her love for them. But they were really due to her desire to find an outlet for her emotions.

Yet she did love them dearly, although she did not know it yet. Children never know how much they love their parents until, usually, it is too late to show it.

Her success was certain from the start. She had a glorious soprano that amazed Signor Battelli the first time she sang for him at his studio in Milan. He was a wrinkled old Italian, and he knew many things beside the technic of singing. He knew the art of acting. So he knew immediately that here was a pupil who would be one of those rare personages in opera, a prima donna who would be a great actress as well as singer.

He kept Beryl with him for two years, learning the great rôles. In the third year he got her an engagement in a fifth rate opera in a small Italian city. There she learned to feel her audience. Battelli got her a part early in 1914 at Monte Carlo. An American impressario heard her. He engaged her for the following season to sing minor rôles in New York.

Just before the war broke out she returned to America. An expert publicity man had filled the newspapers with accounts of her beauty, her charm, her marvelous singing and histrionic ability. Her parents met her in New York and were overwhelmed at her reception by the great of the artistic world. Alone with them at last, she smiled. She had been making increasingly heavy demands upon them for money.

"I've just about put you two poor dears in the poorhouse, haven't I?" she asked.

They were in her bedroom in a fashionable hotel, and her father was conscious of his ill-fitting clothes. "That's all right, Beryl," he said.

"It isn't all right," she told him. "My contract calls for three hundred dollars a week, beginning in October, and I'll begin paying you back then. Meanwhile I'll need a couple of thousand dollars to see me through."

"It'll be pretty hard to raise, Beryl," said Perkins uneasily.

"Oh, but I must have it!" she told him. "I'll pay you back, father."

"It ain't that," he said. "Though of course your expenses have been pretty steep, and while it makes me sick to think of lending money to my daughter, I have to think of your mother, too," he sighed. "I'll get the money, Beryl."

But the trip back to Bucksport was clouded by the shadow of finance. The war had begun while Beryl was coming home, and money was hard to raise just now. Perkins found it necessary to mortgage the little home in Bucksport to raise the two thousand dollars that Beryl needed.

And on the eve of her Metropolitan début, Beryl married William Pennington. And the papers that carried the announcement of her sudden marriage to the eminent and extremely wealthy attorney also told of her cancellation of her contract and her definite abandonment of her career.

A famous opera coach, to whom Beryl had been recommended by Battelli, gave a dinner in her apartment in the Metropolitan Opera Building to her new pupil. Among the guests, carefully selected from the high lights of the (Continued on page 124)

FISHBEIN & BLINTZ, the well known pants manufacturers, were playing a game of golf at the Swamp Ridge Country Club in Westchester County the other day. At the first tee Fishbein drove into the rough while Blintz landed on the fairway. For more than five minutes he watched Fishbein make futile attempts to dislodge his ball and at last he was successful.

"Nu, Fishbein," Blintz inquired. "How many did you do that in?"

"Three," Fishbein replied laconically.

"Three!" Blintz exclaimed. "Why, you miserable crook, I seen you hitting at that ball fifty or sixty times. I don't know how many it was—even a hundred maybe."

"When was this?" Fishbein asked innocently.

"When you was in the rough just now," Blintz said.

"Oh! That time!" Fishbein cried. "That was when I was killing a snake."

JULIUS also told a story about the Eden Musee which up to ten years ago was still standing on the north side of Twenty-third Street near Sixth Avenue, New York. As further guarantee of the story's maturity, it has to do with a crystal maze, a form of amusement almost as extinct as ping-pong. It seems that a visitor from out of town had spent over half an hour trying to find his way out of the crystal maze, which, as its name implies, is a labyrinth of mirrors, and at last he sank down quite exhausted on the floor.

"By gorry!" he said, looking around him at about a hundred different reflections of himself, "if I only knew which one of yez was me, I'd break your neck for ever getting me into this place, so I would."

ONCE more the Scotch are advertising their own thrift. This one was taken from the columns of the Glasgow Herald. Why, the conundrum runs, have the Scotch such an excellent sense of humor?

Answer: Because it's a gift.

A HANSOM cab has at last been placed in the South Kensington Museum to be exhibited beside such obsolete vehicles as the glass coach and the sedan chair. With its disappearance have vanished all the old stories about (a) the cabman who received the exact fare from a stout old lady and asked her to keep out of sight of the horse so that the poor animal shouldn't see what a tremendous load he had been carrying for ninepence; (b) the one about the bottom of the cab falling out and the fare running inside of it all the way from Charing Cross to Euston and then remarking upon his arrival that but for the honor of the thing, he might just as well have walked; and (c) the story of the nervous old lady and the reassuring cabby.

"Does your horse shy at motors?" she asked before stepping into the cab.

"Lor' love ye, lady," the cabman said as he removed the feed bag from his ancient steed, "'e didn't even shy at railways when they first came in."

A GENTLEMAN living in Shelburne, Vermont, recently made quite a large sum of money out of the operation of the Volstead Act, and yet he is in no way connected with its enforcement either as bootlegger, officer or otherwise. He was driving his automobile along the State highway not far from the Canadian border when he ran out of gas. It was late at night and he was many miles from the nearest filling station. As he stood pondering the matter a large motor truck approached and he immediately ran into the middle of the road and waved both arms frantically. The driver applied his brakes and brought the truck to a sudden stop, not without difficulty, however, for the truck was heavily loaded with boxes and barrels. Quicker than it takes to tell it, the truck driver jumped down from his seat, handed an envelope to the motorist, hopped back again, and releasing his brakes, was out of sight before the motorist could even say, "What's this?"

A moment later the motorist opened the envelope. It contained a hundred dollar bill.

EVERYBODY knows the story—and I'm not going to tell it again—of the three Scotsmen who happened to take shelter from the rain in a church just when the collection was occurring and one of them pretended to faint while the other two carried him out.

The one I am going to tell, however, refers to the bartender and his friend who went to church one Sunday—and in spite of Mr. Anderson, I know more than one bartender who used to go to church.

This particular bartender thought he was putting a silver quarter in the plate and found just as church let out that he had put in a five dollar gold piece.

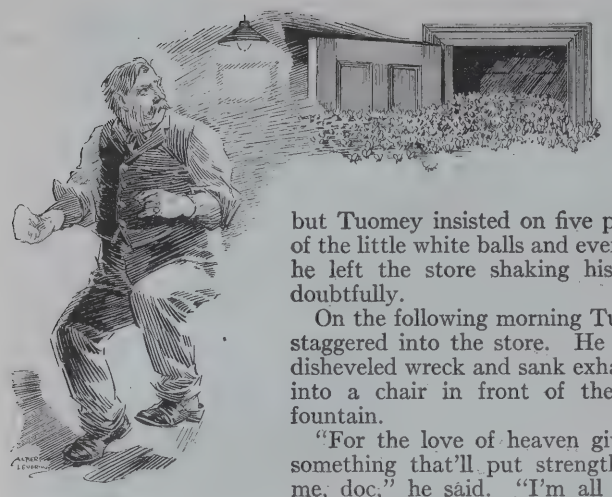
"Well, all you have to do is to go round and see the priest," his friend said. "He's a broad-minded man and he'll be glad to give it you back."

"No, no," the bartender replied. "I gave it to the Lord, to hell with it."

THE proprietor of a drug store in Port Jervis says that he was recently approached by a foreman in the Erie shops, named Tuomey.

"My house is that overrun by moths," Tuomey announced, "that my Sunday clothes looks like a porous plaster. What will I do to get rid of them?"

"Try moth balls," the druggist said. "That'll kill 'em."



He weighed out a pound package of the little tar camphor balls while Tuomey watched him.

"Will them little things kill them?" Tuomey asked.

"Why certainly," the druggist said.

"But not that many of them won't," Tuomey declared. "You'd better be giving me five times as much."

The druggist said that the pound package would be ample for the purpose, but Tuomey insisted on five pounds of the little white balls and even then he left the store shaking his head doubtfully.

On the following morning Tuomey staggered into the store. He was a disheveled wreck and sank exhausted into a chair in front of the soda fountain.

"For the love of heaven give me something that'll put strength into me, doc," he said. "I'm all in. I didn't get a wink of sleep yesterday."

"Why, what's the matter?" the druggist asked.

"It's them dom little balls you sold me," Tuomey said. "Sure I pegged away at the moths all night and I didn't hit a cursed wan of them."

THERE was much discussion in an English city recently as to whether the public houses should be allowed to remain open until eleven o'clock instead of half-past ten. One of the town councilors emphatically opposed the change.

"Wot I says is," he announced in the council chamber, "that if a man ain't drunk by 'alf-past ten, he ain't trying."

THE following incident probably occurred in that restaurant which, according to Julius Tannen the monologist, was of such high standing that only the best quality of turnips was used for the horseradish.

A customer was asked by the waiter what dessert he would like, and he replied upon consulting the bill of fare, "Stewed peaches."

After an interval of several minutes the waiter returned from the kitchen without the order.

"I'm very sorry, sir," he said to the customer, "but the stewed peaches are pears today, and they've turned."

PINNING a story on to a famous personage of history is a dangerous thing to do. If you say that a certain event happened to Sophocles, somebody is sure to write you that as a matter of fact it was an incident in the life of George M. Cohan. I am told by John Alonzo Williams, the illustrator, that the following story dates back to Napoleonic times. However, it sounds more like our own times in the Argonne sector.

A draft of raw British troops was dispatched to Belgium prior to the Battle of Waterloo. They were fresh from the plough and looked it.

"I don't know how these fellows are going to affect the enemy," Wellington is reported to have said, "but they certainly scare me."

MAXIMILIAN FOSTER, the well known novelist, said that a lady to whom he is related by marriage became much interested in Twilight Sleep. She even bought a book about it and found it to be so instructive that she felt obliged to enlighten a lot of other ladies on the porch of a summer hotel. The other ladies knew nothing whatever of Twilight Sleep and the longer the subject was explained to them by Max Foster's relation, the less they seemed to understand it.

"In fact," Max said, "they didn't get her at all, because every time she referred to Twilight Sleep she called it Daylight Saving."

ACCORDING to an old number of L'Assiette au Beurre one Paris crook meets another on the rue d'Odessa and says in the course of the conversation:

"I understand you were in the Magasin du Louvre the other day when all the lights went out."

"It was not the Magasin du Louvre," the other crook replies, "it was another big department store."

"Was it quite dark?" the first crook asks.

"You couldn't see your hand before your face," the second answers.

"And did you get anything?" the first inquires.

"Unfortunately not," the second says. "You see, at the time the lights went out I was in the piano department."

WILLIE COLLIER, the actor, once made an Australian tour, and when he was asked upon his return what sort of a town he found Sidney, New South Wales, to be, he said it was like traveling ten thousand miles and arriving in Newark, New Jersey.

Anyone who has seen or read about "The Music Box Revue" in which Mr. Collier last appeared can well imagine that Mr. Collier's services as a comedian are in great demand by the New York managers.

Mr. Collier was therefore somewhat surprised when he was offered an engagement by a New York manager who pays notoriously poor salaries.

"Will you come with me next season, Willie?" the manager asked.

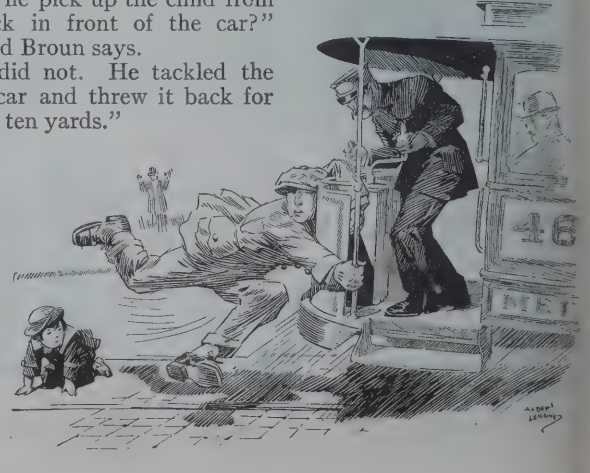
"Why certainly, old man," Collier said. "Where are you going?"

AN IRISHMAN newly arrived in the country was being taken for a walk by his brother. It was around Thanksgiving time and the grocery store windows were decorated with cranberries.

"What are them things?" the immigrant asked.

"They're cranberries," the brother replied.

"Are they good to eat?" the immigrant inquired.



"Are they good to eat!" his brother exclaimed. "Why, when them cranberries are stewed, they make better apple sauce than prunes."

"CURLY CORLISS" is the title of a book published last year. Its hero is captain of the Yale football team, and while walking down the main street of New Haven one day he sees a little crippled newsboy on crutches right in the path of an oncoming trolley car. Before the poor little chap can get clear of the trolley track he slips on the icy pavement and is about to be crushed under the front wheels, when Curly Corliss dashes from the sidewalk. He seizes the newsboy in his arms and jumps to safety with only a split second to spare.

Heywood Broun, the critic of the New York World, in reviewing this book said that a similar incident occurred when he was an undergraduate at Harvard. The conditions were almost identical except that it was a much larger type of interurban trolley. It was also coming a little faster than it did in New Haven, and there was a small baby that fell right in front of the approaching car, when who should come along—not the captain of the Harvard team, but the substitute end of the second eleven.

"Did he pick up the child from the track in front of the car?" Heywood Broun says.

"He did not. He tackled the trolley car and threw it back for a loss of ten yards."

The Lone Wolf Returns

grumbled in English, "you make me sick to think of all the youth I wasted studying what I fondly thought was French!"

Liane turned with a murmur of self-reproach.

"Forgive me, my pretty. Michael and I knew each other so long ago in that dear Paris of before the war, it goes against nature to converse with him in any tongue but French . . . Ah! my old one," she lamented to Lanyard. "Those old days! will we ever know their like again?"

Mistrustful of her drift, Lanyard replied briefly, "God forbid!"

Timely to catch the sense of these latter lines, Pagan returned, his countenance of a clown radiant with good nature restored by the fragrance of the four eight-inch glasses on the tray beneath his nose.

"The dilute laughter of the peasants of Scotland," he announced, presenting the tray to Folly and Liane, "guaranteed to cure every heartache born of pining for a past that, if the truth were known, probably wasn't half so pleasant as the present —Prohibition and everything!" He presented the tray to Lanyard in turn, then, determined at all costs to win the center of the stage, struck an absurd declamatory attitude. "To tonight and tomorrow," he toasted,—"to hell with yesterday! Why waste good time mourning that which is immortal, anyway? All of yesterday that mattered we carry with us, imperishably enshrined in our hearts. After all, what is the present more than the past plus? What man was yesterday, he is today, with something added. Eh, Mr. Lanyard?"

"Or subtracted."

"I disagree"—Pagan made him a formal salute—"with all due respect. Man adds daily to the sum of his experiences, which sum he is; but he can never subtract from that sum one iota of what he has been. The peasant who becomes a financier remains at heart a peasant still."

"A pretty thought," Liane interpolated with earnest interest. "But, to a woman, somewhat unsettling, is it not?"

"To continue: Give the financier who was a peasant respite from his cares, and whither turns his heart? Back to the stage of his young days; if he takes a vacation, he spends it in overalls."

"And yours, one presumes, are devoted to making records for the phonograph?"

"Don't interrupt, Liane . . . Or take, say, a criminal who has abandoned his misguided ways and become a respected member of the community. How will he relax? Eh, Mr. Lanyard?"

"I will not presume to instruct monsieur on a point concerning which he is undoubtedly better informed than I."

Liane exploded a "Ho!" of pure joy, and Pagan shot Lanyard an envenomed glance which he was swift to mask with his well worn smirk. "To be frank," he admitted freely, dropping into a conversational tone, "I had the Lone Wolf in mind. They tell me the fellow is here, in New York, now, and up to his old games again. I confess the thought rides my imagination, the puzzle of it. By all accounts he went straight for years. How, then, came he to backslide? Were the claims of the past too strong? or the demands of the present? Does he thieve today deliberately for gain? or involuntarily at the dictates of some subtle and deathless instinct?"

"But monsieur has so many entertaining theories, surely he will produce one to cover this hypothetical instance."

"I don't know. Nature is too strong for us, she laughs at all our efforts to revise her. We may repress and inhibit our native instincts as much as we will, but in the end, as a rule, they have their way. The Psychical Research Society reported not long ago the case of a man in whom the influence of instincts developed in early professional life were so strong that, buried though his criminal past was under a dozen years of law-abiding life, he reverted to old practices from time to time without knowing what he did; that is to say, in spells of amnesia, during which his first personality, the natural man, broke through the veneer of the secondary or artificial personality with which he had so painstakingly overlaid it. A safe-breaker and jewel thief like this Lone Wolf. Interesting if this were another such case."

"Interesting indeed, monsieur, if conceivable."

"But think a minute, and I believe you'll admit it's readily conceivable. Imagine such a man, with wits and senses all habituated by years of rigorous training to serve his predatory nature. Because he's trying to live an honest life today doesn't mean that those old, ingrained habits have necessarily ceased to function. To the contrary, I imagine, they are always at work. As he goes to and fro and meets men and women who invite him into their homes—in their ignorance of his former identity, of course—inevitably, I maintain, such a man will always be observing and appraising and formulating plans of attack—subconsciously, perhaps, but still and for all that making use of the faculties he trained in other days. I can believe he never visits a home of any consequence without taking away with him a comprehensive scheme for burglarizing it. As you or I might, Mr. Lanyard, if either of us had the education of the Lone Wolf, say in respect of this very house . . . And then some night, when he's least dreaming of anything of the sort, the old Adam reasserts itself, without or with his will and cognizance——"

Perhaps a little frightened by the gleam in Lanyard's eyes and the tension of his lips, Liane bounced up vivaciously.

"Peter!" she cried, "you make me tired, you talk so much. Once you get started you never know when to stop. But now you will stop, I insist that you stop and take me home. It is nearly three, and I am weary to the marrow of my bones."

Lanyard contrived with fair enough grace to decline Pagan's magnanimous offer of a lift in his car; but by the time he found himself on Fifth Avenue again he was half sorry he had. There were no taxicabs cruising for fares at that hour—at least all he spied were tearing along with flags reversed; and his head was at one and the same time buzzing with fumes of whisky and thick with that drowsiness of which he had first become sensible in the cab with Folly McFee. Singularly enough, that cloud had lifted during his stop in her home, whereas since leaving it, ever since he had drawn his first breath of the dank, chill air of the streets, his wits had been like slugs fumbling blindly in a bed of cotton wool. Now his feet as well were beginning to feel leaden.

Hard to understand how one could have been so affected by the scanty ration of alcohol one had consumed that evening—a solitary glass of champagne at the Clique, a single Scotch and soda two hours later. It might be, of course, that Pagan had mixed too stiff a highball . . .

Odd to find oneself resuming one's homeward walk at almost the very point where that rencontre with Liane had interrupted it. Still more odd, how that affair had resulted; in three brief hours everything had come true that one had foretold in seeking to dissuade Eve from the idea of marriage . . .

In a surge of grim rage Lanyard pledged Morphew and Pagan ample grounds for repentance should they show any disposition to persist in tampering with his concerns.

Then he found occasion to execrate the weather, too, perceiving that it had been only holding off until, as now, it had him at its mercy. Now all at once it ceased to tease and settled down to rain in earnest.

And still no taxis . . .

Lanyard turned up his overcoat collar and dug both hands into its pockets, clipping his stick under an arm and plodding heavily through the shining puddles, with every labored step growing more conscious of bodily oppression and the lethargy that ruled his mind, feeling more abused in some vague how and aggrieved.

In the many hued lights of the street the back-spatter of raindrops drilling on the sidewalk churned in rainbow iridescence, a froth of phantom jewels, enchanting, evanescent . . .

Strange that one should never have remarked this effect ere now . . . Stranger still how blindly man is wont to move through the world, benighted to its wonders . . . As now when, lifting dazzled eyes, Lanyard beheld himself a lonely wayfarer in a lane of jewels set in jet and gold . . .

Jewels that outrivaled even those the Sultan of Loot had paraded, and Liane, and that other woman . . . pretty little thing so well named . . . What the deuce was her name? Folly? Folly McFee!

Idiotic to mislay so soon a distinctive name like that . . .

Wading in jewels. Up to one's knees. As Liane waded in them, and Folly, and the Sultan of Loot . . . Between them these three must have had on display that night stones that would fetch four or five hundred thousand . . . flaunting them in the face of a pauper!

A pauper? Well, little better! Penniless, or next door to it. A few more days of running around with Eve . . . who must never guess . . . and he would be stoney. Not pinched for money—broke. The reward of virtue . . .

Lanyard laughed aloud, an ugly laugh.

Pagan hadn't been far wrong. Impertinent clown! Not far wrong, at that . . . Anything but easy to forget the cunning one once had gloried in, to remain forever deaf and dumb to the insidious prompting of instincts which, as long as the sun shone, seemed to have been utterly stamped out and exterminated, but which, when clouds massed and the wind bared its teeth, had an accursed habit of proving they had been but rebelliously quiescent . . .

Curious, how close to the line that mountebank had hewn in his guesswork at the psychology of the outlaw reclaimed.

There lingered still a picture instantaneously printed upon the sensitive film of consciousness in that moment when Lanyard had stood peering out of the rear window at Folly McFee's: a view of the roof of a one story extension running back from the window, a flat roof decked over to serve as a terrace in warm weather, with, beyond it, thanks to an excavation being dug for a new building on the north side of the block, nothing between the house and the next street but a board fence enclosing the kitchen yard. An open invitation to any who might fancy the jewels of Folly McFee; jewels that, shrewdly marketed, would put a provident man beyond reach of want for the rest of his days . . .

Lanyard growled an oath and gave himself an angry shake. What the devil had got into him tonight that he should consent for a single instant to indulge such a train of thought?

Not that there was danger of his being tempted . . . He gave a thick chuckle of scorn . . . Nevertheless it was annoying to find oneself unable to forget that the temptation was there.

All the fault of that reptile with viperous tongue and machine-made leer, what's-his-name . . . What was his name? Fagin? No—Pagan. Loathsome creature . . .

What an ass one had been to swallow his insolence simply because there were women present, to let such an illogical consideration restrain one from yielding to natural, primitive impulse and, with every provocation, throttling the beast, wringing his scrawny neck . . .

In amaze Lanyard emerged from a seizure of sodden insanity to find himself at halt in front of the Waldorf, standing quite still in the driving rain and glaring at his hands, which were extended with tensed fingers compressing the windpipe of an imaginary victim.

What was he doing? He made an effort to pull himself together, and cast right and left, shame-faced to think that he might have been seen. But there was not another soul in sight on the whole undulant length of the Avenue. Only a taxi shot past, and its driver hooted . . .

He seemed to have mislaid his stick. After a moment of myopic searching he gave it up, pocketed his hands and lunged on . . . Not far to go now; but one made indifferent progress because of the fog. Of course it was fog! What else could make the lights so dim? Like a London fog, a London particular. And getting thicker every minute, blotting out the lights.

In a sudden saffron blaze Lanyard identified the common aspect of the small suite of rooms which he rented furnished. He was in the sitting room, wrestling with his overcoat. Soaked through and dripping, the accursed thing seemed possessed of a devil of perversity which resisted all his efforts to shed it. He gave an infuriated wriggle, heard something rip, and discovered, in some surprise, that he was rid of it. Then with indignation he saw that the door stood open to the public hall, a staring oblong of black in the lighted walls. Lurching to this, Lanyard flung it shut with a thunderous slam.

The problem of escaping from the intimate embrace of his clothing next engaged his intelligence. His one dress coat was something he couldn't afford to tear off his back. Yet he darkly foresaw difficulties. After a while of pondering, a spirit of low cunning prompted him to try to deceive the thing by making believe he didn't care whether it came off or not . . . And astonishingly it appeared that this strategem had been successful—he was holding the garment in his hands. With the harsh, unfeeling laugh of a conqueror he cast it from him and shaped a course for his bedchamber. And barely in time; that London fog had stolen in after him somehow, probably through the door he had carelessly left open, Heaven knew how long . . . At its old tricks, dimming down the lights till one could hardly see. Rapidly, too. He succeeded in beating the darkness to his bed, but with nothing to spare; as he sat on its edge, fumbling with his shoes, night overwhelmed the world with a stunning crash . . .

CHAPTER VI

A SPLITTING headache roused Lanyard out of the void; that, with an unfeeling hand shaking his shoulder and a voice dinning his name into his ears.

When he tried to remonstrate his other shoulder was captured by another vise-like grasp, and he was raised to a sitting position on the side of the bed. There, bending forward and clasping his head with both hands lest it rend itself in twain, he regained a measure of lucidity.

Broad daylight was flooding the room. On his throbbing eardrums a voice jarred, hideously cheerful.

"Well—how're you feeling now?"

Without understanding Lanyard blinked into the grinning countenance of Crane.

"Pretty rocky, I'll tell the World, the Tribune and the Herald! Next time you'll know better than to take liberties with lawless liquor—or I miss my guess. Got anything in the place that's good for a wrecked dome?"

Unwisely Lanyard sought to reply with a shake of the head in question. His moans were heart-rending. When he got them under control he heard Crane say: "Well, son! it's a good thing to have a true friend on the job when you're feeling like this. You set there and take it easy while I run down to the drug store and fetch you a pick-me-up."

Crane's footsteps receded through the sitting room and died out beyond a door which was closed with thoughtful care. Pricked by pride, Lanyard put forth a tremendous effort of will and stood up.

Not till then did he realize that he was fully clothed but for his shoes and the dress coat which he had a muggy memory of having discarded in the adjoining room.

When Crane reentered without knocking, Lanyard was splashing in the bathroom. Some minutes later he came out wrapped in a dressing gown and bearing some resemblance to his normal, self-respecting self. Crane was waiting with a tall and foaming glass. A draught long and acrid but grateful. The flavor of aromatic spirits of ammonia replacing that of aloes in his mouth, Lanyard was able to express his thanks with a smile less wan than might have been expected.

"I think you called yourself a true friend," he said. "That was true talk. Never in my life have I needed one more." Subsiding into a chair, he waved a feeble hand toward another. "Sit down and tell me to what I owe this act of mercy . . ."

"Well, if you want to know, I guess you owe it mainly to forgetting to lock your door when you crashed in last night." Crane sat down and favored Lanyard with a quizzical stare, caressing lean jaws with bony fingers. "I knocked till I was tired, then tried the door, feeling pretty sure you were at home because I could see by the transom you had all the lights going full blast. So I just naturally walked in and found you practically a total loss. You were cold sober when I saw you at two o'clock, but you sure did manage to collect a skinful between then and the time you turned in, whenever that was."

"To the best of my knowledge, not much after three."

"Blessed if I see how you managed it. Mind telling? I don't like to seem nosey, but this record you're claiming for the standing broad jag in one hour flat has got me guessing. Didn't know you went in much for that sort of thing."

"No more do I," Lanyard protested. "That is to say, I never did before and never will again, Heaven helping me to avoid further entanglements with temperance drinks."

"That what you call 'em?"

"I mean, the sort of drinks one's friends serve in these Prohibition times. I hesitate to ask you to believe that the ruin you see before you was wrought by one small glass of champagne at the Clique last night, followed by a single Scotch and soda at Mrs. McFee's."

"From the funny things I've seen bootliquor do in the last few months," Crane replied, "some of 'em not so darned funny, at that, I'm ready to believe anything you want to blame on it. What bothers me now is you getting such stuff at Mrs. Folliott McFee's. That little lady is well enough fixed to keep her cellar stocked with the best. However," he reconsidered, "I guess she must've got it from her friend Morphew. She's been training considerably with him and his gang of late; and I wouldn't put it past that bird to poison his best friend for a few dollars."

"We see Mr. Morphew with the same eyes, you and I."

Lanyard wanted very much to question Crane for information concerning Mr. Hugh Morphew, but felt much too listless just then. Another time would do as well, when his mental processes had somewhat recuperated.

"So you were at Mrs. McFee's last night, were you?"

"Naturally I had to see her home," Lanyard replied. "She asked me in to have that drink; and a little later the Delorme woman dropped in with a hyena who calls himself Pagan—dare say you know who I mean"—Crane nodded—"to make sure Mrs. McFee had come to no harm. You see, we were all guests of Morphew's at the Clique when you raided the place. But I presume that's no news . . ."

"You're wrong, then. Morphew and his lot got away clean. We couldn't find hair nor hide of him or any of the parties you've named. They must have beaten it by some secret passage while the lights were on the blink."

Liane and Pagan, then, had lied about being turned back from the roof. Not that it mattered . . .

"How'd you get on with the pretty McFee?" Crane was pursuing with an interest too elaborately casual.

"Well enough, thanks. She seems a nice little thing if a thought flighty."

"Flighty's the word. I gather you haven't known her long."

"Only met her last night, a few minutes before the raid."

"Nice place she's got . . ."

"Nice enough," Lanyard assented languidly.

"Get much of a show to look around while you were there?"

Lanyard opened his eyes. "You're not asking these questions for conversation's sake."

"You're dead right I'm not," Crane drawled, stroking his jaws. "Guess I may as well break it to you. Mrs. McFee reported this morning her house had been broken into last night, sometime between three o'clock and daylight, her safe opened—little tin box she keeps in her boodwah—and the pick of her jewels looted."

"So!" said Lanyard, "it's to that I owe this honor!"

"You've had such a lot of experience in that line I thought maybe you wouldn't mind giving me a few tips . . ."

Lanyard lounged back in his chair again, smiling tolerantly.

"Why trifle with the truth to spare my feelings?"

"Well!" Crane conceded uncomfortably, "I don't mind telling you, the job had all the earmarks of one of the Lone Wolf's."

"Indeed?"

"The bird that opened that box did it painlessly, like you always used to, going on all I've heard—just talked to the works till the safe lay down and rolled over with all four paws in the air. Of course he didn't leave any finger marks. He got in by way of an extension in the back of the house; there's a French window opens on to it from the study. He didn't even need to jimmy that, though Mrs. McFee and the servants can't explain how it come to be open. In fact the butler swears he latched it himself before he went to bed. Looks like somebody must have fixed it . . ."

"Somebody who, like your obedient servant, had plenty of opportunity."

"You got the idea."

"In short," said Lanyard, "what you are delicately trying to convey is that you'd be obliged if I'd come along quietly."

"No," Crane surprisingly answered; "nothing like that."

"No?" Lanyard persisted, in an unbelieving stare.

"No . . . I'll admit I looked you up here with a divided mind. I couldn't somehow believe it of you. On the other hand, I've been fooled by a lot of human nature in my time. But you put in an alibi, even before you came to, sound enough to satisfy me. Maybe I'm wrong about you, Lanyard, maybe you're as crooked as a revenue inspector; but nothing will ever make me believe you pulled that job and then pickled yourself to celebrate, or that the Lone Wolf ever went home after cracking a safe and crawled into the hay leaving the door unlocked. Not only that, but just to make sure, in a perfectly friendly way, I frisked your pockets and searched these rooms high and low before I woke you up. You've got a good right to be sore, if it hits you that way; but I figured it was my duty as a friend as well as an officer of the law."

"On the contrary," Lanyard assured him sincerely, "I am appreciative and grateful, glad to be cleared in your sight, even more glad to be cleared in my own."

"In your own?" Crane repeated in perplexity. "What do you think you mean by that?"

"I'm glad I do not have to wonder if possibly I did this thing in my sleep, so to speak."

"Quit your kidding!" Crane got up with a laugh. "I've got to be getting along now; oughtn't to have lost as much time as I have."

"I shall miss your soothing presence. But I am sure you understand that there are times, and this is one of them, when one would rather be alone."

"You said it."

"You will pardon my not rising to see you to the door?"

"Stay right where you are. I'll drop in again, sometime this evening maybe, to see how you are."

"Do. There are many things I want to consult you about when I feel better able."

"Well, if anything gets in my way and I don't show up like I said"—Crane fished out a card from a worn wallet and placed it on the marble mantelpiece of the old-fashioned fireplace—"there's my name and number. Give me a ring any time you feel like it and I'll blow you to a dinner, with maybe something on the side whose kick isn't quite as deadly as a Georgia mule's."

For upwards of an hour after the detective had taken himself off Lanyard lingered on in the easy chair, listlessly reviewing his memories of the previous night, memories comfortingly clear-cut up to a certain stage . . .

After all, he were an ingrate to complain; surely he had no excuse for considering himself in disgrace with fortune, who had come thus far through this conjuncture retaining the confidence of Crane, but best of all his own!

He counted himself happy indeed—for all the malaise from which he still suffered and which only time and heroic measures in the way of exercise would do away with altogether—that Crane's investigation, while he lay senseless, had resolved every question that might otherwise have perturbed his secret mind. It was grateful to be spared the torment that, but for this exoneration, must have been his; the fear that he might himself, without his knowledge, have proved there was support in fact for the theory of criminal psychology which Pagan had advanced, the theory that it was well without the bounds of possibility for a man in his plight, in sore financial straits and subconsciously tempted beyond his strength, to commit a theft while in a phase of auto-hypnosis coupled with amnesia, a condition comparable to somnambulism . . .

Otherwise his affairs, as Lanyard saw them, had come suddenly to a precarious pass.

In spite of the fact that he knew his intelligence would need some time to recover its accustomed competence, he entertained no slightest doubt but that he would be tomorrow, as he was today, convinced that the abstraction of the McFee jewels had been merely the first move in a campaign shrewdly planned to bring him to Morphew's terms.

His defiance of that one had not been tardy of result; the enemy had not only accepted his declaration of war, he had committed the first overt act.

Lanyard's temper hardened. If it was war Morphew wanted, he should have his fill . . .

But if it was to be war, this was no time to waste in inaction; the enemy was already in the field and taking the offensive, while he lay resting.

Rising, Lanyard bestirred himself to set his house in order.

When he had shaved and dressed and dosed himself with stabilizing draughts of black coffee, he began to collect the clothes he had worn overnight, all of which would require the attentions of a valet before they would be again presentable. Rain had defaced the gloss of his topper beyond repair but by the hatter's iron. His trousers were damp and wrinkled bags of black stuff splashed to the knees with mud.

Over these stains Lanyard frowned. Impossible to understand how he had managed to come by the worst of them, even taking into account the condition in which he had traversed Fifth Avenue during the storm. The marks of that thin black ooze which accumulates on asphaltum explained themselves. But there were others inexplicable, and on his patent leather boots as well—smears and cakes of ochre mud which he could hardly have accumulated without wandering into broken ground such as was not to be found on Fifth Avenue at any point within the bounds of his besotted promenade.

But he distinctly recollected noticing an excavation behind the residence of Folly McFee . . .

With a worried shake of his head that cost him several stabs of anguish, Lanyard folded and laid aside the trousers and returned to the sitting room to get his dress coat.

As he took this up something in one of the coat-tail pockets struck against a leg of the center table with a muffled but clashing thump.

By his own account Crane had already rummaged the pockets of the garment but conceivably the coat-tail pockets he had over looked, who was better acquainted with dress clothes of American tailoring from which such conveniences are commonly omitted. Lanyard's clothes, however, had been built in London; and to the British tailor coat-tail pockets are as a article of faith.

An exploring hand brought forth a little packet knotted in a handkerchief out of his own.

Lanyard surmised its contents before he had succeeded in loosing the knots.

With a sense of sickness he stood staring down at the stolen jewels of Folly McFee

As a protect.on against March winds the right cream is an absolute necess.ty

A cream that protects against wind and cold

Everyone knows the coarse, dry texture that is spoken of as "weather-beaten." That is the result of constant and continued exposure.

But even a single day's exposure can cause chapping that is actually painful. Wind whips the moisture out of an unprotected skin—cold roughens it. To prevent these dangers, a cream is needed that will shield the skin. The cream made by a special formula for this purpose is Pond's Vanishing Cream.

Try a little of this particular cream side by side with any cold cream and see the marked difference. The cold cream is oily—the Pond's Vanishing Cream has not a drop of oil in it. Instead it is made from another ingredient famous for its softening and soothing qualities and which the skin can absorb instantly. This cream keeps the skin's natural moisture in, and so protects it from the drying effects of wind and cold. No matter how cold and windy it is, your skin will keep its natural transparency and softness if you always smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream before you go out.

A very different cream for a thorough cleansing

No one cream can completely care for your skin. To give your skin the thorough cleansing that keeps it fresh and supple a cream made with oil is needed.

The cream with just the right amount of oil to reach deep into the pores and remove every trace of dirt and impurity without overloading the skin is Pond's Cold Cream. Smooth it into the skin of the face and neck every night before retiring.

Both these creams are so fine in texture they cannot clog the pores. Neither contains anything to promote the growth of hair. The Pond's Extract Company, New York.

He smokes a meerschaum pipe fifty years old

Packed with Edgeworth he thinks no other pipe can compare with it

We have run on the case of three generations of pipe smokers preferring the meerschaum pipe to all other pipes. Not only that, but all three generations smoked the same meerschaum pipe (in turn, may we be allowed to add).

For further details we refer directly to the present owner of the ancient pipe.

"Dear Sirs," he wrote us, "I have a meerschaum pipe originally purchased and smoked by my grandfather. When he died, he willed it to my father, who smoked it continually throughout his lifetime.

"When the pipe came to me, I was a little dubious about accepting the family responsibility of keeping up the tradition. I tried several brands of tobacco in the pipe and they all made me sick. Then someone suggested Edgeworth.

"From that day to this I have smoked no other tobacco—no other pipe.

"Give me the old family meerschaum and a little blue can of Edgeworth and I can get all the enjoyment out of smoking there is any time of day or night.

"Perhaps I'm prejudiced, but that's the way I feel about pipe smoking. And that's the way I intend to feel as long as you continue to make Edgeworth."

Well, we can reassure our correspondent on that point, for we intend to go on making Edgeworth just as long as there are smokers who would give up smoking if they couldn't get Edgeworth.

And we intend to go on making friends for Edgeworth by sending out more free samples.

So if you haven't tried Edgeworth, send us your name and address and we will immediately forward to you generous helpings of both Edgeworth Plug Slice and Ready-Rubbed.

For the free samples, address Larus & Brother Company, 61 South 21st Street, Richmond, Va. If you will also include the name and address of your tobacco dealer, it will make it easier for you to get Edgeworth regularly if you should like it.

To Retail Tobacco Merchants: If your jobber cannot supply you with Edgeworth, Larus & Brother Company will gladly send you prepaid by parcel post a one- or two-dozen carton of any size of Edgeworth Plug Slice or Ready-Rubbed for the same price you would pay the jobber.

The Luck That Failed

and picked up a job 'picture-punchin'. I learned things about the cattle business off from some of them—those—directors that nobody else knows."

"You're a motion picture actor?" Carmelita asked half apprehensively. The yellow newspapers had unjustly made bugaboos out of the members of the film world and women and children instinctively feared them.

"No, ma'am, not a actor. Never was a actor. I was one of the crowd that comes ridin' in during the last five hundred feet, shootin' off guns and saving the heroine from a fate worse than death. Sometimes I was a plain puncher, sometimes a Northwest Mounted Policeman or a United States Cavalryman. Once I was a knight in armor ridin' a motorcycle and lately I've been several kinds of Arabs sheikin' across the desert. Right now my connection with the industry has been severed for several weeks."

"Discharged?"

"No, ma'am. I quit. Left 'em cold, I did, and I hear that none of the film producers has made a cent since I stepped out. My uncle that I used to work for—he was a cattleman—up and died. There were so many heirs that when his property was divided none of us got much—my share was only about a thousand dollars. A man that's got a thousand dollars is too rich to keep on workin' and too poor to do anything else. I been aimin' to get a ranch of my own one of these days and raise mosquitoes or somethin' there's always a demand for but I'd need four or five thousand even to make the first payment. So I took my thousand and come down here to get a little action for it."

"You've been playing the races?" Carmelita was getting her first contact with an adventurer, a man who risked everything on a chance. Her reaction was part admiration and part fear.

"Yes, ma'am, I played the races and one thing and another. Struck a lucky streak, too. Anything I bet on seems to win. They call me Fool-for-luck Faraday—my name is really Dan Faraday, ma'am."

"And you've bought your ranch?" To Carmelita it was like a fairy tale and she was hastening on to the happy ending.

"No, ma'am, leastwise not yet. I won a lot more jack than I needed for the property I had my eye on at first and I said to myself, why not crowd my luck right to the extreme limit and get a real place about the size of one or two counties? But I'll have all I need by the end of this week and then I'm going to lay off even if I'm still winning. After that you'll find me over yonder"—he waved—"somewhere back of them—those—mountains."

They came to the border. The United States customs officer perfunctorily inquired if they had any weapons and the Mexican ditto sold them a ticket to Central America for fifteen cents.

Everybody in Mexico seemed to know Dan Faraday. A crowd of hangers-on at the track collected as soon as he parked his car. But they stood at a respectful distance.

"There's the Casino and Sunset Inn on your right," Carmelita's guide pointed out. "If you'd like anything to drink——"

"I don't drink, but if you——"

"I don't either, ma'am, not during business hours especially. Come on, then, let's see what's on for the first race."

They followed the crowd, which was considerable. It was one of the big days at Tia Juana and the stands were already nearly full of sincere devotees of the sport of kings. Carmelita was surprised to see a great many middle-aged and even old women there unescorted and intensely interested in a study of the racing charts. A band played indifferently.

Faraday bought two programs and handed one to Carmelita. They took seats up high near the roof.

Something of the crowd excitement began to tingle in Carmelita's veins. Pulses were moving at a faster tempo inside the gate than they were outside. There was electricity in the air, there was noise, movement, color, alertness.

Carmelita allowed her eyes to fall on her program.

"How odd!" she exclaimed.

"What's that?" demanded Dan Faraday, aroused from a study of his own chart.

"Here's a horse with my name." She pointed to the entry. "Isn't that a coincidence?"

"Coincidence? It's a tip from heaven," Dan declared solemnly. "Gee, that's a pretty name! It's in the fifth race, too, where I usually make my killing. We'll have to hire a truck to take home our winnings tonight. And nobody ever heard of Carmelita before. She's a dark entry and we ought to get all the best of it in the betting odds."

Carmelita demurred at first but Dan finally pursuaded her to make a small bet on the horse he suggested for the first race. He gave her twenty dollars and showed her how to buy tickets at the Pari-Mutuel machine established for the convenience of ladies right in the grandstand. He excused himself for a few minutes while he went to the paddock and placed a bet on the same horse for himself.

Almost as soon as he returned the horses came out and the first race got away. It was awfully short. Carmelita had only just begun to get unbearably excited when it was over.

"Come, cash your tickets," directed Dan, leading the way.

"Did we win?"

"We did."

The cashier gave Carmelita thirty-eight dollars in exchange for her memorandum check. It seemed incredible that twenty dollars could have grown so fast. Carmelita wondered how much Dan had won. She guessed it was much more. She tried to give her winnings to him but he refused.

"No, ma'am, it's yours. You'll have a lot more before the afternoon is over. I staked you, that's all."

Under Dan's direction Carmelita bet her entire roll on his choice for the second race. She won again. The man seemed to have an uncanny accuracy in forecasting what the animals on the track would do. He did not appear to have any particular system either. But by the time the fifth race came along Carmelita had over four hundred dollars in her purse. She was in favor of stopping right there.

"No, nothing like that," Dan insisted. "Why, ma'am, all the rest has just been

"Home, Sweet Home"

IN a dreamy old Long Island town—stands a quaint cottage that has weathered the storms of nearly three centuries—the boyhood home of John Howard Payne.

Above the worn millstone step, the shining knocker on the door tells the story of the old house. On it are engraved the immortal words: "Home, Sweet Home."

The world's most famous song was written by John Howard Payne in a burst of homesickness for this—his boyhood home

No word except "Mother" grips the heart as does the word "Home", and the stranger in a strange land finds no real happiness until he makes that land his home—until he is a citizen of the country in which he lives.

There are twenty-four million homes in America—

With the exception of the comparatively few belonging to the native Indian, every American home is the home of foreign born or the descendants of the foreign born.

There are 14,000,000 Foreign Born—now living in the United States, half of whom have not made this country Home. And by every boat, this number is being added to.

Canada's great chain of United Provinces—has received, in the past twenty years, more than three million immigrants. With her wonderful resources, Canada is attracting yearly a greater number of immigrants.

To help her new comers acquire the standards and the ideals of her noble national ancestry, the hope of the Dominion like that of the United States, is to make her residents, citizens—to make them at Home.

A Clarion Call to Action!

Here's the red-blooded, stirring story of how one Pennsylvania town in one week by the white magic of friendship enriched the community a thousandfold by making its aliens citizens.

Every Resident a Citizen—was the battle cry, and every man and woman went in heart and soul to make everybody a Homebody.

The town had a population of 32,000. One third was foreign born or born of foreign parentage. 2,500 were aliens. A week was set aside in which to invite this alien 2,500 into partnership, without thought of partisanship. Enthusiasm took the town by storm. "What are you doing to help your neighbor become a citizen?" was the question asked from poster, pamphlet and newspaper.

Never was there Such a Getting Together—except during the Great War. The mayor, county commissioner, postmaster, judges, newspaper publishers knew no party save the alien parties they wanted to help. The Y. M. C. A., Knights of Columbus, Salvation Army, and the pastors of thirty-one churches worked with one faith. The Rotary Club, Manufacturers' Association, and Real Estate Board were joined by the officers of fourteen Italian and Polish Societies in the One-for-all-and-All-for-One big purpose.

Not only were the advantages of citizenship explained and the advantages of helping to make a richer, better town, but every one desiring to become a citizen had a neighbor to go with him to court—to a court that knew no hour of adjournment, so long as an applicant for citizenship was to be heard.

As a result of the week's campaign about 1,000 of the 2,500 took the initial step towards full citizenship.

What this town did, every city and town can do.

What about your town?

What is it doing to make every resident a citizen—a better neighbor and a happier and more prosperous one? What is it doing to help the foreign born to make the Land and town of his adoption "Home, Sweet Home?"

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has 20 million policy holders in the United States and Canada—one-sixth of the entire population. The twenty millions speak 25 different languages—thousands of them do not speak English—thousands of them are foreign born and not as yet citizens. Thousands whose families are still in Europe have no real homes on this side of the water.

In order to help its immigrant policy holders to become citizens, and to advise them about their immigrant relatives in Europe or on their way here, the Metropolitan maintains a bureau called the Immigrant Service and Citizenship Bureau.

If policy holders have relatives coming from Europe, they tell their Metropolitan agent—they don't have to leave their jobs to go to the port of entry—Metropolitan will greet the relatives and give what information may be needed.

Many grateful letters are received from reunited families—in numbers of cases the relatives have been saved painful anxiety and needless expense.

In the Pennsylvania town that campaigned to make every Resident a Citizen, the work was organized and led by the Metropolitan Immigrant Service and Citizenship Bureau. The Metropolitan offers the services of this Bureau to any town desiring to conduct a citizenship campaign.

The Company gives at all times definite information as to citizenship. Its booklets on how to become a citizen are written in plain, simple English. They may also be had in Italian, Polish, Yiddish, Hungarian and Bohemian.

The full story of the Every Resident a Citizen campaign is in pamphlet form and will be mailed free on request.

a preliminary to this one race. This is what we came out for. I'll stick your coin down for you this time because that big a bet might ruin the odds for us on the machines. We can do better with a regular book."

"You aren't going to stake it all?" asked Carmelita reluctantly.

"I advise it. The odds are going to be big and it's the chance of a lifetime."

"But suppose she loses."

"Girl, she can't. That name means a winner on land or sea. No horse named Carmelita would dare lose with you in the grandstand."

"All right."

He was gone with the money. When he came back he told her:

"I got twelve to one on your bet which I put down first. They closed up a little thinking I had some inside dope so I couldn't do so well on my own."

"Here they come." Carmelita had learned to recognize the paddock call that heralded the entrance of the horses to the track. Dan looked them over.

"The runt there is Carmelita. The jockey's got red trimmings on white. He'll be easy to watch."

"Oh, Lord, they're off!" Carmelita had dreaded to see them start. It would be such a short time now until it would be over and perhaps that money would be all gone. It was too much to pay per second for excitement.

Their horse, the runt, didn't get away so very well. She stumbled just at the start and lost the pole. Still, she was with the bunch and only about half a length behind.

"Oh you Carmelita!" Dan was saying and the girl echoed him only more prayerfully. She had never had any large sum of money before and the thought of losing it made her ill. "Come on, Carmelita!"

Very few in the grandstand were yelling the same thing. Carmelita had not many friends.

"Give her the gas," advised Dan, shouting orders to the jockey. "Let her out, you damn fool."

"Come on, Carmelita!" prayed the girl, clasping both hands around her escort's arm in a frenzy of excitement. "Oh, she's dropping behind!"

"Not much. Maybe he's saving her for something."

"Atta boy, Surfboat!" shouted the grandstand as the favorite pulled ahead.

"Come on, Carmelita!" cried the minority—very much the minority—hoarsely. (No use saving throat and lungs now.)

"A little speed there, girl. Allah give her legs."

"Please, Lord, trip that first horse."

Something did happen. Nobody knew what just then, but later it was discovered that one of Surfboat's reins broke in the jockey's hands and before he could slacken the pressure on the other one he had pulled his head to one side and guided him to the outside of the track.

The following bunch jammed in to fill the place at the pole and a slight confusion resulted. By the time they were straightened away again at the three-quarter a red cap had swung out around and was running even on the final straightaway. So was Surfboat by that time, his jockey having dropped the other rein and, hanging on to the mane, allowing the animal to take his own course.

IT STARTS PROMPTLY
IN THE COLDEST WEATHER

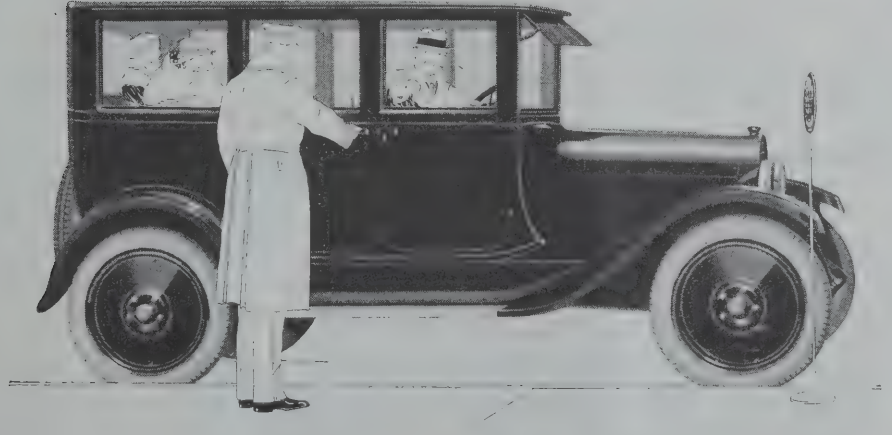
The behavior of Dodge Brothers Motor Car on zero days is a fair example of its fitness the year round.

You turn the switch, step on the button, and the motor starts—without undue noise or delay.

The reasons are readily understood:

The coordination of the power plant is well nigh flawless. The slightest impulse sets it in motion.

The battery—6-cells, 12-volts—is unusually large.



A high-vacuum carburetor so thoroughly vaporizes the gasoline that it ignites instantly under the spark.

The electrical system is remarkably efficient and cuts to a minimum the usual voltage loss between battery and starter.

Finally, the starter, itself—an admirable example of its kind—is directly united with the engine by a chain drive which is always in mesh—a fact having much to do with the promptness and quietness of its action.

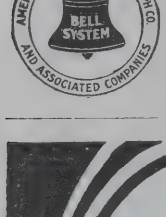
Necessity made the United States a nation of pioneers. Development came to us only by conquering the wilderness. For a hundred and fifty years we have been clearing farms and rearing communities where desolation was—bridging rivers and making roads—reaching out, step by step, to civilize three million square miles of country. One of the results has been the scattering of families in many places—the separation of parents and children, of brother and brother, by great distances.

To-day, millions of us live and make our success in places far from those where we were born, and even those of us who have remained in one place have relatives and friends who are scattered in other parts.

Again, business and industry have done what families have done—they have spread to many places and made connections in still other places.

Obviously, this has promoted a national community of every-day interest which characterizes no other nation in the world. It has given the people of the whole country the same kind, if not the same degree, of interest in one another as the people of a single city have. It has made necessary facilities of national communication which keep us in touch with the whole country and not just our own part of it.



The only telephone service which can fully serve the needs of the nation is one which brings all of the people within sound of one another's voices.

Our Ideal Paige—Your Ideal Car

IF your ideal car is one of dignified beauty, the newly refined lines of the Paige will charm you. If your ideal of beauty means also richness of detail and substantial construction, the new Paige bodies will satisfy you.

For Paige Ideal bodies are now doubly braced, extra stout. Double strips of patent leather keep metal from touching metal, or wood. This idea of Europe's foremost body builders insures a forever squeak-proof, rattle-proof car.

The richness of the new Paige bodies is sensed by hand and eye. Not a piece of imitation leather in the open cars. Superbly loomed velours in the enclosed types. All instruments beneath a single glass panel in a walnut dash. French tonneau hand and robe rails. Walnut steering wheel—position adjustable to the driver's convenience.

Undoubtedly your ideal car is a Paige in performance. Like its predecessor, this Paige 6-70 will prove America's unchallenged champion in speed, hill-climbing and acceleration. Likewise our Ideal Paige goes beyond even your ideals in easy handling.

The new clutch, with six springs instead of one and a light-weight driven member, gives smooth, easy engagement. The new transmission gives finger-touch gear shifting with a bare 3-inch movement. And it is almost as quiet in first and second speeds as in high.

A new degree of endurance—of long life at reduced upkeep—has been given our Ideal Paige by scores of chassis improvements. The finest practicable workmanship by precision tools and gauges, is standard throughout. A new automatic take-up for the chain driven auxiliary shafts does away with need for adjustment.

Since 1909 the same officers, directors and engineers have been working together on the development of our Ideal Paige. Now the success of our Jewett increases our volume and reduces our overhead so that we can fully realize our finest ambitions at a reasonable price.

So Paige now definitely takes its place as one of America's finest cars—frankly offered as the best of which we are capable.

is something I got from watchin' Gloria Swanson."

Probably he lied but it didn't matter.

It was dark when they drove home, dark and almost tropically warm. Dan poked along at ox-team speed.

"I'm not hurryin' none because, girl, I never had such a good time in my life and I'm tryin' to spin out these minutes as long as possible so I'll have more to remember for all the rest of my life."

He was so nice and the opposite of fresh that Carmelita slipped her hand under his arm and hugged it to her a little.

"It's one of the best times I've ever had, too," she said.

He did not do the wrong thing then, either. His hand stayed right on the wheel although he was driving on a straightaway. Only by the swift tightening of the muscles of his arm did Carmelita know that he had the impulse to put it around her.

"Put me down here at the side drive to the hotel," she requested when they finally arrived. "I don't want to go in through the front entrance."

He stopped the car and she got out.

"Many thanks for a glorious day."

She held out her hand. He didn't seem to have anything to say but just held it dumbly, almost desperately.

He cleared his throat. "Could you go out to the track again tomorrow?"

Carmelita laughed to herself. Tomorrow she would be fighting herself all day long not to lose her temper over the twins and Mary Louise—especially Mary Louise. What a contrast to the events of today!

"No, Dan, I couldn't go out to the track again."

"Never!"

"I'm afraid not."

"I was afraid of that, too. Something told me I'd better look at you a lot this afternoon. But I haven't done it much because it hurts. I suppose your folks wouldn't think I amounted to much, would they?"

Carmelita laughed—out loud this time. "No, Dan, that isn't the reason."

"You're engaged—or married?"

"Neither."

"Then, Carmelita, I'm coming back for you."

Carmelita had a momentary panic. Suppose he should come and find that she was only a nursemaid making the most of her day off!

"You mustn't, Dan."

"I must," he insisted stubbornly.

"Perhaps, sometime," she parleyed, "but not soon. There are reasons."

"Not tomorrow?"

"No, positively not tomorrow. Not for a week anyway. Promise me you won't even come over to the hotel for at least a week."

"I don't see why——" he began.

"Will you promise and go if I kiss you good by now?"

"Yes," he assented eagerly. Mankind is always being trapped by the offer of the bird in the hand.

It was a bargain.

Also it was a wonderful good by kiss.

Carmelita's recollection of it afterward was that his mouth was some way clean and sweet—very boyish.

III

THE round of daily duties took up with a vengeance the next day. The children, pretty much ruined by the relaxation of what little discipline Carmelita was allowed to impose, were young fiends.

Perhaps it was just as well that she had a lot of troubles; it distracted her mind from the distaste she felt for her uniform of service, kept her from being spoiled herself by the recollection of the relaxation of self-discipline. It was pretty hard to solace oneself with Mary Louise for the loss of the companionship of a six foot, brown haired, grinning masculine dynamo. There was nothing in the society of the twins to compensate for the look of adoration which she had yesterday so frequently surprised in the youthful gray eyes of her one-day cavalier.

It was a little easier to get through the second day. Perhaps the reason was that she was already planning how she would get off to meet him the following week. It was madness, of course, to continue the masquerade but she just had to. They were both so young and youth doesn't last forever.

The week passed. He had given no sign but Carmelita rather thought he would come to the hotel on the day week after their first meeting. She had tacitly implied that he might. So she arranged, with the slightly peevish consent of her mistress, to have one of the other nursemaids look after the youngsters, and dolled up in "the dress." She had others but nothing else so nice. Besides, a man wouldn't think anything of its being the same one.

She walked loiteringly in front of the hotel. There were many, many cars parked there, but not Dan's. Not yet. She waited half an hour sensitively conscious that she must be attracting attention.

She was still there when Mr. Scott-Murphy came down the hotel steps. He noticed her, not at first as an employee but merely as a beautiful girl. Mr. Scott-Murphy had a slightly roving eye.

"Why, it's Carmelita!" He recognized her at last with a jolt. "I never dreamed that you were so good looking. My dear girl, walk down the avenue a ways and I'll pick you up somewhere out of sight of the hotel and we'll go for a ride."

"I have an engagement," Carmelita lied. "I'm waiting for someone now."

"Some other time, then. Oh yes! here's a letter that came for you with the noon mail. I slipped it in my pocket and forgot to send it to your room."

He handed her the envelope and went on, well satisfied at having discovered a treasure in his own establishment.

The handwriting on the envelope meant nothing to Carmelita. She had never seen it before and opened the letter wonderingly.

My dear Carmelita:

I've been a fool for luck all right and I've played the fool with it, too.

I got to thinking over what you said about our not meeting again and I realized that you were right. I'm not anywhere near in your class, in money, culture, anything.

I thought I could get the money all right. Maybe I imagined you would let me meet your folks if I had a pretty good sized bank roll. Anyway I went out to get it. I began doubling my bets at the track.

The day after you and I were out there I lost the first bet of any considerable size since I began playing the ponies. I made the next one bigger and lost that, too. There's no use going into details. I shot the bank roll. Instead of having half a million as I planned to bring you, I'm down to six bits. Yep, they got my car, too, and most of my fancy clothes.

So you can see why I ain't coming to call on you like I said I was going to. I've lost the one thing I had to recommend me—my luck.

Instead of seeing you, which would break my heart now that you're eighty thousand miles further away from me than you were that day even, I'm starting back to the motion picture lot on Paint, my pony. He'll help me to get a job because he's a good actor. He's got one new trick I ain't going to tell 'em about, either. That's swimming out in the ocean.

I ain't going to say anything foolish because I don't know how. They say a clever girl can always tell when a man's in love with her anyway whether he says anything or not. I reckon you're that kind of a girl.

As I have quit gambling for good it will probably be quite awhile now before I make my pile. When I do I'm going to find you even if it's only to congratulate another man who loves you, too. The way I sling that word "love" around you'd think I was a cake-eater or something. I guess I wouldn't dare if I thought I'd have to face you while you read it or very soon after.

I wish you a whole lot of happiness.

And will until I die. Yours,

Dan

STEAM outstrips sails; the telegraph distances the courier and the automobile passes the horse.

The motor stage from San Diego to Los Angeles went by a lone horseman on the steep grade that leads to the Torrey Pines the other side of La Jolla. A little beyond the top of the hill the driver stopped to let a lady passenger alight. It seemed rather an unusual place for a woman to wish to be left alone, especially as there was no house in sight; still, she insisted and did not demand a rebate on her fare, which was paid to Los Angeles so nobody attempted to dissuade her.

The bus proceeded on its thirty-five mile an hour way and the late passenger began walking back in the direction from which she had come.

Soon she encountered the man on horseback. The man did not see her because he was not looking up or ahead at all. The horse was ambling along at his own discretion, which did not prompt him to any display of speed. The rider was either very dejected or else he was absolutely absorbed in the consideration of some problem that taxed every ounce of his mental powers.

He would have passed the pedestrian except that she hailed him.

"Hey, mister!"

The horse sat back on his haunches, so abruptly was he pulled up.

The rider did not say anything. He just allowed a draft to play on his tonsils by leaving his mouth open.

She spurred him to speech. "I just wanted to ask the way to Hotel de Coronado."

He was off the horse in an instant. "Carmelita!" he said in the tones of a prisoner greeting the bearer of a reprieve and then recollecting himself continued "Didn't you get my note, ma'am?"

Firm in his belief that the locomotive was practical and would prove of inestimable service to man, George Stephenson sought an open competition at which other engineers might receive equal opportunity to exhibit their inventions. His notable success with "The Rocket" at Rainhill, England, in October, 1829, was the more creditable for Stephenson's unselfish attitude and fair-mindedness.

The Courage of Conviction

STEPHENSON, the untutored but far-sighted mine-worker, triumphed over adversity and found greatness through service because he was possessed of the courage of his convictions.

Faith in the ultimate accomplishment, strengthened by uncompromising standards, must invariably precede every great achievement.

It was the realization of the possibilities of pneumatic tires and the confidence of final success that produced the present day cord tire.

In the performance of Firestone Gum-Dipped Cords, the Firestone organization sees the rewards of over twenty years of incessant effort toward better tire quality. Millions today are receiving mileage from Firestone Cords that seemed beyond the realm of possibility.

Belief in the standard of Most Miles per Dollar has brought acceptance of that standard from an ever-widening following.

"Of course I got it. That's why I'm here. I figured that you couldn't have ridden very far and I caught the first bus out going north. We just passed you a moment ago and I got out to talk to you."

"It's mighty kind of you, ma'am, to come to say good by. I thought you wouldn't have any use for me when you found out I was a busted four-flusher, a tin-horn sport, or else I would have come over to the hotel to make my excuses—no, I guess I wouldn't either because it makes it harder trying not to think of you now that I know you're a lot more wonderful even than I remembered."

Carmelita seemed to ponder that statement a moment. She had an answer in kind ready but she thought better of it. Instead she said: "I didn't come just to say good by. I came to bring you this."

She offered a strip of paper which he took wonderingly.

"Why, it's a certified check!"

"Yes. I stopped in town long enough to draw it out of the bank. That's what we won the other day at the track. Now that you're all through gambling I want you to take it back—it's yours really, you know—and make the first payment on that ranch you were telling me about."

Dan absorbed this gradually. "Ma'am," he finally decided, "that's plumb generous of you even if I can't take it."

"Oh but you must!" wailed Carmelita helplessly. "I came all the way out here after you just to bring it so that you could start all over out on a ranch where you'd be so happy and everything."

Dan shook his head. "Thanks again, but I wouldn't be happy on a ranch any more. I've changed a lot since I saw you. I've got hifalutin' ideas now. I ain't never going to quit tryin' till I corral a lot of jack and can travel with the swells that you know. I know I can't probably win you but I'm goin' to die tryin'."

Carmelita laughed but it was not a very amused laugh because the object of her mirth was herself and the irony of fate which had shown her the path to happiness only to close the gate in her face.

"I can cure you of any unhappiness about me," she said finally. "You won't be interested in me at all when I tell you who I am. Then you can take your money and go find that place you spoke of back of the mountains."

"How are you going to cure me by telling me that?" demanded Dan. "Who are you and what's that got to do with it?"

"I'm only a nursemaid working for a wealthy family staying at Coronado. This dress was given me by the lady who employs me and the day you saw me was my day off. So there! Your imagination was fired by this dress, which really is very nice, and by the idea that I was some society débutante or something. In my everyday clothes you would never notice me. Now will you take the money?" She held out the check which he had returned to her.

He did not answer but just looked at her. Finally he shook his head.

"Please, Dan, take it! Don't make my sacrifice all come to nothing. It has been a sacrifice to disillusion you. I would much rather have stayed on that pedestal where you placed me and dreamed about that wonderful day and the nice things you said and did than to strip off all the gilt and tinsel and stand before you just

Most of them carried business men to work, leaving their wives and families at home, marooned because the family's one car is in daily use by the husband and father.

"Because why?"

"I don't know why."

"Was it because you loved me?" Dan had suddenly become the aggressor, and dropping Paint's bridle he led Carmelita off from the road. "Was it?"

"That has nothing to do with it. Dan Faraday, why are you being so rough with me?"

Dan grinned. "I ain't afraid of you any more, thank heaven! That's why I'm sorry you don't care for me because I'm going to teach you how it's done and if you don't learn rapidly I shall have to punish you severely. Hold out your hand!"

Argument

managed to evade the knife and keep on boring—onward and upward—until it had driven the dog mad and killed him? Why did Mescal wear a silver cross round his neck right out in plain view?

Mescal was older than Joe, darker, bigger, more silent. There was something very strong and masterful and winning about him. If he had given Joe an order Joe would have obeyed without thinking.

In two years he had not seen Mescal but once—way back at the beginning of the first year. But he had probably thought about him thirty-five or forty times and wondered what had become of him.

Then one morning a big cloud of dust climbed up over the rim of the world, and all through the forenoon drew closer and closer, and of course grew bigger and bigger.

Some intuition or sixth sense or second sight told Joe that he was going to see Mescal again and he was glad.

Noon passed and Joe calculated that if Mescal were going to pay him a visit and get back to his own sheep by nightfall he ought very soon to emerge from his cloud of dust. But Mescal did not emerge. Instead the cloud itself came on and on, at the pace of feeding sheep, and grew bigger and bigger.

Joe's sheep of their own accord grazed toward it. And about five o'clock when the wind had gone down the two dusts mingled, and the two grazing flocks began an incessant baaing.

Then in the open space between the two flocks gray Bolo and Mescal's black wolf dog smelled of each other and renewed their ancient friendship, and presently Mescal himself climbed down from the seat of his gypsy wagon, and carrying himself like an emperor strode through the sheep to where Joe stood waiting for him.

They did not shake hands or exchange any word of greeting. Mescal simply said: "I am sick of herding alone. Let's join flocks."

And Joe, though he was flattered beyond measure and had something the feeling of a man for whom a wonderful dream has come true, was able to answer simply and at once, and in a voice which betrayed no emotion whatever.

He said: "All right. Let's."

III

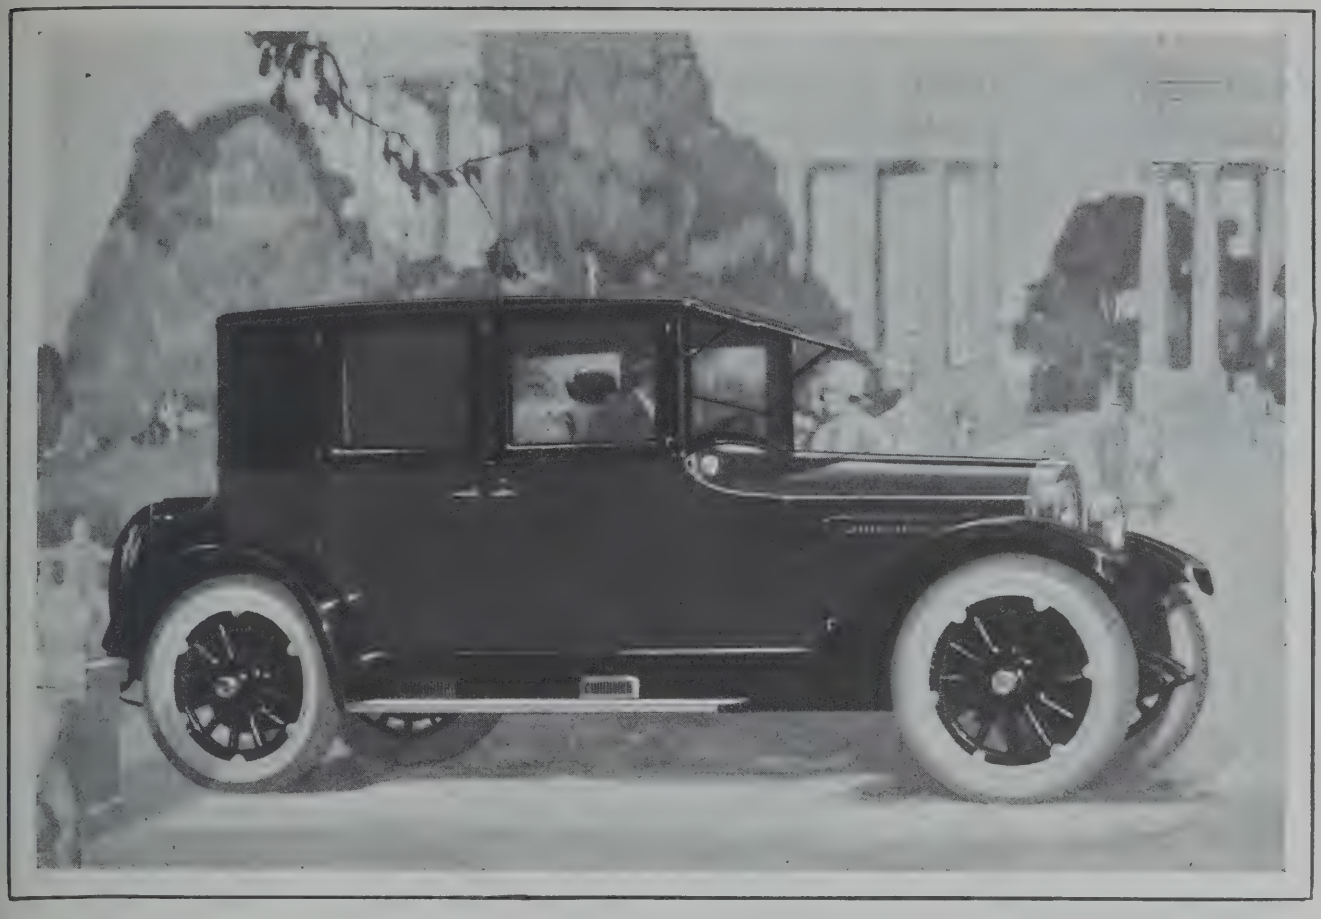
For some time after that neither of them spoke again. It was getting late, and making camp and preparing supper called for action rather than words.

Inwardly Joe had a feeling of buoyancy and elation. That long period of acute stoically borne loneliness following his wife's death had come to an end. He was to have companionship again and again it would be companionship unspoiled by too much talk.

Each went quietly and skillfully about the preparation of his own supper. Both finished and were ready to eat at the same time. The arrangement to sit side by side during the subsequent emptying of the steaming mess tins and coffee pots was made without words. Supper finished and the dogs fed, the two sheep herders began to roll and smoke cigarettes. A half-hour passed pleasantly. Just before bedtime Mescal spoke:

"The last time I go to the city, I bring back a young girl from the Casa Verde. She pretty good girl and pretty soon we get married. Pretty soon she have a dear baby and die. After that I get to feeling pretty lonely and so I come to you and we join flocks."

He rolled and smoked another cigarette. Then he rose to his full height, stretched himself and yawned. Then he said "Good night, Joe," and walked slowly out of the firelight toward his dark wagon.



Joe was touched and flattered by Mescal's confidences. You don't tell the whole intimate story of your life to a man just for the fun of the thing, but because you like him and trust him. He felt a warm liking for Mescal and he felt sorry for him, too. Having himself lost a reasonably satisfactory wife he was in a position to feel sorry for him. He wondered if Mescal had buried his wife and child in the sheep country with a heap of stones to mark their grave and to keep the coyotes from meddling with them.

By noon the next day this speculation amounted to an eager curiosity which after twenty-four hours of silence, found expression in words. They had finished their second silent supper together and were rolling and smoking cigarettes.

Joe said: "I piled up lots of stones to remember my wife by."

And Mescal answered, but only after a long silence: "It's no trouble for me to remember my wife. She was a pretty good girl, and she didn't talk much."

To that Joe could only nod his head and look appreciative. He himself disliked talk and it was pleasant to know that Mescal had the same feeling about it. Still—once in a great while—a little talk was almost necessary. With so many sheep nibbling all around the clock it would soon be necessary to change pastures. And pastures could hardly be changed without a little discussion.

But they were.

One morning just before breakfast Mescal said: "Here the sheep range too far. So after breakfast we'll drive them west. There is a good valley beyond the scarred mountains."

The valley to the west would not have been Joe's first choice if he had been left to himself. But Mescal had spoken with such an air of finality that it seemed foolish to object. The society of Mescal was growing very precious to Joe, and he would not have offended him for the world.

So they moved west in a terrible cloud of dust. Sometimes they rode in their wagons. Sometimes they walked. They ate their meals together in a comfortable, restful, social silence.

Joe could think of no better way of life. He was happy. His admiration for Mescal grew. Mescal knew sheep. There was no doubt about that. He knew more about them and what they needed and when they needed it than Joe, wise as he was, would ever know. And he had the look too of one who knows well many more things. He would look at a thing, it might be the moon or a star or a stone at his feet, with an expression of immense tolerance and understanding. At such times he looked as if he could have spoken volumes. But he seldom spoke at all.

One day they crossed a fresh trail made by a band of wild cattle. Sheep herders dislike cattle almost as much as cowboys dislike sheep. Each feels that the work of the other is low and unworthy of a man. The dislike is so strong that a sheep herder never speaks of a cow as a cow or a bull as a bull or a number of them together as cattle. He calls them "animals."

Thus when Joe and Mescal came to the trail made by the ruminants this contemptuous word fell from them both at the same time. "Animals," they said.

And then felt a strengthening of their partnership and of the ties offensive and defensive which bound them together. Then Mescal repeated the word, and added: "There's getting to be too many damned animals."

The afternoon passed, camp was made and supper eaten. Bedtime came, and it seemed that the subject of "animals" was still disturbing Mescal's equanimity. He rose and stretched himself and yawned with great deliberation. Then he fingered the silver cross which hung about his neck in plain view and said: "God made all things to serve and feed man—even animals."

Joe remained for a little time by the fire thinking over what Mescal had said. A mosquito lighted on the back of Joe's hand, dipped his syphon delicately into the leather here and there until he had located a vein, sucked his belly full of red blood, withdrew his syphon, shook himself and flew heavily away.

Joe went to bed thinking about the mosquito. And the first thoughts that he had the next morning were about the mosquito. Thoughts about mosquitoes and conjectures concerning them kept occurring to him throughout the day. But it was not until after supper that he voiced his conclusions. "God," he said, "must have made animals and men to feed mosquitoes."

It was not until he had spoken that he realized that his belief was a contradiction of the more usual and less questioning philosophy expressed by Mescal on the previous evening. And he was sorry that he had spoken. For it didn't matter much which of them was right, if either, and the man with conventional ready-made beliefs is always more offended by doubt and scoffing than the man who bases his theories on observation and logic.

Mescal gave Joe one short, cold, contemptuous stare, but said nothing. Words, indeed, would have been wasted. The look itself was altogether sufficient without any accentuation. Thereafter Mescal sat for a little while with a darkened face and knitted eyebrows. Then petulantly tossing the chewed remains of a cigarette into the dying fire, he rose, shook himself and started off to bed.

He had the air and manner of a man who in the face of tremendous provocation has managed—for the greatest good of the greatest number—to hold his tongue and to keep his temper.

Joe then and there made up his mind that he would never offend Mescal again. He would be very careful what he said and when he said it. He would be particularly careful never to touch on religion or anything connected with it. And thereafter as a man watches a dangerous snake so Joe watched his tongue.

For a number of days they herded the sheep to the westward, and it was as if nothing disagreeable had ever occurred between them. And the companionship, mostly silent, became ever dearer and more necessary to Joe. He had sinned. He knew that. But he felt that his crime of speech had been overlooked and that he had been forgiven. He was almost perfectly happy.

One night they camped on the side of a mountain and saw the sun go down in glory beyond a vast forest of chaparral. Then in the failing light, and perhaps a mile away, certain little tree tops of the chaparral began to shake and sway and it seemed certain that some living creature had become entangled and was struggling to extricate itself.

To see better the two men rose to their feet. For Mescal a mere glance then seemed sufficient.

"It's an animal," he said, and turned away. Joe's jaw loosened and a look of wonder came into his eyes. He almost spoke.

He looked from Mescal back to the far-off agitation in the chaparral, and from the agitation back to Mescal.

Then his mouth opened wide. He raised his right knee high from the ground and brought his right hand silently down to meet it. Evidently his sense of humor had sent him into a sudden paroxysmic pantomime of laughter.

Several times that night, when Mescal wasn't looking, Joe went through his pantomime: opened his mouth wide, raised his right knee high and brought down his right hand to meet it. Something had tickled his risibilities almost beyond endurance.

Unfortunately for Joe he was not going to be able to keep the joke for himself. It slipped away from the firm hold that he had upon it and escaped from him

Did Closed Cars Cost Too Much?

Thousands thought so. And prior to the Coach, they stuck to the open cars.

That simply meant they wanted to put their investment in chassis quality and dependability, rather than accept lesser mechanical value in a closed car.

Yet closed car advantages are too obvious to need comment. Everyone wants them provided they do not sacrifice chassis value.

So a Great Welcome Awaited the Coach

Essex invented the Coach to meet this plain demand of thousands. It gives every essential comfort of the costliest closed cars. It is solid, quiet, durable and attractive in looks. Yet of course its greatest value is in the famous Essex chassis which world experts have called the finest of its size built. It fully has confirmed that verdict by official proof.

Insist on Lasting Value

Open car cost shows the mechanical value you get in any closed car. And the difference shows what the closed body costs. So consider well the two types of closed cars that sell around $1300.

The Essex Coach at $1145 gives all practical closed car advantages on a chassis that costs $1045 in the open model.

In no car can you get more than you pay for. It is for you to decide whether your money shall go for a costly body or for real automobile performance and lasting quality.

altogether. This happened the very next night at supper, when, the meal nearly ended, some imp of the perverse, which all day had been teasing for a momentary use of his tongue, secured possession of it. Joe spoke. He spoke without meaning to speak and without being able to keep himself from speaking.

"That wasn't an animal we saw last night," he said. "It was a bear."

And having spoken he wished that he had been born dumb like the wife he had loved and buried. A look of the deepest contrition and misery came into his eyes. He looked a little as a beaten fighter looks when he knows that he is about to receive the finishing blow.

Mescal stared at him with a brief and cold hostility. Then he rose, and with a contemptuous lift of the shoulders stalked off to bed.

They had just made that camp, but Mescal's actions and preparations on the morning following showed clearly that he had made up his mind to leave it. Before the sun had risen he and his big black wolf dog were hard at work separating their sheep from Joe's and Bolo's.

Joe was in a great agony of mind.

"Where are you going, Mescal?" he asked.

"Away," Mescal answered coldly.

There was one more human and even pitiful question that had to be asked.

"Why, Mescal?"

"Because," said Mescal curtly, "there is too much damned argument around here."

As soon as it seemed fair to his employers and to the sheep, Joe moved his herd to that part of the sheep country where his wife slept under the cairn of stones. He stayed as long as it seemed fair.

The grave was company for him—not too much company, like some men have but enough.

The Perkinses' Career

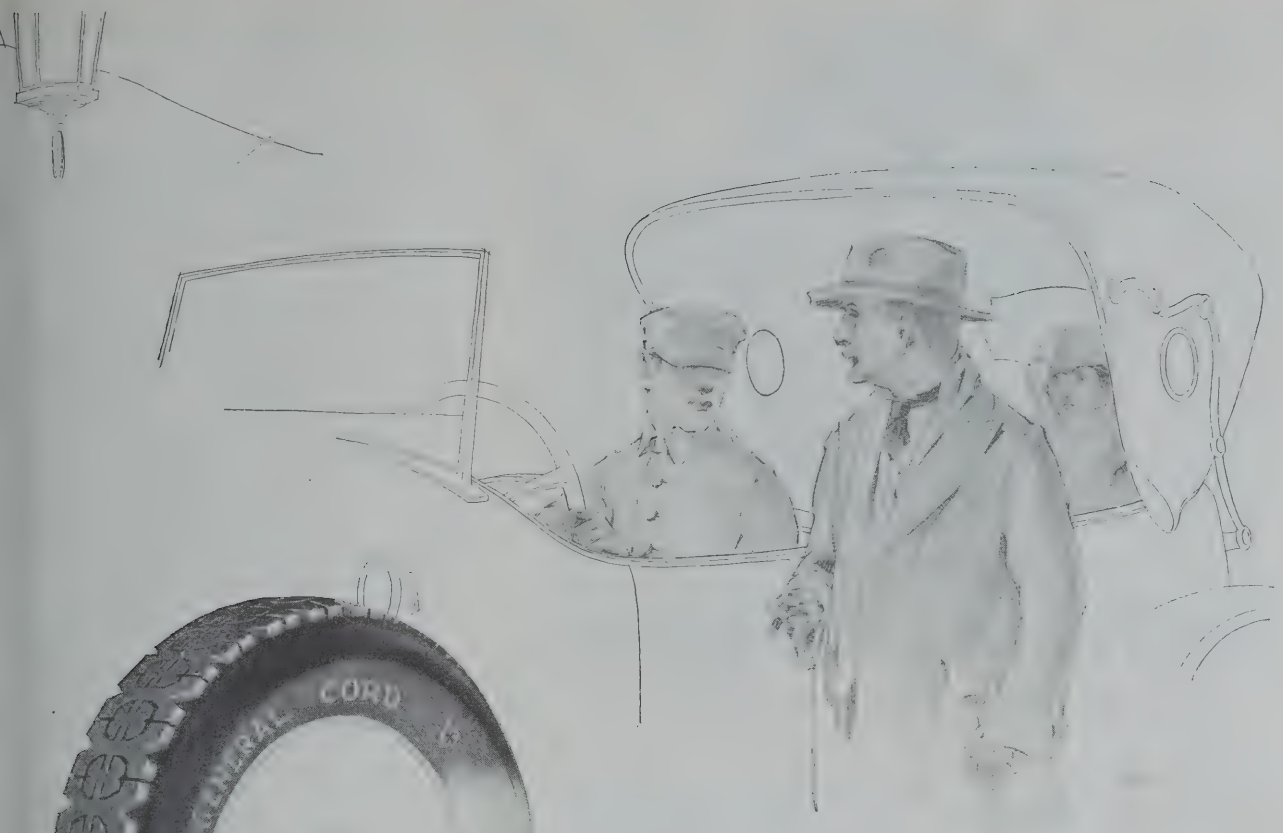
financial and artistic world, was Pennington. He was then a man of thirty-five. Despite his inherited wealth, he had made a career for himself. He had been an assistant district attorney, had served a term at Albany and had earned the respect of his colleagues in his profession by a volume on corporation law. He was an amateur athlete of sorts and had been on the advisory committee that directed the sailing of one international cup race. A rather serious man, his rare smile indicated a boyishness of spirit that was repressed by shyness. For, despite his inherited position and his achievement, he was naturally of a retiring nature.

But diffidence deserted him at first sight of Beryl. Her beauty, her exotic charm, her bubbling disposition conquered him at once. Those who thought they knew him would have said that Pennington's courtship would be a matter of years of slow and gradual approach. Instead, he literally threw himself at the feet of Beryl. She was fascinated, as much by his name and position as by the man himself. His money was no minor attraction.

There was no formal engagement. Pennington made it clear that he was unalterably opposed to his wife's appearing professionally, and this was a barrier at first. For Beryl had dreamed of her career too much to surrender it at the first request. But she had a canny brain. Battelli's enthusiasm about her had had only one provision; that was her health. She seemed strong and robust, and apparently thrived under the hard and vigorous course of training through which he put her. But there were times when her eyes seemed lusterless, when her movements seemed to have that languor that had come upon her in her fifteenth year. Battelli had told her that if she always took the most meticulous care of her health there was no reason why it should ever break down; why she should not have at least twenty successful years.

But Beryl frequently wondered as to her ability to sacrifice herself so unremittingly upon the altar of success. It was this wonderment, this doubt, that caused her finally to accept Pennington. Of course she believed herself to be in love with him. Nevertheless, that selfishness which seemed inherent in her was the compelling reason for her abandonment of opera.

Once decided, she was as ardent as Pennington. To his suggestion that they just be married and let formality go hang, she readily acceded. Their marriage in early October was a nine days' sensation. Then Mrs. William Pennington, returning from her honeymoon, took up her position as chatelaine of the Park Avenue home of her husband, and stepped as gracefully into metropolitan society as though she had been born to it.



Her father and mother spent Christmas with the Penningtons. They had not the slightest feeling of censure because she had abandoned her career. As a matter of fact, both Loretta and Frank highly approved of Beryl's marriage. Marriage to them was much more important than singing. They were not too greatly impressed with Pennington's money or position. Neither of them had either, but they had had love. They were impressed with Pennington's deep devotion to his wife, and were happy because Beryl returned it in the same measure.

There were many presents hanging from the tree in the Pennington library on Christmas morning. Among them was an envelope addressed to Frank Perkins. He opened it and withdrew a check for ten thousand dollars. He looked at the signature, "Beryl Pennington." Over his face spread a flush. He turned to his daughter. At the moment Loretta and Pennington were not in the room.

"That's mighty nice of you, Beryl," he said. He took her face between his calloused palms and kissed her. Then he gently pressed the check into her hand. "I can't take money from my own daughter."

Beryl stared at him. "Why not?" she asked. "Didn't I always say that I'd pay you back?"

"If you'd worked in the opery, Beryl, and wanted to pay me back, I ain't sayin'

You wouldn't have blamed her either

SHE was left a widow when she was thirty-five. Her husband's estate was quite a substantial one, and not being a business woman she was naturally glad to find her affairs left in the hands of a very good attorney—a young lawyer with whom her husband had done much of his business.

Various complications of the estate required her to be in this attorney's office quite often; there were many details to dispose of from time to time.

Then suddenly, for some reason or other, she announced to her friends that this attorney was no longer handling her affairs. He was a rising young man in his profession, and enjoyed an excellent standing. The abrupt change in her dealings to the office of a much less known lawyer puzzled every one, and there was really quite a lot of talk about it. No one could understand why.

Some men succeed in business in spite of halitosis. But many others are held back—often not knowing why.

Sometimes, of course, halitosis comes from some deep-seated organic disorder that requires professional advice. But usually—and fortunately—halitosis is only a local condition that yields to the regular use of Listerine as a mouth-wash and gargle.

This halts food fermentation in the mouth and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean. So the systematic use of Listerine this way puts you on the safe and polite side. You know your breath is right. Fastidious people everywhere are making it a regular part of their daily toilet routine.

Your druggist will supply you with Listerine. He sells lots of it. It has dozens of different uses as a safe antiseptic and has been trusted as such for half a century. Read the interesting booklet that comes with every bottle.—Lambert Pharmacal Co., Saint Louis, U. S. A.

but what I'd taken it. But a girl's parents ain't got no right to be collectin' debts from her husband."

"But you must take it," Beryl protested.

Her father shook his head. "I guess Loretta and me can worry along all right, Beryl," he said gently. "You got married so quick we didn't get a wedding present. You let the little we've done for you stand as part of that present. Loretta and I will do a little shopping before we leave and get the rest of it."

There was no use in further argument. Beryl knew that New England pride that was part of her father. She knew that she would never be able to alleviate with money what she considered the harsh and barren lot of her parents.

Insensibly she drifted away from her parents, to whom indeed she had never been close. It was true that once a year she paid a duty visit to Bucksport, and it was equally true that each winter she invited her parents to visit her. But after the third winter of her marriage her parents no longer came to New York. Loretta's health was failing, and the railroad journey was too tiresome. But they kept in constant communication through the mails. Beryl was still the ready letter writer of her girlhood, and she thrilled her parents with accounts of her social triumphs.

Also, they knew from the papers of her work during the war. She headed committees; she took part in drives; she sang for the soldiers. In every way she proved herself patriotic and self-sacrificing. And if she kept a scrapbook containing the newspaper clippings of her patriotic activities, who could blame her?

Her parents were proud of her; they colored and stammered when her name was mentioned. It seemed to them that they were she, that the glories that came to her were not vicariously theirs, but actually so. She was the glorious fruit of their ambitions.

They never suspected that, after the first three years, happiness left the Pennington home. It is useless to place the blame. Like the majority of unhappy marriages, the fault must be almost equally distributed. This was no case where the sins of one were so blatant that sympathy went out immediately to the other. While Beryl was busy with her war activities, her husband was equally engaged. He received a commission in the army, and while he never went to France, he nevertheless served his country well.

But the long absences engendered a certain constraint. On his brief furloughs Pennington would find his wife so filled with engagements that she had little time to see him. Constraint developed into coldness, and coldness led finally to the similitude of aversion.

For after the war Pennington began to devote himself more assiduously to public life. He cared little for society. As for Beryl, she lived for society. Her husband's political ambitions she began to think vulgar. When he was elected speaker of the Assembly she refused to live in Albany. Because he was easy-going with her, because always he subordinated his own comfort to her pleasure, she thought him weak of character; she did not believe that he would ever achieve any lasting distinction as a man of affairs. And so, finally, bored with him, annoyed because he preferred to spend a summer working on plans for the rehabilitation of men who had lost their all during the war rather than visit the scarred battlefields of Europe, she decided to divorce him.

She had the Pennington name; she knew that he would, of course, settle an ample fortune upon her. And so she went to him and told him of her desire. If Pennington was shocked, shaken to the very soul of him, he nevertheless was a gentleman first, last and all the time. He would not force himself or his code upon anyone else, not even his wife. She offered to go to Reno, but he smilingly shook his head. Nevada divorces had an ugly name; he would permit her to divorce him in New York. And so Beryl's lawyers engaged the necessary detectives and the evidence was procured. The petition for divorce was filed, the summons served on Pennington, and Beryl went to Bucksport to wait until the suit should be called.

Her parents were overjoyed to see her. She had not been there for twelve months, and their gratitude for her presence was almost pathetic. At supper that evening she fetched tobacco and matches for her father's pipe; she stooped over and retrieved a dozen times the napkin which slipped from her mother's lap. For rheumatism had come to her parents now; almost sixty Maine winters were taking their toll.

"You ought to have a servant, mother," she said as she waved Loretta away from the kitchen. "I'll wash these dishes tonight, but tomorrow morning I'll get a maid."

She felt unwontedly virtuous as she dried the dishes; in all her life she could never remember having assisted her mother at these homely household tasks. With her virtue came shame. For suddenly they seemed old; their very joy at seeing her seemed to speak of deprivation. She had never felt so tenderly toward them as when she joined them in the shabby living room.

"Been readin' lots about you this year, Beryl," said her father.

"And William is doing a lot of good work, ain't he?" said Loretta proudly.

Beryl's eyes were very green. "William enjoys life in his own way," she said Then, even as she had suddenly told them of her desire to go to Europe, she exploded another bomb. "I've sued him for divorce," she announced.

Her mother's knitting needles fell to her lap; her father's pipe dropped to the floor, and the live coals burned into the carpet.

"What for?" demanded Perkins.

Beryl shrugged. "There's only one cause in New York," she said.

Unsteadily her father rose to his feet. "I've met your husband; he ain't that kind," he declared.

"It doesn't matter whether he is or not," said Beryl, "so long as a jury decides that he is."

"Why?" demanded her father.

"We don't enjoy each other any more," said Beryl.

Her father's lips were suddenly grim; his eyes were hard. He stared at her. His voice when he spoke was harsh.

"There's a lot of things in life that ain't enjoyable," he said. "It ain't been exactly a pleasure to me to see Loretta bending over the sink, swingin' a broom, scalding herself at the stove. If it hadn't been for —things—Loretta would have had a

India ruby mica is a stone that will bend double and not break

Hindu coolies carry the bundles of mica down from mountain mines to the city

MINES in the almost inaccessible mountains of India produce, under enormous difficulties, the highest quality mica in the world.

The shafts accumulate water and are baled continually by Hindu women with pitchers, while native miners, wielding crude iron picks, dig out the book-like crystals. These they carry afoot down miles of cliff and precipice, to the settlements.

Yet the astonishing elasticity and toughness of India ruby mica more than justify the labor of mining it. A thin sheet bent double or even struck with a hammer, will not crack across. Heat, cold and electricity have no effect upon it.

servant long ago; she'd have had a nicer house, better clothes, and traveled."

It was an unwontedly long speech for Frank Perkins to make. Usually he spoke in monosyllables; the sea had made him taciturn as a boy. But he stopped short and walked toward his daughter.

"'Scuse me, Beryl," he said. "It's your own business. Whatever you do, Loretta and me are with you."

And as if to uphold his assertion, Loretta rose from her chair and walked with widespread arms toward her daughter. But Beryl stepped back until, leaning against the old piano, she faced them.

"Father, what were those—things? Was I one of them?" she asked.

He made no answer. Instead, his arms went around the mother whose embrace she had avoided. She saw their two gray heads approach each other. She saw the quivering of their shoulders that told of the tears they fought to hide, and a great truth seemed to come to her to enlighten her soul. She saw herself as she had never been visible to her own eyes before. She saw herself as a taker, not a giver, and suddenly it came to her that taking loses its savor unless one seasons it with the salt of giving. For her these twain had denied themselves the things that make life less unendurable. That one perfect flower may grow, the other blossoms are cut away. Had she been worth this pruning, this sacrifice? Suddenly she knew that no one is worthy of another's sacrifice, who makes no sacrifice herself.

She walked to the telephone and asked for the telegraph office. She dictated to her lawyers a telegram that contained the two words, "Discontinue proceedings."

Her parents heard and were staring at her as she hung up the receiver.

"Beryl," said her father, "you mustn't mind us, you must do what's right."

"I'm going to," she answered.

It was late the following evening when Beryl rang the doorbell of the Pennington home on Park Avenue. Up in his study, William Pennington heard the bell. The servants were all out, the house was half dismantled of its furniture. On the table before him was an opened letter, signed by six of the most prominent men in the political party to which he belonged, offering him their support in the coming primaries; assuring him of his nomination and election. Beside it lay a letter in which he declined the proffered governorship, in which he put aside forever his political ambitions. For a divorce scandal made those ambitions hopeless. He was reaching for the pen when the bell sounded. He went downstairs and opened the door.

His jaw dropped. Simply, she reached out her arms and pulled his head down to hers. "I've come home," she told him.

Upstairs in his study she walked, mistress of this house, and of this man, and of this man's life, to the desk where lay the opened letters. She picked them up and read them as a full partner might. Scornfully she tore in two his note of declination. She looked archly over her shoulder at him.

"After Albany, Washington," she said.

Amazed, Pennington stared. "Do you know what this means, Beryl?" he asked.

"It means that I've come to my senses," she told him. "It means that—I've never tried. In all my life, things have been given to me and I've taken. I've never given and I've never tried to give. Yesterday I saw my mother and my father and I understood why they are bent and old because of sacrifice for me. I am here today, asking you to forgive me, to take me back to this wonderful home. If it were not for them I'd be a drudge somewhere. My father gave up a career for his children. Mother and he have lived only for me. When I told them that I was divorcing you, their hearts nearly broke, for it was the end of their career."

"Of their career?"

"I'm their career," said Beryl, "and it shall not be a failure."

"You've come back to me rather than hurt them?" His voice was harsh.

She shook her head. "On the train last night and today I thought that was the reason," she told him. "And then it came to me that I have never tried for anything. Everything has always been given to me. My education, my years abroad, my chance in opera—you."

"I don't know what you mean," he said.

"You gave me your love. I did nothing to earn it; I took it as my due, not understanding that payment must be made for everything, and that love can be bought only with love. I am my parents' career. To them, my success means that they have not failed. Divorce means failure to them."

"And rather than have them fail, you've come back?" he asked. His voice was still harsh.

"Rather than fail myself," she told him. "For the first time in my life I've thought of someone else; I've tried." Into her eyes came a light that turned them to softest blue. Over her cheeks swept a wave of color. Her hands went unsteadily toward her husband.

"It wasn't hard," she said.

Why Is Your Man Leaving You?

to express his views upon this subject his conscious mind would cause him indignantly to deny what I am saying. But when he began to think quietly he would agree that it is true. And if only woman had logic enough to understand this—that is, that man is acting from long force of instinct in his casual sense of honor towards her, and not from conscious intention—she would feel less bitterness when she finds him lying to her, which she is almost certain to do sooner or later.

The only way to alter this distressing idiosyncrasy in man in the future is for all the mothers in each generation to inculcate a different point of view into their little sons' subconscious minds, and then in about four generations man's instinct about honor to woman will have altered and he will act towards her on the same principle as he does towards his fellow men. But that would bring the millennium—and it is, I fear, a long way off. So we had better get back to the subject of this article, the moment of revolt which comes to every married man.

Broadly speaking, it occurs when first he begins to realize that the woman i

"Because I can get personal service which will eliminate much of the worry on my long trips.

"Because I can get the service of affiliated clubs in other localities.

"Because I will be contributing to the work my club is doing to eliminate unjust legislation.

"Because I will help to protect myself and other motorists from petty hold ups and persecution by rural constabulary.

"Because I will be doing something for the promotion of good roads in my community."

These are only a few of the benefits you will receive—and give—as a motor club member. In numbers there is strength, and if you make your club strong enough in members, the more effective it will be in every way.

impinging upon his personality or his freedom of action. Numbers of women are very stupid and begin to nag at a quite early stage; or they take up an attitude that they know best what is good for a man: how much he ought to eat or to drink; how many cigarettes he ought to smoke; what flannels he should put on on cold days; what he ought to do with his leisure time, etc., etc. And while the man is in love he will put up with this and even take it as a proof of affection, but gradually it gives him a feeling of suffocation, and he begins to revolt. Then he ceases to be in love. Of all things a man likes to feel that he is free.

Then some women belittle their partners before others, they order them about; and if the man has any spirit he resents this instantly. Every time a woman arouses a feeling of resentment in a man, she has shortened his term of being in love with her, and she is bringing nearer his moment of revolt.

I suppose it would be about one case in a million when the man is docile always. And man gets a sense of revolt when domestic ties seem to be strangling him, interfering with every pleasure or sport he wants to indulge in. He sometimes ceases to be just, then, or to remember that the poor woman is probably also being harried. How a man behaves to her, and how long he goes on loving her, depends entirely upon the character of the woman, her magnetism, her will and her tact. But as very few women have all these three things developed in them, eighty percent may expect to see their husbands showing a sense of revolt sooner or later.

Clever women avoid ever giving the man cause to feel his chains. On the contrary, they make him feel that he is absolutely free, only that he must use his wits to retain them.

But many women are just foolish, loving creatures, never thinking that any of their actions can cause reaction, and really bent on nothing so strongly as expressing themselves. Sometimes that self is a doormat; sometimes it is an over-developed "mother-sense"; sometimes it wants to show devotion in season and out of season. Always what it wants—not what the man would prefer. Men revolt when women want to make them happy in their way, not the men's way. In fact, men revolt the moment they realize that they are bound.

Now a wise woman begins to ask herself questions when she first senses this—she does not ask the man questions. She asks herself what has she done, or implied, which has caused her husband to feel that he has thongs. And if she knows anything about the natures of men she will then use her wits to make him feel differently, not reproach him for feeling what he does. Because if she does he will do one of two things: Either he will deny that he feels any sense of revolt, while he is arranging to enjoy a little freedom on the quiet, or he will show his irritation and start a quarrel, and that will be the beginning of the end of love.

A woman can hold a man's actions because of his sense of duty—but no woman on earth can hold a man's emotion towards her unless she arouses his inclination.

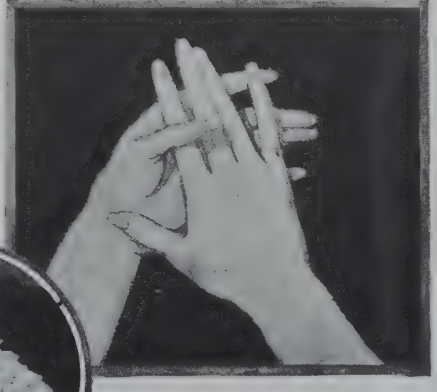
Marriage is a frightful responsibility however you look at it, and to make a success of it neither should cause the other to feel a "moment of revolt."

A new use for Lux-dishwashing

The new way to wash dishes

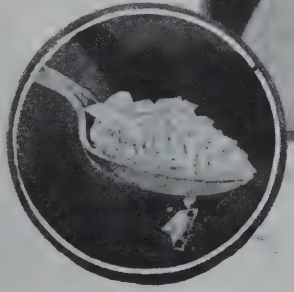
Rids your hands of that three-times-a-day-in-the-dishpan-look 54 dishwashings in a single package

Lux for washing dishes! At last there is a way to wash dishes without coarsening and reddening your hands.



It isn't like experimenting with something new and untried. Of course Lux would be wonderful for dishwashing. You would know it—yet you feel as if you had made a delightful new discovery. Lux saves your hands. It is as easy on them as fine toilet soap.

Your hands are in the dishpan an hour and a half every day—sometimes even longer! That is why it is so important to use a soap for washing dishes that won't irritate your skin, that won't dry the indispensable natural oils.



Just underneath the surface of the skin, Nature placed these oils—secreted them in millions of tiny sacs. They nourish the chiffon-thin outer skin, keep it soft, pliable and resistant.

But Nature didn't provide against the ravages of kitchen soaps. If your hands wash dishes in harsh, alkaline soap suds three times a day these abundant oil sacs are drained dry. Your fingertips, those sensitive organs of touch, grow rough and scratchy. Your hands show unmistakable signs of the dishpan.

With Lux in your dishpan your hands won't be robbed of their natural oils. Lux is so pure and gentle it can't dry your skin. These delicate flakes preserve the satiny softness of your hands; they won't redden or roughen the most sensitive skin.

As easy on your hands as fine toilet soap

One teaspoonful makes the water soapy all through

Just one teaspoonful to a pan

Flip one teaspoonful of Lux into your dishpan. Turn on the hot water. Now watch these fragile flakes break into instant suds.

Just one teaspoonful—it sounds incredible, but try it!

A single package does at least 54 dishwashings—all the dishes, morning, noon and night, for almost three weeks. Not just the china you use on special occasions, but the regular everyday dishes as well.

Dishes so clean and lustrous!

No cloudy, dull surfaces left on your tumblers, no soapy streaks on silver and dishes.

Just a swish of your dishmop in the pure Lux suds—and out come your dishes—clean and sparkling.

Keep a package of Lux handy on your kitchen shelf. Use it for the dishes always. Don't let that hour and a half in the dishpan every day be a hardship to your hands. Begin washing today's dishes with Lux. Lever Bros. Co., Cambridge, Mass.

The Desert Healer

"You know," she whispered with quivering lips. "You saw—the morning after the Governor's ball. I can't speak of it. It hurts me."

For a moment he held her close, his eyes blazing as once before she had seen them blaze; then he rose abruptly and striding across the room flung back the closed entrance flap and stood in the open doorway staring out into the night.

She twisted on the divan to watch him, wondering what chain of thought her words had set in motion. But he gave no explanation of his hasty movement and after a time he came back slowly, his face inscrutable as she had ever known it, and squatted Arab fashion on a pile of cushions near her. Lighting a cigarette, for a while he talked fitfully, his brief remarks punctuated by lengthy silences she did not know how to break. And as the evening wore on he grew more and more distrait until finally he ceased to speak at all, sitting motionless with his eyes fixed on the rug, smoking cigarette after cigarette.

She knew that it was late. The tom-toms and pipes that earlier in the evening had resounded from the men's quarters had long since died away. She was conscious of a silence that could almost be felt, she found herself straining her ears to catch some sound.

When at last he stirred and rose with swift noiselessness to his feet she was lying so still that he thought she was asleep. Hungrily he gazed at the woman he had taken for his own till the warm sweet nearness of her, the faint intoxicating perfume of her fragrant hair and his own desperate need combining shattered the last remnant of his self-control and he swept her up into his arms, straining her to his heaving chest, raining kisses on her lips, her eyes, her palpitating throat till, panting and exhausted with the force of his embrace, her head fell back against his shoulder and he carried her white lipped and trembling towards the inner room. But as he reached the screening curtains that barred his impetuous way he came to a sudden halt. Yearningly he stared into her frightened eyes; then with a gasping sob he slid her slowly to her feet and pushed her gently through the silken hangings.

"Go—for God's sake go!" he muttered, and wrenched the curtain into place.

Not yet! What the world would not believe, was possible to him who loved her. Until he was sure beyond all doubt that she could never be legally free to marry him he would hold her unscathed. And merciful God, how long would that be? He was pledged to Sanois and he had sworn to take her with him. Was he strong enough to withstand the temptation of long months spent in close proximity? He did not know. He only knew that tonight his strength was gone and that he dared not stay beside her. The calm radiance of the starlit sky, the deep stillness of the night mocked him as he fled from the tent. A night of mystical beauty, redolent with the subtle odors of the east, languorous and heavy scented—a night for love.

The blood was beating in his ears and his brain was on fire as he stumbled through the shadowy darkness of the little valley, striving to subdue the longing that possessed him, striving to banish the torturing thought of her nearness. Blind to the road he was taking, he saw only the sweet pale face that had flushed to the touch of his burning kisses, saw only the tempting beauty of her slender loveliness. Was she asleep, as he prayed with all his soul she might be—or was she too awake, longing for him as he was longing for her, suffering as he was suffering? Just now she had trembled in his arms and he had seen the fear that leaped to her flickering eyes, but she had made no effort to repulse him, had made no plea for release. Instead she had clung to him. And it seemed to him that he could still feel the touch of her fingers ice-cold and shaking against his, still feel the rapid beating of her heart. He flung out his hands with a bitter cry and dropped like a log, burying his head in his arms.

Hour after hour he lay motionless on the soft warm sand, too passion-swept to sleep, till at last the raging fever that consumed him abated and he knew that, for the time being, his victory over himself was complete.

But there was no peace in his mind. There was another decision that had to be made before the stars faded and the sun rose on a new day—a decision he knew in his heart was already determined. By acceding to the frenzied appeal of the woman he loved, he had done a thing unpardonable. That did not trouble him. He did not regret it, he would never regret it. Her happiness was the only thing that weighed with him. Last night her need had been his sole consideration. But tonight his thoughts were centered on the husband from whom he had taken her. He would never give her up—but he would steal no man's wife in secret. He was going back to Algiers—going back to face the man he had wronged. And what would be the outcome of that interview? No matter what Geradine had done—she was his wife.

What would Geradine do?

Carew rose deliberately to his feet with a harsh, mirthless laugh. He knew what he would do himself if the position were reversed, what he would unhesitatingly have done twelve years ago if the opportunity had been given him. And if Geradine shot him like a dog, as he deserved to be shot, what would become of the girl who trusted to him? To stay—and forfeit his own self-respect. To go—knowing that he might never return. Heavens above, what a choice! But there was no other way thinkable. His mind was fixed, and the rest lay with Geradine. Would the cur who had stooped to strike a woman fight to regain possession of her, fight to avenge his honor? If he only would—by God, if he only would! The breath hissed through Carew's set teeth and his strong hands clenched in fierce anticipation as his mind leaped forward to the coming meeting.

With a strange smile he swung on his heel and strode back to the sleeping camp.

But as he neared the tent his swift pace lessened and his somber eyes were dull with pain as he passed under the lance-propped awning into the empty living room. How could he leave her to wait alone until he came again—or did not come! His stern lips quivered as he parted the curtains and felt his way to the long low couch.

His tentative whisper was answered by a stifled sob, and out of the darkness two soft bare arms came tremblingly to close about his neck and draw his head down to the pillow that was wet with her tears. Shaken by her distress his resolution almost failed. But he crushed the momentary weakness that came over him, and with characteristic directness told her plainly the course he had decided.

A cry of terror burst from her. "You can't go—you can't, you can't. Oh, Gervas, stay with me, don't leave me! If you go you'll never come back and I——" She shuddered and her frenzied voice sank to an agonized whisper. "He'll kill you. Gervas, he'll kill you!"

"Pray God I don't kill him," he retorted grimly. "I've got to go, dear. It's the only thing I can do." And unable to bear the sound of her weeping he turned away.

With a wail of anguish she leaped to her feet, striving with all her strength to hold him. "Gervas, Gervas, don't leave me like that—tell me you love me, tell me you'll come back to me——"

For a long moment his lips clung to hers; then he laid her on the bed. "You know I love you, Marny," he answered. "It is because I love you that I am going back."

There was a note of intense sadness in his voice that made her bury her face in the pillow to stifle the sobs that were fast growing beyond control, but there was also in it a ring of finality that made further pleading impossible.

When she raised her head again she was alone and she started up, trembling with dread, listening till her ears ached that she might hear the last sound of his voice. But there was only silence in the adjoining room, and driven by an irresistible impulse she fled through the communicating curtains. The loose entrance flap was only partially closed, and screened by the looped back draperies she waited, scarcely breathing, straining her eyes through the gloom, praying that she might see him once more. When he came it was only a momentary glimpse, a fleeting impression of two shadowy horsemen who flashed past the tent to vanish in the darkness beyond.

Sobbingly she stumbled back to the inner room, flinging herself in a passion of tears on the bed where she had wept throughout the lonely hours of the night. She did not question his action; it was enough for her that he had done what he thought best. And there was no bitterness in her grief. Selfless, she did not think of herself. It was only of him she was thinking, only for him she was agonizing. The brutal strength she knew by terrible experience the savage unbridled nature she had learned so thoroughly—what would Geradine do? Tortured by horrible imaginings mad with fear, she writhed in mental anguish until, exhausted, she fell asleep.

It was midday before she woke. The room was filled with light, hot with the vertical rays of the sun blazing down on the roof of the tent. Slipping from the bed she stood for a moment holding her throbbing head between her hands, then moved languidly towards the dressing table. At the farther end of the room she

Not a Day Older

FORTUNATE is the wife and mother whose youthful appearance evokes this compliment on the day of her china wedding. Yet the most famous beauties of history beginning with Cleopatra, were most admired when, from the standpoint of years, they were no longer young.

This gift of eternal youth depends upon one attraction—a fresh, smooth skin: "Keep your school-girl complexion" and you can ignore the passing years.

How to keep it

Very easily, as you can quickly prove. The secret lies in thorough cleansing, once a day, of the minute skin pores which compose the surface of the skin.

For these minute pores have a most important function, they provide the skin with the natural oil which keeps it smooth and soft. But when this natural beautifying skin oil is allowed to accumulate, when dirt and perspiration are allowed to collect in the pores, serious clogging is the result.

Unless all dangerous accumulations are carefully removed, you will soon be wondering why your complexion looks so coarse. The appearance of blackheads and blemishes complete the disfigurement.

Before you resort to the harsh methods which may roughen and toughen the delicate texture of the skin, try this simple but effective method of beautifying.

Get a cake of Palmolive Soap, mildest and most soothing of all facial soaps. Massage the profuse, creamy lather gently into your skin, using your two hands. Rinse carefully and use a fine soft towel for drying.

If your skin is very dry, apply a little cold cream. Normally oily skins won't need it. Do this just before bedtime and you lay the foundation for a fine real beauty sleep. In the morning your mirror will compliment you by reflecting a freshened beautified complexion.

Palm and olive oils

Palmolive Soap is the modern scientific blend of the same palm and olive oils which were the favorite cleansers in the days of ancient Egypt. Modern progress has perfected their combination, but they have remained the ideal soap ingredients for three thousand years.

If Palmolive were made in small quantities it would cost at least 25c a cake. World-wide popularity keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night. This reduces the cost to 10c a cake.

Why Palmolive is Green

Because the rich, natural color of these rare oriental oils from which it is blended, naturally impart their color as well as their quality to the fragrant green cake.

The soft moss tint is nature's own—just as is the color of grass and foliage. Thus there is no need for artificial coloring. Nature does it for us.

found a little bathroom, Spartan-like in its appointments but containing all that was needful, and half an hour later, bathed and refreshed, she went listlessly into the living room.

As she came through the curtains Hosein, who was squatting on his heels by the doorway, rose to his feet with a deep salaam. His presence gave her a curious feeling of reassurance. She knew without being told that Carew must have left her in his keeping, knew also that Hosein must be perfectly aware of the reason for his master's absence; and his calm demeanor and untroubled expression seemed insensibly to soothe her own agitation of mind. But when the meal which appeared with almost magical quickness was finished, when Hosein had gone and she was alone once more, the temporary courage that had come to her faded as new doubts and fears crowded in upon her more overwhelmingly than before.

Cold and shivering, tortured with suspense, unconscious of the passing hours, she huddled on the divan, hoping, despairing, until all her senses seemed merged into one dominant perception as she lay listening, listening for the thud of galloping hoofs.

In the end it was no actual sound that roused her but an intuition, an indefinite something penetrating to her brain that sent her flying to the open doorway.

How long she stood there she never knew. One thought only held her motionless, one question that her pallid lips repeated monotonously. Which—which?

And then, quite suddenly, she knew—knew even before the three swift horses swept into sight from behind the angle of jutting rock that framed the entrance to the little valley. Why were there three?

Only one attendant had gone with him.

And the horseman who rode so closely behind him was no Arab. Her heart seemed to miss a beat as she recognized the slim little figure whose crouching seat in the saddle was so familiar to her. Oh God, why was Tanner with him?

But she had no time for reflection. She saw the foam-flecked black horse, savage and intractable still in spite of the punishing ride, race to the very entrance of the tent; saw his rider drag him, screaming and fighting, to a standstill. Then as Carew leaped to the ground an overmastering panic seized her and she shrank back.

He came through the doorway slowly and took her into his arms without a word. His face was gray with dust and fatigue and there was a strangeness in his manner that forced utterance from her.

"Geradine——" The fearful whisper was barely audible, but he heard it and his arms tightened round her.

"Dead!" he said tensely.

Her face went ghastly and a terrible shudder passed through her.

"Not you, oh Gervas—not you?" she breathed imploringly.

His tired eyes looked into hers with infinite tenderness, infinite understanding.

"No, thank God, it was not I!" he said quietly. "Malec killed him. They killed each other. Tanner found them when he went back to the house early the next morning. The other servants had cleared out—the place was empty. I can't tell you any more, dear. It's too—beastly."

She was leaning weakly against him, her face hidden in his robes, shivering from head to foot. And as he broke off abruptly she shuddered closer to him.

"Was it my fault—was it our fault?" she gasped with a ring of horror in her voice.

"No," he answered, almost violently, "it was his own fault. He brought it on himself. But he's dead, poor devil, and God knows I haven't the right to judge him."

He held her silently for a moment; then the strained rigidity of his features relaxed and a great gladness dawned in his eyes as he stooped his tall head to the soft curls lying on his breast.

"Marny," he whispered impellently. "Marny—my wife!" And with a little cry that was love and trust and joy unutterable she lifted her tear-wet face and yielded her lips to his.

THE END

The Younger Mr. Burrage

she smiled on him and let him dance with her twice in one evening. Once she even let him take her to a dance himself.

Philip Fairbain danced earnestly but well. That night as he circled among the others with his arm round Noreen in the silver sunset thing that was her gown, he was completely happy. He liked the sheen of her coppery hair under the lights, the upward curl of her lashes. He liked the soft color of her cheeks, and the almost transparent delicacy of skin that belongs sometimes to people of her coloring. He liked in fact everything about Noreen Gordon. But because he was Philip Fairbain Burrage he did not tell her so.

Instead he tried rather awkwardly to talk of other things. "I hear Dick Dunning planned the decorations," he said. "He's quite artistic, isn't he?"

"I guess so," said Noreen. "He was in my landscape design class. He proposed to me last night," she added inconsequently.

"Oh!" said Philip.

He did not know what else to say; he thought that Noreen was telling him of her engagement. But Noreen was not.

"I was furious," she was saying instead. "Why, I don't suppose that Dick gets more than thirty dollars a week and probably never will. Isn't it absurd?"

"Awfully absurd," Philip agreed with her.

He did not speak again during the rest of their dance.

And the next day Noreen played all round him on the golf links with Mr. Hopkinson Bowers, and hardly saw him. It was rumored that their engagement was soon to be announced and Philip was very miserable.

The next day also Philip Fairbain asked his father for a raise. He stood in front of the desk in the mahogany and leather office and looked at Mr. G. H. Burrage as if G. H. Burrage had the ball and he wanted it.

"H'm," said Mr. Burrage. "Maybe I'll pay you more when I sell the Nichols estate for two hundred thousand dollars. And maybe," he added, "I'll pay you more when you show a little more pep with your sales.

Philip mentioned that he had sold the Clough property during the past week.

"H'm," said Mr. Burrage. "Yes. Old Condon's been waiting to get his hands on to that land for two years. What'd you think I gave you that assignment for? Gave it to you because it was easy—that's why. Knew no fool could miss it."

And that was the end of the interview.

After that Philip did not see Noreen Gordon for more than two weeks. When he did it was at another dance—one of the early fall series at the Linwood Country Club. Noreen was there with Hopkinson Bowers; it was rumored that they would announce their engagement the following week.

Noreen Gordon was always beautiful, always the life and center of every party, but on that night she surpassed even her own beautiful and animated self. Perhaps it was her dress—a thing of dusky browns and golds, like the color of an October day when there is a purple haze across the woods—a dress that hinted at the colors in her hair. Perhaps it was a kind of suppressed excitement about her; a richer color in her cheeks. Philip, watching her, suspected that this time the report of her engagement was well founded.

She gave him one dance, but they did not dance together. Instead they wandered out and stood under the famous Craigie elm halfway down the hill on which the clubhouse stood. The moon was under clouds all silvered at the edges by light from the inside.

"Beautiful, isn't it?" said Noreen softly.

"Yes," said Philip.

He was not looking at the moon, however, but at Noreen Gordon.

Suddenly he seized her hands and drew her a step towards him. He did not do it roughly, but he did it somehow as if he expected her to come.

Noreen laughed a little, but she did not slip away from him.

And then as suddenly as he had caught them up, Philip let her hands drop again.

"I want to ask you something," he said. "Are you going to marry him?"

"Who?"

"Him," said Philip. "Hopkinson Bowers."

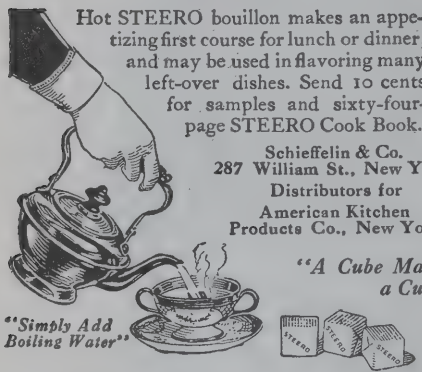
Noreen looked away from Philip down the hill. "I—don't know," she said. "How can I tell?"

"Has he asked you?" said Philip.

Noreen laughed a little. "That doesn't prove much," she told him. "Lots of people do—you'd be surprised."

"I haven't," said Philip solemnly. "And I'm not going to. You don't need to worry. I'll promise never to ask you to marry me. I——"

"Thank you," Noreen cut him short. "That's very reassuring."



She moved a little away from him in the direction of the clubhouse. Then she changed the subject.

"See that cunning little cloud," she said. "The one with the silver ruffle."

They walked back together up the hill. Philip was thinking that thirty dollars a week probably would not buy Noreen's gloves. As for Noreen's thoughts, Noreen herself could not have told you what they were.

After that night, again Philip did not see Noreen for a long time. It was beginning to be increasingly borne in on Philip that under the circumstances the less he saw of Noreen Gordon the better it would be. Every night he read the social notes for news of her engagement.

III

So FAR as his own interests were concerned, Mr. Burrage could not have been summoned out of town at a more inconvenient season. For after infinite angling he had at last persuaded Mr. Judkins, the Best-of-All Soap manufacturer, to inspect the Nichols estate with a view to purchase. He had also several estates which he meant to show Mr. Judkins immediately after Mr. Judkins had refused to have anything to do with the Nichols property, but he wanted to begin with that. Mr. Burrage had been beginning with the Nichols estate for years. And he wanted to show it himself because he knew perfectly well that when the Nichols place was sold, he, G. H. Burrage, would be the one to sell it.

All these things being considered, therefore, Mr. Burrage swore roundly at the telegram that called him to New York. But he went. He had to go. He had barely time to catch the ten-ten train.

Partly because his favorite salesmen were out for the morning, partly because he thought his message was one which any bellboy might deliver, Mr. Burrage rushed in for a moment to the cubicle where Philip Fairbain sat on a high stool and made out his reports.

"Got to go off to New York," he shouted in the tone of one putting the blame where it belongs. "Rush business. Back tomorrow. Now look here, Phil. Old Judkins is coming this morning to look over the Nichols place—be here any minute. Put him off. Get rid of him. Tell him I'm sick; tell him I've gone to a funeral; tell him I've been offered the mint for one of my estates. Tell him anything, but put him off. Don't take him out there yourself. Tell him I'll get in touch with him as soon as I get back."

"Yes, sir," said Philip.

The instructions were alarming, but Mr. Burrage's son was not accustomed to question Mr. Burrage's commands. No one was.

Mr. Burrage rushed off again. Then he stuck his head back for a moment through the door.

"Say, look here, Phil," he said. "You got that straight, didn't you? Whatever you do don't try to sell the Nichols place yourself."

"Yes, sir," said Philip.

He moved about in front of his high stool to conceal the fact that Plute was getting up to see what the rumpus was.

Mr. Judkins arrived at ten-fifteen, when Mr. Burrage was five minutes on the way from Boston to New York. Mr. Judkins was a sharp little man with a picked nose and picked eyes. His linen, which he had laundered every day in Best-of-All White Laundry Soap, was immaculate, but he had a tendency to checked suits. Mr. Judkins was a self-made man. His personal opinion was that he had made not only himself, but his wife, the Best-of-All Soap Manufacturing Company with all its employees, and a considerable part of Greater Boston.

Much of Mr. Judkins's money he had made by keeping it. He was rather commonly known as Old Tightwad Judkins, and he had the reputation of prying all the buffaloes off his nickels to make fur robes out of.

On this particular morning he walked into the reception office at the G. H. Burrage Real Estate Company with the air of a person who knew where every last one of his herd of buffaloes was.

Behind him walked Mrs. Judkins. Mrs. Judkins was a large lady with a soft fat face and soft fat hands. You could tell at a sniff that she used Best-of-All Scented Toilet Soap every morning. She did not share her husband's tightwad reputation.

"Good morning," said Mr. Judkins. "Where's the boss?"

Philip pushed his hand back through his shock of light hair and set out a chair for the lady and another chair for Mr. Judkins which Mr. Judkins did not choose to see.

"He's—out," said Philip. "I'm Mr. Burrage's son. He—asked me to represent him. He—asked me to tell you that he couldn't see you today. He—asked me to tell you that he'd communicate with you by Wednesday."

"He asked you a mouthful, didn't he?" said Mr. Judkins.

"Yes," said Philip.

Mr. Judkins took another look all round the room.

"Um," said he, "where is he?"

Philip swallowed hard.

"He's—sick," he said.

He said it with the frank, straightforward manner of a man in a new lamb's wool coat meeting a neighbor who has been losing sheep.

"Where is he really?" inquired the inexorable Mr. Judkins.

For an instant Philip floundered. Then he resolved on a desperate course of action.

"Well—the fact is," he said, "that my father isn't sick at all. He's away. He was called away suddenly on rush business just before you came. He mentioned getting a big offer for one of the estates in his hands. He had to look after that before he could see you."

Philip was going on famously, reassured by the amount of truth in what he was saying. But Mr. Judkins picked him up sharply on his last words.

"You say he wanted to look after that before he saw me?" he asked.

"He had to," Philip assured him.

Mr. Judkins puckered up his eyes as if he had just made out some object on a distant horizon. "Had to, did he?" he said. "What for?"

"I can't say," said Philip.

"Won't, you mean."

"I—I didn't ask him," said Philip.

Mr. Judkins puckered up his eyes again. He decided that young Burrage had been better trained than he had at first supposed, but that he was a simple soul who would presently tell him everything. Abruptly he changed his manner of attack.

"Well," he said, "we might as well go along out and take a look at this Nichols estate anyway."

"I'm afraid we can't do that," Philip objected.

He was very miserable and rather red. He saw plainly that Mr. Judkins was going to say "why not?" again, and he didn't like it.

Mr. Judkins said it.

"I can't take you," said Philip. "I haven't the authority."

"Authority!" bawled Mr. Judkins as loud as he could with a not very bawling kind of voice. "What's a real estate office for? Do you usually have to get permission to sell anything?"

"Well, no," Philip admitted. "You see this is rather a special case. My father—well, to be quite frank, my father told me not to show you this property while he was away."

"Um," said Mr. Judkins.

Then he sat down in the other chair and squinted up his eyes and winked at Mrs. Judkins.

"If you wait till your father gets back Wednesday," he said, "I may not want to do any business."

"I can't help it," said Philip. He was desperate.

Mr. Judkins was a little taken aback by Philip's uncompromising attitude. But he had several other ways to try. He tried them each in turn. In turn he found that Philip could not be wheedled, or bullied, or bribed, or intimidated. But at last he had an inspiration.

"Well," he said, "I guess you and I can't do any business. I'll get one of the other men in the office to take me up."

He had him there. Philip thought fast and decided that if anyone was going to show the Nichols property it might as well be he. And so they went.

In the elevator Mr. Judkins had a chance to whisper to his wife.

"He's had some big offer on that place," he told her, "and wants to put the Q. T. on our trade. Prob'ly some of the swell neighbors want to get their friends in up there. I don't expect to buy, but I won't be joshed out of looking at it."

Mrs. Judkins patted the ruffles on her lace blouse and nodded.

Philip Fairbain drove the Judkinses in complete silence to the Nichols estate. In silence he whirled them up the drive through rows of strange vegetation, and under the porte-cochère. In silence he alighted and held the door open for Mrs. Judkins. Mrs. Judkins climbed down heavily, and the three went up to the door. Plute also climbed down from his step and followed, his pepper and salt nose close to Philip's heels.

"It's a dog," Philip explained, forestalling the usual question as he saw Mr. Judkins looking at Plute. Then he unlocked the door and threw it open. "This is the house," he added.

He lapsed into silence again—into rather sulky silence—and marched before them through the echoing rooms over the patchwork floor.

The Judkinses trailed after him, pointing at this or that, and stopping now and then to punch the woodwork or to whisper over the arabesques at the tops of the windows.

Mrs. Judkins said that it was a real roomy house.

Mr. Judkins shook his head and said that it was too darned big and that he couldn't afford it. All the same he didn't like the way this whippersnapper agent acted.

"Say, look here," he said when at last they happened to catch up for a time with the hasty Philip Fairbain. "Didn't you ever show a house before? Give us a line on some of this stuff."

"Yes," said Philip.

Then he pointed to the fireplace. There was deep scorn in his voice.

"Black Venetian marble," he stated. "Hand carved. Gondola."

He pointed again.

"Crystal," he said. "Glass enough there to make a string of beads for everyone in Boston."

Mr. and Mrs. Judkins nodded at each other.

"He's got the stuff all right," Mr. Judkins whispered, "if he's just a mind to show it. Too darned high priced, though."

"It's a crime," said Philip, and waved his hand inclusively at the whole house.

Mr. Judkins caught him up.

"What's a crime?" he asked.

"It's a crime to put a house like this on the market," Philip said.

"What do you mean by that?" said Mr. Judkins. "Mean young Nichols ought to keep it in the family?"

That particular point Philip had not thought of, but he thought of it now.

"I suppose he ought to," he said soberly. "After all it was his father who built it."

In Philip's mind condemnation could go no further.

Mrs. Judkins lingered to examine the hand carvings while Mr. Judkins told her that that kind of stuff ran up the price of a place like thunder and for her not to set her heart on it. Then they all went out.

"Front door," said Philip, opening it. "Brass knocker. Lion couchant. Brick terrace." He went down the two brick steps. "French parterre," he added.

"What?" asked Mrs. Judkins.

"French parterre," Philip repeated. "Geometrical flower beds. Topiary work. Sun dial. Granite bird bath. My gosh!"

Mrs. Judkins gasped at the very number of the French parterre's attractions. She plucked Mr. Judkins by the sleeve.

"Handsome, isn't it?" she said.

"Too expensive," he answered. "I wouldn't buy it unless I could get it for a song."

But Philip was going on. "Sunken Italian garden," he was announcing. "Graveled paths. Spraying fountain."

He turned the water on and the fountain sprayed, to the delight of Mrs. Judkins and the disapproval of her less extravagant husband.

Then he pointed from Diana to the noble buck and from the noble buck to the twin cupids fitting their arrows to their bows.

"Kind of a hunting scene," he said reminiscently.

"So it is," said Mrs. Judkins.

Then she went and tickled the cupids' marble toes. She said that she thought they were just too sweet for anything.

They walked on again. Then suddenly as they rounded a corner on the other side of the spraying fountain they came upon something not usually included in an exhibition of the Nichols estate. On a camp chair, with an easel stuck up before her and the sun bright on her bare head, sat Noreen Gordon. She wore a brown linen artist's smock over her dress, and she was dabbling with water color at what was obviously a picture of a sunken Italian garden with a French parterre in the distance. Noreen flushed a little when she saw Philip.

"Why, Phil Burrage!" she said quickly. "How do you do! I hope you don't mind my painting here. I'm finishing that sketch I started."

"Oh, no!" said Philip, and for the life of him could say no more. He was suddenly intoxicated by the mere presence of Noreen, dazzled by the brightness of her hair and the strange lights in her eyes.

He tried to move away with his party, but Mrs. Judkins forestalled him. She trotted up and peeked over Noreen's shoulder. "Oh, Herbert!" she called. "Look here! This is an artist and she's painting a picture of this garden. It is this garden, isn't it, dearie?"

Noreen nodded, too convulsed with laughter to trust her voice.

"It's a real good likeness," Mrs. Judkins went on. "I don't wonder you want to paint this place. It's handsome, isn't it?"

"I don't think," said Noreen gravely, "that there is another like it anywhere in the world."

Mr. and Mrs. Judkins exchanged glances. So too did Noreen and Philip. Philip saw that Noreen thought he was trying to make a sale, and that she was trying to help him. At the realization he was inflamed by a sudden uncontrolable desire to sell the Nichols estate, whatever might be the consequences, to Old Tightwad Judkins

For five minutes Philip Fairbain worked hard to sell the Nichols place. He worked as he had never worked before; he worked as he had not worked even on the Clough property, or the Sea Breeze bungalow lots, or the Muggins apartment house. He spoke with conviction of the splendid location, of the beautiful view from the cupola, of the durability of the house construction and the really unusual way in which the grounds were laid out. Then he looked straight at Mr. and Mrs. Judkins and smiled his slow smile.

"I honestly think," he said, "that you'd find it what you want."

Mr. and Mrs. Judkins nudged each other.

"We think so too," said Mrs. Judkins.

Mr. Judkins nudged Mrs. Judkins again—hard. This time it was in rebuke instead of in agreement. He was accustomed to say that women had no sense about business. He was alarmed at his wife's break.

Philip was even more alarmed as the whole significance of what he had done crashed down upon him. He had been brought up to the letter of the law and the fear of his father, and he knew that if Mr. Burrage said that he didn't want his son to try to sell the Nichols estate that what he meant was that he didn't want his son to try to sell the Nichols estate.

"Still," said Philip, "the place has a good many disadvantages. I really shouldn't advise you to take it."

Mr. Judkins puckered up his eyes again in the manner of one who sees something on the horizon.

"What's your price on this?" he asked abruptly.

Philip was horrified. He gasped. He stammered. He took off his hat and thrust his hand back through his hair.

"I'm not making any price on it," he said.

"How's a hundred thousand?" asked Mr. Judkins.

Old Tightwad Judkins had never before out and out offered a hundred thousand dollars for anything in the world. To him it represented the apex of thoughtless extravagance. He and Mrs. Judkins whispered together.

To Philip there came clearly the way to stop further negotiations. He remembered what his father had said about selling the property for two hundred thousand dollars. He chose a figure which he thought conclusive.

"Two hundred and fifty thousand," he said. "Take it or leave it."

Mr. Judkins turned actually and thoroughly pale. He made a noise in his throat as if he were being strangled.

"I won't pay it," he piped.

"I wouldn't if I were you," said Philip. "It isn't worth it."

He began to walk toward the house. Mr. Judkins trotted after him.

"I'll give you a hundred and fifty thousand," he said.

"I won't discuss it," said Philip. "You'd better wait until Wednesday and make your offer to my father."

Mr. Judkins had had this bluff tried on him a great many times. But when he looked at Philip Fairbain he could see that it was not a bluff at all. The knowledge completely unmanned him.

Mr. and Mrs. Judkins pursued Philip down the graveled path and whispered as they went. The thought was clear in both their minds that if they waited until Wednesday they wouldn't have a chance.

Mr. Judkins choked once or twice over the words. Then he raised his voice.

"All right," he said. "Two hundred and fifty thousand. I'll take you."

Mrs. Judkins patted his arm approvingly.

Philip stopped. The geometrical figures of the French parterre danced giddily before his eyes. Once before he had felt like that—during his sophomore year when the ball had hit him on the head.

"We'll go right down to the office and draw up the papers," the terrible Mr. Judkins went on.

"We'd better wait——" Philip began.

"We won't wait at all," said Mr. Judkins. "You made me an offer and I took it. Now we'll go and fix it right up. We won't do any waiting at all. If you don't want to drive, I will."

Philip felt that in this game Mr. Herbert Tightwad Judkins was giving all the signals.

He hoped vaguely that the mid-Victorian Nichols house would collapse on them as they passed, but it continued to stand offensively erect.

He hoped that the car would be wrecked on the way back to town, but they were not even held up by traffic.

He hoped that the lawyer would be out, but he was in.

He hoped that Mr. Judkins would have a stroke of paralysis as he picked up the pen, but he did not. He signed with an extra flourish after the s on the line that the lawyer pointed out to him.

And then when the name was blotted and he knew that it committed Mr. Judkins to the payment of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the Nichols estate, Philip Fairbain was suddenly—unreasonably—elated.

IV

MR. G. H. BURRAGE returned the next afternoon and came to the office to catch up the odds and ends before dinner.

Philip went in to him at once before he should be sent for. His elation had passed. He did not look forward to the meeting with his father, but he stood up very straight on the wrong side of the mahogany desk and looked at him steadily out of blue eyes. He said briefly what he had come to say.

"While you were gone," he said, "I sold the Nichols estate to Mr. Judkins for two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The papers have been passed."

He made only one statement in his own defense.

"I didn't really try to sell it," he added, "much."

For what seemed a long time Mr. G. H. Burrage stared back at Philip Fairbain in silence. There was, after all, something not unlike in the directness of their gaze.

At last Mr. Burrage spoke.

"My gosh!" he said. "I wonder what you could do if you tried!"

Then he got up and shook his son Philip by the hand. There was nothing small about G. H. Burrage. He said that it was plain that he had underestimated Phil's ability, and that if Phil would drop in the next forenoon he would have the partnership papers ready.

Five minutes later Philip had Noreen Gordon on the telephone. He spoke, for Philip, rather fast, but steadily and with enormous earnestness.

"Hello," he said, "Noreen. I called to tell you that I'm going to take back that promise about never asking you to marry me. Noreen—are you going to be in at twelve minutes of five?"

There was a longish pause. When Noreen's voice came it sounded very faint and far away. Perhaps the line was bad Then: "Yes," said Noreen Gordon.

time back in—where is your town—back in Lorain?"

"Oh, my God!" Bruce ejaculated disgustedly. "I wish you could see one of their parties!"

Poppy walked on in silence, throug streets of old redstone houses, upon whos steps men and women were sitting in th breathless twilight.

Why he wanted to know her

THERE was no special reason for his coming to this dance, and then, in the brightly gleaming lights he saw her! Slender, dainty, radiant, she stood out from among all others like a softly flushing rose.

She was turned slightly from him when his eyes first found her, and he watched eagerly for a chance to see more clearly.

Suddenly, as if his gaze had drawn her, she raised her graceful head and looked at him. Was it possible that anything could be so sweet?

The faintly glowing color of her round cheek, melting into the cream of throat and shoulder. The pure whiteness of the low, broad brow, the coral of curving lips—she was like a delicate miniature on ivory.

For a breathless second he watched her, then hastened to his hostess. "Who is she?" he whispered, drawing his friend quickly toward her.

How Youth Can Spoil Youth

By Mme. Jeannette

Today I sat opposite a young girl in the street car. She had charming, piquant features and a wealth of dark brown hair —but, oh, her complexion!

The skin about her neck and her temples was sallow and dark, while on her face she had powder and rouge of the shades that should be used only by the fairest blonde.

How I did long to sit beside her and say, "My dear, did you look in the mirror before you came out? Don't you know that it is really tragic to spoil your pretty face as you have done today?"

For that is just the point. The proper, the correct way to use rouge and powder is the studying of your own particular type, and the deft accentuating of the color nature gave you.

Just take this girl, for example. Her complexion, from what I could see, where she had neglected to powder, must have been naturally dark.

But a good vanishing cream, such as Pompeian Day Cream, carefully used over face and neck would have softened and prepared the skin for the powder and rouge to blend naturally. They would not have stopped abruptly in the irregular lines shown on this girl's face.

Then the powder. She should have had the rich, creamy Rachel Beauty Powder that Pompeian has prepared for this dark type. And for rouge, Pompeian Bloom, the dark shade made especially for brunettes.

Here was a girl whose features were really lovely and who could very easily have been called a beauty—if she had used a little thought. There is no great knowledge or skill needed to make the best of oneself. Practical common sense in choosing good, pure creams and powders that are the correct shades, and a little care in the way they are used is all that is required.

Pompeian Orange-Tinted Rouge is charming at all times, and you will find it particularly good for daylight use.

—:—

Lip stick, too, plays an important part in improving the appearance. If the shape of your mouth is good, follow its curves with the lip stick. If the lines are not good, draw the lip stick from the inner side of the lips to the outer edge, and blend with the finger tips. Pompeian Lip Stick is absolutely pure, prevents chapping, and its shade is delightfully natural.

our sort of happiness is the pretense,' Poppy said, her face downcast. "All those Western girls paying so eagerly for men's meals, jabbering about Bohemianism and independence and genius—all that half baked socialist talk—things like Estella, today!"

"Estella knew what she was up against!" Bruce said gruffly in a pause. "She and Butch never made any bluff about it."

"No, but he's forty-four and she was eighteen," Poppy offered. "And Floss—I went to see her in the hospital yesterday. I don't know——"

"That sort of thing happens everywhere," Bruce countered awkwardly.

"Yes, I know," she said quickly and thickly. "But—of course the poor little scrap died, and Floss will be back in a few weeks, sitting on a table and banging her mandolin," Poppy resumed, with some little difficulty. "But—I didn't know. There's a baby in our apartment—such a busy, important looking little thing, in a little washed-out flannel jacket, always picking crumbs off his tray and looking at you so wisely—— It—it seems such a waste! And then when you see Harris, big and comfortable, drinking and laughing and shouting out to all the girls—I don't know——"

He glanced at her in consternation; she was crying.

They had been together ever since luncheon; now it was after five o'clock and both were tired. Bruce felt vexed at her, he resented this suddenly lachrymose and analytical mood that had been forced upon his own genial sense of delight in the best of all possible worlds.

"Buck up," he said unsympathetically. "Let's go up to Myrtle's and have dinner."

Poppy looked at him seriously; they had halted, on the Avenue, in the current of homegoing men and women. Poppy's mood was accentuated by the consciousness of somewhat disheveled hair, a somewhat flushed face, a general weariness.

"Bruce," she said suddenly, "they're spoiling you! You talk nowadays as you never did before. You listen to everything they say. You think—you think—I can't bear you to do it!"
